This brings us to speak of what has been accomplished in this city. In recognition of the basis upon which the success of manufacturing art and the increase of taste rested in Europe, namely, the existence of art collections as types and standards, and the education of the people in the first principles of art, the two agencies have been initiated in Boston and Massachusetts. Here we have the Museum of Fine Arts projected, and the foundations of the first wing are nearly completed, which if it ever take its proper place will be to Massachusetts, and possibly to all America, what South Kensington is to London and England, or the Louvre and the Ecole des Beaux Arts and the Polytechnique School of Paris are to Paris and France. In fact, with the experience of these famous institutions in Europe before us, there is no reason why a marked improvement cannot be made upon any one of these national organizations by the combination of the best features of each. The one limit to the good result to which these efforts may attain will be the difficulty of obtaining works of art of a sufficiently high character to be recognized as a national standard. The supply of masters, although it is not exhausted, in these modern days is actually limited in the number of specimens that exist in the world, and those who possess masterpieces by great artists are sufficiently attached to them to take care that they do not leave the respective countries in which they are at present owned. This applies only to the subject of paintings. All works of sculpture and of metal can be reproduced with absolute accuracy, and the reproductions are just as valuable for the purposes of art study as the originals. Added to this, the other branches of industrial and fine art may be so illustrated by reproduction in various ways, that a museum may be established in Boston as valuable to our purposes of education as if it were a bona fide antiquarian collection. It is in this respect that the museum of arts will be thoroughly supplied. The museum will afford a receptacle for such of the masterpieces of modern art as are obtainable, and by creating a public picture gallery to which wealthy citizens who already possess collections of pictures may leave their art treasures for the public benefit, an opportunity will be afforded for the massing of such private collections, and if this be done the museum will soon possess a by no means insignificant collection of specimens of ancient art. It will be found here, as it has already been found in England, that individuals who possess such gems of art as cannot be equalled or replaced will feel that the proper place for them is a public collection, where everybody can enjoy them and where their influence will be most widely felt. It is understood that the museum is not intended to be a mere lounging place for the idle. It is intended to offer facilities for education in art, to be illustrated by the collections which will ultimately be formed, so that even if professional schools of painting, to include training schools for art masters, be not undertaken by the trustees, if they be undertaken by the State or city as a part of their system of education the means of advanced education afforded at the Museum will be attainable. The prospect of accomplishing that part of the scheme is immediate. There are in this city such a number of connoisseurs and highly educated artists that it will be possible to establish professorships of the various art subjects—sculpture, painting, architecture and the technical processes of art. Only the collections at the Museum are needed to make this an accomplished fact.

DRAWING IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

The successful foundation of a system of instruction in the first principles of art, which is sure in time to be made as universal in this country as the common school system itself, may safely be predicated from what has been accomplished in Boston during the past two years. The great work has been initiated so quietly and in such a brief space of time that public attention has not been much called to it, and perhaps none but those who have been engaged in pushing it forward have understood how finely their efforts are succeeding. To a few members of the Boston school committee, advised and aided by some truly generous artists, belongs the honor of taking the first steps and preparing the way for introducing thorough instruction in art into the public schools. This was done in the year 1870, when the first report on the subject of drawing was made to the school board by a committee, of which Mr. William T. Brigham was chairman, and to whom great credit for awakening the attention of the members of the board to the importance of the subject is due. This report is especially interesting, as showing how feeble and desultory were the attempts made previous to the appointment of the committee, to provide any of the scholars in the public schools with a knowledge of the art. The programme of studies in the twelve wards of the city included drawing, but it was not followed. In the words of the committee: "There was a general feeling among the teachers that drawing was simply an accomplishment for those whose leisure might be amused by its exercise, and that the large majority of the children in their charge would be better off without it; and with this impression, joined to the knowledge that there were no examinations or requirements in this department for promotion to higher schools, it is not strange that the time, already insufficient, was found too short for drawing. In some schools the routine of taking out the books, allowing the children to play with pencil and paper for half an hour, and then putting away the result, often without examination, was virtuously performed. In a few schools instruction, and good instruction, was given by the master and his assistants; but this was very exceptional."

In the High and Latin schools some regular teaching was provided, but there was nowhere any system, from the primary to the high schools, and in the three sections of the city different methods were used in intermediate and upper schools. Practically there was scarcely anything accomplished. The committee made up their minds that the work of instruction must be done by regular teachers, and that a system of teaching to apply to all the schools must be adopted. At this time they perceived that the work of instruction should naturally begin in the primary schools, and they began to look about for means of educating the teachers to enable them to impart the necessary instruction. While considering what should be done the committee corresponded with Mr. Charles C. Perkins, who suggested that the proper thing to do was to send at once to South Kensington for a normal teacher, and urged such action upon the committee, and offered if that was done to procure the necessary models at his own expense and give them to the city. This suggestion was earnestly favored by the committee, and it has resulted in bringing to Boston the present year one of the most eminent teachers of industrial art in Europe, Mr. Walter Smith, to whom the direction of art instruction in the public schools has been given. On the 12th of April, 1870, it was ordered that one hour each week should be devoted to drawing in the grammar and primary schools, and the work of systematic instruction was begun. At the same time an interesting report was elicited from Mr. William M. Bartholomew, who had charge of drawing in the normal school and was for some years the only teacher of drawing in the public schools. In the first report of the committee the whole subject of art instruction was admirably reviewed, and the committee closed it by offering an order authorizing the employment of a teacher from the South Kensington school of art, and another order for the establishment of three evening schools for teaching drawing to adults and persons not in the public schools. The latter effort was rendered imperative by the passage of a law by the legislature compelling all towns and cities of more than ten thousand inhabitants to make provision for free instruction in industrial or mechanical drawing.

Under the able and energetic management of the drawing-room committee so much was accomplished that in their second annual report, made in July the present year, they were able to show a rapid advance in the scheme of art instruction. Both the teachers and scholars were found to be enthusiastic in receiving the instruction, and the happiest results were already evident. A system of general supervision was established and the schools were divided into districts, which were assigned to Messrs. Furneaux, Hitchings and Barry, who also had charge of the drawing classes in the girls' high and normal school, the English high school and Latin school respectively. In November, 1870, a free drawing school was opened at the rooms of the Institute of Technology, and over a thousand persons entered their names—many more being turned away on account of the impossibility of furnishing them with instruction. Classes in mechanical, architectural and free-hand drawing were instituted, and also a class in ship-drafting. For instruction in the latter subject an instructor was procured from the navy-yard. The school at once became a great success, and prepared the way for the establishment of other free classes the present season. The city council, which had not been able to sympathize with the efforts of the drawing committee, refused the necessary appropriation, but this did not prevent the making of the experiment in compliance with the law. Over six thousand dollars were expended for this school, the average expense for each student being $15.66. A notable event in connection with the subject was the gift by the American Social Science Association of the fine collection of casts to the girls' high and normal school, which adorns the large hall of that institution and renders it the best-equipped school for art instruction in the country.

As the employment of special instructors in sufficient number to meet the wants of the schools in Boston was quite out of the question, it was decided that the regular teachers could and must do the work, under suitable direction. After a careful consideration of the means to be used to carry into effect this important addition to our system of public education, a consideration which called for an examination of the systems in use in Belgium, France, Prussia and England, it was finally decided that the system in use in South Kensington should be the basis, while the Belgian and French methods, where they surpassed this in efficiency, might be grafted on. The engagement of Mr. Walter Smith as director of drawing in the public schools followed in mid-summer. The committee on drawing having received permission from the city council to employ a graduate of the South Kensington Art School, Mr. Cole, who is the eminent director of that institution, was written to, and in response to the request that he would recommend a competent teacher, Mr. Smith was suggested as the gentleman most competent to fill the position. That our English friends should have been willing to spare their ablest instructor in industrial art certainly speaks well for their interest in the advancement of art in this country. Mr. Smith has been identified with popular art education in England for many years, and has been head master of a number of the most important art schools in the provincial cities.—Leeds, Bradford, Wakefield and elsewhere. In fact he held the best position as an art master in the United Kingdom. Previous to his engagement, means were provided to enable him to visit Boston to see what was to be done, and he came out in May last. Finding what a splendid field lay before him he at once accepted the offer of the city in connection with the position of director of drawing for the State, which was also offered to him, and soon afterwards Mr. Smith returned with his family and took up his residence in this city. Before coming to reside here permanently, Mr. Smith selected a series of casts and models to place in the normal school of art of which he is at the head.

The rooms for this school are at present on the upper floor of the primary schoolhouse on Appleton street. There are two small lecture-rooms, and one large hall divided in the centre, in order to furnish accommodation for separate classes of teachers and also for the free evening classes which have been opened here. The accommodations are good in their way but very limited, and the erection of a large building for the normal art school is only a matter of time. The special teachers of drawing in the girls' high and normal school, the English high school, and the Latin school and the Roxbury and Dorchester high schools receive instruction from Mr. Smith, before the classes for the teachers begin, in consultation with him developing the best methods of simplifying education in drawing. The general outline of the plan of instruction is as follows: Every teacher must, once a fortnight, receive a lesson from Mr. Smith, which she will in turn impart to her pupils. Twice each year there will be an examination of every school, when each grade will have a model to draw in a certain time; the drawings will be labelled with the name of the school, pupil and teacher, and collected for Mr. Smith's inspection. In this way he will be able to see when any school falls behind, and where the trouble is, and at once go to that school and correct the faulty teacher; and, on the other hand, when the work shows an ability to profit by more difficult lessons in more advanced grades, the promotion can be made. Thus from the normal school the influence of this system is extended into every school within the city limits, for the teachers reproduce before their scholars the lessons which they receive from Mr. Smith.

[Conclusion next time.]

Choral Societies an Educational Board.

(From the London Orchestra.)

England is said to be not a musical nation; but the unprejudiced foreigner is free to admit England is no bad judge of the musical doings of other nations. There are thoughts in sounds, logic in harmony, and moral sense in the forms and spirit of compositions, and with regard to these points our countrymen and countrywomen are no mean critics. To those who look upon music as simply amusement—a soothing or irritation of the animal man—a low and often evil way of procuring gratification—music can find its appropriate base and insolent expression. It has its characteristics for all kinds of naughtiness, and there is more than enough of them to be seen in our music halls and the other too well known places of resort. The song and the dance, in their right estate pure and beautiful, can easily be turned and twisted into that which is debased and abominable; so much so as to deter the refined and thoughtful from participating in modes of musical art that are utter failures as means of pleasure or proper incitements to the imagination and the intellect. All this sort of music has its victory for a time, but meets with direct and fatal defeat in the end. It takes no real hold, although fruitful in mischief; it is felt to be injurious to the interests of the commonwealth, and the national instinct remains assured that this prostitution of a noble art is both calamitous and inglorious. It cannot rise, the school has no upward motion; it must descend; it is born of corruption leading to speedy degradation and ultimate dissolution. It possesses no good feeling, and is a stumbling-block to the moral sense.

England is without her grand national opera; for at present we have no composer who has the moral sense in music sufficiently strong to conceive a grand opera seria, nor even the range, finish, or accuracy of art to produce the make believe of the modern continental opera. Our opera composers have neither the moral sense, the earnestness, or the poetical—imaginative—power requisite to create the great musical drama. They cannot put on the abandon—the reprehensible play with sounds—so perfectly at command with our neighbors across the channel, for they have not the artistic resources, nor have they the power to conceal the unworthy, if not vicious, intent. Imitation of the French opera is impossible. The Southern opera is no less inapproachable, so much so, that Verdi is voted a mannerist and a bore, from the very impossibility of imitating him. The German dramatic composer is philosophical, but no dreamer; idealistic, but quite practical; a man, picturing the thoughts and actions of manhood. He can portray in his metaphysical method domestic life, military life, and the transcendental scenes of his myths and supernaturals. He paints them as facts, not abstractions; realities, not mere theatrical scenes. All this is beyond our music-makers. It is useless now to inquire into what might have been the result of the new Mendelssohn opera, but we incline to imagine it would neither have been very new, nor altogether inapproachable. It would have been like his sacred and cantata music, not too great in art to prove unfathomable, or too singular in feeling to have become unsympathetic. His death to England was a great loss, an incalculable loss, for since the days of Handel he alone was the only composer that used a school which made composers of our musicians. "You were players when I came here," said Handel; there was no one in England who could compose music: now you are all composers, and have ceased to be performers." Remembering the English oratorio—music manufactured here previous to the outburst of the "St. Paul," and the effect of the revelation of a mechanism within ordinary reach, although the spirit was beyond grasp, we may truly affirm that the music of Mendelssohn created a real army of composers in this country, and had he been permitted to pass on into the opera, the advantage to our native workers in sounds would have proved beyond measure incalculable. But he lived to make the choral society and the chorus singer. True it is we had our Choral Unions, Classical Harmonists, and Sacred Harmonic Society: there were the "Messiah" and the "Creation," and Mr. Surman had unearthed the unknown oratorios of the "Jephtha," the "Deborah," "Athalia," "Solomon," "Samson," "Israel in Egypt," "Judas Maccabeus," and other grand choral works of Handel. Louis Spohr had toned down the savage Briton, and Neukomm was appeasing his musical hunger with his tasteless hashes from Haydn and Mozart. But there was no real life, no unmistakable delight in oratorio music of modern make, and even Handel was a superstition, rather than a sympathetic faith. The oratorio of Mendelssohn made the choral societies move, brought in new thought and a chorus which could be universally sung throughout the kingdom. In one morning it put aside the cold imitations of Neukomm, and the "Sinai," and the "Daniel" were never more heard. Mendelssohn lowered his standard in the "Elijah" and the "Lobgesang," thus helping our musicians in modes of oratorio composition, but rendering it difficult to see what he could do either in freshness or power with his projected third oratorio. The "Elijah" became the popular work, not so much for its real dramatic character as for the sweet subjective movements relieving the progress of the creation. The composer gauged the moral sense of this country in music, and it was one with which he fully sympathized. To as much of the hard-hitting common sense of Handel as he could command, he added the tender gentleness and sustained belief of Sebastian Bach. Mendelssohn came with the Bach feeling, if not with the Bach mode of expression. He was forcible in his execution because he was serious, he was soft and gentle because he was tender and true. In his thanksgivings he turned towards Handel, in his litanies towards Sebastian Bach. In either case it was the music which gave joy and delight, and the nation felt that the real purpose and end of music was now put into its hands, and where there was one choral society, now there might be ten. Handel had hitherto been the educator of the national mind, the creator of the moral sense in harmony; now there was one of lower frame with the same intent who could enlarge the circle and give new impetus in the opening up of the many great choral works, so out of hand and so little known. Mendelssohn brought out of its tomb, where it had slept for a century, the great "Passions" of Bach; his opinion led to the production of the Grand Mass of Beethoven; Exeter Hall took a new lease, and the country festivals drew in fresh breath and new power. The choral societies increased, and then arose the Handel Festival. All this activity arose from the moral sense in the music and its perception by the moral sense of the country. It was not that the people were turning more religious, but that they felt there were master-spirits dealing with music in its highest form, and portraying subjects of the deepest importance, in a way which their judgment approved, and one not too difficult for their grasp. This unmistakable growth in oratorio performances has led to the successful institution of Mr. Barnby's Oratorio Society; and now we see advertised a proposed gathering up of the metropolitan choral forces in the Royal Albert Hall. The choir in this place is to consist of sixteen hundred voices, under the superintendence of the Hon. Seymour Egerton, and under the guidance and conductorship of M. Charles Gounod.

Mr. Barnby has made the wonderful master-piece of Sebastian Bach a household book in England. Some idea of the education in music amongst the unmusical inhabitants of this country may be gathered from this fact: when some thirty or forty years ago certain enthusiasts proposed to bring out the eight-part vocal motets of Sebastian Bach, Sir George Smart, to whom the proposal was referred, said, "It is impossible, we have no singers here who can sing this music." Mr. Barnby produced a much more difficult work—the "Passion"—with but few rehearsals and with the most undeniable success.—Mr. Henry Leslie also has had sung at his concerts one or two of these eight impracticable motets, much to the delight of his numerous auditory. We have now three choral societies of great power and almost unlimited resources.

There are the not well-known compositions of Sebastian Bach, such as his Christmas Oratorio and his Easter Cantata, not to mention his many large and interesting Festival Anthems. There are also the not well-known compositions of Handel. As the Anthems and Oratorios of Sebastian Bach demand re-scoring, so the secular oratorios—the unknown classical dramas of Handel—required revision and remodelling. What magnificent music is there lying in these unknown deposits of his learning and genius, and to which nothing short of the great choral societies, now in existence, can give full justice. The educational result gained by the production of these unknown works would be immense. It is a simple question of the patronage of the public. There is no lack of enterprise, no want of talent.

With M. Gounod and Sir Michael Costa we have towers of strength; but there is one man living to whom we think it most desirable that some work of Handel should be given to re-model in his own way; need we say Richard Wagner? The undertaking might shed a new light upon Wagner, and teach him to make his rough places plain, and his crooked, straight; and if so, we think it possible that Wagner, Handel, and the British public would all be gainers by the experiment.

*Handel remodelled by Wagner!!!—Ed.

Musical Correspondence.

CHICAGO, DEC. 20. The current of events has begun to resume its former tranquillity in this town. Folks that were burned out and ruined have discovered that they still live, and somehow manage to keep the pot boiling. The day after the fire it did look rather discouraging. Of the awful magnitude of the loss no one can really form a true conception. An immense number of people are dependent on charity, and will be for the entire winter. Still there is very little street begging—none I may say. Building has been pushed to the most wonderful extent. Messrs. J. V. Farwell & Co. are now occupying the lower three stories of their new five-story building on Monroe street, built on the site of their former warehouse. This large building is of brick, about fifty by two hundred feet. The Tribune makes out that about three miles and a half of frontage have already been rebuilt with permanent and, for the most part, solid structures of brick, many of them with stone trimmings. The recent cold snap (in which the thermometer went down to twelve or fifteen degrees below zero) has temporarily suspended brick-laying. But I have no doubt it will be actively resumed should a warm spell of weather favor us. Soon after the fire an advertisement was widely circulated for situations for music-teachers. Some eight places were offered, and notice was conspicuously given in the Tribune and copied in some of the other city papers; but not more than two teachers offered themselves as ready to leave the city. Several others came to see if there were any private relief funds to be given out.

The Messrs. Tieset, two brothers, of whose excellent doings I wrote you last winter, in the first panic rushed off to Philadelphia. But they are back here again now, and, I hope, doing well. Mr. Heman Allen, probably our best violin teacher, and one of the best piano teachers, has two offices, one on the South side, and one on the West. Mr. Goldbeck is the only man we have with enterprise enough to give lessons on both sides at once, by telegraph—and his is not yet in operation.

In my former communications I find I have failed to award due recognition to that exceedingly argumentative mortal, Mr. Paul Becker. Mr. Becker has been longer resident of Chicago than any other teacher here, but, being of an industrious turn of mind and always full of pupils, he has not found it necessary to make a noise about his being here. He was a pupil of the same master as Theo. Kullak of Berlin; though who that master may have been I have not the slightest idea. Besides, this proves nothing, as I infer from the fact that I happen to know a man who was made by the same Creator as Daniel Webster—yet the man I know is not great nor "god-like." But Mr. Becker is an excellent musician of the older school. His pianoforte technique is based on the school of Hummel, and is of unusual extent. His artistic readings are musician-like, but his touch is a little hard, which hinders the beauty of his Chopin interpretations. In teaching he makes great account of playing four-hand music with his pupils, an excellent idea—especially if they are pretty and clever. Mr. Becker, however, has no especial predilection for the class I have named; indeed he finds the other sort less distracting. Mr. Becker has written a number of very clever and musician-like pieces for the pianoforte, but they were not significant nor striking enough to gain currency. As the case now stands he is one of our very best teachers, and I have pleasure in performing the agreeable duty of introducing him to the immortality of DWIGHT'S JOURNAL. Mr. Robert Goldbeck, whom I suppose you know for the author of a number of remarkably clever and thoughtful essays on musical topics, is said to be a fine pianist. He has never played in public here within four years, and my testimony to his merits is second-hand only. He tells me he is full of pupils—and that means a good deal, for he has a Conservatory and teaches six in a class. Putting six in a class seems to me to be "cutting it rather fine," so to speak, but probably they know best. I have been trying it myself with three in a class and it works capitally—much better than I thought it would.

In the world of business there are a number of changes. Root & Cady have sold their sheet-music catalogue to the Brainards at a very fair price. They go out of sheet-music trade entirely. Mr. George F. Root has withdrawn from the firm, and with his brother W. A. Root, and his two sons, F. W., and Chas. T. Root, has organized the firm of Geo. F. Root & Sons; they will deal in sheet-music and music-books. Root & Cady continue in their organ, piano, and imported goods trade, and the publication of their music-books. Mr. Wm. Lewis is admitted to the firm. Root & Cady were doing business at the time of the fire, on a basis of upwards of $500,000 a year. Mr. W. W. Kimball continues. His resources were ample, as he bought on thirty days time and sold on long time and easy payments. He has moved his store to his residence on Michigan Avenue, where he has room for about one hundred pianos. Messrs. A. Reed & Sons have taken a room over a livery stable, as the visitor's nose will be likely to inform him. But financially they are in excellent odor, and have a large stock of pianos on hand. J. Bauer & Co. have a store on Michigan Avenue, near Root & Cady, in the same house with a pawn-broking establishment; so a fellow can pawn his coat and buy a fiddle without leaving the premises. This is really handy.

Messrs. Lyon & Healy is the name of a firm comparatively unknown in the east, outside of musical circles. They began business here about six years and a half ago, and the first year sold about $180,000 of goods. The fact that they were the Western representatives of Messrs. O. Diston & Co., gave them a good start from the first; and this notwithstanding the fact that Messrs. Root & Cady at that time seemed to have a monopoly of the music trade of the West. Lyon & Healy began in a small store on the corner of Clark and Washington Sts. The premises proving too small for them, they moved into Smith & Nixon's hall, where they had ample scope. The piano department was carried on by Smith & Nixon, an old and wealthy firm, for seventeen years representatives of the Steinways, here and at Cincinnati. In January, 1870, they moved into a magnificent store in Drake's Block, Wabash Avenue and Washington St., having a frontage of 90 feet on Wabash Avenue, and 50 feet on Washington. The building was five stories high, and the rent even higher—$20,000 a year. Here they had the finest music store ever seen in this country. Their business had increased, meanwhile, to upwards of $500,000 a year, making the largest music trade west of Boston. In September of the same year, they were burnt out. They then took a store on Clark street, where they had four stories, about 180 ft. by 30 ft. The recent fire came within a year of the former one, and caught them with a very heavy stock of all kinds of goods, especially of pianos, of which they had about a hundred burned—most of them Steinways.

In November 1868, Lyon & Healy commenced the publication of The Musical Independent, a quarto of thirty-two pages, sixteen of which were new music. Of the character of this magazine I need not speak. De mortuis nil nisi bonum, you know—and my relations to the dear deceased were of so tender and intimate a character as to forbid my enlarging on the topic. I merely pause here to erect a monument to its memory, which in token of its distinctively Western character I would inscribe

To the Memory of
THE MUSICAL INDEPENDENT.
"It done its level best."

Requiescat in pace.

Since the fire Lyon & Healy sold their sheet-music catalogue to your publishers, Messrs. O. Ditson & Co., and so found themselves unable to continue the Musical Independent for want of music plates to fill its pages.

This leaves Chicago with just one musical paper, The Song Messenger—a name that sounds "sappy," as Mr. Wm. Mason would say. It has a very large circulation, amounting to 12,000 monthly. Brainerd's Musical World (published at Cleveland) has the same amount of circulation. This indicates, I think, that the field of musical journalism is steadily enlarging. I look forward confidently to the time in the immediate future, when a circulation of 20,000 will not be remarkable for a musical journal.* About the same time I expect musical editors to arrive at the habit of comprehensive treatment of topics coming legitimately before them: a treatment equally removed from puffery and sourness.

Our principal amusements are lectures. These are given in churches and exceedingly well attended.

DER FREYSCHUETZ.

*How trashy will a Journal have to be to reach that figure?—Ed.

PHILADELPHIA.—The concert business is lively in the old Quaker City, to judge from the following list which appeared in the Post last month:

- Nov. 11. Germania Orchestra. Musical Fund Hall. 3½ p.m.
- Nov. 16. Carl Wolfsohn's Second Orchestral Concert.
- Nov. 18. Germania Orchestra.
- Nov. 18. C. H. Jarvis's First Concert. Chickering Rooms.
- Nov. 21 to Nov. 25, inclusive. Thomas's Orchestra. Academy of Music. Five evening performances, one matinée.
- Nov. 25. Germania Orchestra.
- Nov. 30. Carl Wolfsohn's Third Orchestral Concert.

- Dec. 1. Wenzel Kopta's Second Quartet Concert. Chickering Rooms.
- Dec. 2. Germania Orchestra.
- Dec. 2. Beethoven Society. First Concert. Academy of Music.
- Dec. 7. Carl Wolfsohn's Fourth Orchestral Concert.
- Dec. 9. Germania Orchestra.
- Dec. 9. Cross and Jarvis's First Orchestral Concert. Musical Fund Hall.
- Dec. 11. Nilsson Opera Troupe. Two weeks.
- Dec. 15. Abt. Society. First Concert. Musical Fund Hall.
- Dec. 16. Germania Orchestra.
- Dec. 16. C. H. Jarvis. Second Concert.
- Dec. 19. West Philadelphia Choral Society. 1st Concert. Musical Fund Hall.

- Dec. 23. Germania Orchestra.
- Dec. 28. Carl Wolfsohn's fifth matinée.
- Dec. 30. Germania Orchestra.

The new year will bring us the Germania opera troupe, with Wachtel, in January; the Parepa-Rosa troupe in February; Five concerts by the Wolfsohn orchestra; Two from the Cross and Jarvis orchestra; Five from Mr. Jarvis; Five from the Parlor Concert Club; Two from Wenzel Kopta; One from Mrs. Moulton; One from the West Philadelphia Choral; Two from the Beethoven; Two from the Handel and Haydn; One from the Dolby Troupe. Another season from the Thomas Orchestra, and almost as many more to be announced in the proper time.

We add notices of a few of these concerts from the Bulletin:

Dec. 11. On Saturday evening, when the first symphony concert of Messrs. Cross and Jarvis's series took place at the Musical Fund Hall, the attendance was very good. The Orchestra was large, well-balanced and well trained. The overture to The Magic Flute opened the performance, and it was admirably played. Then followed Beethoven's concerto in C minor, in which Mr. Jarvis performed the piano part in most brilliant style. After this came Mendelssohn's violin concerto, op. 64, in which the playing of Mr. Wenzel Kopta was all that could be desired by the most exacting of critics. Schubert's really grand symphony in C concluded the concert, and it was given remarkably well, considering that this was the first attempt of the new organization in a work of such importance. The next concert will be given February 3d, when Beethoven's fourth symphony will be on the programme.

The first "parlor concert," of the twelfth season given under the auspices of Miss Anna Jackson, took place in the Foyer of the Academy of Music, on Saturday afternoon. The audience was a large one for the room, and it included many of our most cultivated musical people. The Philadelphia String Quartet Club played Haydn's No. 1, in G, in the most artistic manner. It is a charming composition, full of grace and feeling, and each movement was interpreted with true intelligence. Mr. Gulemann's playing in two movements from Chopin's concerto in F minor was also very delightful. One of the most admirable of all the pieces was the concerto by Haydn, for violoncello, in which Mr. Rudolph Hennig's supreme mastery of his noble instrument more than ever delighted his hearers. Beethoven's Serenade, for string instruments, played with the utmost elegance, concluded this very enjoyable entertainment.

Dec. 15. The second of Mr. Jarvis's series of classical soirées will be given this evening at Dutton's piano warerooms, No. 1128 Chestnut street. The following exceedingly attractive programme will be offered:

- Piano and 'Cello. Sonata, op. 22, A maj. Sterndale Bennett. Messrs. Jarvis and Hennig.
- Solo 'Cello. Concerto in E minor. Lindner.
- Rudolph Hennig.
- Piano Solo. "Toccata." Schumann.
- Charles H. Jarvis.
- Violin Solo. "Adagio," 9th Concerto. Spohr.
- Wenzel Kopta.
- Trio. Piano, Violin and 'Cello, op. 1, No. 3, C minor. Beethoven.

Messrs. Jarvis, Kopta and Hennig.

These concerts are exceptionally fine, and those of our readers who are fond of good music, presented in a most exquisite manner, cannot afford to remain away from them.

The first concert of the Beethoven Society, for the present season, will be given on Saturday evening next, at the Academy of Music. There will be a full orchestra, and the superb chorus of the Society. The following will be offered:

- Overture, "Jubilee." Von Weber.
- Cantata, "Erl King's Daughter." Gade.
- For Soprano, Contralto, Baritone and Chorus.
- Miss Clara Landerbach, Mrs. A. H. Darling, Dr. E. G. Bullard, and Beethoven Society.
- Chorale Fantasia. Beethoven.
- For Piano, Chorus and Orchestra.
- Mr. Carl Wolfsohn.
- Four-Part Song—"Farewell to the Forest." Mendelssohn.
- March and Chorus from Tannhäuser. Wagner.

The Second Concert of the present season, will take place at the Academy of Music, on Saturday evening, February 17th, 1872. The programme will embrace a chorus of Mozart, "The Spring Message," by Gade, "The Spinning Song," from Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," a quartet, and "Ruins," by Beethoven, and "Legend of the Storm," a chorus for male voices, by Lachner.

The Third Concert will take place at the Academy, on Saturday evening, April 20th, 1872. The programme for this concert will consist of Hiller's cantata of the "Song of the Spirits over the Waters," the "Hymn of Praise" of Mendelssohn, the "Water Lily," by Gade, and "Gipsy Life," of Schumann.

Mr. Carl Wolfsohn's superb orchestra will give its third grand concert in the Academy of Music on Thursday afternoon next (Thanksgiving Day). An unusually fine programme has been arranged. Five of the six selections are entirely new in this country, and all of them we know are choice and beautiful. Mr. Hennig's solo particularly deserves to be mentioned with enthusiasm. The following is the programme:

- Symphony, D major, (first time). Haydn.
- Overture, "Hebriden." Mendelssohn.
- Solo 'Cello, Introduction, Andante (first time). Lubek.
- Mr. Hennig.
- Waltz, "La Bouquetiere" (first time). Godfrey.
- Humoresque, Morceau Characteristique, (1st time). Spindler.
- Packeltans, No. 4, C major, (first time). Meyerbeer.

DEATH OF JOHN C. B. STANBRIDGE.

The musical world of Philadelphia will hear with the most sincere regret of the unexpected death of Mr. John C. B. Standbridge, which occurred at his residence, 317 South Twenty-second street, last night. The death of his wife and the more recent death of his son have weighed heavily upon him, and he has succumbed under the pressure and passed peacefully and painlessly away.

Mr. Standbridge was a native of Birmingham, England, but came to this country in early childhood. He was about seventy years of age at the time of his decease. His original profession was that of a druggist, but having cultivated a taste for music, he abandoned his business and confined himself to the profession of an organist and composer. Of an extremely sanguine temperament, and dissatisfied with the church organs on which he played, he conceived the idea of building an organ for himself, and this purpose led to his entering upon the business of organ building as his regular pursuit.

For many years, Mr. Standbridge has occupied one of the most prominent positions among American organ-builders, and his instruments are in use in many of our largest churches, such as the Cathedral, St. Clement's, Calvary, the new Synagogue, St. Andrew's, the Arch Street Methodist Church, and many others. They are celebrated for peculiar brilliancy and variety of tone, and minute delicacy of mechanism and general finish. Mr. Standbridge regarded his business purely as an art, and constantly lavished expenditure upon it, which precluded any considerable profit from his work, over which he often lingered with an almost child-like enthusiasm.

Personally, Mr. Standbridge was a man who never made enemies. Impetuous and nervous in manner, he was always true and upright to the smallest detail. Simple in tastes and habits, devoted to his profession, single minded in all the purposes of life, a good citizen and a faithful head of a large family, he has passed away full of years, and leaving behind him a reputation which those who come after him may well emulate.—Ibid, Dec. 15.

NEW YORK. The concert lately given by Miss ANTOINETTE STERLING has called forth the most glowing newspaper notices, of which a friend has clipped out one for us. She has not a few friends here in Boston who will rejoice in her success.

MISS STERLING'S CONCERT. The spacious Steinway Hall, floor and gallery, was crowded on Saturday evening with a fashionable and intelligent audience, genuine lovers of good music, who came expecting a rare treat, and were not disappointed. There were Mr. F. Ritter, the distinguished musician and composer, and his equally accomplished wife, Mrs. Fanny Raymond Ritter; Dr. E. G. Bartlett, the most remarkable alto in America, who has persisted for a quarter of a century in restricting his voice to the parlor; Miss Maria Brainerd, the popular soprano; Miss Toedt, the admirable violinist; Mrs. Jameson, a vocalist of high repute; Mr. Lasar and his daughter, who is already winning high praise in musical circles; Mr. Bowman, the excellent critic of the Sun, and hosts of others well-known in the artistic and newspaper world, whom to name would occupy a column. It was an audience which, in itself, was the highest possible compliment to Miss Sterling, and a tangible evidence of the appreciation of this distinguished artist's conscientious efforts in the promotion of high art.

Of the performance it is scarcely necessary to speak at length. Every selection was first class and skillfully interpreted by the best musicians. The string quartet, Dr. Damrosch, Messrs. Schuessel, Matzka, and Bergner, played a quartet of Schubert magnificently. The blending of the instruments was especially fine, no one taking undue prominence.

The Andante was delicious, and the Presto so brilliantly vivacious as to infect the heads of all the audience to nod in unison to its sprightly measures. They also played the Andante con Variazioni (A Major) of Beethoven with superb effect. Dr. Damrosch, with Karl Eisner at the piano, rendered the Andante of Mendelssohn's masterly E Minor Concerto with the pure expression of artists thoroughly imbued with the true meaning of the composition. The introduction of the men's quartet, Messrs. Bush, Rockwood, Beckett and Aiken, gave a delightful variety to the programme. They sang Cook's old but always fresh "Strike the Lyre," and, in response to a hearty encore, sang "Retire, my love," by Horsley. These voices harmonized excellently, and unite as one with fine effect. Mr. Mills, one of the very few pianists in this country entitled to the name of a great artist, played, in his usual brilliant manner, a study of Chopin, and his own sparkling "Saltarella."

And now we come to Miss Sterling, the central figure of the evening's delightful entertainment. On her appearance she was most cordially welcomed. The lady who sat next to us remarked that she was magnificently dressed—a little attention which seems to be indispensable to the success of an artist in this day of extravagance in everything. Her selections were: Rec. and Rondo—"L'Italiana in Algeri," Rossini; Songs—a "Der Doppelgänger," Schubert; b "Allnächstlich im Traume," Schumann; c "Neue Liebe," Mendelssohn; and "Caller Herrin," by Gow, and for encores she gave two popular ballads. Miss Sterling sings the Italian music with as great and unqualified success as the songs of Schubert and Schumann, which she has made peculiarly her own. Her execution on this occasion surpassed herself. It was the performance of a true artist, who, by long and ardent study, has mastered the compositions, and is able to give them their true interpretation. Besides being in excellent voice, Miss Sterling seemed inspired by the cordiality of her reception. We have never heard her sing better, whether in the difficult solos, or in the exquisite glee, "O my love is like the red, red rose," with Messrs. Bush, Rockwood and Aiken, in which she sang the first tenor part. Her chest tones are the most remarkable in her voice, and are round, pure, and free from the roughness too often found in artists of the highest reputation.

But we cannot dwell longer on this delightful concert. It was a rich feast from first to last, and although it continued for over two hours, it seemed scarce half that length. Floral tributes were numerous, the Arion Society recognizing Miss Sterling's merit, by the compliment rarely given by societies to any artist, of a very handsome basket of flowers.

FARMINGTON, CONN. That devoted laborer in the cause of classical culture in music,—too loyal to his art ideal to be tempted out of the quiet sphere which he has filled so many years,—Mr. KARL KLAUSER, sends us two more of those choice programmes of chamber music with which he every year regales and educates his pupils in Miss Porter's Young Ladies' School. Here they are:

55th Concert, Nov. 23.

- Sonata, for Piano and Violin, G. op. 30, No. 3. Beethoven.
Allegro assai. Tempo di Menuetto ma molto moderato e grato. Allegro vivace.
Songs, a. "Du bist die Ruh," op. 59, No. 3. Schubert.
b. "Gretchen am Spinnrad," op. 2, No. 1. Schubert.
Sonata, for Piano, B minor, op. 10, No. 3. Liszt.
Nocturne, A. No. 4, by Field, trans. for Violin, Damrosch.
Songs, a. "Seit ich ihn gesehen," op. 42, No. 1. Schubert.
b. "Er, der Herrliche von Allen," op. 42, No. 2. Schubert.
Rondo, for Piano and Violin, B minor, op. 70. Schubert.

56th Concert, Nov. 24.

- Sonata, for Piano and Violin, A minor, op. 106. Schumann.
Mit leidenschaftlichem Ausdruck. Allegretto. Lebhaft.
Song, "Loreley." Liszt.
Thirty-two variations, C minor. Beethoven.
Three Sonata Movements. Veracini.
Menuett and Gavotte. Cantabile. Gigue. 1686—1750?
Songs, a. "Lustelust," op. 8, No. 7. Schubert.
b. "Am Manzanara," op. 11, No. 10. Schubert.
Sonata, for Piano and Violin, B minor, op. 63. Raff.
Bewegt, mit elegischem Pathos. Sehr rasch und fein.
Nicht zu langsam. Bewegt, sehr bestimmt.

The pianist was Mr. F. von Inten, who, we learn, has made important progress, having gained in strength and freedom, and playing always with clearness and refinement. The Liszt Sonata was new to the audience, and the Beethoven Variations nearly so. He played them both from memory, besides a Suite by Bargiel, the second Ballade of Chopin and several things by Heller. Dr. Damrosch, conductor of the Arion in New York, is well known as a violinist of the first rank in the rendering of classical works. Besides the things set down for him, he played the second and third movements of Mendelssohn's Concerto.—The singer was Mme. Damrosch, who made a very favorable impression by her intelligent and sympathetic rendering of the songs of Schubert, Schumann, &c. Her voice is not a great one, but she sings from the heart and to the heart.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, DEC. 30, 1871.

Notes on the Thomas Concerts.

II.

The third concert, Saturday evening, Dec. 2, offered the following programme:

- Overture, "Egmont".....Beethoven.
Andante and Menuetto, Symphony in C, Op. 30. Bargiel.
Concerto, No. 4, D minor, op. 70.....Rubinstein.
Miss Marie Krebs and Orchestra.
Musikzug, "Loreley".....Max Bruch.
Overture, "Tannhäuser".....Wagner.
Deutsche Tänze.....Schubert.
Solo, for Harp.....Parish Alvars.
Signor Luigi Rocco and Orchestra.
Waltz, "Thousand and One Night".....Strauss.
Humoreske, "Gaudamus Igitur".....Liszt.

The two familiar Overtures, each great in its way (but the Beethoven way by far the better one), were capably rendered. The Schubert Dances followed as delightful recreation after Tannhäuser; both in themselves, and in the order in which they were strung together, and in the felicitous orchestration (by Herbeck, if we mistake not), and of course in the rendering, they were exquisitely perfect; no "light," gay music could be more poetic. The movements from the Symphony by Bargiel have left no very marked impression on our mind, yet we remember feeling that we should be glad to hear them again. A clearer character, a more decided charm was felt in the Rubinstein Concerto, which seemed to be a composition with some genius in it, or at least geniality,—not forced or morbid,—and which Miss KREBS played (from memory as usual) not only with ease and accuracy, but with both power and delicacy, and with good expression. The "Loreley" introduction was a rather interesting specimen of one of the most genial of the new composers. The solo on the Harp was a rare and charming piece of virtuosity, certainly well worth hearing. Of the rest we cannot report: but it was Strauss and Liszt, and we all know them and whether we desire more acquaintance of the one or of the other.

Fourth Concert, Dec. 4.

- Vorspiel to "Die Meister Säger von Nuernberg." Wagner.
Concerto, for Violin, D, Op. 61, 1st movement. Beethoven.
Mr. Bernhard Listemann and Orchestra.
Toccata, Op. 7.....Schumann.
Miss Marie Krebs.
Symphonie Poem, "Fest-Klänge".....Liszt.
Serenade, F, Op. 68.....Volkmann.
String Orchestra.
Concerto Symphonique, No. 4, Op. 102.....Litolff.
Adagio Religioso—Scherzo.
Miss Marie Krebs and Orchestra.
Waltz, "New Vienna".....Strauss.
March.....Schubert.

Save us from more acquaintance with the Introduction to the Meistersinger! It is hard, harsh, forced and noisy, ever on the verge of discord (having the ungenial effect of discord, however literally within the rules of counterpoint). It is a kind of music which does not treat you fairly, but bullies you, as it were, by its superior noise or bulk, as physically big men are prone to do who can so easily displace you on the sidewalk. We doubt not there is better music in the Meistersinger, for this could never have won the prize before any guild, whether of "old foggy" Philistines or fresh young hearts.—Never have we heard Mr. LISTEMANN to greater advantage than in this last rendering of the first movement of the Beethoven Concerto; it was all clear, broad, strong and full of verve; his talent as a solo violinist surely stands among the highest. Miss Krebs had a most exacting and exhausting task in that Toccata by Schumann, in which an extremely difficult and rapid figure is kept up unceasingly, and to the ear almost monotonously, through so long a time. Yet there is a real fire in the movement, and she brought it out with steady and unflinching power.

The Lisztian Symphonie Poem: "Festival Sounds," left us in far from a festive state of mind. A wild and demoniacal festivity prevails in it, with moments here and there of an uplifting rhythm and sweet euphony. For the Serenade by Volkmann was substituted something more like a set of dances. We found the Concerto Symphonique by Litolff quite interesting and original, particularly in the Scherzo, which showed much inventive fancy. The Schubert March of course was an arrangement for orchestra from the piano; a march with a good deal of the eastern Tartar element of Schubert in its short, reiterative rhythm; and all those marches which he wrote for four hands are worthy of an orchestra.

The fifth concert (Wednesday afternoon, Dec. 6) presented the following variety:

- Overture, "Rosamunde".....Schubert.
Adagio. Scherzo, Op. 42.....Rubinstein.
Concerto, No. 1, E flat.....Liszt.
Miss Marie Krebs and Orchestra.
Introduction and Finale, "Tristan und Isolde".....Wagner.
Overture, "Der Freyschütz".....Weber.
Romance, in G.....Beethoven.
Mr. Joseph Dies.
Saltarello.....Gounod.
a. Prelude. b. Waltz.....Chopin.
Miss Marie Krebs.
March.....Raff.

All the pieces of Part First, except the Concerto, were given for the first time in Boston. Schubert's Overture to "Rosamunde" is pleasing, but rather light and slight compared with the two other Overtures which we have heard by him. The two movements by Rubinstein were beautiful, full of originality and power, logical in development and rich in instrumentation. To every listener they must have suggested life upon the Ocean. The Adagio in its more tranquil passages even reminds you of Mendelssohn's Meeresstille Overture, and the Scherzo is full of rollicking, wild sailor sport. It awakened a desire to hear his "Ocean Symphony" entire. This Adagio and Scherzo, published with the same opus number (42), were after-thoughts, a sort of appendix to the Symphony, and we are told that they are better than the corresponding movements in the Symphony itself.

The Introduction and Finale to "Tristan and Isolde" is just one of those Wagner pieces about which we would suspend judgment. On a single hearing, the Introduction pleased us much better than the Finale; parts of it sounded as if Schumann might have written it. Liszt's E-flat Concerto (we have heard it now repeatedly by Miss Topp, Miss Mehlig and Miss Krebs) does not begin to captivate us; to our spirit it does not minister as music should. It was wonderfully well played of course.

A grander rendering of Weber's great romantic Overture could hardly be desired; most familiar of Overtures, it was still fresh and marvellous. Beethoven's well known Romance for the Violin did not sound so well upon the Cello, nor did the performer put much vital inspiration into it. Gounod's Saltarello was a welcome repetition, one of the most original and taking of the novelties which Mr. Thomas has spread before us in such great abundance. The March by Raff is the last movement of the Orchestra Suite which we have heard by him, and to our mind the least interesting portion of that composition.

Sixth Concert, Friday Evening, Dec. 8.

- Symphony, No. 3, "Im Walde," Op. 158.....Raff.
Concerto, for Piano, Violin and Cello, op. 58. Beethoven.
Larghetto—Rondo a la Polacca.
Miss Krebs, Messrs. Listemann, Dies and Orchestra.
Eine Faust Overture.....Wagner.
Prelude.....Bach.
Scherzo, "Kapuziner Predigt, Wallensteins Lager".....Rheinberger.
Tarantelle di Bravura, "Masaniello".....Liszt.
Miss Marie Krebs.
March, B minor.....Schubert.

Instead of the "triple Concerto" of Beethoven, the first movement of his great E-flat Concerto was brilliantly performed by Miss KREBS, the orchestra conspiring to perfection. The Bach Prelude, a very bright and animated one, was new to us, and wholesomely refreshing after a depressing and discouraging Faust Overture by Wagner, under the leaden and tormented atmosphere of which we had sate too many times before to wish to repeat the experience. Raff's "Forest" Symphony, if not entirely satisfactory, not transporting like a Beethoven "Pastoral," was nevertheless so interesting in some parts that we could desire farther acquaintance with it. Schiller's Capucin's mock sermon was grotesque enough, but in our memory does not stand out distinguishable among the many novel extravaganzas of that whole week of mingled Witches' Sabbath and Parnassus. Schubert's nomadic, restless, oriental sounding minor March seemed genial after that and the Liszt Tarentella.

The seventh concert, set down for Saturday afternoon, gave way, by graceful courtesy on the part of Mr. Thomas, to the musical festival of the 1200 Public School children in honor of the Grand Duke Alexis; and a very beautiful, inspiring occasion that was. But the eighth programme, for that Saturday evening, was by far the finest and the noblest of the whole series, to-wit:

Overture, "Bride of Messina," op. 100 Schumann.
Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue Bach.
 Miss Marie Krebs.
Scherzo, Adagio. Symphony No. 9, D minor, op. 125. Beethoven.
Kaiser March Wagner.
Concerto, No. 2, A Liszt.
 Miss Marie Krebs and Orchestra.
Theme and Variations, Quartet, D minor. Posthumous. Schubert.
 String Orchestra.
Waltz, "Herperusbahnen" Strauss.
Introduction—Chorus and March, 8d Act, Lohengrin, Wagner.

The older we grow in Schumann, the more desire we feel to hear whatever he has written. The Overture to Schiller's "Bride of Messina" proved worth the hearing, has fine suggestions (disappointing on the whole), but is by no means a work of such importance as his "Genoveva" and his "Manfred" Overtures. Those who heard Miss KREBS play Bach's "Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue" in one of our own Symphony Concerts last year, need not be told with what consummate clearness and vitality she played it this time. Indeed it is the very best thing in which to hear her, while the composition in itself is one of the finest ever made for the piano: the recitative and the great chords in the first part are wonderfully impressive.

To hear the Scherzo of all Scherzos and the Adagio of Adagios so exquisitely, so perfectly interpreted as those two middle movements of the Ninth Symphony were by such an orchestra, was something near to heaven on earth:—heaven in vision opening upon earthly rapture in the Scherzo, heaven, pure heaven, lived and breathed in the divine Adagio. What next? Could not the cloven foot be kept out? If it could be followed, in Beethoven's own way, by the double basses breaking out into human recitative and the glory of the "Joy" chorus, why not something sweet and tranquil, something with some religion in it, something at least in less violent contrast than that crashing "Kaiser" March again? It was as if a mob broke in.

The second Concerto of Liszt (played last year by Miss Mehlig) we like much better than the first. Extravagant, to be sure, it has more character. In difficulty of execution it would seem to surpass almost all that has been made for the piano, tasking every power of hand and nerve and head to the utmost. But the fair pianist went through all unerringly, unflinching, with a triumphant mastery. And what a treat to hear after this a thing so soulful, deeply edifying as those Schubert Variations once more! The Lohengrin selections still confirmed the first impressions. They are taken right out of the heart and best part of the opera, namely the third act, consisting of the excited gathering for the wedding, the chorus in the Bridal Chamber (which should have been followed, if practicable for mere orchestra, by the best part of all, the Duet between Lohengrin and Elsa), and the gathering of the hosts, with trumpet signals, of the Finale.

In place of the seventh concert Mr. Thomas gave on Sunday evening, Dec. 10, (the Puritan winter of the City Fathers "made summer by this sun" of Russia) a "Gala concert" in honor of Alexis, in which the Handel and Haydn Society lent their aid. The Music Hall was packed, and Thomas was received with many cheers. The programme was decidedly "mixed," sacred and secular in glorious confusion. Think of the Freyschütz overture (Zamir, owls and all) right after "The Heavens are telling;" Lohengrin before "Thanks be to God;" Handel's "Hallelujah" chorus after a trivial mess of Cossack dances! The performance, to be sure, was capital, but one felt strangely drawn asunder between Oratorio and Promenade Concert by a programme worth preserving as a curiosity:

Chorus. "The Heavens are telling," (Creation).....Haydn.
Handel and Haydn Society & Theo. Thomas' Orchestra.
Overture, "Der Freyschütz".....Weber.
Allegretto, 8th Symphony.....Beethoven.
Komarinskaja.....Glinka.
Farewell to the Forest. (Unaccompanied).....Mendelssohn.
Handel and Haydn Society.

Introduction—Chorus and March, (Lohengrin).....Wagner.

Chorus. "Thanks be to God," (Elijah).....Mendelssohn.
Handel and Haydn Society & Theo. Thomas' Orchestra.
Fantasia on Hungarian Airs.....Liszt.
 Miss Marie Krebs and Orchestra.
Ave Maria. (Adapted to the 1st prelude by Bach)Gounod.
For Violins, Harp and Orchestra.
Cossack Dance. Fantasia sur un theme du Cossack.
 Dargomizsky.
Chorus. "Hallelujah," (Messiah).....Handel.

Last Saturday afternoon (23d), the Thomas Orchestra, on a flying visit returning from the East, gave one last concert, with a programme purposely more popular, to-wit:

Overture, Anacreon.....Cherubini.
Andante, from the tragic Symphony in C minor.
 [First time in America.].....Schubert.
Capriccio Brilliant, B minor, Op. 22.....Mendelssohn.
 Miss Marie Krebs and Orchestra.
Träumerei, (By Request).....Schumann.
Finale, Prometheus, Op. 43.....Beethoven.
Overture, Tannhäuser.....Wagner.
Fantasia, Don Juan.....Liszt.
 Miss Marie Krebs.
Waltz: Wine, Women and Song.....Strauss.
Air, Louis XIII.....Gytha.
Grand Polonaise.....Bilse.

The two novelties of this programme (from Schubert and Beethoven) were very interesting, but neither of them a specimen of the composer's most remarkable creations. The single movement of the "Tragic Symphony" is sweet, and rich and full of tender feeling, quite in a Mozartean vein in the beginning, but not inspired like the C-major Symphony, Schubert's "Ninth." In the "Prometheus" Finale it was curious to recognize the familiar theme, which Beethoven afterwards developed with much greater power and wealth of inventiveness in the Finale of the Heroic Symphony. The "Anacreon" Overture put everybody in good genial humor, and the "Träumerei" transcription, with its super-refinement of pianissimo, proved the usual sure bait for applause and encores, answered by the little Haydn "Serenade" (from a string Quartet). Miss KREBS played the Mendelssohn Capriccio very brilliantly and evenly, at a most rapid tempo. Never have we heard a more splendid performance of the Tannhäuser Overture. Liszt's Don Juan Fantasia is largely and significantly planned, the Statue planting itself in the foreground amid the terrible orchestral crashes and "unsettled scales" of the last, (the judgment) scene. The moral logical result thus strongly stated, there follows as typical of the cause, the Don's lawless life of pleasure, a fine serving up of the La ci darem Duet. The interpretation was most satisfactory. There was something gaily quaint, unique and taking in the air to which the name of "Louis XIII." was appended in the programme. The Polonaise by Bilse was spirited, and so ended a rich series of orchestral feasts.

THE CHRISTMAS ORATORIOS. Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" and Handel's "Messiah" were performed to crowded audiences on Sunday and Monday evenings, by the Handel and Haydn Society, with the Dolby troupe of singers, in a style which left hardly anything to be desired. Never has a Boston audience appeared to feel the power and beauty of the music so profoundly. The solos, by Miss WYNNIE, Mme. PATEY, Mr. CUMMINGS and Mr. SANTLEY, were most admirably rendered; it was an event to hear such music by such artists. Chorus and orchestra, too, were in excellent condition, and the "Messiah" as a whole, particularly the latter part, even the "Amen" chorus, never was sung here quite so well before.—But we have no room for further mention now.

We have yet to record two more most artistic and delightful Matinees of Messrs. LEONHARD and RICHARDS. The fifth (Jan. 11) promises us a Beethoven Sonata, op. 69, for Piano and 'Cello; Songs from Schumann's Liederkreis by Mr. KREBSMANN; a Duo for Violin and Piano by Schubert; a Sonata by Handel and Stollano by Bach, for Oboe and Piano (Messrs. KUTNER and LEONHARD); and the Schubert Trio in B flat, op. 99.

Miss ANNA MEHLIG, after a long, rough voyage in the Bremen steamer, reached New York on Tuesday, needing rest too much to come at once to Boston and perform in Thursday's Symphony Concert. Fortunately the Concerto which she had selected, Beethoven's in G, is one which had been played in these concerts more than once before, and most acceptably, by Mr. LEONHARD, who kindly yielded to the request of the Committee and placed himself in the somewhat awkward position of playing it again, and at such short notice, rather than compel a greater change of programme. Neither the composition nor the interpreter can wear out their welcome. Miss MEHLIG will play in the next concert, one week later, Thursday Jan. 4, when also Mendelssohn's "Scottish" Symphony and "Melissa" Overture, and Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva" will be given.

Mr. PRABO's Piano Matinees, at Wesleyan Hall, will take place Jan. 5 and 19, Feb. 2 and 16, at 4 P.M. His first programme includes a Sonata by Krause; Liszt's transcription of Beethoven's Liederkreis; a Serenade and a Gavotte by Bennett; and Schubert's Sonata in B flat.

Mr. PACK gives three more fine Popular Concerts this week (Thursday evening, this afternoon, and Sunday evening), with the aid of Miss KELLOGG, Miss ADLAIDE PHILLIPS, and many more good artists.

The PABRA-ROSA English Opera—the best English troupe ever organized before—will open at the Boston Theatre, Jan. 9.

Two more grand Oratorio performances, with the Dolby artists, will be given on the 13th and 14th, (on the latter evening "Elijah.")

The First Oratorio of the Handel and Haydn Society, Christmas Night, 1815.

Last Saturday's Advertiser contains an interesting communication from "S. J.," who has been searching the records, and sounding the survivors, for information of the earliest efforts of our now proud Oratorio Society, organized in April, 1815. After telling of the meetings (of a zealous few) for practice—chiefly of psalm tunes and in the summer season—and of the gradually manifested symptoms of a desire to soar and have "an exhibition," he proceeds:

At the regular meeting of the society on Thursday evening, September 7, were performed "sundry pieces of music, including a part of Haydn's Creation ('The Heavens are telling') and ending with the Hallelujah Chorus. This was without doubt the first time these choruses were rehearsed by the society. (That night there were forty-eight at rehearsal—no female voices, so far as appears.) The latter chorus was familiar, but the Creation they had yet to become acquainted with. As an evidence how little this work was then known, even in the musical centres of England, it is stated by a member of the society who joined it in the following year, immediately after arriving from that country, and who has ever since been identified with its history, not only as one of its most constant and devoted supporters, but for a long period one of its most valued officers and conspicuous solo performers, that he had never heard of the Creation until he came to Boston.

On the 5th of October the secretary was directed to supply each member with a copy of Haydn's Creation, and parts of it were rehearsed. On the 20th, a committee was appointed "to procure the assistance of professional musicians at the contemplated public exhibition and in the necessary rehearsals for the same." On the 30th the trustees selected voices for the parts in Haydn's Creation.

From this time occurs the repeated entry, "rehearsed music for an exhibition," "rehearsed music from third number of Old Colony." The president, Thomas Smith Webb, and vice-president, Amasa Winchester, with Mr. Benjamin Holt, were made a committee "to arrange a list of pieces for an exhibition," which was subsequently reported and accepted. On the 22d of November the use of King's Chapel was requested and obtained; and, to call public attention to the intended performance, the secretary was instructed to furnish the "Register" with the names of the officers and members of the Society, and with such extracts from the constitution as might be thought proper. The time of the performance was fixed for Christmas night.

King's Chapel, or the Stone Chapel, had already become distinguished for public musical exercises held in it. President Washington, on his visit to this city, in 1789, had attended a concert of sacred music there, at which the ladies are said to have "displayed snashes on which the Eagle and G. W. held conspicuous place, and the Marchioness Traversay exhibited on the bandeau of her hat G. W. and the Eagle set in brilliants on a black velvet ground."

In October 1812, Dr. Jackson, one of the most celebrated musicians in these parts, and even on the continent, who had received his degree from the University of Oxford, had given a "Grand Selection from Handel's Sacred Oratorios, with the assistance of the theatrical band, and many respectable Vocal and Instrumental Amateurs of the "Town," and, later, on the anniversary of Washington's birthday, February 22, 1815, the remarkable number of nearly two hundred and fifty performers had been brought together there, to celebrate the treaty of peace then recently concluded between this country and England.

In the course of the seventeen days preceding the public performance, not less than eight rehearsals were held, at one of which, December 16, the "Philharmonic, an association of the most accomplished amateurs of the day, was long famous for its concerts—of instrumental music, chiefly—which were of the choicest character, and highly esteemed by the dile of the town.

The last two rehearsals were appointed for the Saturday and Sunday evenings preceding the performance.

Meantime in Saturday morning's Centinel the programme was advertised as follows:—

SACRED ORATORIO.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY will perform

AN ORATORIO,

Consisting of a selection of pieces of Sacred Music, chiefly from the works of Handel and Haydn, On Monday Evening, the 25th instant, in the BROWN CHAPEL, in School Street.

To commence at 6 o'clock.

ORDER OF PERFORMANCES.

PART I.

[Here followed the list of the recitatives, airs, choruses, &c., comprising the first part of the Oratorio, and ending with "The heavens are telling." The remainder of the programme we give in full:—]

PART II.

CHORUS—They played an air, &c.
Air—I know that my Redeemer liveth, &c.
CHORUS—Sing ye unto the Lord our God, &c.
Air—He shall feed his flock, &c.
CHORUS—Lift up your heads, &c.
Air—Let the bright seraphim, &c.
DUTY AND CHORUS—By thee with bliss, O bounteous Lord, the heaven and earth are stored, PART III.

DUTY—The Lord is a man of war.
CHORUS—He gave them halibones for rain,
Air—'Tis Liberty, dear Liberty alone, &c.
DUTY—Come over smiling Liberty.
CHORUS—When winds breathe the soft, &c.
Air—Oh! had I Jubal's lyre!
CHORUS—The Lord shall reign forever and ever.
Hallelujah! For the Lord God omnipotent reigneth.

Tickets of admission may be obtained at the Bookstores of Munroe, Francis and Parker, and West and Richardson, Cornhill; of David Francis, Newbury Street, near Boylston Market; Robert Fennelly, Prince Street; and G. Graupner, Franklin Street. Tickets $1.

N.B. Gentlemen who wish to take their families are informed that on purchasing four tickets they will be presented with a fifth gratis; and those purchasing six will be entitled to two additional ones.

December 25.

In another column appeared the following editorial notice:—

"HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.

"We are happy to see it announced in the papers that this respectable society have appointed a time to favor the public with an opportunity of listening to their performances. If we are correctly informed of the principles upon which the society is instituted, it is certainly entitled to public support and patronage. Among its members are almost all the principal vocal performers of sacred music in this and several of the neighboring towns, and we feel confident that their powers, united with those of many of the principal professional and amateur performers of instrumental music, will furnish an intellectual repast that must prove highly gratifying to the lover of sacred music. We have been favored with a copy of the constitution of this society, and are pleased to find that their views are liberal and commendable: they exclude no sect, but cheerfully unite with all in singing the high praises of God. Their members are not entitled to any compensation for their services, and the moneys that may be collected at their public performances are appropriated to the discharge of all incidental expenses, and the surplus for purchasing scarce and valuable music. One of their most important objects is to create and cherish in the community a love of sacred music, and to improve the style of its performance; and as their members emanate from every society of public worshippers, each may reasonably expect to derive some benefit from the united exertions of the whole. We ardently wish them to persevere in their labors, and most sincerely say, 'Peace be within thy walls, and prosperity within thy palaces.'"

The paper also contained an announcement of the adjourned meeting of the society to be held at the Chapel Church at 51-2 o'clock that evening (Saturday), "which the members of the Philharmonic Society are respectfully invited to attend."

Over sixteen hundred tickets have been printed for the coming performance, of which there have been distributed gratuitously to ninety-one members—for by this time the list has increased to that number and upwards—two each; to the "ministers," thirty-eight; two to each of the instrumental performers; two to each of the ladies who are to take part; twenty-eight are given to the wardens and vestry of the church. Dr. Jackson, for his musical distinction, receives complimentary tickets; and thirty-one are sent to the gentlemen of the press.

The final rehearsals, as has been said, had been announced for the Saturday and Sunday evenings before Christmas. The last one was ended, and the president was in trouble. It had been far from satisfactory to him; he was indeed greatly discouraged. It was not strange that he should feel peculiar anxiety for the result. The president was conductor of the music as well, and upon him in great measure would rest the reproach of an inferior performance. Little indeed could he anticipate, whatever hopes might have animated him, that the impending exhibition, now close at hand, would be the first of a long series from which, through so many successive years, thousands should go out with ever renewed impressions of delight.

Disappointed and apprehensive of failure, he ordered another rehearsal for Monday afternoon, declaring that, unless it gave better promise, the public performance, even at that late hour, should be abandoned. But his fears were allayed. And so, after the long and diligent preparation, on the appointed evening the oratorio took place, attended by nearly a thousand persons. Ten members only were absent from their seats in the chorus; their names are duly recorded in the secretary's pages. The singers numbered a hundred, ten of whom were ladies; these were reinforced, as was common at the time, by a few of the higher male voices uniting with them on the treble parts. At the organ sat Mr. Stockwell. The orchestra was made up of the two Grangers, Bennett and Warren, violins; Niebuhr, "single bass;" Graupner, double bass; Alexis Eustaphie, the Russian consul, a noted patron of the art, and Mr. Cushing, who played flutes; Boquet (!), with perhaps a few others.

The opening recitative in the Creation, "In the beginning God created the heaven and earth," was sung by Mr. Jacob Guild. Mrs. Graupner sang "With verdure clad." Mr. John Dodd made his debut in the "Air rolling in foaming billows," in the performance of which he was for many years famous. Other of the recitatives and airs in the first part were given by Messrs. Huntington, Holt, Singleton and Stebbins. In the second part, "I know that my Redeemer liveth" was sung by Mr. Huntington; "He shall feed his flock," by Mr. Brown. In this part Mrs. Graupner is remembered to have sung in brilliant style, "Let the bright seraphim;" this was accompanied by Rawson on the trumpet. Other soloists were Mrs. Withington, Messrs. Winchester, Parker, Park and Phipps. Mr. Webb, the president, took part with Mrs. Withington in one duet.

The concert proved an entire success. Within the consecrated walls, underneath the evergreen garlands with which, according to immemorial custom, the interior of the church was decorated, inspired by the influences of the time and place and of the art to which they had come to do honor, all acquitted themselves with unexpected ability. We do not need to be told what a thrill ran through the chorus, with what lively and sympathetic emotion the audience, largely made up of the most cultivated and appreciative residents of the town, kept silence to listen, while a band of singers, associated under names suggestive only of beauty and sublimity, their voices sustained by an organ whose keys tradition said the great Handel himself had touched, stood up for the first time to claim attention and challenge applause on a field upon which they were to win in coming years so many honors. Nor are we left to picture it in imagination alone. "Such was the excitement of the hearers and the enthusiasm of the performers that there is nothing to compare with it at the present day." This was the judgment—have we a right to call it exaggerated?—of one of the chief critics of the day; and the society, by this concert and the repetitions of it which followed shortly after, established a claim to the public regard which it is to be hoped may never be lost. Five of those who took part in that Christmas night's performance still survive to bear testimony to the interest of the occasion.

S. J.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC,
Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- A Year ago. Canzonet. 3. Ab to c. Rockstro. 30
"What lack the valleys and the mountains,
That once were green and gay?"
Declamatory or recitative style, but with music so varied and attractive, it is fine either as a song or "piece."
- The Birds were telling one another. 4. Ab to a. Smart. 35
"The birds were telling one another,
The May is here! The May is here!"
A very bright affair, English, but borrowing grace from the "Gems of the German" style and the Opera.
- Bessy's Mistake. 3. C to e. Campana. 30
An Italian here tries to write an English sailor ballad. It is fair to concede that he succeeds better than a native. The "Oh, if young Love come, don't let him go," is charming.
- Under the Walnut Tree. 4. A to f. Linley. 40
"Gay as Fairy Elves will be
In some Sylvan Shade,
Perfect in its way. A classic fairy lay."
- Evening bringeth my heart back to thee. 3. D to e. Campana. 35
An easy Italian song, (but with English words.) Full of graceful triplets.
- Well-a-day. 4. Ab to e. Randegger. 40
"Love comes and goes,
Comes and goes like a spell."
Beautiful words by G. F. Morris. A most effective song for public singing.
- Queen of Love. 3. E to c. Gounod. 30
"Close as the stars along the sky,
The flowers were in the mead."
Very beautiful.
- Love's sorrow. 4. F to f. Eikmeier. 30
A sort of German-Italian melody. Requires some execution,—not much,—and is varied and spirited.
- In Waves of Light. 3. F to f. Abt. 30
"In waves of light the river flows Toward the ocean swiftly flowing."
A fine G. ruman song, very bright and sunny. Only English words.
- Old, old Tale. 4. E to g. Abt. 30
"And lo! to charm the listening ear,
The bird of night sang full and clear,
Till, all around, the dell and grove
Was hushed to hear the song of love."
First-rate.
- Angels took away our Darling. Song and Cho. 3. C to c. Christie. 40
"Angels took away our darling Little golden hair so bright."
Uncommonly beautiful angels, judging from their lithographs on the title, and a charming ballad.
- Father's Remembrance. 3. F to f. Smith. 30
"I see my Mary's dancing eyes,
My Lily's eyes of blue."
A nice, wholesome home song.
- Down the Meadow, 'neath the Clover. 3. Ab to f. Huntley. 30
A sweet, pathetic ballad (with Chorus) in popular style.
- Beside the Sea. 4. E to g. Gabriel. 30
"While he kissed her tears away,
The gentle waters kissed the shore,"
A little sad, but beautiful.
- Vision of Beauty. 3. F to g. Smith. 30
"Vision of beauty; fair dream of delight, Sunbeam in sorrow, and star of my night."
Music as graceful as the words are: that is, very.
- Barney, say you'll not forget me. 3. G to e. Dumont. 30
Song and Chorus. Her name was Norah, and what she sings is a very pretty Irish ballad; a farewell to the America-going emigrant.
- Morning Greeting. (Morgengruss). 3. D♭ to f. Abt. 30
"Morning wind so fresh and joyous, Morgen Wind so frisch und freudig."
Abt might, possibly write a poor song if he tried; but he probably never did; and it is evident that he made no exertion at all in that direction in the present instance. A fine song.

Instrumental.

- Flying Dutchman Galop. 4. Eb. Eikmeier. 40
A first-class brilliant, melodious galop.
- Christmas Eve Polka Brillante. 4. Ab. Augusta Gottschalk. 40
It is necessary to give the whole name of the composer, else one might think it was the Gottschalk, of whose music it reminds a player. Bears marks of decided genius, and well worth learning.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. a small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 803.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 13, 1872.

VOL. XXXI. No. 21.

From Old and New for January.

The Organ-Blower.

BY OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

Devoutest of my Sunday friends,
The patient organ-blower bends;
I see his figure sink and rise,
(Forgive me, Heaven, my wandering eyes!)
A moment lost, the next half seen,
His head above the scanty screen,
Still measuring out his deep salaams
Through quavering hymns and panting psalms.

No priest that prays in gilded stole,
To save a rich man's mortgaged soul;
No sister, fresh from holy vows,—
So humbly stoops, so meekly bows;
His large obeisance puts to shame
The proudest genuflecting dame,
Whose Easter bonnet low descends
With all the grace devotion lends.

O brother with the supple spine,
How much we owe those bows of thine!
Without thine arm to lend the breeze,
How vain the finger on the keys!
Though all unmatched the player's skill,
Those thousand throats were dumb and still:
Another's art may shape the tone,
The breath that fills it is thine own.

Six days the silent Memnon waits
Behind his temple's folded gates;
But when the seventh day's sunshine falls
Through rainbow windows on the walls,
He breathes, he sings, he shouts, he fills
The quivering air with rapturous thrills;
The roof recoils, the pillars shake,
And all the slumbering echoes wake!

The Preacher from the Bible-text
With weary words my soul has vexed—
(Some stranger, fumbling far astray
To find the lesson for the day;)
He tells us truths too plainly true,
And reads the service all askew,—
Why—why the—mischief—can't he look
Beforehand in the service-book?

But thou, with decent mien and face,
Art always ready in thy place;
Thy strenuous blast, whate'er the tune,
As steady as the strong monsoon;
Thy only dread a leathery creak,
Or small residual extra squeak,
To send along the shadowy aisles
A sunlit wave of dimpled smiles.

Not all the preaching, O my friend,
Comes from the church's pulpit end!
Not all that bend the knee and bow
Yield service half so true as thou!
One simple task performed aright,
With slender skill, but all thy might,
Where honest labor does its best,
And leaves the player all the rest.

This many-diapasoned maze,
Through which the breath of being strays,
Whose music makes our earth divine,
Has work for mortal hands like mine.
My duty lies before me. Lo,
The lever there! Take hold and blow!
And He whose hand is on the keys
Will play the tune as he shall please!

Milton and Music.

Whether we regard John Milton as a polemic, a patriot, or a poet, we uplift him to a high place among the great men of the world. His controversial writings are sledge-hammer blows from a lusty arm. His state papers are trumpet blasts for the rights of all men. His immortal epic exhausts the beauty of numbers on the sublimest of themes.

The most unwearied workers need a versatility by which they may vary the direction of their genius. A monotony of magnificent achievements is apt to terminate, prematurely, the power that produced them. All vigorous thinkers seek some alcove of meditation, in which the wastage of brain capital may be repaired and readjusted. David turned aside from the cares of government and war, to find recuperation in harp and song. Frederick the Great planned and executed stupendous campaigns, while his mind was refreshed with the dulcet notes of the flute. Milton withdrew from the wrangle of party and diplomacy, to invigorate his jaded spirit with the vivifying tones of the organ.

The home education of Milton was of a generous and humane character. He had before him, constantly, the example of a father who knew what it was to suffer, in position and estate, for opinion's sake. The youthful John absorbed, with every boyish breath, the love of liberty for which his father paid so dearly. But the training of the home circle was not entirely acrimonious. John Milton, senior, found time to give himself to the study of the noble science of music. He attained to such a degree of skill that he composed an In nomine of forty parts, which gained for him a gold medal from a European prince. Several of his compositions found a place in Wilby's selections, and also in Ravenscroft's Psalms.

With such an exemplar in the household, it is not surprising that young Milton became an adept in the art of music. It is not difficult to imagine the domestic circle, with the father at the instrument singing bass, while John carried the melody, Christopher the tenor, and Ann the alto. If Cambridge gave the bent to Milton's mind in the direction of letters, those family concerts in the house of the London scrivener did no less for him in the divine science of music.

In all the experience of Milton's stormy manhood, this sweet comfort of a wearied mind never failed him. If he appears more prominently in history as a statesman and a poet than as a musician, it is only because the world gives more attention to the inviting streams than to the quiet springs which supply them.

After receiving his degree of Master of Arts, he bid adieu to his home and made a tour through the land of song. Already the name which, with that of Shakespeare, was to shine in English Literature, found nobility and literati waiting to confer the highest honor. Artists and titled dignitaries recognized in him a genius worthy of their homage. The treasures of ducal palaces were laid open to his inspection. Galleries of art and ancient libraries invited his thoughtful study. But amid all the scenes of artistic glory and princely magnificence, he carried with him the training of the scrivener's fireside. After reaching Venice, he spent a month in collecting the works of the master musicians of Italy. Luca Marenzo, Monte Verde, Horatio Vecchi, Caba, the prince of Venosa, and others of the best composers of the time, furnished him with a rich treasury of Italian song. Two chests of music books were shipped to England.

At the age of thirty-one he returned to his native land. At once he addressed himself to those political and social projects whose audacity was equalled only by the vigor with which he discussed them. His "Tractate on Education" was as colossal in its conception as it was impracticable in its execution. He was so far in advance of his own age as to appear visionary. It is only in our own time that his broad views have been appreciated, and many of his principles adopted. He maintained that the education of youth should be physical as well as mental; that their minds should be occupied with the whole cycle of human knowledge; and that, among the arts, music should have a conspicuous place. He saw in music not a mere embellishment to set off sterner things, but a profound science and the most inspiring of arts.

Milton never speaks of music without a peculiar and impressive enthusiasm. The depth and virtues of music are glowing themes under his pen. His soul was full of music. His verses sing, because his spirit sings in them. No poet revels more luxuriously in the swelling waves of music. He soars into the very empyrean of lofty song. Coleridge calls him the "musical poet." "Paradise Lost" throbs with the echoes that rang, in incessant anthem, in his musical soul.

Music was his only recreation. In the intervals of severe study, he gave himself to inspiring song. When he stopped to breathe amid the fierce and acrid controversies of his active manhood, he refreshed himself with the grand harmonies of the organ, or the gentler tones of the flute. He could turn from the "Areopagitica" to a soothing choral; from a state paper of the Commonwealth to an anthem. And when, in his old age, blindness and poverty and royal ban were on him, and the hopes of a lifetime were shattered forever, he felt his way back to the keys of the instrument, and found consolation in the harmony of sweet sounds. And out from that musical soul, whose heavenly harmonies neither violence nor neglect could destroy, rolled the measures of the immortal epic that will sing its way on to the gates of pearl.

—College Herald, Lewisville, Pa.

Popular Art Education.

(Concluded from page 155.)

An interesting article might be written concerning the free evening classes alone, which are now in successful operation—one at the Appleton-street school-house, one at the Mason-street schoolhouse, and the third at the Institute of Technology; but they can perhaps be better noticed at another time. It is proposed to carry out those branches of instruction which are comprehended under the term free-hand drawing at the Appleton-street school, whilst at the Institute of Technology, and in Mason-street, instrumental drawing will be taught. The very generous offer of Mr. Perkins to furnish a collection of models, such as are used in the South Kensington school of art, was fulfilled, and in addition to this collection a splendid collection of drawings illustrating the stages of study in the English schools of art have been obtained, and they are now being hung for exhibition. Concerning these drawings it may be stated that it would have been impossible to have procured such a collection without enlisting the services of the English government authorities. During the summer months, under the advice of the general superintendent of drawing, an application was made to the authorities at South Kensington for the collection which is now to be exhibited. Through the foreign office the officials of the science and art department had instructions to cooperate with the authorities of Boston in any way that would advance the study of art in America, and to comply with the request which had been made for a series of class drawings. Where specimens were already in the hands of the government officials, these were presented to the city of Boston; where it was necessary to complete the collection by the purchase of valuable drawings from the students, the science and art officials made the selection, the city of Boston paying the actual cost; so that for considerably less than half the value of the works the city has secured the collection to serve as standards for the students here. The money for this purpose was provided by Mr. Perkins, in addition to having already given a considerable sum for models and casts. Furthermore, there has been obtained by appropriation and by private subscription, a very fine collection of drawing copies, casts, reproductions and historical specimens of sculpture, for the purpose of instruction.

In the course of a few days, after the hanging of the drawings shall have been completed, the committee on drawing will hold a reception at the Appleton-street schoolhouse, to which a large number of prominent gentlemen will be invited, and at that time we propose to notice in detail the superb drawings which the English art authorities have sent us.

In connection with this subject it would be a pleasure to give some account of the progress of drawing in other cities, where Mr. Smith is introducing the English methods, but that must be done at another time. The annexed sketch of the advance of popular art education in England, and the foundation of the system which is being adopted in this country, will be apropos.

INDUSTRIAL ART IN ENGLAND.

It was between the years 1830 and 1835, that the manufacturers of England were discussing the question of what could be done to improve the character of industrial and manufacturing art; for they found considerable difficulty in procuring designs for their manufactures. They were improving the staples of their products every year, whilst the art element alone was at a stand-still, and in that respect they were falling behind the manufacturers of other parts of Europe,—so much so, in fact, that while everybody admired the material and the finish of the goods made in England, everybody was beginning to laugh at their artistic characteristics. The subject was discussed in Parliament and written about, and at last Parliament decided that this was a matter which the board of trade should take up, and that it should make inquiries as to how it should be remedied. The board of trade decided that it would be desirable to establish schools of design in some of the most important manufacturing towns, in order that the designers and the draughtsmen employed in the works, as well as the workmen who carried out the designs, should have an opportunity of fitting themselves for the work they had to do. The first thing done by the board of trade was to call in some of the artists, two or three amateurs, noblemen, and men of distinction and consult with them; and it was determined that the best course would be to establish a central school of design in London in connection with the board of trade, and to induce various of the large manufacturing towns to establish schools of design for themselves, assisted by the government. Up to that time there had been no public drawing school in England, except the Royal Academy, which might be said to be a professional school for artists, and not for the public. In fact, a man could not obtain admission into that school unless he had displayed great talents in his profession as an artist. The government established this drawing school under the auspices of the board of trade at Somerset House, in the very room in which the Royal Academy was started nearly a hundred years before. The rooms were thrown open to students in the day-time and at night at a comparatively nominal fee, and scholarships were established in connection with the school, so that the most advanced students might have the means of pursuing their studies. The school was opened in the year 1836, and from that year to 1841 there were seven schools of design established in the large towns throughout the kingdom. One of the first difficulties experienced in carrying out this scheme was the difficulty of obtaining examples for instruction. The best artists had been appointed to be masters, and a practical designer had been secured to teach designs for carpets and paper-hangings. The board of trade then commissioned Mr. Dyce, who was a rising young artist, and afterwards became the distinguished fresco-painter, to obtain designs for a drawing book which should be a text-book of study in the schools of design. He went all over Europe, and drew from the best specimens of artistic remains a series of progressive ornamental designs, and at great expense to the country that book was published; it has been the best book ever since. The schools of design went on successfully and gradually increased in number. The masters were appointed by the government; the different towns furnished the rooms and premises for the schools, but the government granted an appropriation to each locality sufficient to pay the master's salary, and help defray the expenses. The fees of the students and subscriptions did the rest. The experiment worked well, and a permanent foundation was soon laid by the education of numbers of students who became masters and took positions as head designers in various manufactories. In the year 1851—the year of the great exhibition which was the result of the discussions of the Society of Arts, of which Prince Albert was the head—there were nineteen schools of design in the United Kingdom. As there were scores of towns where such institutions were needed, it was manifest that the problem of art education was only touched upon. In that year a result was brought about of the greatest importance to English art—the creation of a department of the board of trade called the department of practical art. The question was still looked upon as a trade question, and in that respect Massachusetts has proceeded with a similar idea in providing for instruction in industrial drawing.

The creation of the department of practical art was due mainly to the results of the exhibition, the fact being established that the English people were deficient in art education, so that they could neither originate suitable designs for manufactures nor could they appreciate them when they were made. There was both ignorance, as it were, at the manufacturing centre and at the purchasing centre. The art of England, in fact, with the exception of high art, was in a barbaric state. The taste of the common people was little farther advanced than that of the South Sea Islanders. In fact, the images and ornaments in the houses of the working classes were scarcely as beautiful as those possessed by most savage tribes. Happily the direction of this movement fell into the hands of a practical man, Mr. Henry Cole, who has had the credit of suggesting the exhibition of 1851, sometimes given to Prince Albert. The schools of design were put into his charge, and he succeeded in making them very nearly self-supporting and making art education general. The first thing he did was to establish a normal school for the training and examination of art masters. It had been found that with the system of appointment which they had practised, namely, the selection of an intelligent and accomplished artist, and putting him at the head of the school, it did not by any means follow that the school was a success; because, although a very good painter, he might be entirely ignorant of the special industry of that locality. It was necessary that the teacher should not only be a painter, possessed of historical knowledge, and a lover of fine art, but also that he should be skilled in industrial art, and joined to this, that he should have practical teaching power. In order to secure this, a training school for art-masters was created, and the various schools of design throughout the United Kingdom were asked to send their best scholars to London to be trained as art-masters, the government deeming it profitable to give these men exhibitions and to give them the opportunity to study for a certain number of years, in order to secure competent teachers for the schools of art. In the prosecution of the purpose to make art-education general among the people, and to improve the taste of those who simply bought the goods, as well as of the designers, the first experiments were made in the direction of the public schools, a thing that had not been heard of before in England; and in order to train the masters for this, some of the students in the national schools of drawing in London were asked to teach classes of children a certain number of hours a week in order to familiarize themselves with the young. This was an experiment both as to the teaching powers of the masters and as to whether it was possible to teach the principles of drawing to young children. In various districts in London night classes were also established where the artisans were instructed. These experiments continued for a year or two, and resulted in establishing one fact which has been the key-note of all progress since. It determined that all the children in the public schools could be taught to draw. The night classes also established the fact that there was a large number of working-men and artisans who were ready to avail themselves of the instruction and pay for it. The government furthermore succeeded in inducing the provincial cities to establish training schools, and these have been gradually established, until at the present time there are nearly one hundred and fifty schools of art in full operation, headed by properly educated art masters, and from four to a dozen schools are established every year. During the past twenty years Parliament has annually voted a sum of money to be expended for the purchase of objects of industrial art for the museum at South Kensington, where the national school of art is located. It commenced in the year 1851 with an appropriation of ten thousand pounds for the purchase of the masterpieces of industrial art, and it has been appropriating annually a considerable sum ever since, so that there is now collected there such a mass of art material as exists nowhere else, and which enables students from the Provinces to receive a thorough training in all branches of art. The whole field of art study is systematically divided into six sections. To pass through all these the students are required to give at least six years' hard and constant study. It includes the practice of painting in all its branches, sculpture, artistic design, and every branch of art that is practised in the world, except some of the more technical subjects, such as porcelain painting and stained glass work. During the last thirty-six years, which may be said to be the period in which schools of art have existed in England, a very large number of towns have built special schools, with large and handsome rooms, and galleries of pictures for the study of art. One of the last appearances of the present Lord Derby was to open a school of art in Birkenhead, which had been presented to the corporation of Birkenhead by Mr. Laird. With regard to the teaching of drawing in the public schools, in order to make that universal, besides creating a corps of art masters who passed a long and searching examination carried on by the examiners of the science and art department,—in addition to this, in order to establish a constituency for the schools of art, a lower grade of instruction was established at the professional schools, called instruction of the second grade. Masters of the public schools are required to present themselves for examination in this grade, and to obtain certificates. And in addition to this there is a lower grade called the first grade, which is the standard of drawing in the public schools, so that teachers who have not passed the second grade can receive certificates in this grade. It is a distinctive advantage to every teacher to know how to teach drawing because every school is examined in drawing and the salary of the teacher is considerably increased, so that it is a very rare thing in England now to find a school in which there is not a certificated teacher of drawing.

In the change that took place in 1851, one of the most significant points was the transferring of the art educational department from the board of trade to the committee of the council of education, under whom it has ever since remained, and the whole administration is described as a science and art department of the committee of the council on education. The significance is that the subject was relieved of its special character and taken into the general domain of education, and the great work that has been done since is naturally owing to the recognition of drawing as an ordinary subject of education, and the provision for instruction in it, both of teachers and special masters, being regarded as an ordinary business transaction. Since the radical reorganization of the scheme of drawing in 1861 there has been a succession of international exhibitions, in which the influence of art education upon the manufacturers of the United Kingdom has been very easy to trace. Following the exhibition of '51 was the exhibition of '55 in Paris, followed by the exhibition of '63 in London, and again in '67 by the international exhibition in Paris. There was an improvement observable both in the design and manufacture of some of the most important branches of industrial art in the English department in all these exhibitions. The enormous strides to be observed in 1867 in every department of English manufactures, plating, rich iron work and working the precious metals, glass, upholstery, sculpture, ornamentation of furniture, designs for carpets, paper-hangings, book-binding, and all branches in which the art element is one of tangible value, convinced the critics and art writers that there was no system of art education in Europe that had produced so much fruit in the same time as the English system. The exhibition of 1862 showed such progress that the French government sent special inquirers into the English system of art education, who reported favorably upon it, and the exhibition of 1867 showed such results that from that time the system has been regarded as a model for the world. Meanwhile in the small German states, in France, in Switzerland, and in other European countries the governments have been actively engaged in making art an important element in their educational schemes, seeing the immediate result upon the manufactures and therefore upon the wealth of the country, resulting from elementary training in the art of drawing in the public schools and special education in technical schools.—Daily Advertiser.

The Church Music Association.

The first concert of the Church Music Association took place last Tuesday at Steinway Hall before the usual large audience of the representatives of fashion, wealth, and refinement, exceeding in number some 2,000 persons. This is the more surprising when it is known that on that evening the elements were not propitious, and that a snow storm had steadily set in and continued during a greater part of the day and night. "Faust" had also been set up for that evening at the Academy of Music; but on this occasion the counter attractions at Steinway Hall had materially emptied the house, fully convincing the most skeptical that at least one of our local institutions is not without a vitality that can make itself felt when occasion requires.

The success of the Church Music Association is apparent to everyone, and we heartily congratulate its members on the good they are conferring upon the community by steadily persisting in a good course.

At the same time we could wish that, as the society progresses in the estimation of musicians and the public, it would address its attention to works of yet a higher order than those attempted. It is true the work given are very good of their kind; nothing could be more admirably selected than the last programme, but still there must arise opportunities in the future by which the works of Bach and Handel and some more modern, but equally learned musicians' works could be presented.

The elements composing the organization are extremely good. The chorus is now well balanced and composed of the freshest voices to be obtained in the city, and drawn too from a circle of society well sustained by wealth and comfort. The orchestra is large in numbers, never less than seventy performers, and the best that can be obtained; while the musical director and conductor, Dr. James Pech, although we cannot always agree with what he says in his analytical programmes, nor even, sometimes, with his reading and interpretation of the works performed—is a man of erudition, experience and culture in the profession he follows, and is sure, whatever he does, to do it with much intellect and ability.

The programme comprised Raff's overture: "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott," Haydn's Second Mass and the music of the "Preciosa." In this the orchestra and chorus were complete, and in their laudable efforts were joined by the soloists.

It will be seen, here, that in the selection of the programme there is great variety of thought and character in the compositions selected. The Raff overture is well constructed and developed in a highly scholastic way, and, although ponderous, was a happy precursor to the light and almost effeminate composition, Haydn's 2nd Mass, which followed. In the first we had the richness and generosity of the modern treatment with all the scholarship of Haydn; in the latter an inferior melodic form sustained by a choral writing more instrumental than vocal in its character.

The Preciosa Music was, perhaps, delivered better than any other portion of the programme. There was more life and vigor displayed in the attack of the chorus and as a curiosity, the Orchestra played the accompaniments with more grace and lightness than our Orchestras are accustomed to do in this city. And here we must say, that from the numbers of the Chorus—there could not have been less than 300—the attack and body of tone ought to have been stronger and larger. This, probably, will be achieved in the course of time. The singing of the chorus on Tuesday night, however, was certainly better than on any previous occasion during the existence of the organization, which now bids fair to become the best singing society in the city.

The principal parts were taken by Mrs. Philip D. Gulager, Mrs. Jennie Kempton, Mr. Wm. S. Leggett, and Mr. Franz Rommerts. If these names are not very wide-spread in the world, they are known and esteemed here as vocal singers of great respectability. They very evidently united their efforts in the best way they could with those of the Chorus, Orchestra and Conductor in an endeavor to give the most finished interpretation to the works of the composers set down for performance.

Altogether the concert was an enjoyable one, and if in the performance there was much to object to, as there must always be in connection with almost any effort in art, still there was much deserving our highest commendation and encouragement. Dr. James Pech, upon whom so much devolves, most decidedly deserves the best encouragement and thanks of the community for the earnest devotion he is giving to the highest interests of musical art in this city.

The next performance will take place early in February, on which occasion Mozart's Requiem in D minor, and a selection from Wallace's opera "Lurline" will be given. The former work has been underlined for rehearsal for several weeks.—N. Y. Weekly Review, Dec. 23.

Gilmore, his Book.

[From the Nation, Dec. 7.]

History of the National Peace Jubilee and Great Musical Festival. By P. S. Gilmore. (Boston: Lee & Shepard.)

It is wonderful what a man completely possessed by one idea, and blessed with blind faith and pugnacity sufficient to carry it out in face of every obstacle, can accomplish. If he is fanatically inclined, he may found a sect, and gather together a vast community, as Brigham Young has done in Utah. If he is musically inclined, he may get up a prodigious festival, that shall set all New England singing, as Gilmore did in Boston two years ago. If his monomania is of a very aggravated type, he may write a book of seven hundred and sixty pages about it. And this, too, the irrepressible Gilmore has done. Even here he does not stop; for he is busy organising another musical festival, to be given in Boston next June, in which not New England only, but all the world, shall take part. Every nation in Europe is to send a band of its best musicians, and a day is to be set apart for each nationality represented. Instead of a chorus of ten thousand voices, one of twenty thousand is to be organized. The orchestra is to consist of two thousand instead of one thousand players, and the building is to hold one hundred thousand people, in place of the fifty thousand who gathered in the Coliseum of 1869. As everything is subjected to the doubling process, we may then look for another volume of fifteen hundred and twenty pages which shall record the affair.

Mr. Gilmore's book is exactly such a production as we might look for. To say that it is egotistical but faintly expresses its character in this respect. From title-page to conclusion it is all Gilmore. What he thought, what he said, whom he saw, what they did and, above all, what he did, is the record of every page. The ingenious man has even written out and printed the prayer that he offered up in the secret closet in the hour when he feared the whole affair was about to collapse. His hopes and fears, trials, obstacles, and final triumph, are all spread upon the record. Even the names of the ten thousand singers, the thousand instrumentalists, the artillerymen, anvil-beaters, and the very ushers at the doors, are set down. A large part of the book is made up of comments of the press on the progress of his undertaking and its culmination. The author has also improved the opportunity to reflect on such persons as failed to give it support. He is particularly severe on Mr. John S. Dwight, of Boston, the editor of the Journal of Music. Mr. Dwight is known to all who are interested in musical art, as a man whose life has been devoted, in a quiet, unobtrusive way, to fostering and encouraging the highest and noblest forms of that art. It was absurd in Mr. Gilmore to suppose that he could harness him, and men like him, to his noisy, flaring musical chariot; and it is still more absurd on his part to indulge in foolish abuse of them because they would not permit themselves to be made the instruments of his egregious vanity.

Mr. Gilmore's history is long-winded and desultory. It is without literary merit, but has that sort of interest which pertains to all unreserved narratives of personal experiences. In all other respects, it is merely a literary curiosity.

P. S. Gilmore at Home.

[From the New York Weekly Review, Dec. 30.]

We learn from one of our contemporaries, that the indefatigable Gilmore has arrived safely at Boston, after an absence of several months in Europe, on his Jubilee mission, and that his efforts have been successful. It is also said that poets of the Boston Papers already begin to pour forth impassioned lyrics, and that their artists have painted in most vivid colors the gigantic Coliseum, and its impressive surroundings. Consequently the music publishers will soon be out with new songs, marches, polkas, &c., glowing with the white heat of enthusiasm, imitating the bells, drums, guns and gongs to be used on that great and notable day in next June, which will make the Hub famous forever, as the grand centre around which all aspiring fellows of note will hereafter be doomed to revolve.

The following is said to be a list of music already awaiting the press:

Oh Come to Town and see the Great Big Jubilee.
Song and Chorus.....Milgore. 30
The Jubilee Maker was never a Quaker. Solo..Morgil. 50
O Hear those Soothing Sounds Ascending,
While Guns, Gongs, Drums and Bells are Blending.
Quartet.....G. S. Patrick. 75
High Ding Diddle, the Jubilee Fiddle
Got Mad with the Jubilee Drum. Duo.....Patmore.

The grand opening hymn of welcome to foreign delegations, to be sung by 500,000 voices, accompanied by 10,000 instruments, 100 siege guns, 500 anvils, 2,000 gongs, and all the bells of America,—by electricity,—combined, will be as follows:

HIM OF WELCUM.

I.

We greet you, brethren, from over the deep;
You cum here to jub-late, then pray do not weep.
You cum to the land where the fiddle is free,
Where millions may fine in the grate Jubilee.

II.

You cum to a land where the power of song
May blend with the cannon, the anvil and gong;
Where Mormons are squelched, with that cuss slavee;
Then why should we not have a big Jubilee.

III.

Then welcum thrice o'er to our musical feast,
Brave Lions and Eagles, and Bears of the east.
Our bold bird of freedom with pleasure will scream,
To the echo of ten thousand whistles of steam.

IV.

Then fine in our song. As the chorus swells high,
We'll vow that in peace we will live till we die.
And then to Pat Gilmore three cheers will we raise,
While heaven's vast dome is a-roar and a-blaze.

The Fourth Symphony Concert.

[From the Advertiser, Dec. 19.]

In the rich programme of yesterday's concert the name of Beethoven is conspicuous. Three out of the five numbers were by him; his gayest symphony, his most brilliant concerto for piano and his best song. The opening piece was Gade's Highland Overture, and Weber closed the feast with his overture, "The Ruler of the Spirits." After the Gade Overture Mr. John S. Dwight came forward to explain that Miss Mehlig had arrived in New York, but too late for the concert, and that the Committee had prevailed upon Mr. Leonhard to play in her stead. Mr. Dwight's announcement was received with applause. That there was little occasion for disappointment was the general feeling after the first movement of the concerto. When Beethoven played this concerto for the first time at the concert which he gave at Vienna on the 22d of December, 1808, Reichardt, himself a good musician, designated it as a new piece of immense difficulty, and wrote of Beethoven that "he played it in the quickest time and so excellently well as to astonish every one." This remark might well be repeated of Mr. Leonhard, who excelled himself in his performance of yesterday. All the fire and all the tenderness that the piece called for freely flowed from his fingers. The delicacy of his touch in pianissimo passages and the unerring certainty with which he overcame difficulties of the most formidable kind, were alike admirable. Mr. Leonhard has the courage and possesses the ability of playing a pianissimo in which every tone is just audible, and yet so distinct as to pervade the whole house. The Andante, a noble song of lament, was so exquisitely rendered as to move almost to tears. The orchestra bravely seconded his efforts. The principal motive of the first movement strongly reminds one of a motive in the cycle of songs entitled "An die ferne Geliebte" (to the distant sweetheart.)

Mr. Leonhard played the accompaniment to "Adelaide" with his usual skill, and Mr. Glogauer-Castelli sang with fine feeling, evidently husbanding his voice, however, in such a way that, with all his taste and with all the artistic refinement of his style, his rendering produced an impression of sameness. It was the lack of fervor, of passion, resulting, as it seemed to us, not from a want of feeling, but from the fear of overtaking himself.

The rest of the programme was in the hands of the orchestra, and most excellently did our musicians carry it out. We can honestly praise every and all their performances. The sparkling gaiety of Beethoven's symphony; the dreamy opening of Gade's overture, with its suggestions of heath enveloped in mist, followed by the exciting chase; the weird, wild ghost scenes, as well as the sweet melodies in Weber's overture, all were rendered unexceptionably, finely, tastefully. The latter piece, which in its present form was first played at Munich, on the 11th of November, 1811, is not one of Weber's most brilliant efforts; still it is good music for a composer of eighteen or twenty. He was about that age when he composed it for his opera "Rubezahl," at Breslau. We were glad to notice among the performers the familiar faces of the members of the Mendelssohn quintette club, who are at home again for the winter. The concert was thoroughly good in all its parts.

The Fifth Symphony Concert.

[From the Daily Advertiser, Jan. 5.]

Yesterday's delightful concert was made more attractive than the orchestral selections could possibly have rendered it, by Miss Anna Mehlig's faultless performance. Her selections helped to make the programme homogeneous, and to make it, if we may so say, grandly and characteristically ethnological. The first and last pieces brought up the life and love of German knights in the middle ages, being overtures to two old German legends. The symphony carried the lover to the heaths, the sea-shore of Scotland and the merry-making of her people. The Rondo of the piano-concerto, and indeed the whole of that number was essentially Polish, having all the tenderness and passion characteristic of the Slavonic races. And the "Rhapsodie" opened up to mental vision the puszta of Hungary with its grotesque gypsies and their fantastic violins and tamborine music.

Miss Anna Mehlig evidently felt quite at home; besides the ease and self-command in her bearing,—the result of her artistic consciousness of the fulness of her powers,—there was that in her mien which seemed to say: "I am glad to be among you again." Her playing impressed as it has ever impressed her audiences. There was no effort; all was grace, delicacy and strength combined. It would be useless to attempt a critical analysis of her playing, which was simply perfect. The concerto by Chopin is well known. The long introduction by the orchestra suffered not a little from being heard immediately after so beautiful a piece of orchestral music as Mendelssohn's overture to "the fair Melusina." There is in much of Chopin's music a whimsicality, almost amounting to sickness. Some of these traits are exhibited in the allegro of this concerto. Many of Chopin's effects are but pretty conceits, pleasing by the richness of the coloring, lulling the senses with delight, astonishing by their mechanical difficulty very often, but hardly warming the hearer, hardly firing the mind with enthusiasm as Beethoven almost always does. It is genre painting; still-life with a strong national flavor. Beethoven's is grand historical painting. The most characteristic part of the Chopin concerto is the Rondo, with its pretty, fresh, almost coquettish first motive. The immense difficulties of this composition were overcome so easily by Miss Mehlig, that an uninitiated person, who did not see the agility of her fingers, might have thought the piece quite easy. In the "Rhapsodie Hongroise," she had an opportunity to show, not only her dexterity and skill, but also her strength, which is quite marvellous. It need not be said that she kept it within the bounds of the beautiful. Least composes as he only can compose who knows all the resources of the piano. And Miss Mehlig called them forth as the master intended. The audience showed the delight caused by her playing by calling her out twice. The orchestra, who were as active in their plaudits as the rest of the audience, played the accompaniment to the concerto most delicately and excellently. So they played the two overtures. Of the symphony, the Vivace, taking the place of the Scherzo, was played most to our taste. There was some slight unevenness noticeable in the other parts hardly enough, however, to deserve mention.

All the orchestral portion of the concert belongs to the modern school of symphonic composition, and, as the names of the composers, Mendelssohn and Schumann, warrant, to the best class of it. It can hardly be fully understood without a knowledge of the fairy-tale of the beautiful Melusina, or the legend of "Genevieve." The musical listener will discover the principal elements of the former tale in the opening motives, which unmistakably portray the wavy, undulating element whence the fair Melusina comes among men, and the martial character of the knight who woos and wins only to lose her. So the thrice-repeated cry of woe is easily recognized, and the pain at parting when Melusina returns to her home in the waves. Schumann's overture is not so easy to fathom unless one knows the legend. Still Golo's ardent passion and the triumph of virtue are depicted with sufficient plainness to be recognized. Mendelssohn's symphony is a landscape full of life, and even without having been in Scotland one can breathe upon the expanse of the moors, hear the thundering voice of the waves and vividly see and feel the storm. The national bag-pipe is unmistakable in the Scherzo, the legends of heroic ancestry with their feuds and loves are well described in the Adagio, and the exhilarating, swift movement, ending in a hymn of praise, which closes the symphony, is full of glorious reminiscences of sport and open-air life and enjoyment.

Music at Dublin University.

The general interest excited by our remarks in a recent article on the Royal Academy of Music in Dublin, induces us to present our readers with a brief account of the system pursued at the University in that city for the encouragement of musical education, and of the regulations adopted for the granting of musical degrees. Trinity College, or Dublin University, for they are really interchangeable terms, has a musical professorship which is at present filled by Dr. R. P. Stewart, who was elected in 1861, and holds office as organist of St. Patrick's and Christ Church Cathedrals, besides conducting the practices of the College Choral Society, and assisting in the Academy of Music as professor of the piano-forte and harmony. The books of the university were mutilated and destroyed to such an extent in former years that it is difficult to ascertain who was the earliest occupant of the music chair; but the first professor of whom we have any definite record is the Earl of Mornington, whose name is well known on both sides of the Channel. He appears to have been appointed in 1764, and resigned ten years later. Musical Degrees were conferred for some time after by diploma, the name of the candidate being submitted, according to a regular form, to the whole senate, whose "grace," or permission, was a necessary preliminary to the granting of the degree; and even now, although the system of examinations is strictly enforced, the form is still maintained, sometimes resulting in the exclusion of unpopular or unsatisfactory persons. The chief feature, however, in the arrangements at Dublin, and that in which they differ from the sister universities in England, lies in the regulation—introduced, we believe, by Dr. Stewart—that no person shall be admitted to the degree of Mus. Bac. who has not previously passed a general examination, unless he be already a graduate in Arts. This rule naturally diminishes the number of candidates, but at the same time it must be admitted that it is a salutary provision, well calculated to raise the Art and its professors in the estimation of the public. An additional inducement to candidates to graduate in Arts before they present themselves for the musical examination is afforded by the reduction of the fees for the latter degrees to one half the sum charged to non-graduates. At Oxford and Cambridge, as our readers are probably aware, there is no such general educational test, the only preliminary to the Musical Degree being the production of a certificate from one or two graduates, stating that the candidate is a fit and proper person for admission as a member of the university. It may be added that no residence is called for at Dublin by the enforcement of this regulation, for it is possible to graduate in any Faculty in Trinity College by merely going up to the terminal examinations and paying the fees, so that the additional requirements throw no real obstacle in the way of the young professor, provided he possesses the needful education.

In order to make the matter perfectly clear we append the official copy of the Regulations:—

PRELIMINARY CONDITIONS.—A Bachelor of Music must be matriculated in Arts,* and if he shall not have obtained his degree of Bachelor of Arts, must pass, in addition, an Examination in the following subjects:—(1) English Composition, History, and Literature; (2) a Modern Foreign Language; (French, German or Italian); (3) Latin, or, instead of it, a second modern Language; (4) Arithmetic. He must also lodge with the Senior Proctor, at least one month before the day of the Public Commencements at which the degree is conferred, the full score, legibly written, of a piece of Vocal Music, of which a portion at least must be in four real parts, with accompaniments for an organ or a stringed band.

EXAMINATION FOR THE DEGREE OF MUS. BAC. The above conditions being fulfilled, the Candidate (provided his musical composition is approved of by the Board) must pass an Examination in the Theory and Grammar of Music, and in Thorough Bass, to be held by the Professor of Music, assisted by one or more Fellows appointed by the Board. He must also, if required to do so, conduct the performance of his compositions, produced at his own expense, in one of the public Halls of the College, according as the Board may direct. The Proctor cannot supplant for the private grace of the House till these conditions are fulfilled.

EXAMINATION FOR THE DEGREE OF MUS. D.—A Doctor of Music must have obtained his degree of Mus. B.,—and must compose and conduct, under the conditions already mentioned in the Mus. B. Examination, a piece of Vocal Music, of which a portion at least shall be in eight real parts, with accompaniments for a full band. Before the private grace of the House is obtained, the Candidate must pass an Examination on Instrumentation, and such other subjects connected with the Theory and Practice of Music as the Professor of Music may think fit. The Candidate will also be required to write, within a prescribed time, pieces of Harmony on given subjects, or on given basses.

FEES.—Bachelors of Arts in the University of Dublin will in future obtain their Degree of Mus. B. for a fee of £5. This Degree is intended to show that a sound practical knowledge of Music has been attained, sufficient to manage and conduct a choir, or to officiate in Cathedral or Choral Services. Under all other circumstances, the fees will be as follows:—

For Bachelor of Music	£12 0 0
" Doctor "	22 0 0

N. B.—These fees are additional to the Matric-

* Matriculation may be defined as entering the University, which is done by passing the Entrance Examination in any two Latin and two Greek books the Candidate may select. In English and Latin Composition, in Elementary English History, in Modern Geography and in the Elements of Arithmetic and Algebra. The Matriculation Fee amount to £15.

ulation Fees above mentioned. Both the Degrees may be taken on the same day, provided all the conditions are fulfilled.

As a means of showing the nature of the examinations to which the students have to submit, we are enabled to append the following paper, which was set at the examination for the degree of Bachelor of Music in Trinity Term, 1866:—

1. Give the derivation of the word Scale, and explain its meaning as applied to Music.
2. By the Dominant Chord modulations to various keys are effected; assign a reason for this.
3. Resolve the intervals of this chord regularly.
4. How are these intervals treated when the Interrupted Cadence is employed.
5. Give the fundamental basses of the following chords, figure their intervals, and resolve them:—

6. Consecutive or parallel 5ths and 8ths are, for the most part, forbidden in part-writing—can you assign reasons for this?
7. How would you avoid these faults?

Copies of the following Works placed before the Candidates.

8. How has Handel avoided the former in the "Hallelujah" from Messiah? and how the latter in the chorus, "Worthy is the Lamb" from the same?

9. Can you recall anything in Mozart's Zauberflöte Overture which seems to set one of these rules at defiance; and can you explain and justify Mozart's treatment?

10. Define Counterpoint; give the derivation of that term; and describe the various orders of Counterpoint.

11. Give examples of plain and of florid Counterpoint.

12. What is double Counterpoint? Can you point out what description of double Counterpoint is employed in the first movement of Mozart's Sonata in C minor; or Beethoven's Sonata in A flat (Op. 26); or Mendelssohn's III. Symphony?

13. Harmonize in five real parts, without the aid of a musical instrument, Luther's Choral "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott."

14. Harmonize in five parts the same, placing the melody in the second tenor.

15. Harmonize in five parts the same, placing the melody in the bass.

It will thus be seen that the Dublin degrees are of real practical value, and when to the musical test we add the previous examination in Arts we have a definite proof that men who are able to pass through the curriculum are armed at all points. Whether some such modification of the existing rules at Oxford and Cambridge would not be attended with satisfactory results is we think, well worthy of the attention of the professors, but we confess that we look with still greater hope in this respect to the University of London, which from the fact of no residence being required seems specially suited to meet the wants of musicians engaged in active work. The one thing needful at Burlington House is, we imagine, the provision of sufficient funds to defray the cost of the examinations but this ought scarcely to be permitted to stop the way of progress at an establishment where a public test is afforded in every other branch of study, and where a man can now become Doctor of Science or Doctor of Literature—everything in fact but a Doctor of Music. At any rate Dr. Stewart has taken a step in the right direction, and we trust that ere long his example will be imitated at all our other great seats of learning.—Choir.

Music Abroad.

LEIPZIG. The programmes of the Gewandhaus Concerts, since our last report, have been as follows:

Third, Oct. 19. Overture to "Medea," Bargiel; Recit. and Aria from Bach's "Pfingst-Cantata," sung by Frau Amalia Joachim; Schumann's Piano Concerto, played by Frau Clara Schumann; Songs with Piano ("Zuleika," Schubert, "Grass," Mendelssohn); Piano Solos (Gavotte, by Gluck; Andante in F, Schumann; Impromptu, Op. 142, F minor, Schubert).—Symphony in E flat, Schumann.

Fourth, Oct. 26. Symphony, No. 4, in B flat,

Gade; Beethoven's "Ah perfido!" sung by Fr. Amalia Joachim; Beethoven's 3d Piano Concerto, in C minor, played by Mme. Schumann.—Scherzo for Orchestra (first time). Goldmark; Songs by Schubert ("An die Musik," "Geheimes," "Die Taubenpost;" Piano pieces by Schumann, played by Clara Schumann: "In der Nacht" (from Fantasiestücken, op. 12), No. 4 of Nachstücke, op. 23, "Scherzino" from the Faschingschwank; Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven.

Fifth, Nov. 2. Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" Overture; Aria from Boieldieu's "Jean de Paris," sung by Frau Isendahl-Eggeling, court opera singer at Brunswick; Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, played by concertmeister Lanterbach of Dresden; Songs: "Es weiss und rüth es doch Keiner," Mendelssohn, "Unbefangenheit," Weber; Arioso for Violin, Riets.—Sinfonia Eroica, Beethoven.

Sixth, Nov. 9. Concerto for two Violins obligato (David and Röntgen), Violoncello obligato (Hegar), and string orchestra, by Handel (with Cadenza by David); Recit. and Aria from "Figaro's Hochzeit," sung by Fr. Marie Mahlknecht; Concertstück (Intro. and Allegro appassionato), Schumann, played by Capellmeister C. Reinecke; Songs: "Ich hatte einst ein schönes Vaterland," by E. Lassen, "Das Fischermädchen," Schubert; Fantasia and Fugue, for piano, Mozart.—Symphony by J. J. Abert (first time, conducted by the composer.)

Seventh, Nov. 16. Part I. Gade's "Comala," dramatic poem after Ossian, (the solos by Fr. Gips, Guttschbach and Borée, and Herr Gura).—Part II. Schumann's music to Byron's "Manfred," with connecting poem by Richard Pohl, recited by Otto Devrient.—Rather a sombre programme! "Gray upon gray," as the critic of the Signale (Bernsdorf) says.

CARLSRUHE. At a Museum concert in October were performed: Overture and Garden Scene from Schumann's music to Goethe's Faust; "Song of Fate" from Holderlin's "Hyperion," for chorus and orchestra, composed and conducted by Brahms; Songs by Schubert; Scenes from Second Part of Goethe's Faust, Schumann. The principal solo singers were Fr. Schwarz and Julius Stockhausen.

PRAGUE. The latest novelty, Svatojanské Prondy (The Rapids of St. John), at the National Bohemian Theatre, is by Richard Rozkosny, who was highly successful with his first essay, an operetta, produced last year. It has made a decided hit. Svatojanské Prondy is distinguished by melodic freshness, warmth of feeling, and an elevated style. There is a report that it is to be produced at the German Landestheater.—M. Smetana is just finishing his national opera, Libusa. Another new work, Bukovina, the first dramatic attempt of a young composer, Zdeňko Fibich, will shortly be produced. M. Fibich is said to possess considerable ability. In addition to the above, there will, probably, be produced during the present season, two other national works—comic operas—by A. Dvorzak, A. Primaly, and K. Bendi; Gluck's Iphigenie in Tauris; and Spontini's Vestalin, not forgetting the two Russian operas, Rusalka, and Ruslan and Ludmila, the former by Dargomizskij, the latter by Glinka. It will be seen from the above, that, in the way of original dramatic-musical activity, this capital beats for the moment all the other European capitals—like Colman's two fat single gentlemen—"rolled into one."

HAMBURG. Mad. Joachim and Mad. Clara Schumann appeared at the Second Philharmonic Concert. The following was the programme: Symphony, D major, Bach; Recitative and Air from Semele, Handel (Mad. Joachim); Pianoforte Concerto, A minor, Schumann (Mad. Clara Schumann); "Rhapsodie," Brahms (Mad. Joachim); Gavotte, Gluck; Scherzo, Mendelssohn; and Symphony, C major, Mozart. Two days subsequently to the date of the above concert, the two ladies gave a Matinée on their own account. The programme comprised Sonata, D minor, Beethoven; Air from the Weih-achtsthoratorium, Bach; Chromatic Fantasia with Fugue, Bach; "Colma's Klage," Schubert; Nocturne B major, and Scherzo, B flat minor, Chopin; Songs and Pianoforte Solos, Schumann.

At the Stadttheater, a new opera, Die Rose von Bacharach, words and music by Herr Scherff, has been produced with decided success. The music is a cross between Weber and Lortzing.

DUSSELDORF. Concert of the Universal Musical Association: Judas Maccabæus, Handel; Solo Singers: Mdles. Gips, Assmann, Herren Wagner and Bleizacher.

LEIPZIG. Third Concert of the Euterpe: Overture, Witte; Air from Le Nozze, Mozart (Madame Louisa Reinhold); 2d Symphony, C major, Schumann; Songs with Pianoforte Accompaniment (Madame Reinhold); "Huldigungsmarsch," R. Wagner.—Concert in the Gewandhaus for the benefit of the poor of the Town: Overture to Joseph, Mehul; Air from the same (Herr Müller, from Lemberg); Andante from the Tragische Symphonie, Schubert; Concert-Aria, Mozart (Herr Krolop); Requiem, for soloists, chorus, and orchestra, Lachner (vocalists: Mesdames Mahlknecht, Friedlander, Kindermann, Herren Müller, Krolop).

PARIS.

The seventh concert at the Conservatory offered the 8th Symphony of Beethoven; Chorus of Nymphes de Psyché, by Ambroise Thomas; Symphony to "Hymn of Praise," Mendelssohn; O vos omnes, unaccompanied chorus, by Vittoria; Overture to Euryanthe, Weber.—M. George Hainl directed.

Sixth Popular Concert, given by Padeloup at the Winter Circus, Sunday, Dec. 10; programme: Symphony in D minor, Schumann; Air from the Prometheus Ballet, Beethoven; Symphony in G minor, Mozart; Marche Heroique (first hearing). Saint-Saëns; Overture to Freyshütz, Weber.

Carlotta Patti, with several of the first artists, gave a concert, Dec. 19, in aid of the Chicago sufferers.

The programme of M. Padeloup's fifth Popular Concert consisted of: Overture to Athalie, Mendelssohn; Heroic Symphony, Beethoven; Hymn by Haydn (by all the strings); Fragments of Rubinstein's "Ocean Symphony;" "Invitation to the Waltz," Weber, (for orchestra by Berlioz.)

BERLIN. The musical season at Berlin has fairly commenced, and its first legitimate week has been distinguished by two events of the greatest interest to all votaries of the divine art. One was a concert given by two of its high-priestesses, Mmes Joachim and Schumann. The former is unquestionably the first Liedersängerin—imperfectly rendered by "ballad singer"—in Germany. Gifted with a magnificent voice, the lower register of which reminds one of Alboni in her best days, and with that rarest of endowments, a perfectly correct ear, she exhibits in her vocalization the results of arduous and careful study. Here is one of those rare musical natures that impart something of their own inherent beauty and grace to everything they touch—even to works in themselves so noble and complete, that the most accomplished and appreciative musicians are apt to believe that nought can be added to their native charms. Mme. Joachim's interpretation of Schumann's or Schubert's songs can only be compared to a portrait by the hand of a great painter. The original is there delineated, and to the life; but there is more in the picture than a mere likeness—there are admirable inspirations of genius and evidences of individuality that have sprung up under a master-hand, enhancing ten-fold the delight and value of the "counterfeit presentment."

With Clara Schumann's playing you in England are as familiar as we are in Germany; but I cannot help fancying that she feels herself more in her element here than in a London concert room. Encoring is contra bonos mores in Berlin, and wise is the unwritten law that proscribes it as a rule; but we broke the rule the other night, and were not to be denied, in favor of a "gavotte" by Gluck, which Mme. Schumann played with such exquisite grace and finish that the audience, though most cool and critical, broke out into a real tempest of applause.

The second treat of the week was Professor Joachim's Quartet Concert—one of the numbers being Beethoven's monumental quatuor (Opus 130), of all compositions for strings the longest, most difficult, and most sublime. One of the most attentive listeners to this glorious work—executed with rare ability by Joachim and his lieutenants—was Field Marshal Count Von Moltke. As I entered the ante-room of the Academy of Music I met him face to face; he had just arrived, in undress uniform and on foot, without aide-de-camp, servant, or companion of any sort, and was patiently awaiting the end of the first movement to go to his seat. I will venture to assert, that no one in that crowded hall, although every other person present was a musician aux bouts des ongles, enjoyed or appreciated the performances of the evening more keenly than did the stern-visaged strategist who has contributed more than any other man to the overthrow of two mighty Empires and the alteration of the "balance of power." His excellency, by his own account, has never enjoyed better health than now; and, indeed, like the king, he walks, rides, and works with as much ease and vigor as though he were a robust youth, instead of having already outstepped the Biblical limit of human life.—Daily Telegraph (London.)

DUBLIN.—A lecture, the fourth of a Series on "Musical Forms," was on Saturday afternoon delivered in the Examination Hall of Trinity College, Dublin, before an extremely large and fashionable audience by Dr. R. P. Stewart, on "Dance Music." The lecturer commenced by explaining the strict meaning of that department of music classified under the heading which formed the subject of his lecture—namely, the rhythmical arrangement of harmonious sound according to certain laws which, when put actively into operation, tend to produce not unfrequently an almost involuntary tendency to mark the time by a sympathetic movement of the limbs. Savages mark this by clapping the hands, but amongst civilized nations it is performed by movements of the body, the accurate attainment of which has been made an important item in modern education, and forms, when fully reached, one of the most graceful accomplishments. Having traced the origin of the dance from a remote period, and shown that, like most refined arts, it first took its rise in connexion with religion, Dr. Stewart alluded to examples of this shown in the writings of antiquity, and even in the sacred records, as when David danced in thanksgiving to the Lord. He next turned to an account of its cultivation by the Moors and Spaniards, which latter people employed it so freely in aiding their devotions that an aged Cardinal was known to unbend his stateliness in the exercise, and a special dance was at one time composed for the nuns of a celebrated convent, to be employed by them in offering up their hymns. But the dance soon lost much of its connection with religious ceremonies, and became extensively cultivated as a national amusement. In France and Italy it was carried to a still higher degree of perfection than in Spain; and although choirs of boys, with an accompaniment of many instruments, were used to perform the dancing portion of the High Mass Service, just as the early Christians used to employ the dance while engaged in offering up their less complicated form of worship, yet it was chiefly cultivated as a national amusement. Turning first to a consideration of the later and more elaborated and secular forms of dance music in Spain, Dr. Stewart proceeded to enumerate and explain in succession the different dances peculiar to that country. Some were slow and majestic, some sprightly and gay, many remarkable only for the splendor which accompanied their production. Of one of these Dr. Stewart, assisted by several well skilled amateurs, gave separate examples—that is of the music. The course of the dance in Italy and in France was next traced, and exemplified down to the present time, in a manner equally full and agreeable. Amongst these examples there were given specimens from some of the finest operas—notably one from the ball-room scene in Don Giovanni, where that prince of schemers induces his valet to get up a scene of confusion, in order that he may have an opportunity of indulging in his flirtations. Three different dances were played at the same time on Saturday in illustration of this. One on the piano, another on the violin, and a third on the harmonium, and showed very beautifully the conception of the great composer. Alluding then to Germany, Poland, and next to the old English country dance, which has been superseded by the new-fashioned quadrilles, &c., Dr. Stewart gave some delightful examples of all, and concluded his discourse by reviewing the melodies of Ireland, introducing, at the same time, one of the Irish jigs which are familiar throughout the country. The lecture, independently of its instructive features, was really a selection of well-rendered music, over a great range, and affording rare gratification to a crowded audience.—Lond. Choir.

JENNY LIND IN FLORENCE. Florence, notwithstanding gay Paris is once more accessible, is beginning to show a goodly number of winter visitors. The most noticeable at present is the once great cantatrice, Jenny Lind, who with her family has elected this fair city to pass the winter months. Of course all the Americans are on the qui vive to see and hear this famous songstress, and an opportunity was given last evening by the fair wife of the American consul,

Mr. I. L. Geaham, at her elegant apartments, where a most delightful entertainment was given in honor of Mme. Goldschmidt. Nearly one hundred persons were present, mostly Americans, some Italians and French. Jenny Lind, robed in high-necked gray silk, trimmed with purple, an India muslin cape and fall of lace over the back hair, which is still worn in the same style as when she charmed her audiences thirty years ago, looked somewhat ancient amid the elegant full-dress toilets of all the other ladies present; but her kind face and pleasing manner captivated no less than formerly. Time has not been more lenient to her than to the rest of mortals. She looks fully her age, and that magnificent voice has lost much—very much of its pristine glory and power; but that she can still sing she gave evidence last evening in her exquisite rendering of a morceau from Handel's oratorio "Penseroso," to the piano accompaniment of her husband. Her execution was faultless, and much clearness and sweetness remain to testify to what her voice has been. Her manner to the other ladies who sang was charming. She highly complimented the Italian method of singing, represented by Mrs. D. C. Hall, of Boston, whose fine mezzo-soprano voice in Luzzi's "Ave Maria" gave evidence of culture in that school and much natural taste. The fair hostess gave, with much taste, some Italian arias. Everything passed so delightfully that many will remember this evening passed in the company of Jenny Lind with much pleasure and satisfaction. I have been told that Mme. Goldschmidt says her young daughter, aged fourteen years, promises to surpass her mother in the quantity and quality of her voice.—Corr. N. Y. Herald.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JAN. 18, 1872.

Symphony Concerts.

The fourth and fifth Concerts of the Harvard series were notable occasions, attracting larger audiences than usual, enjoyed and talked about by everybody. The glowing criticisms which we have copied from one of the morning Dailies may serve as a fair specimen for all of them,—at least in point of enthusiasm. The programme of the fourth concert (Thursday afternoon, Dec. 28) was as follows:

Overture: "In the Highlands".....Gade.
Fourth Piano-Forte Concerto, in G, op. 58.....Beethoven.
Hugo Leonhard.
Fourth Symphony, in B-flat, op. 60.....Beethoven.
Song: "Adelaide".....Beethoven.
Carl Glogner-Castelli.
Overture, to "The Ruler of the Spirits," ("Rubezahl") Weber.

This programme was a departure from the original design, which had more contrast. That Symphony and that Concerto of Beethoven are not just the two works we would place together; but it happened that Miss MEHLIG, who was to have played in this concert, could not arrive from Europe in season for consultation, but had sent word by letter that she would play "Beethoven in G;" when she finally arrived so late that Mr. LEONHARD was called upon to take her place, the most convenient thing for him to do, involving also the least change in the programme, was to play that same Concerto. And this he did more admirably than ever before; for on several occasions (in past years) he had played it in a manner so artistic and poetic, with such a delicate appreciation and reproduction of its deep spiritual beauty, that we had all come to associate him with every memory of its witching strains. This time, undertaking it at a day's notice, he made it purely an act of artistic devotion, and the effort was indeed blest. In perfection of technical execution, as well as in poetic aspiration, he surpassed himself, felicitous in each and every part. We doubt if any artist could have brought the pathos and the beauty of that exquisite recitative in the Andante, answering to the stern unisons of the orchestra, more deeply home to every listener with any soul of music in him. His pianissimo, as fine as possible, (yet without soft pedal), was perfectly distinct in every note. The buoyancy and brightness of the Rondo brought inimitable sunshine. The Cadenzas by Moscheles, woven out of the Beethoven themes, but not quite of the same texture, not in the Beethoven spirit, were executed with a brilliant, faultless virtuosity. Such artistic service could not fail of most unanimous and hearty recognition. Mr. L.'s reluctance to keeping himself further in the foreground by playing a solo in the second part, in the place of Miss Mehlig, gave us a welcome, though brief opportunity of listening for once to the refined and highly cultivated vocal art of Mr. GLOGNER-CASTELLI, for some years professor of singing in the Leipsic Conservatory, but for the year past established here in Boston as a successful teacher. Mr. Glogner is much more than a mere singer; he is a musician, and a musical character in the best sense. His tenor voice is not powerful, at least for the great Hall, and a little dry in quality, yet it is very sweet and musical, evenly developed, flexible, and used with admirable method. Seldom have we heard Beethoven's great love song sung with so much truth of feeling, so much delicate, refined expression. If to some it seemed a little cold, it was because the singer had caught cold physically and was naturally somewhat timid in the free use of so sensitive an organ.

The Orchestra, (increased this time by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, giving us eleven first violins and six good 'cellos), played with excellent precision, sympathy and light and shade in nearly every part of every piece. Their rendering in the Concerto was very nice and delicate. Beethoven's Fourth Symphony—which we should call the warmest and most love-fraught, rather than "the gayest" of his Symphonies—went remarkably well, the wind instruments in the Minuet and Trio and the Finale, which are gay, leaving little to be desired. The solemn opening (suggesting solitude and silence far above the world) and the exhilaration as of mountain air, in Gade's overture, were impressively brought out. The task of difficulty was the one new piece of the programme, Weber's Overture to one of his youthful operas, "Rubezahl," to which he afterwards gave the name of "Der Beherrscher der Geister" (Ruler of the Spirits). It is thoroughly Weber-ish and anticipates much of the weird supernatural vein of the Freyshütz, while sweeter passages alternately for horns, clarinet, oboe, flute (the fagotto being very active among the subterranean spirits) have more of the charm of Oberon. There is a wild, impetuous life in it, full of originality and fine invention, and it has the unity of form, the concentration and conciseness, the color contrast and effectiveness of a romantic overture in the best sense. Either we overrate it, or the critic of the Daily has failed to see its real worth. As we said, it bristles with difficulties for the instruments, abounding in singular and crooked obligato melodies for now one, now another, and requiring thorough practice to bring it out so clearly and effectively as it was given.

For the fifth Concert (Jan. 4) Miss ANNA MEHLIG was on hand (as also at the Public Rehearsal two days earlier), and this the programme, than which no one has been more heartily enjoyed this winter:

Overture: "The Fair Melusine".....Mendelssohn.
Piano-Forte Concerto, in B-minor, op. 2.....Chopin.
Miss Anna Mehlig.
Third Symphony, ("Scotch"), in A-minor, op. 55. Mendelssohn.
Piano Solo: "Rhapsodie Hongroise".....Liszt.
Miss Anna Mehlig.
Overture to "Genoveva".....Schumann.

Here again there was hardly enough of contrast, inasmuch as the Mendelssohn Symphony had to be substituted at a late hour for the promised orchestral arrangement by Joachim of that very noble and symphonic Duo, in four movements, op. 140, by Schubert, which, after some rehearsal, was deemed impracticable for the present. In itself, however, the Symphony in which Mendelssohn, in the fresh, full vigor of his young imagination, has so vividly embodied his impressions of a tour in Scotland, is ever welcome, and this time its every movement seemed to be drunk in with a sincere delight not too soon yielding to satiety. For it was uncommonly happy in the rendering; particularly the frolic, quaintly national Vivace, where the wind instruments commingled with most musical precision, delicacy and proportion with their bright bits of melody,—as well as the Allegro vivacissimo. The violins, too, were quite up to the mark, sensitively quick and true, and the violoncellos in the Adagio were very rich and tender.

The opening and closing Overtures, each a rare product of its kind, while both embody legends of old German chivalrous romance, are yet as different in their individuality as the two men who wrote them, and interesting for comparison although requiring to be set so far apart. The Schöne Melusine was never more fascinating in its alternation of cool sportive watery life with a motive of heroic, manly character. Only we thought it opened in too quick a tempo for a wholly clear and even picture. After it, as has been truly said, the long orchestral introduction to Chopin's Concerto seemed comparatively weak and thin,—for with this genius of the pianoforte, in a sense so peculiar and exclusive, instrumentation was not a strong point. Schumann's exciting and impassioned "Genoveva" Overture is one whose power and beauty does not cease to grow upon hearers who are deeply musical (we do not mean learnedly), though they heard it at least for the seventh time, if they have followed up these concerts from the first. There is something about it which makes it always new and always appetizing. With all its restless agitato, it yet has perfect unity of form and logical development, still growing to a splendid climax (splendidly rendered this time), while it is relieved at intervals by most delicious and refreshing sounds of woodland life and of the chase, harbingers of hope to exiled injured innocence. In this Overture Mr. ZERRAHN and his orchestra seemed to have studied to do their very best, and that was very good indeed. The beauty of the work has never been brought out here half so perfectly before; the breezy horn passages were prompt and true, the phrasing throughout as distinct as could be wished, and the uplifting, joyful climax at the end was wrought up to a pitch almost sublime. Who would not hear it gladly many times again? Doubtless some, who have yet to find the key to Schumann's secret.

But in no one nor all of these good things lay the chief expectation of the hour. That was the reappearance of the admirable young pianist, who so instantly installed herself as first in favor here two years ago, and still holds the place, if we may judge from the warmth of her reception, the intense interest and delight with which she was watched in every note, and the enthusiasm with which she was repeatedly recalled. Miss ANNA MEHLIG, who had hardly been on terra firma long enough for rest after a long and exceedingly rough voyage, came on the stage beaming, full of health, and evidently happy to be once more in the Music Hall before this sympathetic Boston audience. She seemed inspired to do her very best, and did it from the heart as well as from the clear, large brain. All felt that she had even improved much upon herself; that there was in her playing more of power, of delicacy, of fine vitality of touch making the imprint clear in every tone however softened down to pianissimo; more of artistic continuity, proportion and warm poetic fusion of the parts in one fair whole; in short more of the insight, certainty and breadth of the mature, genial artist. It was, in every point, as perfect an interpretation of Chopin's exquisite creation as most of us are fine enough in instinct or in culture to conceive of. We have heard it genially and finely interpreted by others, but not with the same clearness and positiveness of imprint in every note, making it palpable to every ear in the great hall, and that without the smallest sacrifice of delicacy. It was a new and fresh experience, almost like a second first hearing, and hailed with as much pleasure and surprise as that first debut of hers in the same place, when her rendering of the other Chopin Concerto so electrified the audience. She made a new thing also of the fantastic, freakish, brilliant Hungarian Rhapsody by Liszt.

The Sixth Concert comes next Thursday, with this programme: Bach's Organ Toccata in F, arranged for orchestra by Esser; Piano Concerto in D minor, Mozart, played by Mr. RICHARD HOFFMAN, one of the most sterling, high toned artists of New York; Gade's third Symphony, in A minor (first time in this country), a delicate and lovely work.

Part II. Adagio and Rondo from a Clarinet Concerto by Weber (played by Mr. ERNEST WEBER, of the orchestra); Piano Solos by Mr. HOFFMAN (Nocturne and Polonaise by Chopin); Overture to "Fierabras," Schubert.—Here again, the displacing of a piece in one programme has necessitated a change in several programmes, crowding the Clarinet Solo forward into this one.

Chamber Concerts.

The third and fourth matinees of Messrs. LEONHARD and EICHBERG were fully equal to the two before, alike in excellence of programme and performance. These were the selections:

Thursday, Dec. 14.

Sonata for Violin and Piano, Op. 21.....Gade.
Adagio, Allegro di Molto; Larghetto; Adagio, Allegro molto vivace.

Messrs. Eichberg and Leonhard.

Songs: { "Die liebe Farbe," }Schubert.
 { "Die böse Farbe," }
 Mr. Carl Glogner Castelli.

Concerto for two Violins, D minor.....Bach.
Vivace; Largo; Allegro

Messrs. Eichberg and H. Suck.

Piano Solo, Ballade, op. 38, F major.....Chopin.

Mr. Leonhard.

Trio for Piano, Violin, and Violoncello, op. 68, D minor.

Schumann.

In four movements.

Messrs. Leonhard, Eichberg, and A. Suck.

Thursday, Dec. 21.

Sonata, for Piano and Violin, op. 106, A minor.....Schumann.

In three movements.

Piano Solo, ("Scenes in the Woods,".....Schumann.
1. Entrance; 2. Hunter on the Stand; 3. Lonely
Flowers; 4. Ill-fated spot; 5. Charming view;
6. Inn; 7. Bird prophesying; 8. The Chase;
9. Farewell.

Mr. Hugo Leonhard.

Sonata for Violin with Piano Accompaniment, No. 6,
Op. 1, Comp. 1748.....Geminiani.
Affettuoso; Andante; Fuga.

Mr. Eichberg.

Trio for Piano, Violin, and Violoncello, op. 70, No. 2, E-flat major.....Beethoven.

Poco sostenuto, Allegro ma non troppo; Allegretto;
Allegretto ma non troppo; Finale.

Messrs. Leonhard, Eichberg, and A. Suck.

The Sonata by Gade is one of the most graceful, fresh and genial of his works; the Larghetto particularly charming. Mr. GLOGNER-CASTELLI won great favor by the refined, expressive style in which he sang the two interesting songs from Schubert's "Schöne Müllerin" cycles, finely accompanied by Mr. LEONHARD.

The Bach Concerto for two violins won all hearers by the wholesome life and grace of its two quick movements, and by the exquisite sentiment and beauty of the Andante. How every note tells in the very abstemious accompaniment for the piano! and how the violinists, EICHBERG particularly, seemed to love the music and put their soul into their playing! Mr. Leonhard's rendering of the Chopin Ballade—one seldom or never heard in public here before, but equal to any of the four in interest—was sensitively true and tender in the soft introduction, and superb in the grand, exciting storm and climax of the harmony; it was a great success in a most nervous task. Of Schumann's Trio, one of the richest and profoundest of his imaginative creations, mystical yet fascinating in its first Allegro, full of invention and of earnest meaning throughout, we forbear to say more, as it would cost too many words to do it any justice. It was capitally played and made a deep impression. The critic who thought the pianist played wrong notes, was probably misled by the bold use which Schumann makes of passing discords.

The Schumann Sonata Duo and the Beethoven Trio were altogether charming, particularly the Allegretto of the latter with its piquant motive. Schumann's cycle of little pieces which he calls "Wald-scenen" were heard for the first time here in a concert room, we think. It is a deep-souled poet who reports thus of the woods. Each little "scene" is characteristic, some of them bright and animated, others full of musing tender feeling and suggestive fancy. We hardly know which to esteem most beautiful: "Eintritt," or "Einsame Blumen," (so modest, still and simple), or "Herberge," or perhaps best of all, the last one. The "Bird as Prophet" is a most happy reconciliation of the art of music with free "native woodnotes wild," the little sketches of "arpeggio bird song" constantly overreaching or evading the beaten path of the scale, and yet all harmonized and rounded into an artistic piece. The old Violin Sonata was charming, and charmingly played.

Of the fifth Matinee (this week) we cannot now speak. The sixth and last will be on Thursday, Jan. 25, when will be given: Beethoven Trio in C minor, Op. 1, No. 3; an Aria from Bach's Christmas Oratorio, sung by C. Glogner-Castelli; Piano Solos by Chopin; and the great Schumann Quintet with Piano.

MR. ERNST PRARBO gave the first of four Piano-forte Matinees at Wesleyan Hall on Friday, Jan. 5, to an audience select, but not so large as he had good right to expect. The first piece, a Sonatina (op. 10, No. 1), in C, by Anton Krause, seemed to us too commonplace, too like a piece for younger pupils, to figure in so good an artist's programme; yet it is clear and honest music, without modern affectations. A transcription by Liszt of Beethoven's cycle of six Songs: "An die ferne Geliebte," the most delicate and tender and poetic of all the songs Beethoven wrote, recalls their beauty as well perhaps as such an instrument could do; and the rendering was on the whole true and sympathetic, if here and there not quite enough subdued. A pleasing Serenata, from a Sonata by Bennett, suffered a little from the same want; but the Gavotte in G minor, by Auguste Dupont, a modern imitation of the quaint old forms of Bach and Handel, was capitally rendered. The piece itself is taking, though it is but a clever and somewhat questionable attempt to clothe purely modern moods and fancies in that old form,—putting new wine (not of the choicest vintage) in old bottles. Schubert's Sonata in E-flat (posthumous) was of course very interesting, and happy in an interpreter who plays Schubert con amore.—The second matinee will be Jan. 19.

MISS ANNA MEHLIG'S first of Three Piano-Forte Recitals, at Mechanics' Hall, on Wednesday last (at 3 P.M.) was altogether a success. Large and appreciative audience, rich and varied programme, and of course admirable, in some things wonderful performance. Need we tell, even if we had the room, how grandly she played the great Schubert Fantasia in C, op. 15 (Liszt's arrangement)—how brilliant in the first part and the Scherzo, with what breadth and wealth of harmony and feeling she made the instrument sing its slow cantabile ("The Wanderer") with its variations; and with what stern majesty and power she brought out the fugged finale? The playful C sharp major Prelude and Fugue from Bach's Well-tempered Clavier, and the great Organ Prel. and Fugue in A minor, as transcribed by Liszt (as great as that in G minor which she played before) made a fine impression. Then came Schumann's "Kinderscenen," in which it was pleasant to hear the "Frischerer" in its original and unexplicated form once more; Chopin's Ballade, No. 3, in A flat; two charming revivals of old-time piano-forte memories in Hummel's "Prelude d'Amour" and "If I were a Bird," and an immensely difficult and brilliant Polonaise by Liszt.

Next Monday she will play Weber's best Sonata, in A flat; Andantino in A minor, by Mozart; "Etudes de Concert," by Chopin; Mendelssohn's noble "Variations Serieuses"; three Fantastic-Sticks by Schumann; and Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" marvellously arranged and filled out by Taubert.

MR. CARLYLE PETERSILEA, in a series of Piano Recitals, is playing the entire list of Beethoven's Sonatas in course, after the example of Charles Hallé in London.—Mr. J. A. HILLS gave the third and last of his Recitals of Ancient and Modern Piano Music, at Brackett's Hall, last Wednesday (same hour, unfortunately, with Miss Mehlig). The selections were a Trio by Bargiel, the violin and cello parts by Messrs. ALLEN and SUCK; Mendelssohn's "Autumn" Song, sung by Mrs. KEMPTON; Mendelssohn's D-minor Concerto, by Mr. HILLS, with orchestral accompaniment on a second piano by Miss KIRK; Song by Spohr: "What nerves the Hunter," Mrs. Kempton, with violin obligato by Mr. Allen; and three original compositions by Mr. Hills, viz. the first movement of a Piano Sonata in F, and a Benedictus and Kyrie, sung in quartet by Mrs. WESTON, Mrs. KEMPTON, Dr. LANGMAD and Mr. RYDER.

ORATORIOS. We shall have four to recall in our next. For the present we can only remind our readers that the last chance to hear such music given with the noble singers of the Dolby troupe occur this evening (Stabat Mater, with choice selections for a second part), and to-morrow evening, "Elijah" once more, in which the Handel and Haydn Society are always certain of success.

ENGLISH OPERA. The PAREFA-ROSA company have opened at the Boston Theatre with great success. The company is uncommonly complete, good principals, good orchestra and chorus, and nothing slighted. Lucrezia Borgia, Maritana, Bohemian Girl, Marriage of Figaro, and Martha have been given. To-night (first time) Balfe's "Satanstoe." Look out for Oberlin's "Water-carrier," as well as Weber's "Oberon," are long!

"APOLLO" claims our homage and shall have it.

DEATH OF THEODORE HAGEN. The Musical Review, the most important of the musical journals of New York, thus announces the sudden death of its editor:

Theodore Hagen expired at his residence in this city at an early hour on Wednesday morning, the 27th of December, in the 48th year of his age. The bereavement has come so suddenly, and is so afflicting, that it words in which to record it seem very hard to find. By those who knew him intimately Theodore Hagen was greatly beloved. His manliness, his goodness, his generosity, his sweetness of temperament, his wide range of sympathies, and the happy and winning compound of refinement and joviality that he diffused in the every day business of life made him a unique character, and one that was equally admirable and lovable. He has left many true friends; he has not left a single foe. His career as a journalist extended over a period of more than thirty years. He was born at Hamburg on the 15th of April, 1824, and he received a liberal and thorough education in the schools and colleges of his native land. At an early age he went to Paris, and there he became connected with the Press—contributing, also, to papers at Hamburg and Leipzig. From Paris he removed to London, and thence, in 1864, to this city. His relations with this journal—then called the Musical Review and World, and published by Messrs. Mason and Brothers—immediately commenced, and they have continued unbroken till this hour. He purchased the paper in 1860, and, as its readers know, changed its title, and subsequently, in 1865, its form and general character—to what they now are. The history of his labors as a journalist and a musician is not now to be written. The commemoration of his virtues and his talents—which, as a scholar, critic and composer, were alike solid and brilliant—cannot yet be attempted. Grief for a great loss is still too recent.

NEW YORK, JAN. 9.—After numerous preliminary and supplemental "farewell" nights, the season of Italian Opera has come to an end, the last appearance of Mr. Strakosch's troupe having been on Jan. 8d, in "Lucia di Lammermoor."

On Christmas day Herr Wachtel appeared at the Grand Opera House in "The Postillion of Longjumeau," and was received with an enthusiasm which, need it be said, was amply justified by his admirable singing and acting. Miss Pauline Canham took the rôle of Madeline.

There was the usual performance of "The Messiah" in the evening, at Steinway Hall, with Miss Kellogg and Miss Antoinette Sterling in the leading parts. The rendering was, as usual, somewhat uneven, the orchestra, in particular, being very unsatisfactory. However, thanks to the artists above named, the general impression left by the performance seemed favorable.

The present week is made specially interesting, to lovers of good music, by a series of four concerts and one matinee, which Theo. Thomas announces to take place at Steinway Hall. If the first of these concerts, which I attended last evening, is to be taken as a sample of those to come we have much enjoyment in store. The following pieces were performed:

Overture, Anacreon.....Cherubini.
Adagio, 9th Symphony.....Beethoven.
Fantasia on Hungarian Airs.....Liszt.
Miss Marie Krebs and Orchestra.

Introd. and Finale, "Tristan und Isolde".....Wagner.

Theme and Variations, Quartet, D minor.....Schubert.
Balletello.....Gounod.
a. Nocturne.....Chopin.
b. Waltz.....Rubinstein.

Miss Marie Krebs.

Overture, "Der Freyschütz".....Weber.

No one who has once heard this excellent orchestra need be told of the precision and delicacy with which these pieces were rendered. The Adagio of the Ninth Symphony I have rarely heard so fully interpreted.

The Introduction and Finale from "Tristan und Isolde" were given, the programme informs us, for the "first time." If there were those present who devoutly wished that it might also be the last time, they bore the infliction with patience out of respect to those who are far enough "advanced" in their ideas to enjoy such strange combinations of tone.

The darkly beautiful "Theme and Variations" from Schubert's Quartet was played in the manner so popular in France (I believe it originated at the Conservatoire), that is by massing together all the stringed instruments in the orchestra.

Miss Krebs added not a little to the pleasure of the evening by her clever manipulation of the themes in Liszt's Fantasia, and it seemed as though she had gained some new insight into Chopin's music since last year. The remaining concerts are to take place on the 9th, 10th and 12th inst., with a matinee on the 13th, and a benefit to Miss Krebs on the evening of that day.

I send programme of the second Philharmonic, Jan. 6th.
Overture, "Euryanthe".....Weber.
Concerto for piano in F sharp minor.....Reinecke.
Mr. S. B. Mills.
Symphony No. 18, in G.....Haydn.

Symphony, "Im Walde".....Raff.

The Haydn Symphony took the place of Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" Overture, which was at first announced.

A. A. G.

"HOME, SWEET HOME." One of our foreign correspondents, not long since, recognized this melody in Donizetti's opera of Anna Bolena, and rushed to the conclusion that Donizetti was the author. But the London Musical World, of Dec. 16, has the following paragraphs:

A correspondent of the Athenaeum asks whether Donizetti or Bishop has the right to claim the composition of the ballad "Home, sweet home." The Athenaeum thinks "the honor should be assigned to our English composer, as the air was sung by Miss Tree (sister of Mrs. Charles Kean) in Howard Payne's musical drama, Clari, produced at Covent Garden Theatre, on the 8th of May, 1823, whereas Anna Bolena, in whose mad scene in the Tower, the melody is heard, was only brought out at the Scala, in Milan, in 1830, with Mme. Pasta, Signor Rubini, and Signor Galli in the cast." The fact is that the air belongs neither to Bishop nor to Donizetti, being a popular Sicilian melody. Bishop was even a greater thief than Handel, without one hundredth part of Handel's genius.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—In reply to a note in the Athenaeum, allow me to say that this air is Sicilian, and on the title of the original English edition, published by D'Almaine and Co., Sir Henry Bishop acknowledges the source whence he obtained it. Sir Henry Bishop informed me he received the melody from an officer of De Roll's regiment, Captain Alexander Stuart, who served in Sicily, during the British occupation, under General Lord Bentinck. I, myself, during my rambles in Sicily, at the foot of Mount Etna, and in the neighborhood of Palermo and Catania, have heard this melody sung by the peasants whilst gathering the produce of the vineyards, both as a solo and chorus. The melody being made popular throughout Europe by Sir Henry Bishop's arrangement, in 1829-30, Donizetti introduced it in Anna Bolena, to the words, Cielo il mio lughè; but there is no doubt of its being an old Sicilian pastoral melody.

WELLINGTON GUERNSEY.

London, Dec. 15th, 1871.

NICOLAS-PROSPER LEVASSEUR.—Nicolas-Prospér Levasseur, the original Bertram in Robert le Diable, the original Marcel in Les Huguenots, and the original Zacharie in Le Prophète, has just died in Paris, at the age of 81. He was born in Picardy, of humble parents, and entered the Conservatoire when sixteen years old. His debut was made at the Opera, in 1813, in La Caravane, after which he appeared successively in England and in Italy. In 1828, Levasseur returned to the Grand Opera, and created the roles of the Governor in Comte Ory, and Mahomet in Le Siège de Corinthe; but his greatest success was made in connection with the works of Meyerbeer. On retiring from the Opera, he became a professor at the Conservatoire, and held the post until within the last three years. The obsequies of Levasseur were celebrated, with due musical honors, at the Church of Notre Dame de Lorette.

A Story About Mendelssohn.

THE FAMOUS ORGAN AT FRIBURG AND ITS KEEPER.

The writer of "Musical Recollections of the Last Half Century," in Tinsley's Magazine, tells this story of Mendelssohn:

Great as Mendelssohn was as a composer, I believe he was far greater both as a pianist and as an organist. Under his hand each instrument "discoursed" after a manner as original as it was captivating. Scarcely had he touched the keyboard than something that can only be explained as similar to a pleasurable electric shock passed through his hearers and held them spell-bound—a sensation that was only dissolved as the last chord was struck, and when one's pent up breath seemed as if only able to recover its usual action by means of a gulp or a sob.

An anecdote relative to this feeling I may here introduce as told me by Sir Michael Costa. On one occasion of Mendelssohn being in Switzerland, he and Sir Michael met at the church of Friburg, in which building the organ is of such world-wide celebrity that few persons—especially those who lay claim to any musical taste—leave the town without going to hear it. At the time referred to the custodian was somewhat of a bear, and most determinedly refused, either for love or money, to permit any stranger to place his fingers upon the keys, although he himself had not the slightest pretension to the designation of an organist, and, so far from showing the capabilities of the instrument, induced very many to go away under the impression that they had been "sold," and that all "Murray" and other guide-books had stated was nothing better than "a delusion and a snare." Mendelssohn was resolved, by hook or by crook, to ascertain what the Friburg organ was made of.

For this purpose he drew the custodian out, working upon his weak points of character—for the old man really loved the organ as if it had been his child—but as to getting his consent, that seemed to be beyond the probability of realization. Every one who ever had the good fortune to be acquainted with Mendelssohn, must have been attracted by his winning manners, his courteous bearing, and his manifestations of decided character. Whether he won upon the old man by any one of these peculiarities of his "native worth" in particular, or by their combination, can only be inferred. Suffice it to say, that after long parley he was permitted to try one range of keys. One hand he employed at first, quietly using the other in drawing the stops, as if to test the variety of their quality; and when he had thus got out as many as seemed applicable for his purpose, he made a dash, which completely staggered the old man, and began to play as only he could play.

The old man gasped for breath. He clutched the rail against which he was standing, and for an instant seemed as if he would drag this bold intruder from his seat. That impulse was, however, only momentary; for he soon stood, as it were, spell-bound, until a break in the gushing harmony enabled him to make an effort to ascertain who the master spirit was that made the organ speak as he had never heard it speak before. Sir Michael Costa, at first scarcely knowing whether it were better to smile at the old man's astonishment and let events take their course, or to enlighten him at once, decided on the former course; but at this moment the old man seized him by the arm, and gasped out, "Who, in Heaven's name, is that man?" But when he answered, slowly and deliberately, "Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy," he staggered as if struck by a tremendous blow. "And I refused him to touch my organ!" he sorrowfully said. But as Mendelssohn began again to play, he gave an impatient sign that he should not be disturbed, and listened and listened as he never listened again, as if some mighty spirit entranced him. The object gained, Mendelssohn spoke a few kind words to the old man, and so departed, leaving an impression upon his mind and heart that, without doubt, during the time that he was spared, was never for an hour obliterated.

English Opera.

THE EARLIEST PERFORMANCE.

About the earliest and most notable performance of English opera was in 1656, under the management of Sir William Davenant, the poet. The piece was entitled: "An entertainment at Rutland House, by Declamation and Music, after the manner of the Ancients," and was afterward published, in the same year, in a quarto volume. Davenant had just been liberated from the Tower, where he had been confined by Parliament for his complicity in the scheme—originally encouraged by Henrietta Maria, the Queen-mother of England—of carrying out a number of artificers to Virginia. At this time, tragedies and comedies—thanks to the morality of a Puritanical government—were prohibited. Davenant formed the idea of starting an entertainment which should consist solely of music, thus escaping the penalties of the law. This musical drama—of which we have already given the title—he styled an opera, and the first performance took place at Rutland House, Charterhouse House Row, or what is now called Charterhouse-square, on the 15th of May, 1656. The price of admission was five shillings. Although there were accommodations for 400 people, only about 150 were present. The scene was Athens; and a quaint description of the place and the performance is given in a MS. of the time: "The room was narrow; at the end thereof was a stage, and upon either side two places railed in, purple and gilt. The curtains, also, which drew before them were of cloth of gold and purple. After the prologue—which told them that this was but the narrow passage to the Elysium, their opera—up came Diogenes and Aristophanes, the former against the opera, the latter for it. Then came up a citizen of Paris, speaking broken English, and a citizen of London, who reproached one another with the defects of each city—in their buildings, manners, customs, diet, &c. And, in fine, the Londoner had the best of it—who concluded he had seen two crotchets in Paris, both with heavy burdens on their backs, stand complimenting for the way, with 'C'est à vous, monsieur,' 'Monsieur, vous vous moquez de moi,' &c., which lasted till they both fell down under their burdens. The music was above, in a loover hole, railed and covered with sarasnets to conceal them. Before each speech was concert music. At the end were songs relating to the victor (the Protector). The last song ended with deriding Paris and the French, concluding thus:

"And tho' a ship her sea'cheon be,
Yet Paris hath no ships at sea."

"The first song was made by Hen. Lawes, ye other by Dr. Coleman, who were the composers. The singers were Captain Cooke, Ned Coleman and his wife, another woman, and other inconsiderable voices. It lasted an hour and a half, and is to continue for ten days, by which time other declamations will be ready." Such was the "first season" of veritable English opera. The novelty seems to have rapidly gained in public estimation, for the opera was afterwards removed to the Cock-pit, in Drury Lane, and was much frequented for many years.—Once a Week.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC,
Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Over the Bars. 3. G to e. Smith. 30

"'Twas milking time, and the cows came up
From the meadows so sweet with clover."
A very pretty ballad. A love scene in the morning.

Let thy loving heart believe me. (Nella Braccia.)

6. D to b. Ricci. 75

Not more difficult than the 4th degree, if one leaves out the trills and a cadenza, but requires a light, fine, flexible organ. Very sweet and taking. Has the character of a Waltz Overtune, and has been introduced in "The Child of the Regiment."

Gypsy Queen. 3. Bb to e. B. D. D. 30

"Room where I may, glad smiles greet my way, Life is to me a long holiday."
A capital, and very merry Gypsy song, with chorus.

Ye dinna understand. 3. A to e. Sargent. 30

"It's nae your fault, my darlin',
I think it most my ain."

Beautiful Scotch song.

Magelone. 4. Eb to g. Keilman. 30

English and German words. Very smooth and melodious.

The Mountain Sylph. 4. F to a. Hensler. 40

"In halls where diamond fountains play,
'Tis there we dance till break of day."
The melody is pretty, and not difficult, except that it requires practice to fit it to the light, tripping, fairy-like accompaniment. Pretty exhibition piece.

The beautiful Song she sang to me. 3. D to e. Harrington. 30

"The summer moon thro' the pine trees shone
On a maiden fair who was waiting alone,
While she sang to the stars of their golden light,
And sang to the flowers of the loving night."
The words of a few of the songs of these ballads, if published separately, would make a very acceptable book of poems. Words and music, in this case, alike beautiful.

Bianchi. (Vaga fanciulla). 4. D to d. Colferi. 35

Italian words written on the occasion of the Countess Bianchi Bianconceli Perinani di Bologna (take breath here) saving a youth from drowning. Extremely pretty and piquant melody. Neat translation added.

When the Hay was mown, Maggie. 3. D to d. Hoag. 30

"When the hay was mown, Maggie,
In the years long, long ago."
Very well chosen words set to an elegant melody. Good chorus.

True Happiness. Song and Chorus. 2. G to d. Keller. 35

"I ask not for riches, I ask not for wealth,
I seek but contentment, prosperity, health."
A kind of hearty goodness in this song, good sentiment and good music.

Instrumental.

Starry Night. Un nuit étoilée. 4 hands. 5.

Eb. Smith. 1.00

The well-known brilliant piece, rendered a little easier and somewhat more powerful, by a 4-hand arrangement.

Serenade de Gounod. (Sing, Smile, Sleep). 6. F. Smith. 75

A sort of "gold bound" edition of a favorite song, which every one will confess to be beautiful when varied.

Why don't you? Waltz. 3. Cumming. 50

Not "why don't you waltz?" but "why don't you?" as a waltz. The question is asked quite distinctly by the music, which has a very dance-inspiring rhythm.

The Piquant Beauty. Mazurka Elegante. 4. D. Hoffmann. 60

Three things in its favor may be said. 1. It is by Edward Hoffmann. 2. It is a mazurka by Hoffmann. 3. It is an elegant mazurka by Hoffmann. Try it and hear for yourself.

Cubana Waltz. 3. Ab. De Janon. 40

A rich, ripe, Spanish beauty to the waltz, which is "full and harmonious."

Reese and Thorns. Galop. 2. G. Fuller. 30

Very neat. A mixture of gliding and staccato passages, suggesting the flowers and the thorns.

Carl Marwig's Boston Dip Quadrille. 3. Bb. Funkenstein. 40

If any persons doubt the beauty of this quadrille, they have only to "dip into it" to the fine music mentioned above, and they will, no doubt, pronounce it a good thing.

L'Esperance. Valse. 4. A. Cable. 40

Powerful and very brilliant.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 804.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 27, 1872.

VOL. XXXI. No. 22.

My Old Red Violin.

When the gray light fades away,
When the wood-flames laugh and leap,
When the kitten stops her play,
When the babies are asleep—
Then I lie with happy tread
To a treasured nook within,
And from out its silken bed
Lift my old red violin.

Italy its birthplace fair;
Quaintly carved this monkish face—
Wrought with silver tendrils there,
Here embossed with Flemish lace;
Brown and black and yellow blend
Round the classic hooded head;
And the graceful ovals bend,
Steeped in sunshine rich and red.

Grand old palaces it knew;
Thrilled their royal, jeweled throngs;
Touched by wondrous bards, who threw
All their sweet souls in its songs.
Slow and reverently I
Wake its sleeping pulse to life;
Make it sob and laugh and sigh
Only for my winsome wife.

Shall I tell you how I found Blithesome Bessy Loverin?
Simply by the wealth of sound
Of my old red violin;
She sang sweet in Bethel choir;
I played tender "Golden Hill;"
Rose the mournful strain yet higher,
When, lo! every voice was still.

Throbbing to no mortal pain,
Wailed the weird, reverberate string:
Wailed all the church in vain,
Bessy wept and could not sing.
Blessed power that day was mine,
Pearl of pearls my bliss to win;
So I held one gift divine
Through my old red violin.

Harper's Weekly.

Wagner's "Lohengrin" in Italy.—An Italian Criticism.

[On the 1st of November, 1871, "Lohengrin" was performed, for the first time in Italy, at the Teatro Comunale in Bologna. Mrs. FANNY RAYMOND BITTER translates for the New York Weekly Review the following extracts from an exhaustive article upon the work, written by FRIDIO LICURGO for the Gazzetta Musicale of Milan, which no doubt will interest our readers.]

At last we have heard the dreaded "Lohengrin;" at last the terrible maestro of the future has been judged in Italy also; and yet we have not to pity the wounded, or lament the dead; there has not been even the faintest appearance of a battle! Let him wonder who will, there was no need of battle or of combatants, simply because there was not much opposition and no approbation displayed, that had not its good and true reason for existing.

With our public, the sensations of delight and enthusiasm were positively unanimous; and so were those of fatigue and oppression. These impressions lead us to believe that the judgment regarding Wagner, which has generally gained ground, is the correct one; that is to say, that he unites, as no composer has done before him, the two poles of efficiency and vacuity, of high expression and triviality, of power in the use of artistic means, and absolute forgetfulness of them.

Full, robust, effective, daring, when he treats whole masses of voices and instruments, Wagner is empty, colorless, wearisome, heavy, monotonous, and sometimes vulgar, in the music which he puts in the mouths of his characters. Let it not be supposed that I intend to discuss his melodic inspiration here, to decide whether or not he gives new forms to melody; I limit myself to the assertion that in the melopea, in musico-dramatic recitative, in that intrinsic part, which, according to Wagner, should constitute the famous "future school" of art, he is wanting in force of creation, contrasts of colors, dramatic truth. Wagner appears a Lilliputian when he exhibits himself in his profession of "futurist," while he rises to a colossal height, boldly advances with the steps of a giant, shows himself capable of great conceptions, of intrepid flights, when he contents himself with the modest character of a great maestro, as other famous composers have done before him.

I do not mean to say that he imitates this or that school, this or that author. No: his truly fine pieces bear an especial stamp; move in a peculiar manner; display an astonishing sonority, and hitherto unheard of boldness. Great artist that he is, he possesses a character, that is his own, and that of no one else, as have done all the more or less great masters, who left the old track to open a fresh pathway.

But while maintaining his own personality, Wagner is obliged, in the culminating points of his operas, to do precisely as others have done, for the simple reason that in art certain laws—fixed, indisputable, and not to be cancelled—exist, which are the essence of art itself.

In "Lohengrin" we find the musical and dramatic action developing itself in great pictures, while the sensations depicted by entire masses—artists, chorus, orchestra together—reverberate in the mass of auditors; but the principal characters of the drama seem reduced to the condition of parts written merely to fill up. In "Lohengrin," while we share the enthusiasm of the knights of Saxony and Brabant on the apparition of the Mystic Swan, and admire many powerful orchestral pages, we remain indifferent to the loves of Elsa and Lohengrin, to the malice and rage of Ortrude and Telramond; we find it difficult to understand the feelings of the actors (except while reading the libretto), because they are depicted in such feeble colors; because the recitatives resemble each other so much, and are merely conventional, while they ought to bear the principal weight of the development of the drama, since according to Wagner this forms an essential part of his school.

It would be difficult to pronounce a conscientious judgment on the problem—whether this want of expression in individual dramatic life be powerlessness? or a pre-conceived system? or powerlessness masked by system? but this open, undeniable contradiction between the Wagnerian idea and the result obtained, is a great, a striking one.

The Italian public—for crowds flocked from every part of Italy to Bologna on the evening of the first performance of "Lohengrin"—listened with the deepest attention and the greatest respect to Wagner's work; tried to form its judgment with unprejudiced conscientiousness; and pronounced it with such unanimity, that, as I have said above, it met with no serious opposition from partisanship, for or against it; yet spite of the innate courtesy and habitual composure of the Bolognese public, had "Lohengrin" been announced as the work of a composer at the commencement of his career, rather than that of one whose name is surrounded by the mystic aureole of the apostle, it would have fallen, never to rise again, at the close of the 2nd act, notwithstanding the favorable impression produced by the incontestable beauties of the first act.

On hearing Wagner, we are not moved by pleasurable sensations, but rather by those of astonishment and wonder; your heart is not tenderly touched, your nerves are violently shaken, little by little, Wagner approaches you, entangles you in his toils, magnetizes, transports you; the beating of the heart grows fainter; the blood rushes violently to the brain; at a certain point of sonority, it bounds with such an impetus that it excites you to convulsive, involuntary exclamation. This morbid effect was produced in our calm Bolognese public, which, at the close of the pieces that most vividly impressed it, displayed its approbation, not by the ordinary clapping of hands, but by nervous and excited cries. I felt the same necessity, as if the electricity with which my brain was surcharged sought an outlet in this manner.

It is certain that to produce such sensations, a powerful mind is necessary (and no one denies Wagner's possession of this); and if we add to powerful the epithet diabolical, we shall still remain within the limits of the truth.

On the evening of performance the public felt at once that it had to do with a great, a daring master; and after the introduction, executed to perfection, a unanimous demand was made for its repetition, amid general enthusiasm. But the declamation between the King and Telramond was found extremely tedious; then came the recital of Elsa's story, in the ordinary form, but containing a delicious phrase, sweetly repeated by the chorus; the herald's call, the apparition of the Swan, the entrance of Lohengrin, the increasing wonder, the immense burst of enthusiasm. A fine scene, beautiful music, masterly treatment, powerful, irresistible effect. But where was the future? The public, applauding vehemently, and with reason, found no trace of it here.

After the beautiful salutation of Lohengrin to the Swan, the reply of the chorus, the long subsequent recitatives, the duet between Lohengrin and Elsa, comes a fine prayer, intoned by the king, taken up as a quintet by the singers, and then by the chorus, with increased effect, yet with economy of means. This prayer struck me as superior to the swan scene, to the introduction even—it seemed to me the best thing in the opera. The phrase is large, grandiose, effective, inspired. Then came the duet, the return of thanks to heaven, the conqueror's triumph, filled with the great Wagnerian sonority, brilliantly closing the first act. Applause was unanimous; the artists were called out, and Mariani (the conductor) received an ovation in the orchestra.

In the second act we navigate the open Sea of Future Music; the masses have disappeared, the drama of inward feeling comes to the surface; but if the poet clearly figured this to himself, the maestro did not; an abuse of modulations, rhythms commenced but to be broken off, a tremolo of the string instruments, an incessant lament of the wood instruments, a constant cadence of the voices, make of the duet between Ortrude and Telramond as of that between Elsa and Ortrude, an insupportable continuity of wearisome oppression. I will not mention melody here—'twould be blasphemy; but here is not one ray of inspiration. Where, where is the dramatic recitative of which Wagner is the prophet? If this be it, then I do not hesitate to declare that nothing can be more flat, more ordinary; this is no more, no less than common recitative, prolonged to an intolerable length. And the worst of it is, that the drama—the poem—is so badly seconded by the music, that it is not possible to interest the audience in the action here.

Through the whole of this interminable scene I found but one fine passage. It is the close of the duet between Ortrude and Telramond—a happy phrase in F sharp minor; the two voices moving in the octave—where, furious from the thirst for revenge, they curse heaven and earth, God and man. The effect of this is so horribly true, that a friend of mine, a learned musical dilettante, said that it deserved to have been adopted by the communists as their hymn of destruction.

But public attention was so wearied, so overstrained, that this passage went by unobserved, as did the music in which Wagner picturesquely describes the dawn of day, the awakening of a city, etc.

This second act closes with a religious march, to the sound of which Elsa advances towards the church, where her nuptials with Lohengrin are to be celebrated. Ortrude opposes the heroine's progress, Telramond attempts to oppose that of Lohengrin, accusing him of sorcery; but he is contemptuously driven away—the wedding group proceeds onwards, the people rejoice, the sound of the organ swells above the voice of the chorus;—and yet, with the exception of the religious march, this scene does not offer any remarkable features. The curtain fell; a weak attempt was made to recall the artists; but this was met by a lively demonstration of displeasure.

The third act also commences with a prelude, Wagner says, in his libretto: "An orchestral introduction, descriptive of the joy of a nuptial festival." He has succeeded to the full. This sonorous, striking, beautiful page of instrumental composition was re-demanded amid transports of enthusiastic applause.

Then came the wedding chorus:—light, pleasing music, appropriate to the situation;—then the great love duet between Elsa and Lohengrin. Ah! what bitter disenchantment! the prelude prepared us for different strains; are these the accents that should fall from the lips of newly married lovers? Poor Elsa! surely she must have foreseen in this first interview the life of ineffable ennui that lay before her.

The first part of the third act closes with the death of Telramond.

An annotation in the libretto surprised me: "Lohengrin pulls the bell-rope." Is it possible that in the first half of the tenth century they had bell-ropes, and the relative little bells? My historical research will not suffice to answer the question; I leave to Wagner the responsibility of the bell, which at that period (I must have my foolish jest!) was doubtless the bell of the future.

The last scene carries us once more to the banks of the Scheld; the king, the court, warriors, trumpeters, accompany Lohengrin, who conducts them to battle. But he must leave them; betrayed by his wife,—who contrary to her vow, has asked his name,—and drawn back by superhuman powers to his mystical dwelling place, he declares his origin and rank amid general emotion. Lohengrin's story, woven on the same theme as that of the prelude to the first act, is highly effective, as is the entire close of the opera. It was received with the warmest approbation; the artists, the chorus director, and Mariani, were called four times before the curtain.

From this rapid review of the performance, the reader will perceive where the effect lay, and where the composer did not succeed. He will observe the nullity of individual dramatic life, the great power of massed forces. Sorrow and joy, love and hatred, are narrated to the public, but not felt by the actors; Song is utterly, completely banished; in the fullest acceptance of the word, whatever the partisans of this style of recited drama may declare.

The performance of "Lohengrin" at the Teatro Comunale of Bologna was truly marvellous!

marvellous in coloring, unity, force, precision; the choral and orchestral forces were conducted with unequalled energy and ability. Not the smallest error or uncertainty in the whole long course of the opera. Mariani was the soul of all; his powerful ability and learning, his lively, nervous temperament, infused an electric warmth into the performance, and heightened every effect. It was the universal opinion, that under a German conductor, the success of "Lohengrin" would have been more doubtful; in such a case the finish of performance might have been as great, but a certain heavy solemnity, a want of accent, would have characterized the performance, the tempi would have been taken slower, with more calm, and the patience of our audience would have been put to a severer trial.

After Mariani and the orchestra, the highest praise is due to the chorus director and to the chorus; last of all to the solo artists—not that they were anything less than excellent—admirable! but because in "Lohengrin" they are of secondary importance.

I fear my readers will have already accused me of discourtesy in so long claiming their attention; but since our subject is an important one, I feel sure they will pardon the further remarks with which I intend to conclude this article.

Wagner's music gives me a distinct image of the desert; the desert with its vast imposing space, but with its dangers and hallucinations; the desert, in all its grandeur, in all its aridity. It has its few oases, but many are the false mirages that confront us there.

It must be remembered that the German public is regular, calm, methodical. A public that must leave the theatre to sup at a certain hour, that can mingle beer with music, that mercilessly cuts (or allows the mutilation of) the greatest operas, in order that the performances may close at the orthodox hour, needs to be occasionally shaken by violent emotions. The German climate, habits, and special nature have little to fear from this aphrodisiac music.

But the frequent hearing of it would have a fatally overstraining effect on the ardent, impressionable Italian public, nervously, tenderly alive to delicate feelings; and therefore it is the duty of an honest critic to place this danger before the eyes of our people.

And let me not be accused of wanting in esteem and respect toward the German public, for such an accusation would be false. The laws and conditions of nature have made all people what they are; transport the German public into Italy, the Italians into Germany, and in the course of fifty or sixty years, their radical qualities would become so greatly modified that their relative defects and advantages of character would seem to have changed places. But the present conditions of the two publics are unalterable, and we must take them as they are.

Is there then, any serious danger that Italian art may be submerged by this impetuous torrent? I scarcely think so. Wagner is a great artist, an intrepid maestro, a profound, strong mind. And our public has, without prejudice, generously recognized his exceptional qualities—our Italian public, so unjustly accused in Germany, of superficiality and ignorance! However, the result would not be doubtful, should one of our own composers—reviled in Germany for effect-seeking, for writing noisy music!—venture to produce such violent effects, such continuous movement of heavy masses. Setting entirely aside the question of rival powers in regard to flow of ideas, elevation of style, charm, feeling, we find that the Italian maestros, long before Wagner, gave to the recitative a dramatic force such as he has never yet even equalled. I need only to point to the recitatives in "William Tell," those in the first and last acts of "Norma," in Macbeth on the apparition of the dagger, those of Rigoletto when he curses his fate, etc., sketches dictated by lofty philosophy and a profound knowledge of human nature and the highest principles of art.

This first performance of "Lohengrin" has been summed up by Doctor Verita in a few lines: "A little weariness, a little confusion, much admiration, little excitement, surprise rather than delight—the surprise which the grandiose awakens. Apparently a triumph: really, the wonder which the aspect of chaos, colossal in dimensions and deficiencies, would excite in its astonished beholder. The marvellous, however, is not wholesome daily bread; but an intelligent, self-controlling public may allow itself that luxury—occasionally."

Popular Art Education.

(From the Daily Advertiser, Jan. 11.)

THE ART EXHIBITION AT THE APPLETON STREET SCHOOL-HOUSE. — THE ENGLISH DRAWINGS. — COURSE OF INSTRUCTION EXEMPLIFIED.

The reception at the Appleton Street school-house last evening, under the auspices of the drawing committee of the school board, was not so well attended as it should have been, considering the importance of the occasion and the interesting character of the exhibition. Still the art rooms were visited by a large number of persons, among whom were several of our leading artists and many ladies and gentlemen who have a general or special interest in the promotion of popular art education. The invitations to the reception were distributed especially to members of the city and State government and to the members of the school board. To allow the public to witness the fine collections of casts and drawings with which the normal art school is now supplied, the rooms are to be opened this evening and to-morrow evening between the hours of seven and nine o'clock, and it will be worth the while of every one to visit the Appleton Street school-house and witness for themselves the facilities which now exist here for art instruction.

THE PERKINS COLLECTION OF CASTS.

The fine collection of casts given to the city by Mr. Charles C. Perkins naturally attracts a great deal of attention. These casts were selected in Europe, and have been sent over and set up with scarcely any injury. The casts consist of reproductions of the actual size, and identical in form with the best examples of ancient art, including statues, busts, masks, architectural ornaments, and casts from nature, both of foliage and the human figure. There are two very large casts from the Trojan forum, one of which is said to be the finest piece of acanthus work in existence. There are some very beautiful drawings of the human figure, of conventional ornament of flowers and foliage, and of animal forms. The outlines of the figures have been drawn from the best specimens of antiquity, and some of the choicest of Greek sculpture. The foliage and conventional ornament has been drawn from the accepted types of different periods of Greek and Roman renaissance and Gothic art. These casts were prepared by the moulder to the British Museum, who has access to the finest collections in the world. Although the casts make up only a fragment of the collection which is usually to be found in a European art-school, yet they embrace representatives of the very best periods of the art, and hardly any accepted type of architecture is unrepresented. The casts from nature are especially valuable. These were first made by Mr. Smith in England. There is a back and front of a thistle leaf, and a spray of blackberry leaf and fruit, than which nothing more beautiful could be brought before the student's eye. One of the rarest architectural casts is a copy of the famous bronze plaster of the side of the doorway of the Church of the Madeleine in Paris, which is said to be both the finest example of modern acanthus work and the finest treatment of an ornamental subject. There is also a series of casts and mouldings from the celebrated gates of Ghiberti, of which Michael Angelo said that they were fit to be the gates of heaven. Amongst the figure casts are reductions of Michael Angelo's celebrated Tomb of the Medici, and in addition to these perfect artistic works, the collection for the education both of the school-teachers and the night-classes includes specimens of modern terra cotta, angelica work, vases, geometric solids, and other subjects.

THE ENGLISH DRAWINGS.

Around the sides of the large hall are hung the drawings which were presented to the city of Boston by the science and art department of the English government, and also some of the drawings which were produced by the students of the free night classes of last year. The drawings by the students of the English art schools are framed, but are not hung in consecutive order. Each drawing illustrates one stage of the art, there being twenty-three stages, the last of which is actual design for manufacture. The finest drawings are arranged, however, to show the relation of the twenty-second stage to the twenty-third. For instance, one of the twenty-second stage illustrates a botanical analysis of plants with a view to ornamentation, and next to it is a design for lace which obtained the only national medal awarded in the national schools of art in 1869. In the first drawing the flower analyzed is the crane's petal. Both the flower and leaf are taken and the geometric outlines are drawn and the conventional color, to approximate to nature, is tinted upon the outline. The same method was applied to the mistletoe and snowdrop. Another drawing gives an outline sketch of the natural growth of a flower portraying a section of the flower, a side view of it, geometric analysis of the leaves, making a complete ornamental epitome of one flower. This is the preparation for original design. The student went from this to design the lace, which is a most beautiful illustration of the reproduction of floral outlines for manufacturing designs. Another beautiful drawing illustrates the application of a principle of ornamentation to a tea-set. Next to this is a study of drapery upon the living figure, and a painting in water color of a branch of pear blossom, directly from nature. The original design for this painting is among the casts. There is also a design for a small mansion showing the ground plans, the geometric side elevations, and the sections, making the analysis of a whole design for the structure. Another interesting thing is a figure shaded in chalk from the antique, in illustration of the professional study of the human figure. Further along in this line are copies of the geometric models, an illustration of stage 23 drawn from actual machinery, an illustration of drawing in chalk from a model which may be seen in the cast room, a drawing in monochrome from a thistle leaf. A fine thing is shown in illustration of the design of a carpet which has been actually manufactured. The geometric principles employed in the devising are fully shown; also some very fine designs showing how given spaces are filled up with ornamentation. There are in this collection two paintings, the authors of which have become famous since these sketches were made, and the author of one head is now getting five hundred guineas a piece for his works. Instrumental drawing is also fully illustrated, together with anatomical drawing, and carpenter's work. The latter is illustrated by the actual working plans of Exeter Hall and many other of the largest public buildings in England. In addition to this there is a very full set of architectural sketches in water colors, illustrating the best styles of rural architecture. Space fails for a notice of the many splendid drawings; but it may be of interest to state that there is a single monochrome of fruit, the original of which is to be found in the collection of casts, which illustrates the chiaroscuro so beautifully that it alone is said to be worth all that the entire collection has cost the city.

Some of the drawings made by the pupils of the night-schools last year are exhibited, together with some very excellent specimens of work done the present term, which show that great progress is making in the free schools since the introduction of the new models. The course of instruction to teachers was fully illustrated by drawings put upon the black-board by Mr. Smith. A great deal of time was spent in arranging the pictures in order to present to visitors a tolerably accurate idea of the development of the plan of instruction, and the pupil's progress from first principles to actual design. There has never been in this country an exhibition of this kind which is worthy to be compared for a moment with this one. The drawings and casts have all been arranged by Mr. Walter Smith, the State and city superintendent of drawing, who is laboring with the greatest energy and zeal to advance the art education of the people.

John Braham.

[From the London Musical World, 1864.]

One of the most remarkable singers of his time, and one of the greatest ornaments of the English stage, was born in London in 1777. When scarcely seven years old, Braham became a pupil of Leoni, the professor and vocalist, and the original Don Carlos in Sheridan's Duenna. Leoni—whose real name was Levi—when a boy, was engaged by Garrick and brought out in a musical entertainment at Drury Lane called The Enchantress, the music written by a well-known character named Handel Smith, who was called "Handel" from his intimacy with the author of the Messiah. The boy Braham made such astonishing progress under the instruction of Leoni, that at the age of ten, in 1787, he made his first appearance on the stage, at the Royalty Theatre, as Cupid in an occasional piece called The Birthday, written in honor of the anniversary of Queen Charlotte, consort of George the Third. The Royalty Theatre was under the management of John Palmer—Gentleman Palmer as he was called—when afterwards died suddenly at Drury Lane while performing in the Stranger. The first public vocal display of young Braham was in the air: "Gentle God, whose sacred powers," an invocation to Hymen, composed by Carter, the author of several beautiful ballads, among which we need only mention "O Nanny, wilt thou gang with me." At this time Braham had a voice of extraordinary sweetness and compass, and could already execute florid music with the greatest fluency and the most perfect ease. In Dr. Arne's bravura song "The Soldier tir'd," he was enthusiastically applauded; when singing this song Braham used to appear on the stage in a soldier's coat, which was much too large for him, and never failed to excite the merriment of the audience.

This occurred exactly sixty-seven years ago. How many of all those thousands who then applauded and laughed are now living? Perhaps not one, while the hero of our sketch is still green and flourishing, hale and hearty, happy and full of life. What various vicissitudes of fortune must Braham have witnessed in his time! What changes since public fame first opened to him have happened in arts and science, in manners "domestic and foreign," and in politics. He has lived and flourished under four successive reigns—George III., George IV., William IV., and Victoria—and has, perhaps, seen the greatest revolutions of which history makes mention. But Braham never meddled in politics; art was his sole pursuit. From the moment he first attracted public attention, Braham became a special favorite with the nobility, and his intimacy with their Majesties George III., George IV., and William IV. is a matter of notoriety. It has been said of him "that he was a prince among artists as well as an artist among princes."

Having lost his master Leoni, who left England in 1789, Braham placed himself under the tuition of a Mr. Davis, with whom he prosecuted his studies advantageously. In a short time, he had so grounded himself in music and singing, that he was enabled to take pupils, and became the master of several of his fellow students who had begun to learn at the same time as himself. It is even recorded that some time before Leoni went on the continent, young Braham actually taught his own master how to sing some of Dr. Arne's songs, so much even then was thought of his taste and style.

Among the earliest and best friends of Braham were the munificent merchants Abraham and Benjamin Goldsmid, who perceived his talents, and took him under their especial protection. Braham was in no small degree indebted for his subsequent career as an artist to those kind patrons, and never speaks of them to this day without expressing his admiration of their generosity.

In the latter end of the year 1789, Braham's voice broke, and he applied himself with assiduity to the study of the pianoforte, taking lessons, among others, from Dussek. He soon became a proficient on the instrument, and acquired a neat and ready execution. But he did not neglect his voice at this critical juncture. By the most careful attention it soon recovered its strength and quality, and Mr. Ashe, the flute player, having accidentally heard Braham, advised him to accept an engagement for the Bath theatre, which he could procure. Braham accordingly went to Bath, and while there took lessons from Rauzzini, an Italian teacher and vocalist, the Veluti of his day. This artist, from his superior dramatic powers, was called the Italian Garrick. It is related of him that, at the end of the Death of Montezuma, he acted so naturally that Garrick, who was present at the performance, came behind the scenes and embraced him. Independently of his musical and dramatic abilities, Rauzzini, we are told, possessed a fund of esprit, and many amusing anecdotes are cited of his wit and humor. He had so great an affection for Braham that his house and table were always at his command, and he paid Braham for every concert at which he sang—an unusual proceeding for a master.

In a few years, Braham made such advances in the art of singing under Rauzzini, that he began himself to give lessons in Bath; and in 1795 he obtained as a pupil Lady Nelson, then Mrs. Nelson, who was desirous of learning Italian songs to please her husband, Captain Nelson, afterwards the celebrated admiral. The fame of the young and rapidly rising tenor soon spread to London, and Stephen Storace, the composer, went expressly to Bath to hear him, and engaged him for Drury Lane Theatre in the spring of 1796, to make his début in Storace's opera of Mahmoud. The composer, however, died before Braham appeared at the end of the season.

So great was the success achieved by Braham at Drury Lane, that in 1797 we find him engaged at the King's Theatre, (the Italian Opera in the Haymarket), singing with the famous Mad. Banti and the celebrated tenor, Viganoni, in Zemira and Azor. Our young English singer alternated the first male parts—which, at that time, except in Mozart's operas, were always tenors—with Viganoni, during the first season of his engagement, but was afterwards retained as sole primo tenore.

Resolved upon visiting France and Italy to gain greater experience in his art, Braham went to Paris with the intention of remaining only a few days. He, however, stayed eight months, and gave several concerts, the first of which was held at the Elysée-Bourbon, under the immediate patronage of Mme. Josephine, wife of General Napoleon Bonaparte. The price of admission was one louis-d'or. During his sojourn at Paris, Braham was offered a lucrative engagement at the Italian Opera, which, however, he declined, being resolved not to be diverted from his principal object in leaving England, which was to proceed to Italy, and prosecute his studies under the best masters.

When Braham gave his first concert at Paris—which we have just said was under the patronage of Mme. Josephine Bonaparte—he received a communication from General Bonaparte, in which that illustrious captain expressed his regret that he would be unable to attend the performance. On the same day, the hero of Marengo quitted Paris for Egypt, and seized upon Malta en passant. Braham was intimately acquainted with Jerome Bonaparte, the brother of Napoleon, a simple citizen, with whom he used frequently to play whist. On one occasion, alluding to the political differences between France and England, Jerome Bonaparte, with perfect coolness and simplicity, addressed our hero as follows:—"Citizen Braham, my brother the General is determined to invade and conquer England. No power on earth can prevent it. England must fall, and London be laid in ruins. But, mon cher ami, do not be frightened. Pray give me your address—the place and number of your house in London—and I promise you I will occupy it myself, and take care of it for you. Citizen Braham, don't be frightened. He liked Jerome Bonaparte, in spite of his rhodomontade, and Jerome had a great regard for Braham, although he was an Englishman. This scene took place in the house of Mme. Montansier, directress of the Theatre de Montansier (Palais Royal).

Braham soon after left Paris for Italy, and was not long in the "land of song" before he obtained an engagement. His first appearance in an Italian theatre was at the Pergola, Florence, in an opera called The Return of Ulysses, composed by Basili, in which Braham played the part of Ulysses. Unfortunately, however, the Telemachus was upwards of six feet high, and the Ulysses being barely five foot three, when father and son came on there was a general titter throughout the house. But the singing of the English tenor speedily excited admiration, and Braham's success was unquestionable. While at Florence, Braham was introduced to the celebrated tenor David, the Rubini of his day, who when asked to name the best tenor in Italy, replied, with equal wit and modesty, "Dopo di me, il Inglese"—"After me, the Englishman." A great compliment, however, was intended.

From Florence Braham went to Milan, where he met his countrywoman, Mrs. Billington. This renowned vocalist was then married to a M. Fleissont, who was so exceedingly tenacious of his wife's celebrity, that he could not endure that she should encounter the slightest rivalry or opposition. Mrs. Billington and Braham were engaged to appear together in a new opera, composed by Nasolini. Nasolini was an ardent worshipper of Bacchus, of which Mrs. Billington's husband took advantage. While the composer was writing the songs for Braham, Fleissont was with him every morning, and plied him with wine until he was unable to collect a thought or to put pen to paper. With great difficulty Nasolini was enabled to write a song and duet in the opera, which was called Il Trionfo di Claria. During all this time rehearsals were held in the theatre, and the manager, who daily applied for Braham's song, was put off with trifling excuses. Things could not go in this manner, and at length Braham's anger was excited. He was determined to have his triumph as well as Claria, and succeeded to admiration. It was the custom of Mrs. Billington to try her song four or five times at the rehearsal, with all the cadences and ornaments she meant to introduce. Braham listened attentively to these, and learned by memory every passage and roulade. Nasolini, at last, sent the act and duet, where Braham had to sing immediately before the entrée of the prima donna. Our hero accomplished his plan with the greatest success, and in the course of the air, introduced, in succession, every one of Mrs. Billington's cadences which he had heard at the rehearsals. When the lady herself came on to sing, she was so excited and enraged, that she failed to produce the slightest effect. In consequence of the drunkenness and neglect of Nasolini, the opera was produced in a mutilated state, and there was no grand scena for the tenor. The public were dissatisfied, and the opera was not allowed to proceed to the end. The manager, Gherardi, who came forward to apologize, was hooted off. On the following day, however, he issued an announcement to the public, worded in a most humble manner, promising, that, at the next performance, the whole of the opera should be given, and that "Citizen Braham"—it was during the time of the Republic—would sing a grand scene written expressly for the occasion. Fortunately for the impresario, Braham was gifted with an excellent memory, and could sing the most difficult music at first sight, so that in a few hours' study he was enabled to make himself quite familiar with the new composition. Both tenor and prima donna this time met with the most flattering reception, and were tumultuously applauded in their several performances. In after times, Mrs. Billington and Braham frequently alluded to this anecdote in England, and referred with infinite satisfaction to their reminiscences of Milan, the unhappy manager, Gherardi, and the scottish composer, Nasolini.

About this time Mrs. Billington was engaged at Covent Garden, under the direction of Mr. Harris. She was in the zenith of her power, and possessed a voice of extraordinary power and beauty. In an Italian bravura which she introduced in one of her performances, she used to take G in alt with the utmost ease. The same feat is recorded of Signora Sinclari, a vocalist of reputation in the time of Mozart, who transcribed some of the most remarkable passages she was accustomed to execute.

From Milan, Braham went to Genoa, where he sang with Marchesi, the Voluti of his day, in the opera of Lodovico, for thirty consecutive nights. At Genoa he studied composition under Isola. While staying here Braham had to submit to a great deal of inconvenience in consequence of the city being besieged by the English under Lord Keith. He applied to General Massena for permission to leave Genoa, and was informed that on a particular day he would obtain an answer; but before the day arrived the English and Austrians had entered Genoa, and the French had quitted it. Massena had done all he could to prolong the siege, expecting that some good news would reach him from Bonaparte; and his expectations were not far wrong, since a few days after the surrender of Genoa, he received an account of the victory of Marengo.

At Leghorn Braham was introduced to Lord Nelson, who took great notice of him. Our hero visited the admiral's residence almost daily, and generally dined there twice a week. After dinner he frequently sang duets with Lady Hamilton, who had a splendid voice, and a real taste for music. One day, at the request of Lord Nelson, Braham tried over a march on the piano, which the hero of the Nile intended should be his funeral march. While he was playing, General Abercrombie was announced; but Nelson told Braham not to leave the room, and requested him to continue his performance. The two illustrious commanders meanwhile walked up and down the saloon and carried on an animated conversation in an undertone. At that moment Braham could hardly have felt the presentiment that he was destined, not long after, to compose the "Death of Abercrombie," and the "Death of Nelson," which during a long series of years he has sung to hundreds of thousands of his countrymen.

Braham did not proceed, as he had desired and intended, to Naples. His engagements in the North of Italy were too numerous and lucrative to admit of his paying a visit to that picturesque abode of fishermen and lazzaroni. From Leghorn he went to Venice. It was here that Cimarosa began to compose his last opera, Artemisia, for Braham; but, like Storace with regard to Mahmoud, the celebrated Italian musician died before the work was completed. Our English tenor took part in the funeral service of the composer with Naldi, and by his pathos and expression profoundly affected the audience. As there are some who are sceptical as to the fact of Cimarosa having composed his last opera expressly for Braham, we extract the following characteristic letter, which has immediate reference to the subject, and will at once set the question at rest:—

To the Editor of the MAESTRO.

"SIR,—In reading an account of Cimarosa in the papers of the day, I thought the following communication might not be unacceptable to the musical world. I think it was about the year 1800 I was engaged at the Fenice, at Venice. Cimarosa was the composer of a new opera (his last) called Artemisia; the libretto by Il Conte Colloredo. I was with the illustrious composer almost every day. He was evidently dying, though full of wit, spirits, and repartee. He took a great quantity of ciria. The mistress of the house in which he resided called one morning, and begged he would pray to the saint of her parish, assuring him he was very powerful. Cimarosa thanked her exceedingly, but said he was afraid it would be of no use, as not belonging to her parish the saint would, very probably, pay no attention to him. He knew his time was come, and prepared for death, and died like a good Catholic and sincere Christian. The part of Tenore Principale he had written for me, but, never having heard me sing, he composed the principal arias merely from what he had heard of me from others; and surely never was music better adapted. He wrote for me a beautiful scena, con coro, that had a wonderful effect, it was so delightfully instrumented. I regret I could not get a copy of it. The copyist was so outrageously exacting in his demands that I was obliged to leave Venice without the aria. Poor Cimarosa left the opera of Artemisia unfinished. Mayer, the celebrated German composer, was requested to finish it, but he, from real modesty, refused. The opera was performed in its unfinished state. The music was applauded to the very echo, mingled with the tears of the audience. Unfortunately the poem was very mediocre. I assisted at Cimarosa's funeral, sung a song, and in a quartetto composed by Bertoni. A funeral movement was performed, and, in the midst of the most solemn and soul-striking harmonies, little snatches of musical phrases, taken from celebrated operas of the composer—from the Orazzi, Ulysses, and Matrimonio—were heard from some wind instruments placed in a distant part of the church: subdued in pianissimo—seeming to come from the clouds—they had a startling and unearthly effect. My heart trembled and tears started from my eyes. Little did I then think it would be my fate to sing in the last immortal operas of two of the greatest composers—Cimarosa and Weber.—I am, Sir, your most obedient servant,

"GIOVANNI BRAHAM."

"Tenore, ma scrivo con molto umiltà un Inglese."

This letter was published in the Maestro, a musical journal which was born and died in the year 1844.

On his journey homewards to London, Braham sang at Trieste and Hamburg, and accepted an engagement at Covent Garden theatre. He made his first appearance in a new opera, called Chans of the Heart, written by Prince Hoare, the music by Reeve and Mazzinghi, with a success that is even now remembered.

(Conclusion next time.)

Richard Wagner's Collected Writings.*

(From the London "Observer.")

The first volume of this collection, which is to embrace all Wagner's critical writings as well as his poems for music, has just appeared. There are to be nine volumes, and the publication will extend up till July, 1873. Of all the professional musicians who have written about their art—and the list is a long one, embracing as it does, of late years at least, the names of nearly all eminent musicians in Germany—Wagner is at once the most voluminous, the most interesting, and the most important. He does not hesitate to state this himself, remembering Goethe's saying, so often repeated by Schopenhauer, "Nur die Lumps sind bescheiden" (Lumps only are modest.) He deserves, and he is sure to receive, the attentive consideration of all those to whom musical art is more than a mere means of sensual enjoyment. Many of the dissertations promised in this edition are now for the first time accessible to the general public. They were mostly published as contributions to journals, or as pamphlets, and have long been out of print. What Wagner presents in them all is perfectly clear, distinct and consistent, his tendency being the formation of an ideal drama in which music is to be one of the principal factors, and exercising its influence on all others. But as the publications are, with only two exceptions—Kunstwerk der Zukunft and Oper und Drama—occasional pieces, they do not present the appearance of a system of musical æsthetics, though they contain ample material for one. They can be classed under the following heads: 1.—On the interpretation of particular works by the great masters. In this we include his essays on the overture to Der Freischütz, his programmes to Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, the Sinfonia Eroica, and the overture to Coriolan, and that scathing pamphlet "About Conducting" which has of late set all German musicians at loggerheads. 2.—Plans and proposals for the amelioration of existing musical institutions in Germany, or for the creation of new ones, viz., on the reorganization of the Court Theatre at Dresden—on the Goethe Stiftung, the theatre at Zurich, the Court Theatre at Vienna; and the Essay upon a Conservatoire of Music to be instituted at Munich, which latter is the only one of his elaborate plans that has as yet borne palpable fruit. The recent examinations at Munich, if the report of Herr Weissheimer in the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, a highly competent musician, can be accepted, have shown results such as no similar institution in Europe can boast of. 3.—"Novels and Miscellaneous Essays," written for the Paris

* Richard Wagner's Collected Writings. By E. W. Fritzsche. Leipzig.

Gazette Musicale; "At Weber's Grave;" "Letters to Brendel, Liszt, Berlioz, and Mme. de Mûchanoff." This last is known as the letter on Judaism in Music, which created such a storm some years ago. 4.—"Concerning Certain Indirect Connections of the Development of Art with that of Politics;" "Art and Revolution;" "About the State and Religion;" German Art and German Politics;" Essays on Great Musicians," and "Reviews of Writings about Music." The most important of these is the latest published of his essays, Beethoven, which forms the deepest and most original contribution towards the metaphysics of music since the profound chapters in Schopenhauer's Welt als Wille. 5.—Lastly, the critical and scrupulously theoretical books referring to his ideal musical drama—Kunstwerk der Zukunft and Oper und Drama, together with the libretti of all his operas.

Any one who has watched the spiritual career of an artist of genius, living or dead, will have observed that his theoretical convictions concerning his art throughout his life are a sort of running comment upon his artistic productions. There can be no greater mistake than to suppose that Wagner has written his musical drama in accordance with any preconceived artistic theories more or less eccentric. He has, like all men of strong creative impulse, trodden the long, dim path from more or less instinctive production to a complete mastery of means and ends. His theories and his practice grew together, and, if anything, the former is a result of the latter. Wagner is a poet first and foremost, and his case differs from that of his predecessors only inasmuch as he gave to the world a more elaborate and minute account of the mental fermentation which preceded and accompanied his works of art; and that he has done this ought to entitle him to the thanks of all men who know a poet to be something different from a mere funnel through which the gods pour beautiful thought. He has, in common with Goethe, the very rare gift of becoming perfectly conscious of all his mental evolutions, and of being able to give a cool and complete account,—an outsider's view, as it were—even of his passions. This makes him so formidable as a poet and writer. He speaks always at first hand; talks of nothing but what he has himself seen or felt, and holds his subjects with an intense and passionate grasp. Here is no filtration of other men's thoughts from phial to phial. It was the conflict between his artistic desires and the existing means of realizing them which for a time tormented him, and then perforce drove him to criticism.

He felt his way through a maze of theoretical speculation on the musical stage, and its elements, mimics, music, and poetry, out of which he came forth, after a protracted and laborious search, with his sight strengthened in more ways than one, and his artistic powers increased a hundredfold. There are three facts, we believe, to which nearly all the pen-and-ink quarrels concerning Wagner can be traced. First, that he published his criticisms and abstract theories at a time when his late works of art, by which alone these theories could receive their sanction, were little known, and but rarely and inadequately performed; secondly, that the social and political heresies, which he propounded by way of clearing the air and finding free breathing-space for his artistic ideals, frightened people; and lastly, that he now and then thought fit to point his moral by attacking living men of repute, such men as Meyerbeer, for instance, in a most savage and merciless manner.

About the importance of accurate critical insight to a modern artist there can be scarcely two opinions. We quote Charles Baudelaire—"Tous les grands poètes deviennent naturellement fatalement critiques. Je plains les poètes que guide le seul instinct; je les crois incomplets; il serait prodigieux qu'un critique devint poète et il est impossible qu'un poète ne contienne pas un critique." Mr. Matthew Arnold, too, often preaches on the same text. In his luminous essay on The Functions of Criticism at the Present Time, he points out the immense mark made by Goethe, not only upon German but European thought; contrasts it with the comparatively traceless apparition of Byron on the English horizon, and shows that Goethe had such weight as a poet, not because his productive power was greater, but because his critical exertions and those of his contemporaries gave him a stronger and surer foothold. Among living men one could not find a better illustration of this than Wagner. His principal theoretical books were published between 1849 and 1852, when he was banished from Germany, and had no hope whatever of seeing one of his new dramas embodied on the stage. They raised a paper war, in comparison to which the Parisian squabble in the last century between the Gluckists and Piccinists appears as one of frogs and mice. Ingenious critics, killing two birds with one stone, contrasted his theories with his earlier operas, pointed out plentiful contradictions, and proved both to be the outcome of a confused and extravagant head. Some assert that Wagner was a mere charlatan, who invented theories as a cloak to cover his musical impotence; others that he was a musical genius led astray by metaphysical will-o'-wispes; a third set, by far the noisiest, held him up to public loathing as a furious madman, who would tear down all existing art fabrics, and plant himself on the ruins, "a god of the future." In one respect, and one only, they were unanimous, that a strait-waistcoat would benefit him greatly. Most deviations of opinions on art matters, like nearly all conflicting assertions concerning human life and things, depend, we believe, upon those fundamental philosophic conceptions which men have adopted either with or without previous examination. Wagner sees in art the ultimate outcome and final flower of things terrene, and he looks upon what he calls Das Drama, in which man contemplates his own nature in all its dignity, as the highest, and, properly speaking, the only adequate artistic expression of harmoniously developed humanity. The conditions, in many respects new, under which he conceives it possible to realize a drama that shall expand together with ever-growing humanity, form the main contents of his theoretical writings. In Kunst und Revolution, and especially in Das Kunstwerk der Zukunft, his gyrations round this centre of drama are of enormous width, and flavor not a little of social and artistic utopias. In his largest work, Oper und Drama, however, and in the essay on German art and politics, the circles contract into more manageable limits, and he aims at comparatively direct and practical ends. The first volume of his writings under consideration contains a very interesting fragment of an autobiography, up to 1843, which has been out of print for a long time, and of which we shall before long give some account. Besides this, it contains the poems to the first three of his operas, which have been publicly performed: Liebesverbot, Rienzi and Der Fliegende Holländer; a series of seven essays about musical matters, contributed to the Gazette Musicale, in 1840 and 1841, and reports about Weber's Der Freyschütz, Halévy's La Reine de Chypre and Rossini's Stabat Mater.

Cherubini's "Water-Carrier."

THE LIBRETTO.

The story of the "Water-Carrier" (Les Deux Journées) is of the simplest. Count Armand, a French nobleman, President of the Gallic Parliament in the reign of Louis XIII, a friend of the people, and powerful opponent of Louis' notorious prime minister, Cardinal Mazarin, who completely ruled the "grand monarque," fleeing with his young bride, Constance, from the Cardinal's vengeance, is screened and protected by a Savoyard water-carrier named Micheli, whose son's life the Count has saved, and who by his shrewdness and daring contrives to carry the fugitives safely through the camp where Mazarin's Italian mercenaries, inflamed by Romish influences, are assembled to waylay and arrest them, an immense price being set upon the head of the Count. Once out of Paris and among his own political adherents, Count Armand would become overwhelmingly formidable to Mazarin, an important fact well known to the patriotic and grateful water-carrier, as to the diplomatic cardinal. Through the readiest and most cunning devices, concealed under the guise of perfect simplicity and bon-homme, Micheli succeeds in his plan so far as to place the count and his bride safely beyond the military cordon which encircles Paris; to insure the escape of Armand, and subsequently that of his wife, who in disguise is to follow her husband to his place of concealment in an old oak tree near the village of Genesee.

On her arrival, however, she finds herself in the presence of two of Mazarin's soldiers, who, struck by her beauty, and encouraged by her apparently unprotected position, make brutal advances to her. This is witnessed from his hiding-place, by her husband, who, forgetful of his own danger, rushes to the rescue of his wife, and is immediately made prisoner. Armand's life is now forfeited; but the faithful water-carrier has not been idle during these stirring events; for, seeing almost irremediable danger, he has already been to the cardinal with the news of Armand's escape; and his holiness, dreading the influence of Armand with the people, has sent him a free pardon.

That this little story has the classical requirements of a beginning, a middle and a legitimate end, there can be no question; that the dénouement cannot even be suspected until it actually arrives, is equally true. Its themes are heroic patriotism, gratitude, and woman's constancy. Can there be any more lofty or loveable in human life?

In its exciting incidents, and constantly melodramatic action, too, it is almost what now would be termed "sensational." Such is the libretto which Cherubini has set in musical gold of the purest and most solid kind; such is the literary material to which his magic pen has given an undying charm. "The Water-Carrier," in Europe the most widely-known work of the man who wrote "Faniaka," "Medea," "Lodoiska," "Ali Baba" and "Demofonte," and whom that musical colossus, Beethoven (who certainly was no flatterer), addressed as the "greatest dramatic writer of his time," is now introduced for the first time to the American public by the Parepa-Rosa management.

Let us now proceed to examine

THE MUSIC.

The overture (in E major) is probably familiar to the musical public, here as elsewhere, under the title of "Les Deux Journées." For years it has been a stock piece all over the civilized world, and is always played with effect because it is absolutely grand and beautiful in itself; still, apart from the drama it so poetically symbolizes, the music can scarcely be more than half understood; for the chivalrous patriotism of Armand, and the no less heroic devotion of his wife, Constance, throw a light upon its merits which necessarily display them still more brightly, and enhance their intellectual value.

In the solemn introduction, forebodings of evil, dreamy prophecies of impending woe fall vaguely on the ear, fixing our attention, yet perplexing us with thoughts of change. But now comes the allegro, in the first subject of which we at once recognize the light-hearted poco-curante dashing of the preux chevalier, Armand; in the second, so full of anxious tenderness, the utterances of his devoted Constance. The overture is, indeed, permeated by the same ideas which are the very core and essence of the coming drama; but heroism alone characterizes the peroration, in which both husband and wife seem to be united in one grand resolve. To say that the orchestration is very fine, were not enough. Taking into consideration the small number of instruments employed, compared with modern usages, it is a perfect marvel of science and genius. The rich resonance of the score would suffice to fill the largest building, and as much may be said for the instrumentation from end to end of the work. On the whole, this overture may safely be set down as one of the most classical and really dramatic of operatic preludes.

ACT FIRST. No. 1 in the opera is the Savoyard's song, a most plaintive and touching melody in G minor, 6 8 time, in which Antonio relates how, as a poor wandering boy, he was saved from starvation by a stranger, a French gentleman whom he has never since beheld. Characteristic coloring and unaffected pathos distinguish this melody, which is followed by an equally delightful strain in the major key, where Antonio, with his father and sister, earnestly invoke blessings on his benefactor.

No. 2 is a song in E flat—"Give me Thy Guidance, Bounteous Heaven," in which the Water-Carrier, in his plain simple way, appeals to Providence to help him in saving the unhappy fugitives whose escape he has undertaken to effect. There is no ostentatious display of religious fervor, no pompous piety in the setting of these words, but the music is throughout exactly suited to the plain, honest character of the man.

No. 3, "Our Brave Preserver," is a trio in C major, sung by Constance, Armand, and the Water-carrier. Its theme is the gratitude of the lovers (they are still lovers, although they are married) for the devotedness of the Water-carrier, who responds in his manly, open-hearted way, that he was but doing his duty. It consists of a melody in three parts, martial in character, and varied by those devices of imitative counterpoint of which Cherubini was so complete a master, and which enliven and enrich the score in the most graceful, and apparently spontaneous manner. Nothing can be more natural than that people, animated by the same spirit, and having nearly the same things to say, should say it nearly in the same language; and thus Cherubini's lovers sing musical imitations (colored with charming diversity in the orchestra), probably without the public being aware of any scientific process, so easily and naturally does the whole thing flow. Here, as everywhere else in the "Water-carrier," does the "Ars celare Artem" principle prevail.

No. 4, a duet in D Major, for Armand and Constance, illustrates their parting. It consists of an accompanied "dialogue recitative," and an allegro movement, one portion of which—we mean the tender and fervently affectionate phrases upon the words, "You, the joy of my life"—will immediately remind musicians of Beethoven (not the only resemblance to be found in this work between the two great contemporary masters). Dramatic power and deeply rooted feeling are the characteristics of this impassioned duet; but a chaste dignity governs the one and tempers the expression of the other. Those who seek here for the sickly sentimentality, or frantic hair-tearing ebullitions of modern Italian operatic lovers, will be much disappointed. Cherubini understood the "cum ratione insanire" of Terence, as well as the "fine frenzy" of Shakespeare, and never wrote a part to "tear a cat in."

No. 5, "Whom do I now behold," finale to the first act, is a sextet in E flat major, sung by Micheli, Armand, Constance, Marcellina, Antonio and Daniel. It illustrates Antonio's recognition of his benefactor, Count Armand, Micheli's gratitude, the pettish opposition of the simple Marcellina to an arrangement which suddenly deprives her of the pleasure of attending her brother's wedding, and her subsequent acquiescence in the proposed scheme, when she finds it is to aid the escape of Constance. Such is the very simple dramatic matter with which Cherubini had to deal, in constructing that which stands to this hour, and ever will remain, one of the very greatest concerted pieces ever written. The extraordinary combination of musical and dramatic power for which Cherubini is so justly celebrated, finds a striking illustration in the very commencement of this sextet, where the grateful Antonio (his voice faltering with emotion) informs his father and sister how he recognizes in Count Armand the "French gentleman" who saved him from dying of starvation on the streets of Paris.

The son relates, his family almost breathless with anxiety, listen, interrupting the speaker only by occasional questions and exclamations of surprise. The good Micheli's heart swells, and tears are starting to his eyes as the truth becomes more and more evident; but when he is convinced beyond all doubt that it is to the chivalrous Armand, whom as the people's champion he already reveres, that he owes the deliverance of his son (now recognized by the Count), he and all around him, who share his feelings, unite their voices in a glorious hymn of joy, in which the might and majesty of Cherubini's genius shine with extraordinary effulgence.

And by what musical process is this immense effect accomplished? Simply by exciting and constantly increasing in the auditors a feeling of expectation, all through the earlier portion of the piece, till the at last absolutely longed-for climax arrives, with the words, "Praised be Heaven."

The dialogue is now resumed, accompanied in the masterly way already described in speaking of other parts of the work where similar means of orchestral illustration are employed. The listeners will probably be much amused with the sudden opposition of Marcellina to the idea of depriving her of the pleasure of being at her brother's wedding, and charmed with the happy manner in which it is expressed in the music, affording as it does a refreshing relief to the more serious parts of the piece.

The refractory young lady exclaims, "I don't choose to remain here!" "This is too bad!" "If I don't see my brother's wedding, consoled I'll never be," and repeats the defiant words over and over again in a comically determined way, until Antonio tenderly appeals to her, while the young Savoyard's song floats on the air like a voice of the past, recalling to her memory Antonio's deep obligation to Armand; and she willingly enters into a scheme which she now for the first time fully understands is absolutely necessary to save the lives of the lovers. And now the superb ensemble, "Praised be Heaven," is resumed, and intensified by still richer and more varied harmonies, the whole being wound up with a peroration worthy of the rest, brings the first act to a grand conclusion.

ACT SECOND. The entr'acte music heralds the approach of Mazarin's soldiers, who are coming to search for Count Armand and his bride. We hear their measured tramp approaching nearer and nearer. Another fine crescendo, similar to that in the sextet, leads up to the chorus in D major, "No mercy show!" which surpasses any chorus of the same kind to be found in the whole range of operatic music. The quick responses between the basses and tenors, "careful guard," "all prepared," are inexpressibly exciting, and the ensembles on the words, "No mercy show!" "Such are the orders!" almost overwhelming in their fierce delight. Then there is an odor of sanctity about the solos of the commanding officers, noticeable in those sustained chords and "suspensions," belonging to the ecclesiastical style, with which Cherubini accompanies the words: "And the gratitude of Mazarin deserving, etc.," which reveals how deeply the composer has studied his subject. Cherubini is here characterizing leaders of the Italian mercenaries of the Cardinal Mazarin, sustained by the power of the Pope in a strange land, against the will of the people, and who as papists were as sourly and savagely fanatical as Cromwell's cut-throat saints. This noble chorus has but one fault,—it is immensely difficult to sing well, taxing as it does the extreme high notes of both basses and tenors very heavily. There is not one body of choristers in five hundred that could do it justice.

The next important piece (No. 7), is an intensely dramatic trio, with chorus in B flat, portraying the seizure of Constance by the soldiers. Then comes the finale to the second act, a fine, well sustained movement in E major, "Alia Marcia," written for soloists and chorus. Here, again, the vigor and beauty of Cherubini are strikingly apparent.

ACT THIRD. The delicious entr'acte introduction and succeeding chorus of peasants, revive one like a draught of fresh country air. We can almost hear the babbling brooks, the chattering birds and waving trees; nay, even the "tingling silence" of the little village of Gonesse. Here is a pastoral tone-picture, worthy to stand beside Beethoven's well known inspiration, admirable in a musical sense as the eclogues of Virgil.

In the next morceau d'ensemble, where Armand is made prisoner, Cherubini has put forth all his strength as an operatic composer. There is a double chorus divided between peasants and soldiers, and nearly all the chief characters take part in the piece, though Constance has the most important solos. This is succeeded in the original score by a chorus in 6-8 time, with which the opera terminates; but the management, adopting the custom of the principal theatres in Germany, makes use of the superb sextet "Praised be Heaven" with added chorus, as a worthier conclusion to so grand a work. This is the only "liberty," if liberty it can be called, which has been taken with Cherubini's score. There is, however, one interpolation, which is Gounod's little-known air from "La Reine de Saba," one of the purest and most classical specimens of the favorite French master extant. It is exactly suited to the dramatic situation, and affords Madame Parepa an opportunity she would not otherwise have for displaying all her power, Cherubini having composed no solo aria for his prima donna.

We subjoin a copy of the title page of the earliest French full score with the original cast.

"LES DEUX JOURNÉES, OPÉRA EN TROIS ACTES,
Par le Citoyen Bouilly.

Représenté pour la première fois sur le Théâtre de la Rue Faydeau le 26 Nivôse an 8.

Mise en Musique,
Par le Citoyen Cherubini

DREUX AU CITOYEN GOSSEC, membre de l'Institut des Sciences et des Arts, l'un des Inspecteurs du Conservatoire de la Musique.

A PARIS.

A l'Harménie, chez Gavau aîné Éditeur Marchand de musique."

Personnages.	Artistes.
Armand (Président Mortier du Parlement de Paris),	Cn. Gavau.
Constance (son épouse).....	Madame Srio.
Michel (Savoyard d'origine, établi à Paris porteur d'eau).	Cn. Juliet.
Daniel (son père), (Vieillard infirme).....	Cn. Piatel.
Antonio (fils de Michel).....	Cn. Jansserrand.
Marcellina (fille de Michel et sœur d'Antonio),	Mad'elle Rosette.
	Gavandan.
Semmes (riche fermier de Gonesse).....	Cn. Prevost.
Angelina (fille unique de Semmes accordée avec Antonio),	Mad'elle Desmarre.
Premier Commandant,
Second Commandant (des troupes Italiennes la solde de Marmio).....	Cn. Desmaleset.
	Cn. Georget.
Premier Soldat Italien.....	Cn. Darcourt.
Second Soldat Italien.....	Cn. Garnier.

Many will doubtless trace strong resemblances to Beethoven's "Fidelio" in the "Water-Carrier;" but it must be borne in mind that the work of "Citizen Cherubini" preceded by four years that of the great German master.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JAN. 27, 1872.

Oratory.—The English Singers.

The present will long remain the memorable season of our old Handel and Haydn Society. Having reached that point of choral strength and excellence, with excellent accompaniment and masterly Conductorship always at its command, that it could worthily co-operate with the best solo singers from abroad, it has at length enjoyed that privilege and used it largely for its own and for the general good. True there have been no new Oratorios produced; but the best of the old ones have been made as good as new by the new revelation of their beauty and their depth of meaning through such gifted, cultivated, true and loyal artists; taken together, by far the best interpreters that we have ever had of the great sacred recitative and song of Handel, Mendelssohn, &c. We have already told how the Elijah (in Thanksgiving Week) electrified the chorus and the audience when they sang the solos; how great was SANDLEY in the music of the Prophet; and how Judas Maccabæus became a new revelation of unsuspected power and beauty through their singing, particularly that of Miss EDITH WYNNE.

Then came two Christmas Oratorios. St. Paul,—loved by most musicians even better than Elijah—but less dramatic (if we may say it, less sensational), and therefore less popular—made a deeper mark than it had done before, though the great chorus hardly had become so perfectly at home in this severer task; for that very reason it should be repeated. For neither of the solo singers does St. Paul afford the fullest opportunity for a display of their rare powers; all the more therefore could we admire and heartily enjoy the conscientious, loyal spirit, the artistic, devout feeling and love with which each and all of them—we like to name them: Miss WYNNE, Mme. PATEY, Mr. CUMMINGS, Mr. SANDLEY and Mr. PATEY—did their best to illustrate and bring home to us the import of the music and the text. (The manner in which the last two gentlemen gave the short duet: "Now we are ambassadors" is worth remembering). The earnest feeling and fine intellectuality of Mr. Cummings were quite in place here. His tenor voice is very beautiful, and if occasionally it sounds a little hard or forced, or swerves an instant from the pitch, it is because of the very delicacy of so choice an organ, which is easily fatigued and sensitive to weather.—In the Messiah the chorus were inspired to sing their best, and never in our memory have all the choruses, even to the Amen, been done so well. If Miss WYNNE has not great volume of voice, or the long breath of the large prima donnas, yet the purity and sweetness of her tone goes far and rises above any orchestral fortissimo; while her consummate art, her true conception, and her beautiful devotion, merging herself entirely in the music, a certain rapt St. Cecilia-like seriousness, fitted her admirably for the great soprano airs. Nilsson showed more individuality in them perhaps; but it may be a question whether Miss Wynne's rendering will not haunt the memory as long. Mme. PATEY's great contralto and warm feeling also made their due impression. Mr. Cummings in the Passion portion of the Oratorio has hardly been surpassed; and even for "Thou shalt dash them" he found rare energy and strength. Need we tell what a satisfaction it was to hear Mr. Sandley in "Why do the Heathens rage," and the other bass airs!

On the 13th of this month a miscellaneous programme was given, the first part consisting of Rossini's Stabat Mater. Hacknied as it is,—having been murdered in a "sacred concert," as the sole meet sacrifice they had to offer, by every Italian Opera troupe that ever came here—it has much beautiful and some grand music in it, which was rejuvenated by these singers. Nothing could be better suited to the large, rich, sensuous contralto of Mme. Patey; and no richer voice, unless it were Alboni's, could Rossini have desired for it. It all went admirably well, closing judiciously with the "Inflammatus," an arduous task for such a voice as Edith Wynne's, yet it soared bravely, musically, above orchestra and chorus. The best piece in the work, the marvellous unaccompanied Quartet: Quando corpus, was sung to perfection.—The second part began with the trumpet Chorus: "Sleepers wake!" from St. Paul, grandly sung. Mr. Cummings sang Handel's "Total eclipse" with more beauty and delicacy of tone and expression than ever. Then came a sentimental commonplace Song by Gounod for Mme. Patey, hardly worthy of her: "There is a green hill far away," in which the music does not relieve the bald sectarian creed statement of the words. The Society sang two unaccompanied Part-Songs by Mendelssohn with fine sonority and unity; and then Mr. Sandley exerted the peculiar charm of the sustained continuity and large, tranquil, easy flow of his great organ-toned voice, with perfect simplicity of expression, in Gounod's "Nazareth" ballad, wrought up to a climax with orchestra and chorus in the last verse.

The most important of the selections, however, was Bach's Aria, full of pious ecstasy of bliss: "My heart, ever faithful," inasmuch as it was given for the first time here (perhaps the first time anywhere) with the orchestral parts as completed by Robert Franz; this accompaniment, with Miss Wynne's singing, brought out its intrinsic beauty as never before. The concert ended with the "Conquering hero" chorus from Judas Maccabæus. The next evening Elijah was repeated in the same grand style as before; except that Mr. Sandley suffered from a severe cold, which he surmounted bravely in some pieces; while in others it gave us opportunity to know more of the artistic worth of Mr. Patey, who took up the part at a moment's notice and did it with great credit.

The noble group have left us (except Sandley, who will sing in Opera awhile). Never has Boston parted more unwillingly with any company of artists. They carry with them the sincere, with many the affectionate respect, of all here who can value noble music. Their example will remain a model and an inspiration for our singers; our standard from this day is higher.

English Opera.

The PAREPA-ROSA troupe conclude their brief, but very active season of three weeks at the Boston Theatre to-night, having given seven performances each week. The repertoire has been large, including two important novelties (for Boston): Cherubini's "Water Carrier"—a masterwork which ought to run a whole week, or (better still) alternately with the other charming novelty to most of us, Rossini's famous "La Gazza Ladra." Besides these we have had "Don Giovanni," and the "Marriage of Figaro," by Mozart; and "Fra Diavolo," "Lucrezia Borgia," Verdi's "Il Trovatore," and "Un Ballo in Maschera," Flotow's "Martha," all in English; and, of English operas proper, Wallace's "Maritana," and Balfe's "Bohemian Girl" and "Satanella" (new.) All have been presented with remarkable completeness, conscientious regard to detail, and a strong combination of solo talent compared with any English company we ever had before, or even with the best Italian or German troupes of the last several years. It is indeed most creditable to the united gifts and energies of CARL ROSA, proprietor, manager, Conductor, and his wife, who certainly is one of the greatest, most accomplished, versatile and never failing prima donnas of our time.

For years we have not heard so good a performance of Don Juan as these people gave us last week. Mme. ROSA was in her best voice and gave the music and the lofty character of Donna Anna with commanding power and beauty. In the great recitative where she relates the outrage to her lover, with the following aria: "Or sai," and in the noble "Letter" aria (so frequently omitted), she was superb, warming the whole beauty of the music into life; and she too was the soul of the concerted music. The difficult and equally important part musically (when not abridged) of Donna Elvira, was better filled by Mlle. DORIA (Miss Barnett), than we have seen or heard it for a long while. With a clear, telling voice, neither unmusical nor very sympathetic, well trained and flexible, and evidently with a better basis of general musical culture than most singers show, she sang the music with good style, well in character, and with conscientious care to a consistent impersonation. The great recitative and aria: "Mi tradi" was sung with good taste and effect. Mlle. VANZINI's Zerlina was at least bright and piquant, and like her quality of voice very pronounced; somewhat too external, the singer addressing herself too constantly to the audience; but she sang fluently and well, although with little of a Bosio's grace and soulfulness suggesting a fine nature under the rustic garb.

Mr. CAMPBELL, suffering from a cold, made a good Don Juan, both in song, in person and in ease and dignity of action. The "wine" song ("Fin ch'au dal vino") was taken at two swift a tempo for him; for this is the one weakness of our young Conductor, that he is too excitable; carried away by the rush of the music he is not quite thoughtful enough to wait on the convenience of the singers. Mr. TOM CARL has a sweet and even tenor voice, of fair power, well trained, and sang Don Ottavio's music quite acceptably. The Leporello of Mr. AINSLEY COOK surprised us by its cleverness and good sense after seeing him in a part so ill adapted to his person as the Duke in Lucrezia. His voice, although a little husky, is large and sonorous, and he kept the humor of the part within bounds without any loss of life or interest. The statue found clear, ponderous, startling tones in the organ of Mr. RYSE. Chorus and orchestra were remarkably good, except that the latter was sometimes, as in all the operas, too loud.

In the "Marriage of Figaro," as well as in "Fra Diavolo," we missed the charming song and action of Rose Hersee. But Mlle. Vanzini's Countess and Zerlina, both, were quite agreeable; while PAREPA seems to have gained new vivacity and ease in Susanna, and Mrs. SEGGIN was as pretty and as musical as ever in her old parts of Cherubino and Milady Anglaise. The rest of the cast was as before in each piece—CASTLE, CAMPBELL, HALL, &c., never more acceptable. Seldom of late years has Lucrezia Borgia been so well presented, both on the part of the principals (Parepa, Castle as Gennaro, Cook as Alfonso, Mrs. Seguin as Orsini), and the uncommonly good and complete ensemble. Rossini's beautiful La Gazza Ladra, an opera of his most fresh and genial period, composed only a year later than "The Barber," it never had been our luck to hear performed before, familiar as much of the delightful music was. Musically it is worth a hundred Travoltes and thousands of Bohemian Girls. It is a bubbling spring of melody from beginning to end, abounding too in exquisite concerted pieces and brilliant but not overladen instrumentation. The well known overture holds out a promise which is fulfilled throughout. To be sure, the florid Rossini melody, full of roulades, was hardly suited to some of the singers; but Miss VANZINI in the Maid's part sang it with great ease, volubility and grace, and altogether made an excellent impression. The Podestà of Mr. Cook was capital in singing, make-up and acting; while Mrs. Seguin in the pretty part of Pippo, Mr. Carl as the lover, Mr. Campbell as the father, and nearly all the rest were satisfactory.

Unfortunately this fine opera was sung to some three hundred people only, partly because it came so unexpected, but more because "all the world" had set its heart upon the farewell concert of the Dolby singers. It should be given oftener; we can better spare Verdi than Rossini.

"The Water-Carrier" on Wednesday was a glorious success,—too late for notice now. Meanwhile we print in an earlier part of this paper a very good description of the opera, issued in pamphlet form by the Parepa-Rosa management, and written, as we understand, by Mr. Howard Glover.

Chamber Music.

The 5th Matinée of Messrs. LEONHARD and EICHBERG (Jan. 11) opened with the noble Sonata for Piano and Cello, op. 69, in A major, which was finely played, Mr. HARTDGEN taking the cello part. The promised songs from Schumann's Liederkreis were omitted on account of Mr. KRISCHMANN'S illness; in their place Mr. Eichberg, with Mr. Leonhard, played with true feeling and expression a profoundly beautiful Adagio from one of Bach's six Violin Sonatas; all, we are sure, were grateful for the gift, and would have been still happier if a quick movement also had been given. An Andante and Allegro Vivace from a Sonatina (posthumous) of Schubert, for piano and violin, sounded for all the world like Mozart,—certainly so the Andante; perhaps the Allegro was quite as much in Haydn's vein: did Schubert do this purposely? Mr. KRISCHMANN'S Oboe bore part once more, and most delightfully, in a Sonata in G minor by Handel and a Stelliano by Bach, both compositions very beautiful—the latter having been written, if we mistake not, for the violin.

The concert ended grandly with the superb Schubert Trio in B flat, op. 99,—less seldom heard than its great brother op. 100, in E flat, but not a whit less beautiful and full of inspiration. The rendering by Messrs. Leonhard, Eichberg and Hartdgen was altogether worthy of the composition, of themselves and of their audience, the best and largest of the season, who all listened with intense delight increasing to the end.

This week [on Thursday] the series closed with the great Schumann Quintet for piano, violin, &c., preceded by the Beethoven Trio in C minor, op. 1, No. 3; Chopin's Nocturne, op. 37, No. 2, and Scherzo, op. 20; and the Tenor Aria: "Frohe Hirten, eilt" from Bach's Christmas Oratorio, sung by Mr. GLOESNER CASTELL. As the printed score contains no accompaniment for this Aria except a flute part and a figured Basso Continuo, the concert-givers, rather than entrust so delicate a task to ordinary hands, wrote to Robert Franz to beg that he would make a piano-forte accompaniment expressly for this occasion, which he has kindly done and with his usual skill and intimate acquaintance with the spirit and the art of Bach. The artists, in their gratitude, propose to give one extra matinee in compliment to ROBERT FRANZ, at which we too, in like gratitude, and eager joy, will doubtless all be present.

Miss ANNA MENLIS'S second and third Piano Recitals drew more listeners to Mechanics' Hall than we have seen on any such occasion. Nor does the enthusiasm about her admirable playing in the least abate; on the contrary there is urgent call for more Recitals, which we are happy to say will be granted,—three more, beginning on Wednesday of next week.

The second Recital (Jan. 15) opened with a novelty for Boston, Weber's grand Sonata in A flat, a work full of interest, with all the Weber idiosyncrasy, and extremely difficult; it was rare luck to hear it from such an interpreter, but we do not think it haunts the memory like other matter in the programme. Mozart's lovely Rondo in A minor (set down as "Andantino") shows a finer genius and formed a sweet oasis of repose such as harmonious full life only knows. Four of the wonderful Etudes of Chopin followed, in great variety of mood and style, brilliant, delicate, tender, deep and grand, taxing interpretative sympathy and insight, as well as every executive faculty to the utmost; and these held attention breathless to the end. Mendelssohn's noble "Variations Sérieuses" on a theme of his own, op. 54, bringing us back to a more serene and elastic, but not less vital and imaginative sphere of art, were rendered in the true spirit of the music with consummate skill and grace. Three of Schumann's little Fantasia-Stücke: the Träumerei (dream bewilderment), the mystical "Wurde" (Wherefore?), with a motive like the song of Franz, "Er ist gekommen," and the impetuous "Aufschwung," were daintily offerings delicately tender. A more brilliant effect piece for a finale could not be imagined, than Tausig's arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance." It is deftly clothed and filled in with rich, at times strange harmony, with intertwining counter-motives in the running passages, and developed into spry and tendril of ingenious cadences in the pauses; making of the whole a far more full, elaborate, crowded work than Weber dreamed of, far more astonishing, but not more fascinating and poetic than the thing is in its comparatively thin and simple form; for even thus it fully tells its story, and has a better reason for existing than this wonderful arrangement, which was wonderfully played and most exciting.

The third Recital (17th) began with a very clear, artistic and poetic rendering of the Beethoven "Moonlight" Sonata, so called. The concert room does not afford the right conditions for a perfect rendering of such a tone-poem; to bring out all its soul and meaning one must be able to forget the presence of a public, which is of course impossible. But we know not when we ever heard it as a whole more satisfactorily presented. Did the opening Adagio to some seem slightly cold? That was because it was the opening (of the concert); there was need of something first to "break the ice." It soon began to melt, however.

The group of three little pieces (Scherzo, by Haydn; Impromptu, by Schubert; and Rondo Brillante, Mendelssohn), followed the Sonata, and followed one another, in charming continuity of contrast; nothing more genial for the Piano could be found in Haydn than that delicious Scherzo; and no fresher flower of Schubert's genius than that Impromptu. The most important rarity of the concert was Schumann's great Fantasia, op. 17, in three long parts, through whose broad and complex web of harmonies there runs a haunting melody, half hidden in the middle part, but ever and anon rising to the surface. The first piece is mystical and dreamy, provoking a desire to understand it better; the second is march-like, bold, triumphant, not quite convincing on the first hearing; the third is in a vein of graceful, tender, sentiment which cannot appeal in vain. It is extremely difficult to play, and difficult to understand at once, however well played, as we must presume it was by one so gifted. It must be heard again.—A couple of familiar Nocturnes and Waltzes by Chopin were exquisitely rendered.—The rest of the concert was all brilliant and of a modern Lied-like temper. First, little Schubert Waltzes in a sumptuous Lied-like setting; then Liszt's transcription of the "Spinning Song" from Wagner's "Flying Dutchman;" finally his really immense Fantasia on the ghost scene, the "La ci darem" duet and the "Wine" song in Don Juan:—on the whole a too protracted blaze of dazzling fireworks, exhausting to the nerves of listeners, if not to the long strained energies of the o'er-generous artist. But great was the enthusiasm, and warmly will she be welcomed back.

MR. PERABO'S SECOND MATINEE. We unfortunately lost the greater part of it, and therefore borrow the report of the Gazette:

Mr. Perabo's second matinee on Friday afternoon was notable for some truly admirable piano playing, and a rather weak programme. We cannot conceive the object of playing in public such childish compositions as the Sonatine, by Krause, or such a vulgar and commonplace aberration as Carl Löwe's Biblical Sketch proved to be; though the former is indescribably superior to the latter in everything that distinguishes the good from the irretrievably bad. But whatever the motive, they were played with all the earnestness and fidelity that mark Mr. Perabo's style, though we wish his skill had been exhibited on worthier themes. The Biblical Sketch by Löwe aimed at the higher flight of descriptive music, for according to the programme "the opening discloses a group of houses in the village they are approaching." A group of houses is rather a difficult subject to bring before the mind's eye by musical sounds, and we must confess to our shame that we failed to hear even a brick of it, to say nothing of a front door or a parlor window. The composition throughout was frivolous to an unusual degree. Not so the two posthumous pieces by Schubert, which are charming, and in the composer's best manner. The Adagio is an exquisite piece of work, at times exhibiting all the grace and delicacy of Mozart; in fact, the principal theme is quite Mozartish in style. It was interpreted by Mr. Perabo with rare expression and tenderness. The Allegretto is eminently Schubert-esque, and full of character and originality. Though bizarre almost to a fault, Mr. Perabo's capital rendering of it made it at once intelligible. Mendelssohn's Capriccio in F sharp Minor was clearly played, but, to our taste, with an absence of that airy lightness that seems to us so essential to certain portions of the work. The Allegro Vivace and Minuetto from Schubert's Odeon in F major, arranged by Mr. Perabo, brought the entertainment to a close, and gave the artist a favorable opportunity to show how really excellent a performer he is, and how well skilled to execute and to interpret purely classical music. An excellent selection is announced for the next matinee, which will be given on Friday afternoon, Feb. 2.

"SLANDERS, SIR." The satirical rogue of the Gazette perpetrates the following, "all of which, though we most powerfully and potentially believe, yet hold we it not honesty to have it thus set down."

We feel it our duty to enter our protest against the inconsiderate conduct of those ill-bred people who go to the Harvard Symphony Concerts to be seen, and who will insist on disturbing those who go to hear. We grieve to state that young ladies are the principal offenders in this respect. It is not an uncommon thing to see some ambitious sun-flower, full of the belief that she is not born to blush unseen, and determined not to waste her sweetness on the desert air, rise in the midst of a piece of music and shuffle across the hall, to the annoyance of everybody in her path, and take her departure, allowing the door to bang heavily behind her by way of a parting salute. If such have only received permission from their parents to remain out for a certain time, and must return home punctually in order to escape a scolding, it would be better for them to depart at the conclusion of a piece or a movement, rather than disturb an entire audience, and insult the performers, by doing so while the playing is going on. If, on the other hand, the offenders are merely inspired with a desire to exhibit their new bonnets, cloaks or dresses, we beg to remind them that such a result is attained at a sacrifice altogether disproportionate to what is realized by the attempt at display.

☞ The SYMPHONY CONCERT, with Mr. HOFFMANN'S admirable playing, the beautiful concert of the new "APOLLO" Club, and more, have to await more room for notice.

MUSIC. Mlle. Erika Lie, a Swedish pianist from Christiana, took part in the ninth Gewandhaus Concert. She performed Chopin's Concerto in F minor, and some pieces by Bach. The vocalist was Herr Max Sißgeman, from Hanover, who sang several well known and favorite compositions. Among them were the songs, "Von ewiger Liebe," Brahms; "Frühlingslied," Schumann; and "Es blinkt das Thau," Rubinstein. The orchestra performed Weber's "Jubel Overture" and Beethoven's second Symphony in D major.

A new symphony by Herr Abert, of Stuttgart, was performed at the sixth Leipzig Gewandhaus concert, on the 9th. It had only a succès d'estime, the work being considered not to realize the expectations raised by his previous Columbus Symphony.

On the 29th of November the Vocal society "Cecilia" gave their first Winter concert in the Hall of the Hotel de Pologne. The programme was Overture to "Iphigenie" by Gluck; "Arion" (Declamation) composed by Schlegel; Air and Chorus from "Castor and Pollux" by Rameau, and Romberg's "Lay of the Bell." Mr. M. D. Tottman, the Director, is accorded great praise for the manner in which the different works were performed.

The last Chamber music Soirée was opened by a Concerto of J. S. Bach's about 130 years old, for two flutes, a solo violin, and string orchestra. Messrs. Barge and Tischendorf performed the flute parts, and Concermeister David the solo violin part. The A major quartet, No. 3, by Schumann, followed; then the prelude and fugue of Mendelssohn, by Capellmeister Reinecke, and finally Beethoven's C minor Sonata for piano and violin, by Messrs. Reinecke and David. The Soirée was a grand success.

In the two last Gewandhaus Concerts, Dec. 1st and 7th (Concert for the Poor and 8th Subscription Concert) were performed overture and air from "Joseph," Andante from Schubert's "Tragic Symphony," a new Requiem for solo chorus and orchestra by Franz Lachner, and Mozart's grand Concert Air for Bass "Alcandro," etc. For the second part of the 8th Subscription Concert, Wednesday, overture to "Schönen Melusine," and Mendelssohn's "Lorley-Finale" with Madame Peschka Leutner. As the Requiem of Lachner's met with such great success at the first performance, the Directors of the Gewandhaus Concerts decided to repeat it at the 8th Subscription Concert with Lachner himself conducting.

BERLIN. In the Second Subscription Concert of the "Symphonie-capelle," M^{me}. Hallwachs Heints was taken suddenly ill; and Mr. Ignas Brill, from Vienna, played in her place, and his performance of Schumann's A minor Concerto is pronounced sublime! particularly in the first movement. He also played "Études en forme de Variations," (Op. 13) by Schumann. Members from the Hertschen Verein sang in this concert four choruses for female voices and orchestra (Op. 12) by Brahms and Willner, of which Ave Marie by Brahms was greatly applauded. The orchestra played Beethoven's overture to Leonora No. 3, and an overture to Kärners "Zriny," by the Society's young Director, Mr. Dappe.

ROME. Miss Brewster writes (just after Christmas):

The opera began last evening. On Saturday is the Terra Sera, always a brilliant one of the giro. We are to have Rigoletto. To-day the fine Sgambati and Pinelli concerts begin. They are "chic" in Rome. On the programme of to-day's concert is the Schumann quartet in E flat; Tartini's Sonata in D min; and two Beethoven Sonatas—the one in E flat, Op. 30, and the one in E flat, Op. 109. There are to be six of these concerts; they will continue all January—a delightful Wednesday afternoon occupation for an hour and a half—then we drive to some 5 o'clock tea, talk over the concert, the music and our friends, goodnaturedly or illnaturedly, according to our individual dispositions. What agreeable institutions are these 5 o'clock teas! I thank our English cousins for making them the fashion.

COLOGNE. At the fifth Gürzenich Concert, the programme was composed of one work, Handel's oratorio of Theodora. The vocalists were M^{des}. Bellingrath, Wagner, Joachim, M^{lle}. Holmsen, Herren Wagner, and Krollop.

NEW YORK, Jan. 13.—The "Onslow Quintette" gave the second concert of a series of "Soirées Classiques" of Chamber music on Monday evening, Jan. 9th, at Chickering's Hall. The first of the Thomas Concerts came on the same night, so that I can only give the programme of the chamber music which was as follows:

Quartet in E flat, op. 47.....R. Schumann.
Soprano. "Chiamo il mio ben".....Glück.
Violoncello Solo. "Fantasie Hongroise".....Grützmacher.
M. Brand.

Trio in E flat, Op. 3, No. 1.....Beethoven.
Songs: a. "Der du von Himmel bist," }
b. "Könnt du das Land," }.....Liszt.
Quartet, No. 36, in A, op. 69.....Onslow.

Miss Antoinette Sterling was the vocalist, and her name is a guarantee for the conscientious and effective rendering of the selections assigned to her. These concerts meet a want which has long been felt here, and, as the subscription price is so low that they are placed within the reach of all music-lovers, they certainly deserve liberal patronage.

The second of the Thomas concerts at Steinways' opened with the "Eroica," which was grandly played and seemed to be fully appreciated by the audience, as there was perfect silence and close attention to the music throughout the house. This was followed by Liszt's vague and unsatisfactory Concerto, No. 3, in A, played by Miss Krebs, who seems to delight in surmounting the difficulties which are the only claim to interest that such music offers. The two selections assigned to her in the second part were an "Étude" by Chopin and a Rondo by Weber. Her performance of the latter piece was by far the more satisfactory of the two, the broken tempo of the former seeming to be studied, rather than the result of a true sympathy with the composer's mood. In the beautiful Rondo, [E flat, Op. 32] her playing was clear, crisp and delicate, with just the required warmth of coloring. The orchestral pieces in the second part comprised Hornemann's "Aladdin" Overture; Herbeck's arrangement of Schubert's "Deutsche Tänze," a Serenade by Haydn [String Orchestra], and the Introduction, Chorus and March from the 3rd Act of Lohengrin.

The third concert, Jan 10, presented the following programme:

Vorspiel, Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg.....Wagner.
Concerto, for Violin, in D, Op. 61. First movement.....Beethoven.
Mr. Bernhard Listemann and Orchestra.
Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue.....Bach.
Miss Marie Krebs.
Symphonic Poem, Fest-Klänge.....Liszt.
Serenade in F, op. 68. First time.....Volkman.
String Orchestra.
Concerto Symphonique, No. 4, Op. 102, Adagio, Scherzo.....Liszt.
Miss Marie Krebs and Orchestra.
Overture, Egmont.....Beethoven.

Perhaps the most interesting feature was Miss Krebs's playing of Bach's "Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue," a composition in which she appeared to excellent advantage. Mr. Listemann's effective rendering of the first movement of Beethoven's Violin Concerto reminded me of Theo. Thomas in the days when he had not yet exchanged the bow for the baton.

At the fourth concert, Jan. 12, we had Schumann's D-minor Symphony, No. 4; Beethoven's Leonora Overture, No. 3, followed by Schubert's wonderful "Song of Death" (from posthumous Quartet, D minor). Wagner's "Kaiser March" (one hearing of which is sufficient to break down the Constitution of the United States,) closed the programme. Miss Krebs played on this occasion the first movement of Brahms's Concerto, op. 15, and Liszt's arrangement of the Masaniello Tarantelle.

At a matinee, this afternoon, Beethoven's Overture, op. 115; the Andante from Schubert's "Tragic Symphony"; and Schumann's "Träumerei" will be played, together with a number of light pieces suitable for what is called a "mixed audience." The concert this evening is to be the benefit of Miss Krebs. She will play Liszt's "Concerto Symphonique," No. 4; Liszt's Concerto, No. 1, E flat, and Chopin's Polonaise in A flat.

JAN. 22.—A new season of German Opera opened last week at the Stadt Theatre, with three representations of "L'Africaine" by the MULDER-FARNER troupe. This evening "Don Juan" will be given with Miss Anna Elser as Zerlina. Notwithstanding the limited accommodations and meagre mise en scene which this theatre affords, it is entitled to the distinction of being the only place in New York where there is a regular and permanent opera. It is here, too, that Wachtel sang last fall and, with such a singer, or with Mozart's music, the veriest farthing dip turns to an astral, and methinks the walls even of the black hole of Calcutta would "stretch away into stately halls."

The Dolby troupe gave two farewell concerts at Steinway Hall, on the 16th and 17th, prior to their departure for Europe. Two thoroughly enjoyable concerts they were for those who love the sweet and simple ballads whose infinite popularity age cannot wither nor custom stale. At the second concert nearly every piece was encored. I must own to some regret at finding on the programme none of those beautiful songs by Arthur Sullivan which Miss Edith Wynne knows how to sing so charmingly.

Mr. Santley is to remain with us and will appear in English opera with Parop-Rom at the Academy—beginning Feb. 5th. Zampa and Fra Diavolo are among the impersonations announced. With these two artists and others which the enterprise of Mr. Rom will furnish, this troupe will be one which has rarely been equalled in America.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

I'm sweet Sixteen. Illustrated title. 2. C to f. Pratt. 40

A pretty, serio-comic affair, with a neat melody. Words by Geo. Cooper.

O sing unto the Lord. (Cantata Domine.) 3. Bb to g. Thomas. 75

The exigencies of the Episcopal service require frequent renewals of the musical part of Te Deums, Benedicites, Cantatas, &c. Our native composers are nobly responding to the demand occasioned by this want, and the best class of pieces, of which this is one, will be well received in any congregation, of any denomination.

The man with the Indian drum. Illustrated Title.

2. G to c. Hunt. 40

"For his name it was Thingimachum, chum-chum, And he played on the Indian drum, drum, drum." Comic, and quite pretty.

Somebody's happy to-night. Song and Chorus. 3. C to f. McNeal. 35

"Summer night dreams are bright and fair. Sleeping among the roses rare." A very sweet love song. Has a nice chorus, although love songs are not often more than duets.

The Farewell Letter. 4. G to g. Gray 30

"The night has closed in silence, The battle shocks are o'er." An affecting farewell by a wounded soldier.

The Sea hath its Pearls. For 4 voices. 4. Eb to g. Piusini 60

"The sea hath its pearls, The heaven hath its stars, But my heart, My heart hath its love."—Longfellow.

A magnificent thing, if that term be not too lofty to apply to something which is so delicately beautiful. Try it, and be delighted!

When shall I be a bride? 3. Bb to c. Keller. 30

"I wish he would decide, mamma, I wish he would decide!" A most useful song,—for ladies who wish to "help along" a bashful lover. No young lady with such a follower should be without it.

A little while. 4. Bb to c. Marshall. 40

"A little while, a little love The hour yet bears for thee and me." Words by Dante Gabriel Rossetti. Serious, solemn and beautiful.

Instrumental.

Qui Vive March. 3. Bb. Downing. 30

Something of the style of those marches which a third of a century ago used to be considered the highest grade of music by a large part of our common players and composers. Really very brilliant and effective.

Woodland Whispers. Waltz. 2. G. Kinkel. 30

No. 25 of Kinkel's Crystal Gems, a capital collection of instructive pieces.

Blue Violet Polka. 3. F. Loesch. 30

A well-chosen name for a very sweet composition. May be termed "fragrant music."

Lord Dundreary Polka. Illustrated Title. 3. F. Turner. 40

This promiscuous individual appears in all his dreaminess on the title. But if you please to Turner-round the leaf, you will find the inside contents to be a most vigorous original piece, written in Mr. J. T's best vein.

Dream in the Wood. Capriccioso. 4. F. Wand. 50

Belongs to an order of pieces now coming into high favor with lovers of the beautiful in Nature and Music. Interprets quite successfully the feelings of a musician while listening to forest sounds.

Vienne Galop. (Kettner). 4 hands. 4. F. Rummel. 80

A favorite and very brilliant galop newly arranged.

Offertoire and Communion. Op. 31, No. 29. 5. Battista. 1.00

One of the Music Hall Organ-concert pieces. For pedal and manual. Graceful and effective.

Fantasia Comique, introducing the melody "The Yaller Girl" 5. A. Pease. 60

This absurd song happens to have a very merry air, and "grave and reverend" young men are very prone to whistle it. The piece is something in the style of Gottschalk's "Banjo," and has a very taking, comical kind of beauty.

Chanson des Anges. Morceau de Salon. 5. Pape. 1.00

Ab. Simple in construction. A pleasing air, varied mostly by a tremolo movement, but including chromatics, arpeggios, runs and all sorts of musical fireworks.

• ABREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c.

A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 805.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 10, 1872.

VOL. XXXI. No. 23.

A Dilettante to the Death.

[From the London Musical World.]

Leopold I., Emperor of Germany, was born for harmony. Little suited for the profession of arms, and not desirous of running the risks of any battle, he never appeared at any siege, or at the head of his troops. However, as he ascended the throne when Europe was in a state of continual agitation, he did as all sovereigns then did, waged wars; but he waged them by his substitutes, namely, his generals, who were neither the least learned nor the least fortunate generals of a period as fertile in celebrated men as in great events.

Music was for him the truest of all religions, and he was a most fervent worshipper at its shrine. Having rendered himself familiar, at an early age, with all the mysteries of the science of sounds, he boasted and congratulated himself that he possessed philosophy and serenity of soul, and that he owed them to the cultivation of the divine art.

Early in the morning, on getting up, he had some one to play to him, or else played himself, to disperse the melancholy impressions produced in his mind by agitated sleep, a cloudy sky, or the innumerable causes of vexation incident to his position as a reigning sovereign: he said it was the only way to become a man again—good and humane; that when the hearing is occupied and captivated, it neutralizes the gross appetites of all the other senses, idealizes matter, and makes one believe in the soul. When he felt he was about to give way to passion, he calmed himself, like Saul, by listening to the sweet and tender tones of some melody, especially that of the minuet, "Quel caprice," which he had parodied, for he was a good composer: he used to write some very pretty harmonic canons (with one n), while the cannons (with two ns) of his army were thundering away in Europe. He was so enchanted with the canons played on the piano by a Pole named Kontski, great-grandfather of the present brothers Kontski, that he ennobled him. Kontski served in Sobieski's army, and, by his acquirements as an artilleryman, was instrumental in compelling the Turks to raise the siege of Vienna. The valiant Pole's double canons must, therefore, have been doubly pleasing to the Emperor. Leopold recompensed in a different fashion the Count de Serin, a noble Hungarian, who had summoned the Turks into the empire. Despite Serin's agreeable voice, which Leopold liked very much, he had the Count's head cut off, so as to prevent his again singing the hymn of revolt and treason. He had two other Hungarian nobles, Nadasti and Franzipani by name, served in the same way.

What this imperial dilettante loved most about the victories obtained by his General Montecuculi, by the famous John Churchill, Duke of Marlborough, and by other commanders, was the pleasure of having Te Deums sung in the Cathedral at Vienna, to celebrate their successes.

Being one of those who signed the treaty of the Peace of Ryswick, he was on the point of taking part in the grand concerted piece, composed with reference to the Spanish succession—the right of Louis the Fourteenth's grandson to the throne of Spain being destined to contestation, a concerted piece which subsequently plunged Europe into war—when he felt that the principle, the springs of life in him were performing a fugue: A philosopher, a Christian, an epicurean, a musician, he sent for his medical man, his confessor, and the musicians of his chapel. He ordered the first to inform him, as nearly as possible, how much time he had still to live—and, on learning, apparently without any emotion, that the torch of the imperial life would be extinguished simultaneously with that day—that in a few hours all would be over for him, he granted an hour of time to the priest, and then, having taken leave of him, exhaled his last sighs, drowned his last gasp, in floods of harmony. His face was brightened by the different emotions produced by music that was religious, martial and sensual in turn. He expired gently, murmuring in a recitative which harmonized with a sweet mysterious melody, some vague, detached words, seeming to say:

"La musique est pour moi le ciel qui va s'ouvrir — Elle m'apprent à vivre et m'apprend à mourir."

Thus died, in 1705, Leopold I., Emperor of Germany, a cunning diplomatist, a hypocrite and a coward, for some; for others, an adroit politician, firm or prudent, as the occasion required; a gentle and benevolent philosopher; and, more especially, a man who, by love for musical art, contributed to place Germany at the head of those nations which have distinguished themselves by their taste and their aptitude for the science of harmony.

"Lohengrin" in Bologna.

THE SOCIAL UNIFICATION OF ITALY—BOLOGNA—OBJECTS OF INTEREST—HOW "LOHENGRIIN" WAS PRODUCED—ITS EFFORT UPON THE AUDITORS—WAGNER AT HOME—A CRITIC'S ANALYSIS OF HIS MUSIC.

(Correspondence of the Daily Advertiser.)

Naples, January, 1872.

I little thought when I was making my digest of the report of the royal musical commission last summer, and noting how there had crept even into that document the natural Italian antipathy general to the raisonné coldness that characterizes so much of German music, and especially to the abstruse originalities of Wagner and his disciples, that I should so soon make one of a crowded audience in a great Italian musical centre, in order to hear "Lohengrin" repeated in the Italian language, and by Italian artists. Yet thus has the whirligig of time brought about its revenges; and while Verdi's "Don Carlos" has fallen dead in Italy, and his latest work has been obliged to seek its first public in Cairo, Wagner has crossed the frontier, and with the trumpets of "Rienzi" has summoned to an almost unconditional surrender that stertor stronghold of Italian tradition and devotion—the conservatory of Bologna—has triumphed, and has followed the pealing choruses of that blatant opera with the swan-song and the bridal strains of "Lohengrin."

That this is a real triumph, no one who knows Italy at all will hesitate to admit. Scarcely in England can the old established order of things hold firmer sway. To be sure there is the difference between negative and positive to be allowed for; England binds you to an antiquated prescription, while Italy responds to your entreaty for an innovation with a placid "Non si costuma,"—"it is not our wont." But the railways are working a wonderful change in Italy in all respects. Not alone do they set at naught the brigand, who still makes the Calabrian roads a peril to the rich proprietor who would pass them unaccompanied by his escort of carabinieri, or trusty family retainers, and open up, as in all other countries, new and easy avenue for the interchange of commodities and the extension of commerce; but they are daily promoting the union of Italians one to another, and of Italy to the nations which lie above and beyond her. In every chief station of Italy can be bought, at a reduction of from thirty to forty-five per cent, circular tickets, valid for from twenty to fifty days, the holders of which can travel over corresponding sections of the peninsula, passing from line to line, and stopping at almost any intermediate point which they may choose, the only formality being the enforced enregistering by the station-masters upon the ticket, at each departure, the name of the next stopping-place selected. In like manner one can pass out of Italy by the Brenner or the Semmering, and make a circuit through Austria, Southern Germany and the Tyrol, re-entering Italy at the opposite point. As yet the Italians do not avail themselves largely of these so-called "international" tickets, for they have no undue fondness for the German language and manners; but they are beginning to journey within their own borders, and to find out that, in spite of the radical differences—and half repugnances, too, sometimes—which exist between Milanese and Neapolitan, Venetian and Roman, there is yet enough of common desire and interest, of kinship and of mutual regard, to be the making of a united, a prosperous and a respected people.

If the Italians, however, do not go out, the Germans do come in, and since the close of the war they are coming in crowds. Strolling in the Villa Nazionale, or lounging through the vast corridors of the museum, one hears constantly the Teutonic tongue busy with its consonants and gutturals, or asking information in grammatical Italian from which every atom of melody has been crushed out. I could believe that to-day there are more German visitors in Naples than Americans and English united. And all through Italy are Germans: established in commerce, in arts and sciences, and in petty trade. The best demonstrator of anatomy at the great clinical hospital of the city is a German; the chief oculist-professor of the university, though an Italian by birth, is much more a German in education, in habits of thought, and even in accent; many of the strong banking and mercantile houses are German, and there are German professors who teach the rhetorical elegances of Italian to the native pupils, while one of the few known comprehenders and expounders of Hegel is Vera, professor of the philosophy of history to the University of Naples. The completion of the excellent route through the Brenner pass wonderfully developed communication, and the stream that flows to and fro so constantly has as constantly left some trace of itself along the line of its course. New ideas, in North Italy at least, are not such bêtes noires as once they were, and if they are not all and wholly accepted, they serve at any rate to leaven the mass of old thoughts and habits and to quicken them.

Bologna is, in spite of all its self-esteem and self-confidence, a very good place for the planting of new ideas. Its famous old schools were in their highest estate most catholic; they welcomed their ten thousand students from all nations, and taught them according to their talents, not according to their own theories; they let the learned speak and teach in their halls, without distinction of nationality or of sex; they encouraged the discoverer and the inventor, and they gave to science some of its heartiest impulses. And to-day, when those schools hold their glory but as a legacy from the past, one can feel in the character of the city a double sentiment—trust in local tradition and respect for universal intelligence. For this very reason the medical art, which has been in a decadent state in all Italy, shows probably less trace of antiquated dogma and practice in Bologna than in most other cities which have not a considerable number of English or German or French doctors and surgeons to enlighten the whole body of the profession.

And again, it is easy for new ideas to reach Bologna. The city possesses many items of interest, such and so disposed that even the typical traveller who goes about the world "doing places," finds a single day too little for him. The great basilica of San Petronio; the quaint, round church of San Stefano, with its seven subterranean chapels; the academy, rich in its dark, sturdy Domenichines and Caraccas, its paler Guidos, and the olive Saint Cecilia of Raphael—all pictures to be seen before the religious splendors of the Venetian school; these with the tumbling towers, the miles of shadowy arcades and the curious streets and squares, are a deal in themselves. But beside these, which all lie handily within the city walls, there are the suburban attractions of the old monastery of San Michele in Bosco, where excavations are revealing many things of antiquarian interest; of the high-perched church of the Madonna di San Luca, from under whose colonnades, stretching for a mile along the hill-side, are to be had exquisite views of the Apennines, the diversified sweep of town and country at their feet, and the Adriatic, dotted with parti-colored sails, melting away in misty whiteness to the far eastward; and, finally, of the great Campo Santo, most original among burial grounds, and sheltering in the marble galleries which enclose its acres of simple cross-marked sods, so many monuments which delight the eye and which satisfy the mind, not so much perhaps because they are complete and consistent to their last detail, as because their fancy is fond and free, and their sentiment sincere and sympathetic. For myself I know no funeral tribute more touching and more fascinating at once, than that monument of the Maiani family, with its sombre portal of black marble, and its sad, sweet mourner sunk in all the abandonment of desolate grief upon her knees beside it, her clasped hands drooping listlessly, and her head fallen back against the door-post, the eyelids closed and the lips half parted in the deep weariness of silent, tearless grief; again and again have I turned back to it, half-fancifully to behold in the dim light of the aisle a real woman, and waiting for the relief of her first sigh to break the still suspense. There, too, are the Pepoli monument, with its twin angels mounting to the Saviour's out-stretched arms; the statue, tall and bold, of Murat, with trophies at his feet; chapel after chapel with carved madonnas or saints, and many a commoner tomb, bearing no bust or sculptured wreath, but with a handful of immortelles and a little epitaph in which fact and fancy are blended with that delicacy and naturalness which no language but the Italian permits, and which give a pleasure to the loitering reader, even although the name embalmed is all unknown and the story, as such, unheeded.

Few, therefore, of the travellers brought into the spacious railway station of Bologna by the three great lines that centre there from France via Milan, from Germany via Verona, and from Austria via Trieste and Venice, pass on without making some stay in the old city, and it would be a sorry chance if they did not impart as well as derive something.

Accordingly I was quite prepared—knowing that "Rienzi" had previously made almost a furor—for the excitement which I found on the subject of "Lohengrin," when I paused in Bologna on my return from Germany in November, to refresh there many a pleasant memory. People with whom I spoke were full of tales of boxes ordered by telegraph, and of curious auditors who had come from all sorts of out-of-the-way corners of Italy on purpose to hear the extraordinary composition. When the pouring rain in which I arrived had somewhat abated, I strolled out to the theatre to secure a place for the next representation. Although in Germany I had self-sacrificingly listened to about as much Wagner as can be borne in a single season by any but a nerveless man, I was most anxious to see the effect of this opera—on the whole, the author's best in respect of evenness, clearness and simplicity—upon an Italian audience of the best stamp, musically educated and disposed, but of unshaken faith in the idea that vocal music, at least, must have melody for its harmony to cling to, if it is to have any living worth, just as much as a body must hold a soul to be redeemed from common clay. In the theatre I found an old official, most enthusiastic about the performance. "Lei deve sapere," said he, "che per noi altri Italiani, questa non è musica; ma come rappresentazione è bellissima, anzi unica." He verified to me the fact that musical people had come from all Italy to hear the opera, and told me that the machinist, scenic artist and stage director had all been sent to Munich to study the effects with a view to a close imitation. Furthermore, that so many forestieri, habituated to higher prices than those of the theatre, and estimating their places chiefly by what they cost, had attended the Wagner nights, that the manager had been obliged to put in one special row of stalls at double the price of the ordinary orchestra seats, which were usually all gobbled up eagerly by such visitors as had purses long enough to lodge themselves at the Hotel Brun. But I could not get from him any hearty indorsement even at second-hand, from his fragments of lobby criticism, of "Lohengrin," for the composer—only for the performers.

On the evening of performance the Teatro Comunale,—a spacious and handsome room, finished in gold and white, and having five tiers of boxes, and of perhaps two-thirds the size of San Carlo,—was punctually filled with an audience of intelligent aspect, which gave the closest attention throughout the evening. To my great satisfaction I observed very few of those "nice young men," who are so numerous in most Italian audiences, and who have apparently no other object in life than to wear creaseless lavender kids, to ogle the rest of the company through infinitesimal opera-glasses, to talk aloud in the piano passages, and to fall back in their chairs rapt and speechless when the ballet begins. Indeed, at this moment I can only recall two, who occupied one of two funny little triangular pens, built outside of the box range, just at the corner of the stage, against the columns of the proscenium arch. One was a small, pallid, inefficient-looking youth in a Daniel Webster dress-coat; the other, big and burly, with hair of the deep, dull Italian red, and a face as flat as a prize-fighter's, who seemed to glory in his ugliness, and in every entr'acte rose and plumed himself like a peacock. But their presence was a very slight disturbing element; for when the big one had exhausted himself in a tussle with the libretto, and the small one was on the point of being utterly lost in ennui, they bethought themselves of a mysterious door, artfully blending with the panelling behind them, and slipped secretly away, perhaps that "from the cool cisterns of the midnight air" their spirits might "drink repose."

Upon the performance I need not dwell. It was good in all its parts, and in some respects rose to positive excellence. After the mise-en-scène and the really perfect ensemble of the opera at Vienna,—the only place where I have ever seen operas given as they ought to be, from greatest to least particular,—the spectacular effects and the singing could but suggest unfavorable comparison. But the orchestra left nothing to desire; Signor Mariani, an eminent professor of the Conservatory, directed, and all the purely orchestral passages were given with a German accuracy and an Italian anima combined, the whole band moving, not like one machine, but like one man.

I had already had the opportunity of watching the effect of Wagner's music in his own stronghold, Munich, upon an audience of his followers and believers, when "Rheingold" and "Die Walküre" were given, as well as upon the Viennese public (unequaled, possibly, in inherited tradition and taste), when "Lohengrin" and "Rienzi" were performed. Now I had around me an audience of the most sensitive, if not the most sensible, people in the world, so far as music is concerned, and the representation assumed for me rather the guise of an interesting psychological experiment. In Munich one artist, rather inclined to Wagnerism, was won to confess to me that he could not understand the "Walküre," which he thought intolerable after the first act, and to add that he didn't know what would become of the musical world if the author should make an advance upon himself in the two operas, which he threatens to bring out as necessary to continue and complete the "Rheingold" or "Walhalla" series, corresponding to the step he has taken from "Rheingold" to the "Walküre." In Vienna another artist said to me—because I was going away and could not spread his heresy,—"Wagner is a great man and a genius, to make his way into the first opera-theatres of the world with even his most peculiar works; but he has done a monstrous injury to the art and cause of music." In both these cities I saw a certain blankness spread over the faces of the people when what I should call, for want of a better nomenclature, Wagner's mythological music, began; and I could discover a live interest only when he had deigned to adhere to heretofore recognized principles of composition and combination. Astonishment, perplexity, stupefaction almost, there were often; but pleasure and applause only when a rare bit of melody came to refresh, or a choral or orchestral movement to inspire; such occasional movements were welcomed with eagerness, and the audiences made as though they would fain prostrate them. At Bologna, I observed the same results, only more easily and clearly, because in a fairly constituted Italian audience the magnetic effect of the national simpatia or antipatia is felt long before it is manifested. There was no turning away, or yawning or chattering when the dramatis personæ were rehearsing their stories or their feelings in measures as calculated and as dry as an algebraic problem, but a peculiar petrifying chill seemed to pervade the room; on the contrary, when a little air, like Lohengrin's swan-song, a motived chorus or even a melodic phrase succeeded, there was an instant warmth to be felt kindling, and the bravos seemed to say themselves, so spontaneously they rose. As for that wedding of voices and instruments in Elsa's bridal procession, it fairly made a rapture everywhere, and the celebrated introduction to the third act was redemanded with an impetuosity that would not be denied. There was no pretence of "not being quite educated up" to an appreciation of the discordant, nor of being impressed by the vague and abstruse, but honest, straight-forward likes and dislikes, and undisguised reasons thereof. Italy was frank, having no cause to be otherwise; Germany was disingenuous, because—well, perhaps because she is too philosophical to be simple.

I have known something of Wagner ever since the old days when Bergmann used to turn to the audience at the Germania rehearsals and say: "Ve play now, ouverture, Taunhäuser!" and after this summer's experiences I feel as though I had gained a sufficient insight into his ways to pass some comment upon him. Imprimis, he sets out apparently with the intention of making his singers deliver their text as if singing were natural—that is to say, in arbitrary musical intervals, as actors do their speeches. Hence, as a rule, no sentence or phrase is ever repeated, but the current of monologue or dialogue flows on steadily, each little group of words being set by some abstract principle, such as the mechanical elocutionist prescribes for the delivery of a given paragraph. In "Rheingold" this plan of continuity is so adhered to that there is not an instance of silence, and the curtain never falls until the end. But this principle is of course false, and should be discarded, because it leads to ungracious results. People do not talk in blank verse or musical measures; therefore, as we accord to the Shakesperian actor a liberty of delivery which we should refuse to a "character" player, simply because when Shakespeare passes from the abstraction of the closet to the positiveness of the theatre the standard must become an artistic instead of an argumentative one,—so in the opera, which is thoroughly artificial in its fundamental idea, should we seek real beauty and delight, no less than approximative philosophical truth. Wagner is unable or unwilling to comprehend a situation en bloc; his treatment of it is disjointed and incoherent; no sooner has the tale begun to be told in one form, than it changes aspect, tonality and rhythm, and the ear, deluded by a melodious figure, is shocked by a sequence of strange and irrelevant intervals that perhaps, considered in the light of pure reason, or of the integral calculus, ought to correspond to the exact words of the moment, which is not by any means the purpose and scope of the opera as hitherto understood. Yet Wagner does not lack melody; he rarely denies it to his choruses, his orchestral parts are flowing, and every formal intermezzo has two or more voicings as rhythmic and pleasant as one could ask. He seems simply to have set himself determinedly against arias, cavatinas, cabalettas, and all such variety, because he desired to make a revolution, and there was no other way. Verdi has done the same in "Don Carlos," and as a consequence nearly the whole of a long evening is taken up with a drama in recitative, which would be a thousand times more interesting if the words were spoken naturally by the artists, and the few airs sung as songs introduced into a play, and the best of the instrumental portions retained as a melodramatic accompaniment to the action.

Again, Wagner is false to his own canons. He has censured most harshly such of his musical brethren as have had recourse to stage effects for enhancing those of their scores, while never man asked so much of the decorator and the machinist as he. "Rienzi" ends with a conflagration in Rome; the first part of "Rheingold" is under the waters of the Rhine, the second has a pair of giants, and in the third the gods mount up towards the skies over a "practicable" rainbow; in "Walküre" the goddesses ride on barebacked bridleless horses across a bridge of clouds, and for a finale the heroine is burned up in a hollow tree, the flames running furiously all over the stage in pipes imitating the gnarled roots of a giant oak; while at all times thunder, lightning, tempest and clouds of real steam, rising from a perforated stage and tinted by the calcium lights, are elements as common to his hand as processions and banners and bands of trumpets to Meyerbeer, or Halevy, or Verdi.

But above all, Wagner in those later operas which constitute his new manner and which he himself lauds as the true music of the stage, stirs with the human voice no sentiment and awakens no emotion; the priceless instrument is even less in his hands than the humblest integer of his orchestra, and the human element only retains such force or dignity as his studied combinations have been powerless to take away. This is perversity, not poverty; for Wagner knows how to weave a winning melody and how to thrill with majestic harmonies; but he is apparently reckless of results, and resolute to be a new Canute and give laws unto the infinite sea of sound.

John Braham.

(From the London Musical World, 1854.)

(Concluded from page 172.)

At fifty-four Braham might be said to have been in the zenith of his powers. The cause why singers lose their voices so soon arises either from a want of stamina in the constitution, or from a bad method of vocalizing. Braham's constitution is of iron, and has never been tampered with. Always moderate and careful, from temperament as well as prudential motives, he has never been led into excesses, and at this moment he presents one of the most remarkable instances of age joined to vigor of body and mind in existence. That Braham's method of singing belongs to the best school need, we think, scarcely be advanced; he has too long stood in public estimation as a model for English singers, to render it doubtful. But, independently of the excellence of his style and method, another cause still more important tended to the preservation of his vocal powers. His voice was naturally so strong and of such unusual compass, that he was not obliged to overstrain it to produce his greatest effects. How many singers have been prematurely lost by exerting themselves to do more than nature intended them! M. Duprez, the celebrated French tenor, while yet a young man, was put hors-de-combat for the stage through his forced and continual endeavors to sing the ut de poitrine in Guillaume Tell and other operas; and Signor Tamburini, the most accomplished barytone the Italian opera ever boasted of, lost the beauty and power of his voice at the age of forty-six, by striving to roar like Signor Lablache in the "Suoni la tromba" duet in I Puritani. Braham had, fortunately, no cause to do violence to nature in any music. The strength and physical conformation of his lungs gave him immense force and sustaining power, and scarcely any note written for the tenor voice was too high for him. In a ballad he introduced into one of his own operas at Drury Lane he has been known to sing to D natural in alt, in his chest voice. Braham's voice was truly magnificent. Sonorous and metallic in quality, having the fullness and power of a barytone, it was also of exceeding sweetness. He who remembers the tenderness and exceeding pathos infused into some of the Scotch and English ballads must acknowledge how little in the shape of simple singing can be compared to it in the present day. Yet Braham's singing was not always as unaffected and plain as might have been desired. On his first return from Italy he was infected in no small degree with the prevailing mania for florid vocalization. Even the commonest ballads were overcharged by him with a superabundance of floriture; and he was not yet content with that pure and unforced expression which, in a few years after, became one of the special characteristics of his style. Braham, however, may be forgiven for being seduced into that vitiated taste which only followed the exigencies of the age, and conformed itself to popular requirement. These were the times, it must be remembered, of Mrs. Billington, Mme. Mara, Catalani, Tramezzani, David, Rubini, and others, all singers of the brilliant and extraordinary kind, who led the public by the nose, and induced composers to write exercises for the voice instead of simple tunes. The audiences of those days were not always pleased with the unadorned singing of Mrs. Crouch, Mrs. Dickons, or Mrs. Bland. They loved to be surprised rather than delighted, and were not satisfied if their hearts were touched, unless, at the same time, their ears were tickled and their understandings dazzled. Such, at this period, was the state of musical feeling in the popular mind, and to which Braham did not hesitate to subscribe when he came back from the continent. The singer had another motive which tempted him to adopt the prevailing style; his voice was extremely flexible, and no passage was too difficult for him to execute. Most of his early songs and duets indicate his leaning towards the florid school. In all probability at that time he hardly knew where his chief strength lay, and not until he had studied Handel's sacred music did he find out that the grand declamatory style was his forte. In recitative Braham has never been surpassed, and seldom equalled. His delivery of some of Handel's songs, such as "Jephtha's Rash Vow," "Comfort ye, my People," "Every Valley," "Waft her Angels," "Sound the alarm," and others, was particularly grand, chaste, and impressive. It was the excellence of his vocal elocution in sacred singing which procured for him the designation of the Sidons of the Lyric Drama.

* The gentleman must know that for us, Italians, this is not music; but as a representation it is most beautiful, nay unique.

Our own earliest impression of Braham dates back as far as 1830, when we heard him for the first time in Masaniello. His whole performance struck us as being astonishingly grand and powerful. Braham seemed, indeed, scarcely to act at all, yet so earnest and abstracted did he appear when singing, that we felt no loss in the absence of any histrionic display. Such were our subsequent feelings when we saw Rubini in I Puritani. It seemed as if an exhibition of acting would have been but an intrusion, disturbing the intense feeling awakened by his singing. In Masaniello we were almost awed at the volume of tone and energy exhibited by Braham in the morceaux in D flat minor, in the second act: "Uprouse ye, manly hearts," where the Neapolitan fisherman first incites his companions to revolt. Braham's voice sounded like the blast of a trumpet throughout the theatre. We heard the opera for thirteen successive nights with renewed delight, and with increased admiration for the singer.

So great an artist as Braham could hardly have been before the public for more than half a century without producing the most decided influence on his time, and, consequently, all those singers who have aimed at excellence in the declamatory style, have taken him for the model. But, however correct and safe an example Braham offered in his own person, it was by no means an easy task to follow him. The power and largeness of his voice, which rendered his delivery so grand and emphatic, could not be imitated; and without these qualities the singer is precluded from attaining the highest excellence in lyric declamation. Art may effect much to supply the deficiency of voice, but its want must be always seriously felt in vocal elocution. Braham produced a host of servile imitators, many of whom only caricatured his style and manner, but could not catch his beauties or his graces. There existed for many years a Braham-mania among the tenor-singers in England. Those who had strong voices bellowed at the top of their lungs and imagined that this constituted them rivals of their great archetype in energy and power. Those, on the other hand, with weak voices copied his expression and feeling, and fancied by so close an imitation that they had made amends for their want of power. Still the model being good, imitation could hardly have failed to originate some beneficial consequences. Braham's fine elocution, his clear and distinct enunciation, his method of producing the notes, the blending the chest with the falsetto voice—one of his most striking merits—his correct judgment, and refined and classic taste, could not be entirely thrown away for so long a period upon the mass of vocalists; and there is no doubt that at the present time his influence prevails largely wherever oratorios and sacred works are performed.

In the year 1812 to so great a height had Braham's popularity risen, that he obtained almost unprecedented salaries at the two patent theatres, as well as at all the concerts and oratorios. He was also growing rich by means of his musical compositions, at which he labored most assiduously. His music, generally speaking, displays a vein of homely yet graceful melody, well adapted to please an English audience, which it seems was the highest aim of his ambition. For the copyright of some of his operas he was paid more liberally than any composer who wrote before him, and more than many others who came after him. He received, in 1804, no less than one thousand guineas for the music of The English Fleet in 1342. (Many years afterwards he sold his ballad, "The King, God bless him!" for eight hundred pounds, a sum greater than that paid to Rossini for Il Barbiere di Siviglia.)

The operatic works composed by Braham, in whole, or in part, were as follows:—The Cabinet, The English Fleet in 1342, Out of Place, Thirty Thousand, Family Quarrels, The Paraglyph, Kais; or, Love in the Desert, Americans, the Devil's Bridge, False Alarms, Zuma, Navensky, etc. The most popular of these were The Cabinet, the English Fleet, and The Devil's Bridge, which, until modern taste—whether false or true we shall not discuss in this place—drove the ballad opera almost entirely from the stage, were held in special estimation for many years.

Perhaps no singer ever went through a more extraordinary career than John Braham. From 1806 to 1816 he was engaged nearly every year as primo tenore at the Italian Opera, and sang invariably at one of the patent English theatres in the winter. At the Italian Opera he sang with Billington, Mme. Grassini (aunt of Gisi), Mme. Fodor, Signor Naldi, etc., etc. He was the original Sesto when Mozart's Clemenza di Tito was brought out at the King's Theatre. He was the original Max in Weber's Der Freischütz, when it was produced at the Lyceum; and Weber wrote the music of Sir Huon, in Oberon, expressly for him. It was at the suggestion of Braham that Weber wrote the grand scena, "Oh, 'tis a glorious sight to see," which, nevertheless, is far from being the gem of the opera, admired and hacknied as it is.

To follow the career of Braham from the period about which we are now writing—from 1806 to 1816—to the present day (1854) would occupy more room than we can afford to a hurried sketch in these papers. From the moment that he gained the loftiest position as a vocalist in this country until he quitted the stage, he retained his place and his reputation, unperilled through all changes and vicissitudes, through prejudices and pique, through good and indifferent report, through party spirit and favoritism, through love of novelty inherent in the play-going public, through even the weariness supposed naturally to result from too frequent seeing and hearing the same artist. Indeed, in the case of Braham, it would seem as though his audiences were never tired of calling Aristides the Just. Assuredly nothing but talents and accomplishments of the highest order could have conduced to such a result. Braham, in his earliest days, as a singer, had to contend against the popularity of Inledon, one of the most gifted and remarkable vocalists this country ever produced; but Braham's superior musical endowments, his greater art, and his knowledge and acquaintance with the Italian school, whereby he was enabled to master all varieties of singing, gave him many advantages over his great rival. While Inledon confined himself by necessity to English music—and even there his vocal powers were in a great measure restricted, Braham could roam discursive through every region of song, and adapt himself to each particular style. Inledon nevertheless, was the only dangerous antagonist Braham ever encountered on the English stage. Sinclair, who enjoyed for years a considerable reputation, was a singer of a different class altogether, and had no pretension to be compared to him in any respect; and the other tenor singers of the day, however meritorious and excellent, individually and in their appropriate places, are entitled to little consideration when speaking of Braham.

In the year 1835, Braham built and opened the St. James's Theatre, at a cost, it is said of thirty thousand pounds, and became the manager of an operatic company; and the same year he purchased the Colosseum at a large price, and provided a novel kind of entertainment in that splendid edifice. Both speculations, however, proved ruinous, and the fruits of many years' labor were swallowed up in a short space of time. The St. James's Theatre and Colosseum were disposed of at an enormous loss, and Braham again appeared on the stage under another management besides his own. From this time, though occasionally joining the opera troupes at Drury Lane, and elsewhere, his exertions were principally confined to the concert rooms and oratorios. In 1839, he played William Tell, in Rossini's opera of that name, and created a powerful impression in the part. None who heard him can easily forget his profoundly pathetic singing in the air with violoncello accompaniment, which Tell addresses to his son previous to his shooting the apple from his head. The music of the part of Tell is written for a barytone—not a high one—but Braham's power in the middle register, and depth in the lower tones, always enabled him to undertake barytone parts with some trifling transposition. In this respect he resembled the renowned Donzelli, whom we have heard one night singing the high tenor music of the Count Almaviva in the Barbiere, and the next night the barytone music of Count Almaviva in the Nozze di Figaro. But both Donzelli's and Braham's voices were exceptional; and we have no singer on the modern stage to which either of them may be compared. About this time, too, Braham appeared as the Don in Don Giovanni, at Drury Lane, and sang the music with a peculiar charm. The last time Braham appeared before the public, was in March, 1852, at the London Wednesday Concerts, when he was induced to enter into an engagement to give a series of final performances at Exeter Hall. These performances, in consequence of bad management, were never concluded, and thousands were thereby prevented from hearing Braham. Of the singing of the great tenor on that occasion, we shall only say, that if it were not equal to his best efforts in his best days, some forty years ago, it showed astonishing vigor and energy, and produced an effect, literally impossible to describe.

In one of the essays of Elia, written some thirty years or more since, the quaint and humorous Charles Lamb, writing of Braham in his usual off-hand way, thus adds one to the many opinions so frequently expressed, that to his good sense he was mainly indebted for his high standing in his profession:

"There is a fine scorn in Braham's face, which nature meant to be of —. The Hebrew spirit is strong in him. He cannot conquer the Shilleboleth. How it breaks out when he sings, 'The Children of Israel passed through the Red Sea!' The auditors for the moment are Egyptians to him, and he rides over their necks in triumph. There is no mistaking him. Braham has a strong expression of sense in his countenance, and it is confirmed by his singing. The foundation of his vocal excellence is sense. He sings with understanding, as Kemble delivered dialogue. He would slug the Commandments, and give an appropriate character to each prohibition."

It only remains to add that the renowned singer is now [1854] living in retirement, in the enjoyment of excellent health and spirits. Approaching close upon his 80th year, he is still sound in mind and vigorous in body. That indomitable energy which exercised so powerful an influence over the fortunes of his art has not yet deserted him, and would not fail him in the hour of need. The sun has set on his glories forever, but their memories will remain to illumine the history of his art long after less perishable things have passed away without a record or a name.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Wachtel.

We noticed in the last number of the Atlantic an article with the title of Music, and, although a criticism on a criticism is perhaps unusual, in this case we trust it will not seem unjustifiable, and may teach the writer in the Atlantic that criticism is by no means abuse, and that when a writer attempts to speak of music he should first make sure that he thoroughly understands the subject of which he treats.

In the first place it is stated in reference to Wachtel, the German Tenor, that "he has undeniably a most superb tenor voice," that "there is no good or fine quality that his voice does not possess," and that "it has a magnetic power over the audience that is at times almost maddening." So far so good. But here the praise stops, and we find that Wachtel is "no artist in any high sense of the word," that "his phrasing is vulgar," "his vocalization bad," "his style wanting in dignity and simplicity, and though we may be electrified by his glorious chest C, yet this vocal phenomenon is a small compensation for his gross violation of all that is really artistic in singing."

These with other numerous faults make up a large list. But let us see how it is. Though he may not be called an artist in the highest sense of the word, as that would imply more general culture and refinement of feeling than he possesses, still his method is of the purest, and his voice has received the highest cultivation. He is the only Tenor now in the country and the only one we have had here for years (it is difficult to name another) thoroughly conversant with, and correctly using the three registers of the male voice: the low chest, the second chest, and the falsetto tones; and his transition from one to the other of these registers is wonderfully correct, and shows in itself the skillful and thorough cultivation of the voice. Particularly is this noticeable when he changes from the second chest to the falsetto, and so beautifully does his voice glide into the falsetto, that it is difficult to tell exactly when he changes, and sometimes all but impossible.

His phrasing, it is said is vulgar. If so, what must we call the phrasing of the generality of tenors whom we are forced to listen to in opera and concert? This is perhaps the respect in which it is most difficult to criticize a singer. It is a matter not clearly understood, and we know of no singer who keeps strictly to either the German or Italian method, and here Wachtel is no exception. His phrasing shows his Italian instruction, and is a combination of both schools. But he is not alone; as we have said, there is hardly an artist of the present day who sings in either school alone.

In vocalization it is most difficult to retain the full true tone, and at the same time render the words intelligible; and when we consider how intelligible his words are, without the slightest injury to the complete tones, we must grant that his vocalization is as nearly perfect as possible.

Now, as to his style which is "without dignity or simplicity,"—the true way to use the voice is in accordance with the anatomy of the throat, not straining the tones above or forcing them below their natural registers. Such is Wachtel's method of singing. Can anything be more "simple" or pure? It is true he is wanting in the sickly sentimentalism so common in the singers of to-day, and which is so apt to pass for expression and feeling. There is nothing of the sort in the man. What a relief it is to hear a singer free from these mere tricks, and to listen only to full and sonorous tones going directly, and with commanding effect, to the heart. Can we desire a better illustration of true dignity?

Finally, as to his "glorious chest C" so called. This expression involves a contradiction of much of this fault-finding. Is it not wonderful that Wachtel is able to bring his falsetto tones to such perfection that the audience, and among them, our so-called critics, are not able to detect the change from the second chest register to falsetto? And this is exactly what he does and nothing more,—no "vocal phenomenon," but simple pure art. He rarely goes above Ab with the chest register, and his high C is a pure falsetto note, but so strong and pure that it is far superior to the false and strained tones of the majority of our Tenors, who, by forcing the vocal chords to an unnatural extent, not only ruin their voices but produce what to our ears is no music, only noise.

Our defence of the great singer is quite unnecessary so far as he is concerned, for Wachtel can speak or rather sing for himself; but, being lovers and students of music, we could not consent to allow the article in the Atlantic to go unnoticed.

Though Boston may not be pleased with such singing as Wachtel's, allow Philadelphia to add her voice to that of Europe in pronouncing him the greatest living Tenor.

Philadelphia, Jan. 24, 1872.

Wagner's Opinion of Liszt.

A CURIOUS BIT OF AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

In a communication to his friends, recently published abroad by Richard Wagner, he says:

"I met Liszt, for the first time in my life, during my earliest sojourn in Paris, and, moreover, in the second period of that sojourn, when—humiliated, and seized with a feeling of disgust—I renounced all hope of, nay, more, all desire for, a Parisian success, and was in the state of revolt which I have already described at length against the artistic world there. When I met him Liszt offered a complete contrast to myself in his nature and position. In that world in which I had yearned to enter and shine when, in poor circumstances, I longed for greatness, Liszt had from his earliest youth grown up unconsciously, and become its wonder and delight at a time when I, touched by the coldness and want of kindness it had shown me, was cast off so far that, with the full bitterness of one undecieved, I was able to perceive its hollowness and nothingness. Thus Liszt was sometimes more than a man to be merely suspected by me. I had no opportunity of making myself known to him in my true nature, and by my works; the only knowledge he could have of me was superficial, and so was the manner of his meeting me; this was very natural in him—especially when we take into account that he was a man into whose presence individuals of the most different sorts forced their way in large numbers every day. I was not at that period, in a frame of mind to inquire, justly and calmly, the motive of conduct which—of itself friendly and obliging—could only wound me. With the exception of this occasion, I never called on Liszt again, and—certainly without my knowing him, but on the contrary, with my entertaining a decided feeling of antipathy against making his acquaintance—he remained, as far as I was concerned, one of those whom we consider foreign and hostile to us naturally.

"What I uttered while in this humor, which was an enduring one, subsequently happened to reach his ear, and at the time, too, when I had created so sudden a sensation in Dresden with my Rienzi. Liszt felt puzzled at being so violently misunderstood, as, from what I said, it appeared that he was, by a man whom he scarcely knew, and whom it now struck him as not being quite beneath his while to know. At present, when I look back, there is something unusually touching in the earnest endeavors, continued with astonishing endurance, with which Liszt tried to inspire me with a different opinion of himself. At first he still knew nothing of my works, and thus there was no artistic sympathy, properly so speaking, in his desire to become better acquainted with me; but merely the purely human desire not to allow the continuance of any disharmony, that may have accidentally arisen, in his relations with another; and in this desire there was perhaps mixed up an indescribably tender doubt as to whether he might not perhaps have actually wounded my feelings. Any one acquainted with the boundlessly selfish loveliness and unfeeling regardlessness manifested when we come into contact with one another in all our social relations, but especially in the relations of artists towards each other, cannot fail to be more than astounded, he must feel thoroughly entranced, when he receives such proofs of an individual's behavior to him as were showered upon me by that extraordinary man.

"But I was not yet in a position to appreciate the unusual charm and ravishing nature of Liszt's disposition, which is, above all things, amiable and loving. I at first regarded with astonishment his approaches to me, and even frequently felt inclined to supply that astonishment with almost trivial nourishment. Liszt now attended in Dresden a representation, which he was nearly compelled to bring about by force, of Rienzi, and from all possible places visited by him in the course of his virtuoso progress, I received, sometimes through one person and sometimes through another, proofs of his restless eagerness to inform others of the pleasure he had derived from my music, and thus—as I should almost prefer assuming—quite unintentionally, to act as a propagandist for me. This occurred at a time when, on the other hand, it kept becoming clearer to me that I should fail to achieve any outward success with my dramatic labors. Now, exactly in the same degree as this utter unsuccessfulness was more plainly, and at length decidedly, manifested, Liszt managed by his most individual efforts, to establish a supporting asylum for my art. He gave up his peregrinations and—though at home in the utmost splendor of the most flourishing cities of Europe—settled down in the modest little town of Weimar, where he took up the stick as conductor. It was there I met him the last time, when—still uncertain as to the real character of the persecution that threatened me—I was staying on Thuringian soil, during the flight which was at length necessary from Germany. On the day that, from information received, it became clearer and clearer, and at length perfectly certain, that my personal position was one of the utmost peril, I saw Liszt conduct a rehearsal of my Tannhäuser, and was astonished at perceiving, from what he did, my second self in him; what I felt when I conceived the music, he felt as he had it performed; what I wanted to say as I wrote it down, he said as he caused it to re-echo through the place. Strange, through the love of this most uncommon of friends, I obtained at the very moment I myself was homeless, the actual and long-desired home, always sought in the wrong place, and never found, for my art. When I was banished, to rove in foreign lands, he who had roved the world through withdrew to a little spot and made it a home for me. Everywhere and evermore thinking of me, always rapid and decided in his help, when help was required, with a heart opening wide to everyone of my wishes, and with the most devoted love for my whole being—Liszt became for me what I never found before, and that to such a degree that one cannot grasp its fullness until it really surrounds him in all its extent."

Liszt and Rubinstein in a Symphony Concert—What the Critics Say.

1. The Daily Advertiser, representing, we suspect, about the average impression of the audience, writes as follows of the Seventh Concert, which (having its imagination so excited with the "Future," no doubt) it unwittingly calls "the twenty-seventh":

We confess to something akin to dissatisfaction with yesterday's symphony concert programme; or, to express it more definitely, there was some jarring on our finer musical feelings. There was at least one piece which contained strangely insufficient attempts at beautiful expression of musical feeling. In Franz Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso: Lamento e Trionfo," the great pianist truly expended much strength in striving to find a suitable garb for his musical thought. To express the lament he repeats a very lugubrious motive by apparently every instrument in the orchestra, which, by the way, he handles with masterly effect. To express madness he hauls in the triangle, the chimes and the flauto-piccolo; and to express—no one knows what—he employs chromatic passages, which those masters of musical expression, Beethoven and Mendelssohn, reserve for portraying a raging storm of the elements. Mozart, it is true, uses them in his "Don Giovanni" in that terrible ghost and perdition scene. But Liszt, like a third-rate actor, struts and snorts and, grows red in the face; like a fourth-rate scene painter he throws potsful of dabs on the unfortunate canvass. With exceeding strength he wields ponderous engines to lift up a—feather. He exaggerates; he vainly seeks for the strongest expression; he is overpowering, but tedious. It reminds one of the pygmies stealing Jove's thunder and then not knowing what to do with it. There stands Beethoven intent on expressing similar emotions. His "Coriolan" tells us of anguish as does Liszt's Tasso. The loving entreaties of mother and wife in "Coriolan," their plaintive utterances when they see him unyielding, are not so far different, essentially, from kindred emotions in Tasso. Yet how simply do Beethoven's harmonies, how truly do his melodies, how chastely do his instruments express all this. The proper motto for Liszt's piece might read thus: Great skill, very great effort, exceeding much noise, but very little creative genius. Not that we would condemn the piece altogether. There is an abundance of fine instrumental effort; there are some splendid motives, well worked up; there is power and beauty in some parts, but the whole lacks that quality which only genius can give to any work of art,—the simple and true expression of the idea. It sparkles, it glitters, it shines like an overdressed belle, gorgeously got up and overloaded with finery. We are becoming accustomed, now-a-days, to tremendous efforts in the way of music. Meyerbeer, Verdi, Wagner, by their operas, Liszt by his gigantic piano-works, full of the utmost force, have educated the popular musical ear down to a point where any amount of noise seems bearable, any harmonic contortions admissible, any eccentricity in the conduct of melodies proper. We think that a cure might be effected by restricting the musical public to an exclusive diet of such works of force and pathos. Why not play all the symphonic poems in two concerts? There are nine of them, we believe. Would it not be a wise thing to be done with them once and for all?

The other modern piece was of a different character—Rubinstein was a man of genius—of creative genius, we mean. And beautiful were many of the motives he employed, and well worked up. And yet the results were not such as the enormous difficulties would warrant. The effect was disproportionate to the means employed. The second movement was very beautiful, tender, pure; the last dramatic to a high degree. The resemblance of the first motive to that hacknied chorus in "Martha" did not detract from the freshness of the movement. And yet there was laboring after effect. The idea was not expressed with the fullest truth in many cases. Especially did we find this in several melodies. Strange progressions of the melodic motive, mannerisms in introducing unusual dissonances and in resolving them are common. The sense of musical beauty, even, is offended, in two instances at least, where doubling thirds and sevenths makes the chord absolutely painful. After all this, however, we gladly say that the work is good and affords pleasure. Mr. Lang made easy work of the difficulties, playing his octaves, arpeggi and other difficulties with the utmost aplomb and with unusual fire. We could wish that he had had a more effective piece to play, say some beautiful Mendelssohn Concerto. Still we admire his playing none the less.

Slight differences of intonation in the reeds and wood instruments and one or two infelicities that happened to the oboe and horn excepted, the orchestra did exceedingly well, playing all the pieces with finest regard to shading and expression. We thought we noticed a more pleasant piano than on former occasions, where it was almost too fine-span. The opening and closing overtures and the Haydn symphony were thoroughly enjoyable, and we could not help congratulating ourselves and the audience that there were at least three perfect master-works performed. Especially did the symphony please us. It completely restored our good humor, a good part of which had taken flight before Liszt's ponderous efforts.

LISZT AND THE DAILY ADVERTISER.

To the Editors of the Boston Courier:

A pre-requisite to discriminating musical criticism is that the critic shall understand the music he is criticising, which, unfortunately for art, does not appear to be the case with the Advertiser's musical critic in his review of Liszt's Tasso in the Symphony concert of yesterday. Musical criticism is something more than a mere expression of likes or dislikes; it is, or should be, a careful discrimination of the merits and demerits of the work; and to say that Liszt "struts and snorts and grows red in the face like a third-rate actor," or that he "throws potfuls of daub like a fourth-rate scene painter," is to exhibit lack of taste equalled only by ignorance of the true character of the music he undertakes to criticise. If the critic does not see the beauty or grandeur of such music it is not the fault of the composer, and the critic's vague talk about "lack of creative genius" and failure to embody an idea will not convince the many, who at that concert thoroughly enjoyed the Tasso "poem," of their lack of taste in liking what he is pleased to call "harmonic contortions." As a music lover I would heartily thank the Harvard Symphony Association for the enjoyment they gave some of us yesterday, in their presentation of Liszt's Symphonic Poem, and at the same time protest against the indiscriminate censure indulged in by the critic above mentioned, as lowering the standard of musical criticism.

Cambridge, February 2.

THOROUGHLY OUT OF HUMOR.

(From the Saturday Evening Gazette.)

The Seventh Harvard Symphony Concert on Thursday afternoon was well attended, but the programme proved less interesting than any hitherto presented this season. Beethoven's fine overture to Coriolanus, which began the performance, was fairly played, though we fancy we have heard it given with more precision and color than it received on this occasion. It was followed by an unmeaning and bombastic piece of sentimentalism by Liszt, entitled "Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo," which is remarkable for nothing but an obtrusive charlatanism, and a blatant vulgarity and poverty of ideas. It is utterly without form, and if it have a purpose beyond noise and eccentricity, it was not made apparent. As a work of art it is a complete failure. Why such works are played when so many really fine compositions remain in comparative obscurity, is beyond our power to conceive or explain. They should be left to the appreciation of that future for which they are written. The present can get along very well without them. The beautiful and true in art find no place in this rapid and long-drawn piece of bombast, which is overflowing with extreme discords and bizarre instrumental effects. When a fragment of melody appears, it is trite and vulgar; and when an idea crops out through the dreary stables of purposeless modulations, it is utterly incomprehensible, owing to the tasteless manner in which it is presented. We have had enough of such unmeaning vagaries. The gabbling of a madman is always painful to listen to. Liszt is a mere musical juggler, who keeps up a volley of nonsensical talk in order to direct attention from the manner in which his silly tricks are performed. When the trouble has been well taken, the result is but a trick, after all. Liszt's orchestral works are an insult to art, and are undeserving the time bestowed upon them. They are a riddle even to the educated musician, and what they must be to the unprofessional public baffles surmise. It is time things were called by their right titles, no matter whose name they may bear, and under this condition Liszt's "Tasso" can claim no higher merit than that of meaningless jargon. What is bad, is bad, no heed from what brain it may emanate. A respect for mere reputation is folly. This symphonic poem—heaven save the mark!—is a piece of gaudy musical harlotry, decked out in glowing robes of many colors, selected without taste and worn without decency. It attracts for a moment by its vulgar glare, but never charms. It is loud and coarse in every sense. There is nothing real about it. Its very sensuousness is simulated. Wash off its paint and strip it of its gawgawed trappings, and it stands forth the wan and wretched object it really is. There is better work in store for the Harvard Musical Association than the performance of such wretched stuff. Liszt has written some capital music for the piano, and there his love for innovation has been a source of profit to the world, but where he has ventured outside this narrow limit he has been a complete failure, and this truth cannot be too soon understood and acknowledged. We sincerely trust we have heard the last of his hideous orchestral ravings.

Haydn's Symphony, which followed, was an unutterable relief. Though by no means the best of the composer's works, its form, its purpose, its beauty and its freshness, struck a sympathetic chord in every heart. It was the intelligence of Ulysses against the brute force of Polyphemus. Though almost childish in its innocence and naïveté, it is worth a thousand such savage and incoherent bellowings as "Tasso." It was not clearly given, and showed signs of insufficient rehearsing. The slow movement in particular was played in a very slovenly manner. It was perhaps fortunate that it was preceded by the symphonic poem, or the faulty way in which it was rendered might have been more palpable; but the ears of the audience had been so deluged with discords that two or three more were scarcely worth the notice. However, despite short-comings, we are thankful that the work was on the programme. We trust that we shall hear more of the same character at the coming Harvard concerts. While there are so many similar productions by the old masters that the public have not heard, and with which it is necessary they should become acquainted, it is folly to waste time on the meaningless and valueless music of the future. The time taken for the rehearsal of the latter can be more wisely spent in preparing better works.

Rubinstein's Piano Concerto in G is a somewhat difficult, brilliant, and fituous aberration. It is never strikingly original, but is often commonplace. In fact, Rubinstein, in writing this work, seems to have been laboring under a species of cacoethes loquendi, without having anything to say worth the listening to. Whether Mr. Lang was dispirited by the nature of the work he had undertaken to perform, or whether he was not in a favorable mood for playing, we cannot say, but we were disappointed with his performance. It was not as clear as we have the right to expect from him. Many of the passages rolled from under his fingers in a mutilated form, and there was an absence of variety in his style which was almost monotonous. At the same time there was little in the composition to inspire him, and we have no doubt his relief at its termination was no less than that of the audience.

The overture to "Oberon," which ended the performance, received a brilliant interpretation. On the whole, the concert was unsatisfactory. Liszt and Rubinstein cast a chill over it that nothing could completely remove. The intonation was far from perfect, and at times the clarinets and oboes differed nearly a quarter of a tone in pitch; nor were the bassoons immaculate in this respect. The symphony, as we have said, was not justly dealt by, and for the first time during the season we were disappointed with the manner in which the orchestra acquitted itself.

Bright's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, FEB. 10, 1872.

"Harvard" Symphony Concerts.

The series (of ten) is two-thirds over, the interest still on the increase. The sixth programme (Jan. 18) was as follows:

- Toccata in F, composed for Organ.....J. S. Bach.
Arranged for Orchestra by H. Esser.
- Piano-forte Concerto, in D-minor, No. 8.....Mozart.
Allegro. Romanza. Rondo Prestissimo.
Richard Hoffman.
-  Symphony in A-minor, (No. 8), Op. 15.....N. W. Gade.
Presto. Andante sostenuto. Allegretto. Finale.
-  Adagio and Rondo, from the Clarinet Concerto in A flat.....C. M. von Weber.
Ernest Weber.
- Piano-forte Solos.....Chopin.
a. Nocturne in B. Op. 32, No. 1.
b. Polonaise in A flat, Op. 68.
Richard Hoffman.
- Overture to "Fledermaus".....Schubert.

The star prefixed means given for the first time in these concerts; two stars, for the first time (publicly) in Boston; three stars, for the first time in this country.

Bach's great Organ Toccata—more distinctly, vividly, if less massively and grandly, set before us through the orchestra, than it is likely to be through the impersonal and accentless medium for which it was composed,—had already in one or two of the earlier Harvard seasons made an impression worth recalling. This time its titanic and perennial vigor, its wonderful buoyancy and fulness of life, its exhaustless beauty and variety, notwithstanding the clearest simplicity of purpose, were still more deeply and more generally felt. By the orchestra it gains accent, individuality, distinctness in the entrances and imitations of the theme in the different parts; also the aid of color contrasts, as where those strong full-chord responses are offset in the wind band against the broad and even polyphonic current of the strings;—it loses the oceanic depth and volume, the roar as of many waters, especially the massive bass of the great Organ, so that the infinite and mystical suggestion of that impersonal instrument of instruments is put to flight by shall we say excess of sunshine. In the transcription its internal structure is more quickly recognized by most ears, clear outline is perceived where once was vagueness, the work is better understood, and therefore more enjoyed. In the same way a fugue well played on the piano is clearer than it can be on the organ. Such at least is the experience of nearly all beginners, that is to say the mass of any public audience; always excepting some poetic souls, in whom the mystical element is strong, and who can feel and love, and hold communion through the seashore mystery and murmur of great organ music without understanding it or caring to trace out its form or scan its rhythm; for one may feel and own the spirit of an art work though he know nothing of its law. Herr Esser certainly has helped us to a clearer perception of the genius and the art of Bach, though purists will not cease protesting against all "arrangements" as unorthodox. But what a glorious creation (living creature almost), what a power this same Toccata is! What a sustaining, strengthening charm it exercises! It holds us up as in the hollow of its hand. It took possession of the orchestra and through them of the audience.

Mozart after Bach came well prepared and welcome; and that Concerto in D minor, played only once before (last winter by Miss Mehlig), is one of his finest works alike for the piano and the orchestra. We count it greatly to the credit of a pianist now-a-days to choose one of Mozart's Concertos for his performance in a concert of this kind; it shows (ceteris paribus) a sound artistic feeling, an interest in a noble composition as such, and a wish to save it from oblivion in the midst of newer and more dazzling things, which is stronger than the love of personal display. The pianists of the day, even the most classical and earnest, are shy of such comparatively modest tasks, and turn too willingly away from them to others which afford a greater opportunity to show their mastery of all the modern problems of pianism. Among Mozart's Concertos, they will readily admit, are found some of the most admirable creations of his genius; simple tasks, it may be, for the pianist, but exquisite in the ensemble with the orchestra, forming perfect wholes too fair to be forgotten. How shall these be saved to the world, where shall they ever get a hearing, if not in just such concerts as these, of which the spirit and the sole aim is to make Art, truth, beauty, genius paramount, and personal ambition of the least account; each individual talent losing (and thus most truly finding) itself in joint production of an artistic whole? Is not the composition of a Mozart a matter of more interest than the personal prestige of any solo player? Will there ever be a perfect concert until vanity and self-esteem give place to the much more delightful and more quickening incentive of a pure devotion to the ministry of Art? We thank the artist, therefore, who is not above helping us to know the worth and beauty of Mozart's Concertos. And we thank Mr. RICHARD HOFFMAN for the conscientious manner, and the consummate skill and taste with which he executed his part in that Concerto in D minor, which is commonly understood to be the one that gives more prominence to the piano than the most of Mozart's, while it is reckoned his best Concerto as a whole. Certainly the orchestral part has beauties which a score of hearings would not exhaust, and the musicians all coöperated with zeal and delicacy. Mr. Hoffman won the general sympathy at once by his quiet, manly, and artistic bearing, as well as his youthful, fresh appearance, though he is of middle age and ranked among the best pianists in New York full twenty years ago. He has a clear, crisp, vital touch, and a technique so precise and clean and even, lending a pearly roundness to each tone even in the finest demi-sumi-quaver groups, that you get as it were an exact photographic reproduction of the music. But the interpretation was also refined, exquisite in its gradations of light and shade, true in conception and in sympathetic feeling of his author; we could not ask for a finer reading of Mozart. What, for instance, could be finer, more absorbing to the listener than his rendering of the passage in the slow movement where the piano carries on the simple leading melody so long alone? His execution of the Chopin pieces was perhaps more remarkable as an exact, cool reproduction, without affectation or sentimental nonsense, of the written music, than as showing deep affinity with Chopin. The tempo was almost too rigid; yet there was delicacy, grace, light and shade enough, and in the Polonaise a fire, an energy, and a masterly way of working up a long crescendo, which were quite remarkable and made a great impression. Mr. Hoffman's playing has its interesting individuality, while it proves the master by the ordinary tests, and his visit to our city (too long delayed) will be counted among the most pleasant incidents of this uncommonly rich season.

The Symphony by Gade was approached not without some misgiving; our experience so far having confirmed the common warning, that though he has written seven symphonies, he has never again reached the height of his earliest, in C minor. This our concerts had verified in previous trials of the second (in E) and of the fourth (B flat.) Most of the audience, therefore, must have been agreeably disappointed by the beauty, the fine imaginative, romantic charm of this one in A minor. If not a great Symphony, it is a lovely one; poetic in its mood, refined in every detail of expression; not commonplace if not decidedly original; suggesting Mendelssohn more by affinity of nature than by any imitation. Alike in its serious and its playful movements, it is all tender, delicate, and clinging to the shade, although the instrumental colors are richly blended and sometimes charmingly contrasted. You may listen for some time and not suspect the Presto tempo of the first movement, it cuts the air with such an even wing, and in a mood (seemingly) so still and dreamy, that you might fancy it a smooth Andante. The Andante itself is in a more deeply serious mood, to which you pleasantly surrender yourself. The Allegretto is a most delicate, bewitching bit of fairy humor, and the Finale full of fire, and eke of difficult and nervous work for the violins, to which they proved fully equal; indeed the whole Symphony was capitally rendered. It is one of the best works, not of a Titan, like Beethoven, but of a genial, genuine tone-poet of a gentler, less commanding mould.

In the clarinet Concerto, which, though somewhat of a common, older fashion in its form and motives, has yet the Weber individuality and charm, Mr. ERNEST WEBER showed to fine advantage that beauty and richness of tone, that easy, finished, tasteful execution for which his instrument has been noted for two seasons in our orchestra; his effort met with warm and merited applause; and the brightness of such a solo on the most human of wind instruments added an element of freshness to the programme. Schubert's grandest Overture makes more impression every time that it is heard.

The seventh Concert (Feb. 1) offered the following somewhat exceptional and yet instructive bill of fare:

- Overture to "Coriolan".....Beethoven.
- *Tasso: Lamento e Trionfo" (Symphonic Poem)....Liszt.
- *Symphony, No. 3 (Breitkopf and Härtel), in E flat. Haydn.
- Adagio and Vivace assai. Adagio. Menuetto. Vivace.
- *Pianoforte Concerto, No. 3, in G.....Rubinstein.
- Allegro moderato. Andante. Allegro risoluto. B. J. Lang.
- Overture to "Oberon".....Weber.

That this contrasting side by side of new with old; of works of clever, pretentious talent with creations of undoubted genius; of ambitious striving for would-be originality with real inspirations of sincere art, produced precisely the effect anticipated by those who framed the programme, is proved by the discussions which followed in musical circles and by the predominant tone of the newspaper criticisms, of which (in their variety) we have copied some marked specimens on a preceding page. For this was meant to be, as far as possible a pleasing, but mainly an instructive programme in regard to a much mooted musical question of the day. To gratify for once the party who complain of what one has called the "ungenial conservatism" shown in the persistent exclusion of the names of Liszt and Wagner from these programmes,—a party never very numerous in the Harvard audience, and which has dwindled to a very small minority since the liberal allowance of such music granted in the Thomas programmes,—one of the "Symphonische Dichtungen" of Liszt, the "Tasso" (promised a year ago, but postponed on account of the non-arrival of the music from Germany), was made a feature of the concert. Time was when this would have been a hazardous experiment with a public of unsettled taste or tendency in art; when mere brilliancy and startling effect, like gaudy pictures in a gallery, might have dazzled many and blinded them to a perception of the finer beauties of more sincere and unpretending works of truly inspired genius, to put which in their proper light and make them well appreciated is and has ever been a leading motive of these concerts. But that time seems to have passed; a Boston audience can now be trusted to know wheat from chaff, and after listening with a curious interest to questionable new things, to feel fresh life and charm in true things even if their form be old. And, by the way, "ungenial" is an unfortunate term to apply to this sort of conservatism, so simply and sincerely constant to the old love; for, if there be any virtue which can at all times, and without the smallest reservation, be ascribed to any and every one of the classical masterworks of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, &c., it is the thorough geniality of all their music; while the grand objection to these modern strivings after new effects, is, not their departure from conventional form, not their non conformity in any way to long accepted and beloved models, not their reflection, it may be, of the new spirit of the age, not their heroic recognition of the principle of progress and their chivalric ambition to do something "epoch-making;"—but, that, whatever else we may find in them, whatever pleasing details, bold original suggestions, new intensities of instrumental power or color, still we feel they are not genial; they do not transport us into that "peace which passeth understanding," that sweet and pure Art atmosphere in which our spirits are in tune with the divine love and wisdom of the Universe; the homeliest old Symphony of Father Haydn can do this for us; Liszt may pile Ossa upon Pelion, he cannot scale the heavens.

The "new school" element in the programme was represented mainly by the "Poem" of Liszt, and in a degree by Rubinstein's Concerto. These were offset by the Haydn Symphony in the middle, and by two of the very best of characteristic classical Overtures, in contrast to each other, at the beginning and the close. For an expression of deep inward pain and passion, of the struggles of a proud gloomy soul with destiny, of a fiery life storming itself out, there was the "Coriolanus" Overture by Beethoven: how intense, concise and brief is the expression! how completely it embodies the whole tragedy! yet how it realizes the repose and symmetry of Art, how it throws the divine, reconciling, comforting Art halo over all, and makes the whole thing beautiful! Then came the "Tasso": his Lament and Triumph; the poet's morbid sorrows, persecution, madness, and his triumph (too long deferred) when he was crowned at Rome. How different this expression! Madness and grief enough, tumultuous jubilee enough: but what has become of Art the Comforter! how has the bewildering chaos of musical surprises and effects, not without now and then some fleeting mirage of beauty, helped to put our souls in tune?

Liszt tells us that he composed the work when he was asked to write an Overture for a performance of Goethe's "Tasso" on the centennial anniversary of Goethe's birth in 1849. In spite of Goethe, he owns that he was more under the influence of Byron's presentation of the gloomy side of the picture in composing the first part of it. Goethe comes in where the music brightens, we suppose. "Tasso lived and suffered in Ferrara, he was avenged in Rome, he still lives in the people's songs of Venice. These three moments are inseparable from his impishable fame. To reproduce them musically, we first summoned up his great shadow as it to-day wanders over the Lagoons of Venice; then there appeared to us the proud and melancholy face of him a looker on at the feasts of Ferrara, where he created his masterworks; and finally we followed him to Rome, the Eternal City, which placed the crown upon his head and glorified in him the martyr and the poet."

The composition opens with a lugubrious and morbid motive (fortissimo, very slow) in the basses, which reappears repeatedly throughout the work, even in the blaze of triumph at the end. This theme Liszt says he used to hear sung, to the first lines of Tasso's "Jerusalem," by the gondoliers in the lagoons of Venice;—weird, spectral boatmen, one would think, their gaunt forms, like their hoarse voices, magnified through the mist! This theme is ugly, and if it might have been developed into something truly musical by artistic treatment, the composer has not done it. Then follow very sick chromatic passages; then wild outbursts (Allegro strepitoso), like a carnival of fiends, spasms of agony and madness; a moment of repose and sweeter music (adagio mesto); groans, and shooting pains, and melancholy moans, and furious outbursts again; and then the relief of a graceful minnet-like melody, of a taking and somewhat novel character,—the one thing that haunts you afterward, besides the gloomy gondolier theme. With all the distraction and noise there is a certain dramatic (rather than a musical) progress to the end, culminating in loud, hoarse martial strains of triumph, that fatigue the brain and almost stun you by the weight and din of braying brass and drums and triangles. There are beautiful passages no doubt; charming traits of instrumentation; (violincellos, taking the burden of almost any theme that is musical, always sound well); there are fine promises, not kept even to the ear. But on the whole we must repeat what we remarked a year or two ago: We cannot but regard that as false art, which seeks new field for originality in giving unredeemed and cheerless, fruitless utterance to those gloomy moods, which, however they may enter into the experience of all, even the noblest souls, and however essential perhaps to the spiritual economy of life in the long run, have really no right to public expression, but belong, by every modest instinct of propriety, to strictest privacy, at least until the discord be resolved,—as it is, for instance, in a true Art work like the Coriolanus overture.

We are far from saying that the "Tasso" is without interest or charm in spite of its overstrained and ugly passages. It finds admirers for a time, but the abiding impression is one of distraction and of weariness. The Haydn Symphony, after it, was an "unutterable relief." It was like walking into the Spring air and grassy fields out of a hot and crowded ball-room or a tumultuous mob. And so it was generally felt, notwithstanding the fact that it had scarcely been rehearsed, though new to the orchestra, for Liszt and Rubinstein had consumed all the time. The execution therefore was not as good as it might have been; the theme of the Allegro was begun too pianissimo and did not stamp its form at once upon the mind; there were discords among reed instruments, &c., &c. Yet the beauty of the Symphony was unmistakable, and did away with the gloom and weariness of the Liszt piece before the Rubinstein came on.

Now in this Concerto we found more enjoyment than the sterner critic we have quoted. It is not to be counted in the Lisztian category. It is at least musical, continuous, and not refractory even to the classical Concerto form. Delicate and winning traits predominate. It would not do to be heard immediately after "Tasso," to be sure; but after a healthy walk with Haydn intervening, it need be neither cloying nor oppressive. There are striking beauties in all three movements; the first has themes and phrases somewhat in the vein of softer passages in Liszt's "Preludes," but not enough to pass for imitations. The Andante, with its pensive, tender utterances in fragmentary Recitative, is charming for a while; the fault is, that it becomes prolix and vague. Think, in contrast, of the brief but wonderful recitative in Beethoven's G-major Concerto! The last movement is very dramatic and exciting, full of interest, and, like the whole, full of extraordinary difficulties both for piano and orchestra. The instrumentation is elaborate without overloading, often fine. Mr. LANG played it, we thought, admirably, doing the work all justice, though the task was not one of the most thankful. Hardly a work of genius, at the best half inspired, the Concerto was surely worth the pains.

How splendidly the Overture to Oberon came in to prove the quickening power of genius after all this!

The eighth concert will be on Friday, Feb. 23, and will consist of a Symphony in C, by Raff (first time); Beethoven's C-minor Concerto, played by J. C. D. PARKER; a Concert Overture by Gade (first time); Andante and Adagio from Beethoven's "Prometheus"; and the charming Scherzo from Schumann's "Overture, Scherzo and Finale."

English Opera.—"The Water-carrier."

First of all let us correct an error in our former notice: It was not Mme. VANZINI, but Miss CLARA DORR (Miss Barnett), who took the part of the Countess in "The Marriage of Figaro," and more artistically than she has commonly had credit for.

An "event" of true importance in this most eventful season has been the first introduction to our public of Cherubini's charming little opera, — a universal favorite in Germany — "The Water-Carrier," or as the French call it, Les deux Journées. The music is for the most part of a very quiet, unpretending, thoroughly sincere, artistic character; and there is not a great deal of it—at least only just enough—in proportion to the large amount of spoken dialogue. But the plot (described in our last) is a very fine one; and simply as a play, in dialogue and incident and stage effect, the work is fascinating. Perhaps on this account it had a greater popular success than music so unsensational, so simple and yet so learned, and containing scarcely any personal appeals in the shape of great arias and cavatinas for the singer, could have commanded at a single hearing. For this is music whose beauty is so delicate and true, so unobtrusive, that piece after piece may pass unappreciated, and seem tame and common, though it is sure to grow upon one who has any music in his soul. No one can fail to feel, however, that he has listened to a unique and perfect whole; every note in it tells its story and no more; every phrase is characteristic; every bit of orchestral accompaniment or interlude just pertinent to character and situation, suggesting just enough and no more. Therein the master shows himself, in this masterly chaste abstinence from all superfluous and overstrained expression. To know and to love such a work is of more good to one, than to have all of Verdi's operas by heart. And yet this music, where it seems simple, is not commonplace; where it is learned, it is not pedantic, but compresses meaning, feeling and expression into short forms of subtle texture safe from all danger of becoming hack-nied.

The two greatest compositions in it are the well-known superb Overture, which borrows no themes from the Opera itself, yet forms a fitting introduction; and the Finale of the first Act. The curtain rises on a sweet and picturesque domestic scene in the Water-Carrier's house. There is talk enough to explain the story before the first strain of music comes; and this is the song of the Savoyard, his son, a tender, song of gratitude, of melody most simple and yet most refined; true gold in contrast to the sentimental ballad tunes of our day,—some little turn or modulation only, now and then, showing the master hand. This was sweetly sung by Mr. TOM CARL, and its essential melody clings to the character throughout the play. Then comes the Water-Carrier himself,—Mr. AINSLEY COOK, whose admirable make-up, song, action, ready humor, made the part throughout seem real. His song, too, is of an even simpler kind, but full of the heartiness and frankness of the character; its tune returns too in the orchestra to herald his approach in later scenes. Next comes the Countess (Mme. PARKER-ROSA) and the Count Armand (CASTLE) seeking shelter, and a Trio, of rare skill and beauty, finely expressing the relations of the noble pair of refugees, is worthy of Mozart, rising to intensity of feeling. The great Finale begins with a Sextet, where the son (Antonio) recognises his benefactor in the Count, and in a series of expressive movements and commingling themes, aided by opportune suggestions every instant from the orchestra, proceeds to portray all the intricacy of the relations of the persons, all the hurry and agitation of the plan of escape, and all the shifting hues of feeling; passing soon into a sublime chorus of gratitude to heaven, which returns again to close the act. The effect was electrical, so that the chorus had to be repeated, and, as it was used again to close the opera instead of the slighter chorus used by Cherubini, it made four times that this chorus was given in an evening and yet not to satisfy. Parepa's voice soared splendidly in the high passages of this finale, and the whole piece was most effective.

Act II opens with one of those soft, contrapuntally woven bits of orchestration, which occur ever and anon, and which always mean something, always express the situation better than anything else could do it; while they are beautiful in themselves if listened to attentively, like the finest Organ music. Here the scene is the guardhouse at the gates of Paris; the music means the silence of the early dawn; then the reveille is beaten, and then the splendid chorus of the soldiers rings out crisp and clear; and when allusion to their employer, Cardinal Mazarin, is made (for they are Catholic Italian soldiers) how mysteriously and beautifully the orchestra in undertones insinuates another of those contrapuntal church-like strains! Of the stirring melodrama, the bits of Trio, solo, chorus, &c., that fill out the Act, and the fine march of the retreating soldiers, we can only hint.

The third Act mainly wears another color, opening with an introduction of most fresh and lovely rural music, and a joyful naïve wedding chorus of the village youths and maidens, which it is happiness to call back to mind. The tragical ensemble where the refugees are discovered, rising to a climax where the Water-Carrier rushes in with a full pardon, is of the most exciting interest.

All the singers entered fully into the spirit of their parts, Mme. Parepa and Mr. Cook fairly dividing the chief honors. Madame looked positively handsome, acted with great vivacity and naturalness, and sang superbly. The only disturbance of the unique and fine impression of the whole, was her interpolation of an Aria by Gounod, patching Cherubini's music with an ill-assorted and too brilliant pattern, and breaking the spell for a time, although it gave the prima donna an opportunity to show her power, which Cherubini did not think it worth while to provide. Miss DORR filled the pretty part of Marcellina capably well; and even the old man's part, Daniel, acquired importance in the hands of Mr. SEGUIN. CARL ROSA had drilled his orchestra very thoroughly, and everything went well, much to the credit of the taste and enterprise and courage of the management and all concerned. The crowded house and the enthusiasm which hailed the first performance, were repeated in like ample measure at the second.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.—Messrs. LEONHARD and EICHENROD gave the last of their Six Matinees on the 25th ult. The selections were: Beethoven's early Trio, Op. 1, No. 3, in C minor; a Tenor Recitative and Aria ("Frohe Hirten eilt"), from Bach's Christmas Oratorio; a couple of Chopin pieces (Nocturne, op. 87, No. 2, and Scherzo, op. 20); and for a glorious finale the great Schumann Quintet, op. 44, for piano and strings. A true artistic glow pervaded the entire performance, felt throughout the well filled room. The Quintet went to a charm, the solemn march-like second movement with its wonderful variations making a profound impression. Mr. LEONHARD was most happy in the Chopin interpretations,—two of the choicest inspirations of that piano poet. Mr. GLOUGNER-CASTELLI sang artistically, but in rather a dry voice, the florid (coloratura) Aria of Bach, the effect of which was much heightened by the masterly piano accompaniment arranged from the incomplete score by ROBERT FRANZ expressly at the request of the concert givers. In gratitude for this service, they announced their intention to give this week an extra Matinée in compliment to Franz; but to gain time to make the demonstration more substantial, it has been postponed for some weeks. Due notice will be given.

NEW YORK, FEB. 5.—The third concert of the Philharmonic Society was given, at the Academy of Music, last Saturday evening, with the following programme:

Symphony, No. 4, D minor.....Schumann.
Aria, "With verdure clad".....Haydn.
Mlle. Henriette Corradi.
Concerto, for violin.....Max Bruch.
Sig. P. Sarasate.
Overture: "Macbeth".....Hofmeister.
Aria from "Il Poluto".....Donizetti.
Overture: "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven.

The most interesting number was of course the Schumann Symphony, the same which was played at the Thomas concerts last month. This afforded a good opportunity for comparing the two orchestras; and it seemed to me that, while the Philharmonic is the stronger and in some respects the better balanced of the two, yet in that delicate shading and fine ensemble, which can only be attained by long and constant practice, the Thomas Orchestra excels. Still the Symphony was very well played, and those who braved the storm to go and hear it were repaid for their pains. Signor Sarasate merited and received much applause for his rendering of the Violin Concerto. Mlle. Corradi was hardly passable in the Aria from the Creation; and the insertion, in the programme of a Philharmonic Concert, of a piece like the second one assigned to her (an aria from I Martiri) must be regarded as an innovation, in gross violation of good taste and, unhappily, not without precedent in the annals of the society.

The musical event of last week was a concert given by Miss ANNA MULLIG at Steinway Hall on Wednesday evening, (her first appearance in New York since her return from Europe). The programme presented the following choice selections:

Grand Fantasia in C, op. 15.....Schubert.
Mlle. Mehlig.
Solo for Violin. a. Air from Suite in D major.....Bach.
b. Gavotte.....Vieuxtemps.
Mr. Wenzel Kopta.
Canzonetta, "Quando miro quel bel ciglio".....Mozart.
Mlle. Antonette Sterling.
Solo for Cello: "Souvenir de Spa".....Serafin.
Mr. F. Bergner.
Piano Solos. a. Ballade, A flat.....Chopin.
b. Invitation à la Valse.....arr. by Taubig.
"Dichterliebe": Two Songs, Nos. 13 and 14.....Schumann.
Solo Violin: Aïre Hongroise.....Ernst.
Fantasia for Piano: "Don Juan".....Liszt.

This noble list of pieces could hardly receive better treatment than it did at the hands of Miss Mehlig and the trio of excellent artists who assisted her.

Schubert's great Fantasia was superbly played, and the "Wanderer" was never more pathetic than when sung under the artist's fingers in the Adagio. The finale, too, afforded the pianiste an excellent opportunity for the display of her talents. In Taubig's fine arrangement of Weber's "Invitation" she played beautifully and received a hearty encore, to which she responded with one of Chopin's Nocturnes. In this and in the Ballade her playing was, to me, a trifle less satisfactory: it may be because there is in Chopin's music a certain sentiment which, in the concert room, is apt to elude both performer and hearer; it is emphatically salon music, and the hearers, as well as the player, need to be chosen.

Miss Sterling's rendering of the two Schumann Lieder was as near perfection as any thing it has been my fortune to hear, while Messrs. Bergner and Kopta bore their share in the honors of the evening.

Among the other concerts, during the past fortnight, mention must be made of a matinee given by S. B. MILLS at Steinway Hall, Jan. 27. He was assisted by Sig. Sarasate, Mr. Bergner and others. Among the selections played were the "Kreutzer" Sonata and Mendelssohn's C-minor Trio. This is the first of a series of similar matinees. The second is announced to take place on Saturday, Feb. 10.

On Monday evening, Jan. 22, a series of Chamber music concerts was begun by Dr. DAMROSCH and Herr PRUCKNER, at Steinway's smaller Hall. The programme offered a fine selection of classical pieces, beginning with Beethoven's Sonata in G, op. 80 (piano and violin) and closing with Schubert's Trio in B flat, in which Mr. Berger took part. Miss Helene Damrosch sang several songs by Mendelssohn and Schumann.

Last Monday evening Miss CHRISTINE LARSEN gave a concert at Steinway's. She sang the "Ah! non creder" and the following Rondo from the Sonnambula, and a Ballad, "She wandered down the mountain side." She was assisted by Dr. Damrosch and Mr. Mills. At the Stadt Theatre, Don Juan has given place to Isabelle, which will be followed on Wednesday by "The Merry Wives of Windsor." The PARSFA-ROSA English Opera begins this evening with "A Masked Ball," but BARTLEY will not appear until next week, when Zampa is announced.

A. A. G.

MILWAUKEE, JAN. 26.—The 26th Concert of our Musical Society last week, under the directorship of Mr. Balatka, brought several novelties, in the main very agreeable, though perhaps a trifle too "Wagnerian" to suit the taste of well-balanced minds. The programme was as follows:

"Ocean," 2d Symphony, C major. A. Rubinstein. a. Allegro maestoso. b. Adagio con moto. c. Allegro. d. Adagio et allegro con fuoco.
"To thee, noble Edifice, my Greeting" aria for Soprano, from "Der Tannhauser" R. Wagner.
"On the Open Sea." By general request. Chorus for male voices with orchestra accompaniment F. Moserling.
"Fantasia Caprice," sole for violin. H. Vieuxtemps.
Mr. Henry De Clerque.
"The Heavens are Telling the Glory of God." Full chorus with orchestral accompaniment. L. van Beethoven.
"Thou art gone far away." For Tenor. Hieron. Truhn.
Scene and Ensemble from "Der Tannhauser." Septetto, with accomp. of full cho. and orch. R. Wagner.
Fantasia on "National Air." Paraphrase de concert for orchestra. H. Balatka.

The performance of such difficult compositions, left much to be desired, of course, from a critical point of view. The orchestra, however, acquitted itself well, as usual, being composed entirely of professionals, and Rubinstein's Symphony was generally appreciated as the most substantial portion of the intellectual feast of the evening. To criticize the work itself, after one hearing, is out of the question. The Fantasia Caprice, by Vieuxtemps, was performed by Mr. De Clerque, formerly of Chicago, in a truly artistic manner, and pleased the audience so much that an encore resulted, to which Mr. De C. responded with the "Reverie" by the same composer. I could but think, however, that something more novel or classical might have been offered to the public. The Caprice has been played, fiddled and scraped, by professionals and amateurs during the past twenty years. The fragments from "Tannhauser" might have been omitted, I think, with profit to audience and singers. They appear rather tame in the concert-room. The Soprano solo was sung by Mrs. Gelsberg, an old favorite of concert-goers here, and she was loudly encored. Her voice, however, shows signs of decay, and will hardly enable her to attack such compositions as flow from the prolific pen of Herr Wagner. The Septet from the same opera suffered materially at the hands of the tenor, a young man of more than ordinary self-assurance, but possessing very little voice or method. His attempt to sing the high C brought down the house with laughter. He shall remain nameless here. Beethoven's noble hymn "The Heavens are telling," sung by the Society's chorus, is a grand composition, and was given with precision and effect. The tenor solo, "Thou art gone far away," might have been omitted with propriety. The young amateur who sang the piece needs a little more voice and schooling to make his efforts agreeable in the concert-room. Balatka's Fantasia on a National Air (The Star Spangled Banner), is a pleasing composition, of fine instrumentation, and did not fail to rouse the usual patriotic feelings among the audience.

VIENNA. The Philharmonic Society opened, as usual, the concert season for the winter. The first programme included, among other compositions, Cherubini's Anacreon Overture; Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, Op. 64 (played by Herr Robert Heckmann, from Leipzig); Herr B. Wagner's "Huldigungsmarsch," and Beethoven's A major Symphony. —Herr Ullmann's Concert Troupe have been here, but, if report speaks true, they did not on this occasion turn out a pecuniary success. —Herr Joseph Wieniawski, the pianist, and brother of the violinist, has announced a concert. —Herr Hellmesberger has begun his usual Quartet Concerts. —At the Imperial Operahouse, Herr Franz Doppler's Judith has been revived, with Madame Dustmann in the principal part. The next revival was Marchner's Hans Heiling, by some persons considered his best opera. This was the first of Marchner's works ever performed in the new house. —At a recent meeting of the Männergesangsverein, it was resolved that the Schubert Festival shall be held in May. The precise date is not definitely fixed. The proceedings will include a grand concert and Liedertafel, in which other Associations will be invited to take an active part. A medal will be cast to commemorate the event. The excavations are already made in the Park for the foundations of the pedestal on which the Composer's statue will stand.

MILAN. Signor Francesco Lucca, a music publisher, has given Signor Strazza a commission for a full length marble statue of Donizetti. When the statue is completed, it will be placed in the vestibule of the Scala, Signor Lucca having offered it to the Town Council for that purpose, and the Town Council having accepted the offer thus liberally made. —The management of the Scala has issued its prospectus for the ensuing season. The prospectus promises no less than five operas, among which will be Attila, Verdi; Il Giuramento, Mercadante; Il Franco Arciere (Der Freischütz), Weber; and La Forza del Destino. The season will be inaugurated with the last-named opera.

BAYREUTH. The committee appointed to select a site for Herr R. Wagner's Nibelungen Theatre here have chosen the Stückberg. The Stückberg belongs to Herr Rose, a large sugar-refiner, who may not feel inclined to sell it, but no very great apprehensions are entertained on that score. The site, close to the Brandenburg suburb, is a tolerably elevated piece of table-land, commanding to the east and south charming portions of the Fichtelberg and French Switzerland. Besides being, in the opinion of the committee, particularly well adapted by its magnificent position for the performance of an eminently poetic work, it possesses another advantage: excavations for deep "sinks" can be made without coming upon water, which is not the case elsewhere in the vicinity. The ascent, too, is very gentle, and consequently by no means fatiguing. The choice of the committee meets with general approbation. There is a second question which may be regarded as no less satisfactorily solved: the lodging, and providing for, from 2,000 to 3,000 visitors.

RECENT GERMAN WORKS ON MUSIC.—For new books on music one has always to go to Germany, and the publications of the last three months present much that is interesting. First and foremost is the collection of "Popular Lectures on the Formation of a Critical Musical Taste," by Hermann Käster (Leipzig: Breitkopf und Härtel), which should be read by every one who wishes to enjoy music understandingly. The lectures are clear and well expressed, and are full of excellent examples. The "Catechism of Composition," by J. E. Lobe (Leipzig: Weber), and the "Theoretical and Practical Study of Harmony and Music" of Leopold Heinze (Ober-Glogau: Handel), will carry the reader further into the practical knowledge of music. Among books of musical history and biography we must note "German Composers," by Dr. Emil Naumann (Berlin: Oppenheim), a series of lectures delivered at the Victoria Lyceum in 1870-71, devoted to the chief German composers, since Bach. The treatment of Meyerbeer and Wagner in one chapter is exceedingly singular. "The Great Piano-forte Virtuosi of Our Time" (Berlin: Behr), is a very entertaining collection of reminiscences of Liszt, Chopin, Tausig, and Henselt, by W. von Lenz, well known to the musical world by his studies on Beethoven. Lenz is now very old, and it can be seen from the title that the "our time" is not the present day with its Bülow and Rubinstein. Persons who remember Mendelssohn's description in his letters of his playing before Goethe will perhaps be interested in "Goethe and his Relations to Music," by W. Von Bock (Berlin: Schneider). Some new letters and recollections of Mendelssohn himself have just been published by his friend Eduard Devrient. We are glad to see the first volume of the complete writings and poems of Richard Wagner (Leipzig: Fritzsche), which contains, besides "Rienzi" and "Der Fliegende Holländer," the various sketches he published when he was earning his bread in Paris in 1840 and 1841. The best of these is "A Pilgrimage to Beethoven." Wagner then had much humor, and his style was pleasanter than now. His last brochure, "Beethoven," is very hard reading. The Beethoven Centenary of 1870 called out a number of memories, of which the best is "Beethoven Festival and the Art of the Present," by Ludwig Nohl (Wien: Braumüller), the biographer of Mozart, and an adherent of the new school. Ferdinand Hiller, the successor of Mendelssohn, and a violent partisan of the old school, has also published a charming essay on Beethoven, which is printed separately and also in his little book, "From the Tone-Life of our Time," (Leipzig: Leuckart). This book contains in addition articles on Rossini, Hauptmann and Bach, and an amusing sketch called "Too Much Music," directed against the tendency to riot in musical noise at dinners and balls and in gardens of all sorts.—Nation.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

- Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.
- Over where the Shamrock grows. Song and Chorus. 3. C to f. Dumont. 30
The sunset, my darling, is now on the waters. Pretty Irish ballad.
Chicago Rediviva. 3. Eb to c. G. U. D. 30
Good words from "Punch" set to music. For one voice or four voices.
Chicago's been burnt down in timber to-day, —Chicago'll be built up in marble to-morrow.
Bird of the Night. 3. C to c. Hackleton. 30
Bird of the night, I with thee would be taking my flight.
Very neat "bird-warbling" accompaniment, and sweet song.
The Sailor's Story. 3. D to d. Smart. 50
A very fine narrative song for a bold, manly voice. Easy and effective for a concert.
Two Castles. 3. A to f. Tours. 40
"I built a fairy castle, It hovered in the air."
Musical story of the destruction of an air-castle, and very musical.
O that we two were Maying. 4. Eb to f. Gounod. 40
"O that we two were maying,—
O that we two sat dreaming,—
O that we two were sleeping,—
And our souls at home with God," are lines which hint at the quality of the quaint, rich poetry by Kingsley. The music shows Gounod's fine workmanship; German ingenuity and French elegance and taste.
To Deum. Aria from "Hamlet." 5. G. S. C. 1.25
If one hesitates, for a moment, to approve of a solemn To Deum arranged from a new, popular opera, it must be remembered that this is a serious opera, and that a sacred piece would not be out of place in it. Requires skillful performers.
The Mississippi Twins. 3. G to f. Dumont. 40
"We are a pair of frisky moles Who never borrow pain."
Mrs. Sippi's handsome pair of twins appear on the illustrated title. Their sensation song and dance is very spirited.
I would if I were you. 3. F to f. Pratt. 40
"Speak out, and ask her like a man, I would if I were you."
A pretty, comic love song. Illustrated title.
- Instrumental.
- Breakdown on the Swanee River. 4. B. F. W. Root. 35
Introduces "Old Folks at Home," and a kind of Banjo melody, in a very characteristic, piquant and brilliant way.
Willetta Waltz. 3. Ab. Parker. 30
Very brilliant and dance-able.
Sovienir de Pesth. Mazurka Etude. 4. D minor. Zakonyi. 35
A very beautiful and delicate Mazurka. The name of the author suggests Poland, and the music is worthy of one bred at the home of Chopin. But he may be Hungarian after all.
Cachuca Caprice. 5. Eb. Op. 79. Raff. 1.00
A fine piece and a peculiar one. Opens with two pages of music on the bass staff, something like a violoncello solo, followed by a succession of brilliant responses of right to left hand, and vice versa. Then comes a powerful page of octaves, and another of "chord melodies." Next we have a left hand melody accompanied. After this come variations full of arpeggios, staccato and grace-note passages, and at length three or four pages of a rapid, half-trilled "finale." Effective exhibition piece.
Love's Greeting. (Liebesgruss). 3. G. Op. 291. Jungmann. 30
Op. 291 "sounds old," but there is no lack of youthful grace and beauty in this sweet piece, which is quite worthy of one who is always a Jung-mann (Young-man.)

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. a small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 806.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 24, 1872.

VOL. XXXI. No. 24.

Nilsson's Madman.

A PRISON SOLILOQUY.

Mad! say you—mad! Who is not mad for her?
Am I more mad than yonder raving crowd
That nightly split their leathern palms at her?
Nay, not more mad, but only more outspoken.
Poor brain! if flawed, 'tis as a crystal vase
O'errung by musical vibrations. None
Can be her listener and maintain his pose.
The Slavic Prince, who towers above his kind—
"Facile princeps"—is her "bounden slave."
And thou—wise judge!—that didst this body doom
To strong walls so unjustly at her quest—
Poor fool!—had she so willed it, thou had'st shed
My very life-blood, powerless to refuse.
"Blow! blow, thou winter wind!" now howling round
My prison-bars, for in thy moun I hear
My own Lucia wailing her defeat.
"Tis now the witching hour," when crowds are tranced.
O Violetta! lives the sage too sane
To screen thy frailties with his pardoning arms?
O Mignon! walking 'mid the burning shores
Barefoot and pure—or only stocking clad—
O happy hose to press her dainty feet!
Defly articulate for her slender toes.
What envy gnawed us when her lover rushed,
And safe through "sulphurous and devouring flames"
Bore her sweet form: "Villain! the chance was thine!"
O, Margerita! When audacious you fell
Upon his neck—his neck, alas! not mine—
That inappreciative tenor's neck,
I could have throttled—ground him to the dust;
For O! she loves me. Aye! smile on!—I know
She loves me. Yet, with woman's sweet perverseness,
Cloaking her preference 'neath a veil of scorn,
At moments breaking forth. Once, when I stood Within the "upper circle," near the dome—
"The first you reach as you descend from heaven;"—
She threw me a kiss—a wild, transporting kiss—
That—were I not already there—ha! ha!—
Had wafted me apace "among the gods."
And when, grown bold, I sought her, to return
The boon, they stole my freedom. What care I?
They cannot bar her image from my soul.
What's liberty to one no longer free?
I glory in my bonds, nor wish to break,
Till comes the blessed hour—and come it will—
As unto neeple lovers the last act—
When trials, anguish, cruel parents past,
Through "hideous ruin and combustion" saved,
They rush to footlights—to each others' arms
Grappled with "hooks of steel." O yes! I feel
Our lives in sweet communion yet shall blend:
Humbly perchance, yet amply fed, and clad—
With shoes—dear Mignon! for thy precious feet—
When we shall sit at even's hour of calm
Beside our cottage-door, and sing sweet songs
Indeed. I'll rave no more! Then call me daft,
Half-witted, if you will—ha! ha! poor fools!
We're rabid all alike; yet may we boast
At least it took a sun to strike us mad.
—N. Y. Eve. Post, Dec. 15, 1872.

into oblivion in England, while in Germany it was never known except to the few persons who possessed the old, and as it was called, complete, though faulty, edition of his works. The translation made by Ger-vinus for Chrysander's edition was the first ever published. The work was never performed in Germany. As, however, we are now rehearsing, and intend performing it on the 19th inst., at the Gürzenich, a few words concerning it may, perhaps, prove acceptable to many of our readers.

Chrysander informs us that the words are by Th. Morell, who names a work by Boyle (London, 1697), and a French play, as the sources whence he obtained his materials. One can hardly understand his requiring so much for so paltry a poem. The story of the latter is somewhat to the following effect.

Under some Roman Emperor (the particular Emperor is not named, but he must, at any rate, have come after Augustus and before Constantine) Valens holds the post of governor at Antioch. He hates the Christians with a fine Roman hate. On his Emperor's birthday, he determines to institute a public festival and sacrifice to the gods, every one who will not take a share in the proceedings is to be subjected to the full rigor of the law. The care of seeing this carried out is confided to Septimius, a Roman "officer." Septimius, somewhat softened by a friend, Didimus, who has been secretly converted, seeks out the Christians when piously assembled, and endeavors to move them to obedience, but Theodora, "a Christian maiden of noble race," answers him in a manner displaying such pride of conviction, that he has her cast into chains. She is ordered to bow down before the gods. Didimus, who loves her, succeeds in obtaining permission to see her in prison, and prevails on her to leave the place in his armor instead of him. When, however, she learns that, on his having boldly avowed he saved her, he has been condemned to death, she gives herself up to Valens, that she may die with her Beloved—happy in her purity and in her faith. The verses are skillfully written, and their form is favorable for the musician. But there is not much poetry, properly so-called, in them. We find tame thoughts; washed-out pictures, and very frequently insipid reflections. Gervinus's translation preserves the common character of the original, though in other respects it is much freer than the views entertained by the author of Handel and Shakspeare ought to have permitted it to be. But, in addition to these views having rendered the work accessible to us, they possess the merit of completely disguising in many places the indelicacies (to use a mild expression) of the English author—indelicacies which in England are considered as accounting for the neglect into which the work has fallen. We do not see, by-the-by, why the said indelicacies could not have been altered in the original as well as in the translation.

Besides the personages above mentioned, namely, Valens, the governor (bass), the two "officers," Septimius and Didimus, (tenor and alto,) and the noble Christian maiden, Theodora, (soprano), we have another Christian girl, Irene, (alto), who scarcely takes any share in the action, and choruses of Pagans and Christians. Valens has several airs, in which he praises Jupiter, and the Emperor, expressing himself with all a Roman's pride, and savage delight in prosecuting others. The airs are all striking in form, and treated with characteristic curtness—arrogantly violent and partially vigorous in spirit. When we reflect how much brass and how many dissonances would be employed now-a-days, to depict a false and hardened persecutor of Christians, we might almost feel inclined to say Handel has treated him very indulgently. Septimius, the adjutant of Valens, is one of those figures which would drive a less resolute composer than Handel to despair. Now an humble servant, now an obliging confidant, he generally gets rid of people with a few well-meaning and not inelegant sentences. The composer punishes him by making him the representative of bravura singing. Long preludes introduce his airs, while endless runs adorn them—they are, as a rule, old-fashioned, and could at most interest us only if executed by very eminent representatives of this class of singing. As such, however, are no longer to be found, the best course would probably be to omit most of the airs, though we cannot deny that the very intelligible way in which they are drawn musically, and their bright but not glaring colors, must impart a feeling of repose to the general effect.

Forming a sharp contrast to the Christian portion of the work, apart from the airs given to Valens, are the choruses of the inhabitants of Antioch, especially of those devoted to the service of Venus; they are, in a high degree, fresh, easy, and jocund. But the great importance of the work must not be sought in this direction. It is to be found in the choruses of the Christians, in the songs of Theodora, Irene, and, partially, of Didimus, which are certainly some of the most beautiful and most feeling Handel ever created. There is a tender, mournful, and yet elevated, holy inspiration spread over all these tone-poems. It seems as if Handel's genius, which generally comes before us like some proud general, who leads his hosts to victory, with a full consciousness of his strength, had retreated within itself for the purpose of seeking out the most inward recesses of his soul. And what mournful songs, and what endless woe—but, at the same time, what hopes full of faith, and what sublime views did it find concealed there! And it tarried and experienced a peculiar kind of happiness in sinking, in weaving itself a home in these depths, which contain the very best that has been bestowed on us, and which we so seldom are able to seek out, or wish to seek out, when life has once grasped us with its energetic power. And after our great tone-poet has thus listened and overheard the profoundest emotions of his soul, he fashioned them with his mighty hand into shape—and they became the airs of Theodora and Irene, and the choruses of the secret Christian congregations at Antioch. But, in reality, they are only tears of love, of mourning, and of hope, which creative genius has crystallized into tone!

It is the predominance of the elegiac character, indeed, in Theodora, which probably rendered that oratorio less acceptable to the listless public of a great capital like London, than the composer's brilliant works taken from the Old Testament. But it would be a bad case, if in our own profoundly-feeling Germany, this tone-poem did not gain a vast host of friends. We must not expect to find in it the thunder-bursts of Israel in Egypt, or the triumphal songs of Maccabæus, or the choruses of exultant jubilation such as are contained in The Messiah—the most beautiful element in Theodora is its inward soul-like nature, to be felt rather than applauded. The stronger the resolution the hearer brings with him to abandon himself to his emotions, the more richly will he be rewarded.

DR. FERDINAND HILLER.

—Cologne.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Wagner in Italy.

Wagner's Lohengrin has at last been produced upon an Italian stage, and whatever may be its ultimate and lasting success in a country apparently so unfitted and unlikely to appreciate its characteristic merits, however strong the under-current of opposition or over-current of fictitious and not entirely genuine enthusiasm may eventually prove to have been, the performance of this remarkable work cannot be counted as anything short of a momentous event in the musical annals of the Peninsula,—possibly even in those of musical history itself. The mere fact that Italy should have been foremost among nations foreign to the composer in giving Wagner's opera a fair and impartial hearing, and even to acknowledge, to a certain degree, his merits as a musical writer, is at any rate by no means insignificant.

That the copyright of all Wagner's works had been purchased years ago by the editor, Luca di Milano, was well known; for Rienzi, The Flying Dutchman, Tannhäuser and Lohengrin had successively made their appearance with Italian words in neat octavo Piano-forte scores; but performing them on the stage was a different matter altogether, as the publisher soon discovered to his cost.

At the first attempt in this direction a formidable opposition raised its head, and the antagonism which Theodora, an Oratorio by G. F. Handel.

Theodora is the only dramatic work of the great composer founded upon a Christian story. It was composed in July, 1749, and produced for the first time on the 16th March, 1750. Handel evinced a particular partiality for it, although, or, perhaps, because it was not favorably received by the public. Many observations, half angry, half humorous, made by him with reference to it, have been handed down to us. To a speculator who wished to take all the boxes for an approaching performance, Handel said: "You are a fool. The Jews will not come, for it is a Christian story, and the women will not come, because it is a virtuous one." He is reported to have thought more highly of the final chorus of the 2nd Part than of the Hallelujah in The Messiah. But a man's judgment, even that of a man possessing the intellectual energy of Handel, must not be accepted as an exclusive standard for his own works.

Since Handel's death, this oratorio has half fallen made itself felt on all sides, soon threatened to consign the Last of the Tribunes and his brethren, the bright heroes of Teutonic legend and mythology, to the cobwebs and dust of obscure book-shelves. As for the Scala at Milan, it absolutely refused to have anything to say to them; San Carlo at Naples shut his doors in the face of the stately demi-gods and glittering knights, and the Pergola at Florence ignored the matter altogether. In short, for a considerable period, no Italian director was to be found who would consent to undertake the responsibility of the task, until at length the city of Bologna, generally foremost in artistic enterprise, boldly picked up the gauntlet and entered the lists as champion. And thus it came to pass that one fine October day the public was informed, to its great amazement, that Lohengrin was actually going to be performed on the 9th of November.

Could it be possible? What director could have undertaken it? Who would be able to sing music notoriously impossible for the human voice? What orchestra could grapple with the difficulties of a score full of abstruse musical combinations, wherein each single instrument was taxed to the fullest extent of its capabilities? Where were the Italian choruses to come from who should submit to the drill necessary for a performance of the wildest vagaries ever hatched in the brain of a semi-crazed musician? And, supposing even difficulties such as these to have been successfully overcome, who was to listen to the very incarnation of Teutonic barbarism set to music? What Italian audience was likely to relish strains which had required fifteen years untiring effort to obtain a hearing in the very country which gave birth to them? What was it to make of music "devoid of all melody and harmony," as this was represented to be, and not only "the product of ingenious mathematical calculation" as some would have it, but manifesting a corrupt taste for discord, and revelling in unheard of rhythms? "Alas," said a respectable critic, shaking his head, "to think that Italy should have fallen so low as to run after such stuff, and renounce what she formerly taught as indispensable conditions of the musical art!" "And then," muttered an aristocratic connoisseur to a dandy dilettante friend, over a glass of Vermuth at the café: "who ever heard of an opera without a ballet, forsooth!" "All this may be very well," philosophized one of the University professors, as he smoked his cigar in the passeggiata, "and no doubt this famous work is full of German science and learning, but who is to stand three hours of German mysticism? and do they seriously think that an educated, refined Italian audience is to be bamboozled by a compound of demi-gods, heathen sorteresses, miracles, enchanted birds and symbolical allegories? What school of æsthetics ever heard of a musical drama in which the tragic catastrophe was not death, or the dénouement a happy conjugal union?"

Such remarks as these might have been overheard in all quarters a few days previous to the eventful occurrence; for the probable fate of so bold an undertaking was discussed everywhere, in most cases the wings of the modern Icarus guilty of this conspiracy against public taste and musical morals being mercilessly clipped by anticipation, and his neck broken in the charitable apprehension of the goodly fellowship of benevolent critics, would-be connoisseurs and knowing dilettanti. Yet, alas! for the accuracy of human foresight, experience has been cruel enough to give it the lie; what it had mistaken for Icarus has turned out to be nothing less than Pegasus himself, Pegasus with all the spring and elasticity of wing to bear him to the loftiest regions! To make a long story short, where ignominious defeat had been prognosticated, signal victory was achieved, and for the present, at any rate, Lohengrin does not seem likely to lose any of its prestige with its novelty, the success of the work having rather increased than diminished since it has been repeated several times.

True, the principal parts are not sustained by stars of the first magnitude or brilliancy; but the excellence of the orchestra, choruses, and general mise-en-scène, amply compensates for any deficiencies on their side, the result being a most creditable performance of a totally different stamp from those usually presented by an Italian stage. Perhaps even no harm has been done by thus rendering the chief dramatis personæ less promine than they are wont to be in Italy, if it were only by way of a practical illustration, that operas need not always be constructed upon that stereotype ballet pattern, which seems to have taken so firm a hold upon the lyric drama in this country, that it requires no slight effort to make an attack upon its infallibility.

It would be no difficult task to explain the intimate relationship in which Ballet and Opera stand to one another in the minds of Italian composers and Italian audiences, by a natural affinity. I confess, for my own part, that I can never see the one without being instantaneously reminded of the other. In fact when I see in a ballet the pas seuls, with their obligato adagio introduction and inevitable concluding cavatina for the legs! or the pas de deux, with its symmetrical solos for the man and woman dancer, and its duet conclusion; or the pas de trois and de quatre with their ensemble finales,—they always seem to me to be the exact counterparts of the set forms of the modern Italian opera. [By this I mean, of course, the opera as it is appreciated in Italy, and do not refer to works by Italian authors, like Cherubini or Spontini, who wrote for foreign stages and foreign audiences.] As far, indeed, as dramatic action goes, it is in both cases more or less sacrificed to the individual display of virtuoso proficiency; whether the cavatina be executed by the ballerina, and its final fermata, shake and cadence carried out by legs and toes, or whether the polacca be danced by the voice and lung. Is it not the same muscular power displayed now in long sustained notes, now in impossible positions? Is the aim not identically the same in both cases: viz.: the exhibition of the artist's agility or skill? Again the corps de ballet and opera choruses present similar features of resemblance, their respective functions being usually limited to stage decoration or interspersing the solis with occasional refrains and amens of an exceedingly mild character; no attempt on their part being made to meddle with what evidently does not in the least concern them. Finally the Overture is in the one case, as in the other, an instrumental introduction, mainly serving to silence the chattering audience, and bearing little or no reference whatever to the piece it pervades, beyond an occasional flying reminiscence of some theme sung afterwards by the prima donna, or danced by the ballerina. All this we must bear in mind if we wish to fully appreciate the audacity of Wagner's innovation,—others call it revolution, he himself would say rather restoration,—and the difficulties it had to overcome in Italy.

Just imagine the world turned upside down and inside out; an opera with real dramatic declamation and action, without any set forms whatever, with no solo terminating with a pirouette on one leg, without a single opportunity for individual display, where the choruses take a lively part in the drama, and greatly contribute towards heightening the dramatic effect. Fancy an opera in which the words are neither sacrificed to the music nor the music to the words, in which the action is simple and natural, and which exacts the highest pitch of artistic excellence and intellectual culture in those who perform, if they are adequately and faithfully to convey the composer's intentions, while it affords no opportunity to ring down cheap applause. Realize all this, I repeat, as brought at once before an Italian audience, not only entirely unprepared for it, but accustomed to loll in their boxes, yawning and lazily fanning themselves, gossiping with their visitor, or sauntering in and out of the pit to some neighboring café, only directing their attention towards the stage when their favorite singers sing their choicest morceaux, and returning to their former occupation or relapsing into their previous indolence as soon as these are finished! Picture to yourself what must be the amazement of Italians who now saw for the first time that it was possible to keep up their attention or interest for four consecutive hours, without having recourse to any one of those elements or expedients which they had been taught all their lives to consider as indispensable. Nevertheless, this ordeal has been gone through with perfect success, and Lohengrin has come forth victorious!

Now, what can have been the reason why Lohengrin should have met with a more favorable reception in Italy than in any other country at first sight, Germany not excepted? Simply this: that an Italian audience after all is an impressionable one, and has preserved sufficient naïveté and genuine artistic instinct to enable it to recognize instantaneously a work of genius under whatever form it may be set before them, and that it is sufficiently candid to show and express its feelings without disguise. In Germany, where a vast amount of traditional prejudice and preconceived theoretical notions have to be overcome, ere people will consent to believe their own senses, and above all, before they can be brought to avow their own natural impressions (when they have any), Wagner's works encountered a most formidable systematic opposition, which prevented them in the beginning from being heard at all, and when this point had at last been gained, threw serious impediments in their way for long after. In France and England, far more trivial, though no less influential, causes prevented and still prevent Wagner from obtaining an impartial hearing; for while, in Germany, at any rate, convictions of some sort, whether based upon traditional ideas or abstract theory, were at the bottom of the opposition; in the latter two countries it was mainly the weight of critical infallibility, and still more fashion and its all powerful influences which lay in the way, aided by a too strong reliance upon hearsay evidence, the veracity of which had never been tested. It is notorious that unless previously approved by the Revue des deux Mondes or some other influential journal bien pensant, and supported by the Jockey Club, it is useless for a musical work of any importance to expect a favorable reception in Paris. And it is equally well known that London for years has been accustomed to follow the Parisian lead, and seldom if ever ventures to think for herself in artistic matters. Paris had but one chance of testing her own impressions and rectifying her ideas with regard to Wagner, and all the world knows what came of the only performance of the Tannhäuser which took place there. Both Revue des deux Mondes and Jockey Club began by placing it under solemn interdict, and virtually themselves played the part of that benevolent gentleman, who, when asked what he thought of the Opera, replied: "Well, really, to tell the truth, I was so busy hissing during the whole performance that I did not even hear it!" An opera thus pre-condemned in Paris became of course impossible for London, and thus the English audience has never yet had the smallest opportunity of exercising its own judgment in the matter. The only attempt which has been made, to my knowledge, at performing Wagner's operas in countries foreign to Germany, besides the recent successful one in Bologna, was made in Holland, where the success was quite as great in spite of most unfavorable circumstances. In fact for the last twelve years both Tannhäuser and Lohengrin have been extremely popular in that country. It is therefore, we repeat, an event of no small importance, that the Italians should be foremost in giving Lohengrin a thoroughly impartial hearing and a hearty welcome to boot.

The work itself is based upon an ancient legend, according to which Knights of the Round Table who have especially distinguished themselves by their valor and virtue are called upon to exercise the lofty privilege of guarding the Holy Grail, a precious vessel supposed to contain drops of the blood of Our Saviour, preserved by Joseph of Arimathea, and renewed periodically by a dove (the Holy Spirit). Occasionally one or the other of them is allowed to descend to earth and defend injured innocence and calumniated virtue. They are then even permitted to remain for a time and to contract terrestrial alliances, but on the one peremptory condition: that their origin be not inquired into nor the sacred mystery of their life be traced. The opera opens with the public accusation made in the presence of Henry the Fowler, King of Germany, and all his court, by Frederick of Telramund, next male heir to the dukedom of Brabant, against the youthful Duchess Elsa, of having wilfully made away with her younger brother in order to reign in his stead. Unable to prove her innocence, and the King having ordained that it should be tried by single combat, she solemnly invokes the aid of Heaven by sending her a champion in the hour of need to defend her cause. After two vain appeals, followed by a dead silence, a third is made, when a murmur of astonishment is heard among the assembled crowd, which continues increasing as a bark glides up the river drawn by a swan, and bearing a knight clad in bright silver armor, who takes up the gauntlet, requesting as his reward for her defence the maiden's hand, which is vouchsafed him, and making as sole condition that she shall not ask his name nor ever seek to know whence he comes. After a short combat, in which his adversary is soon disarmed, he claims his prize and the first Act closes with rejoicing.

In the Second, Frederick, under sentence of banishment, and his wife, Ortrud, a heathen sorceress, who is the real culprit and has changed Elsa's brother into a swan, hold consultation how they shall contrive to regain what they have lost, and instil perfidious doubts into Elsa's mind as to the sanctity of her supernatural champion. In a short interview between Ortrud and Elsa, the former seeks to undermine the latter's confidence in her lover, and to induce her to inquire into his origin before giving him her hand in the cathedral of Antwerp. The presence of Lohengrin himself, however, soon dispels her incipient misgivings, and she finally enters the church with him followed by her wedding procession.

The third act, preceded by an extremely effective Wedding March, opens with the Bridal Chorus by which Lohengrin and Elsa are conducted to their apartment, where they are soon after left to themselves. Two-thirds of this Act are taken up by the duet between these two lovers, commencing with the expression of rapturous delight at having found each other, and passing from this sentiment by a clever progression through different phases by which the author ultimately brings about the tragic catastrophe. This consists in Elsa's insisting upon knowing the origin of her mysterious spouse, and is ingeniously motivated in Wagner's libretto not by curiosity, nor even by doubt on her part concerning his worthiness or the sanctity of his mission, but by want of confidence in her own power to retain and suffice to one so greatly her superior. Simultaneously with this climax in the duet an attempt is made on the part of Frederick to assassinate Lohengrin, he having previously contrived to conceal himself in the apartment. The knight, however, is on his guard, and despatches his enemy with a stroke of his sword.

The final conclusion of the opera is Lohengrin's answer, not delivered to his bride in private, but in the form of a recital to the king and his assembled court at daybreak, on the banks of the Schelde. He relates at length his story, proclaims his divine origin, but at the same time the necessity of his leaving them to return to his bright abode and post of trust. The swan, seen slowly advancing to fetch the knight, is re-transformed, on the prayer of Lohengrin, into Elsa's brother, the young Duke of Brabant, falsely supposed to have been murdered by her; while a dove, emblem of the Holy Spirit, takes his place and draws away the bark and its bright occupant 'mid the sorrowful amazement of the bewildered throng and Elsa's despair at the loss of her celestial bridegroom, and her consciousness of having herself been the cause of his departure.

It is difficult to imagine a more poetical idea than that embodied in this beautiful legend, viz.: that faith must not be too closely investigated if we would preserve it, and too often vanishes entirely when submitted to scrutiny. A happier mode of applying it to dramatic purposes could also scarcely be imagined than that adopted by the author of the poetic libretto, who, as all the world knows, is no other than Wagner himself; it being his custom not only to write the music but the words also of all his operas.

In harmony with the views of this most original composer regarding modern opera, according to which all the arts, plastic, lyric, and dramatic, ought to combine in producing the future Work of Art—as he names it—the mise-en-scène in Lohengrin is of unusual brilliancy, and it is almost superfluous to add, especially well cared for in the Italian performance. In spite of a strong dislike to what is generally termed theatrical display, Wagner does not in the least disdain to make use of choregraphic effects when adapted to his purpose. Thus, the scene on the banks of the river in the first act, with the king and his retinue, the herald, the arrival of Lohengrin himself in the bark in his shining armor, the single combat and the final tableau are as near approaches to ballet effect as possible. Again, the nuptial procession at the doors of the Cathedral of Antwerp, at the close of the second act, and the last scene of Lohengrin's departure in the third, afford every opportunity for the scene painter, costumer, and stage manager to show their capabilities.

Any attempt to enter into general considerations or appreciations of the composer's treatment of music and the place allotted to it by him in the lyric drama, would of course be out of place here, and lead us beyond the limits of an article like this. Suffice it therefore to say that he has remained true to his principles in this especial work, using music as a co-operative means of adding vigor of expression where words alone do not suffice to convey the full extent of the idea, or whole power of the sentiment he is portraying. Wagner never, like other composers, treats music as a separate thing, and here it is that we must look for the clue to what most embarrasses those who hear his works for the first time. It is next to impossible to detach purely musical—whether instrumental or vocal—passages from any of his later works, precisely because in his operas words, dramatic action and music stand in so intimate a relationship to one another, and form so complete a living organism, that it is hardly possible to dissect it without endangering the life of the whole.

Three or four such passages might perhaps be lifted, as it were, out of their frame, and exposed thus isolated; but it is clear by the above that they will infallibly lose much of their pristine value and characteristic effect by the process. The musical element pervades the entire work, now refining, sublimizing the supernatural sides of it, now vivifying and intensifying the depths of human passion and tragic despair, till it renders them almost painfully acute.

The Italians seemed, as it is natural they should, to relish most those parts which, musically speaking, offered least striking contrast with their own artistic views and habits. The two introductory instrumental pieces: the Prelude or Overture, and the Wedding March which precedes the last act, met with enthusiastic applause, and were encored both at Bologna and at Florence, where Lohengrin was subsequently transported for the space of three evenings. Several choruses seemed to give equal satisfaction, if we are to judge at least by the frequent interruptions caused by the enthusiastic reception they encountered, and which was duly merited on their part, not only on account of the quantity and superior quality of voice displayed, but also of the care with which they had been studied. The soli, especially of the second act, were not appreciated in the same degree by any means; nor can this be attributed entirely to the short-comings of the singers, although they may in great part be held responsible, as an unusual amount of dramatic talent is requisite to give this part of the opera its full weight. The principal reason lay, no doubt, in the total absence of those forms to which Italians are accustomed, the lack of which gives them a feeling as if they had lost their compass and were in open sea. However, barring those portions of the opera where the purely Wagnerian recitative form prevails, which, by the way, is not a mere recitative like those of other German or French composers, nor anything resembling the adagios, airs, cavatinas, &c., we find elsewhere, they seemed astonished to find the music of Lohengrin perfectly intelligible. A few of the more intelligent among them even, who had looked at the score and heard the opera several times, began to suspect the existence of a different order of symmetry from that clearly defined outward species which their ears vainly sought. Perhaps that happy artistic instinct which seems innate in them, led them to detect the subtle fact, that if the outward semblance of unity in detail was wanting, an inner substance replaced it, that inward unity of cohesion by which the whole work is characterized; that if the harmonies did not always caress the ear, if the melodies were hardly of the kind to be used for Pianoforte capriccios or violin fantasias—not to speak of barrel organs—a harmonious atmosphere pervades the entire opera, the musical themes being strictly in harmony with the subject and the situations to be expressed, whereas the reverse is for the most part the case in their own productions; such anomalies as a climax of despair being rendered by an exhilarating galoppade movement, revenge and hatred expressed by the sweetest of melodies, or a hero at his last gasp performing a series of acrobatic feats with his voice, which is hardly compatible with exhaustion, being too familiar to all who are acquainted with modern Italian opera, to need my calling them to mind. In fact they found here the ἀπαρὴς ἀγνορία in lieu of the φανερὴ ἀγνορία of which the ancient philosopher was wont to speak.

The sobriety, originality, ingenuity, and variety exhibited in Wagner's mode of handling the orchestra, was to them likewise novel, being as far removed from that Italian carelessness and neglect of study in detail, which in general consigns to it the part of a "monstrous guitar" accompaniment, as from that crushing, elaborate preponderance allotted to it by modern composers of other countries, which forces the singers to task their lungs to excess, if they will be heard at all.

In short, the Italian audience has on the whole been not only agreeably surprised, but evidently gratified by the result of their first voyage of discovery in the Land of the Music of the Future. Since the successful attempt which was made in bringing the whole thing to Florence last month, there is a talk also of making a similar experiment in Rome, Naples, and even Genoa. Who knows if later on it may not prove worth while for some London impresario to do the like, provided there be one able and willing to divest himself for a while of French influences and musical prejudice? J. LAUSSOR.

Florence, Jan., 1872.

Mendelssohn and Goethe.

FIRST VISIT OF THE COMPOSER TO THE POET.

In a pamphlet of some fifty pages, Dr. Karl Mendelssohn has published a narrative of his father's boyhood and relations with Goethe. That the poet, who was as indifferent as Gallo to any cordial intimacy with Beethoven, Schubert, and Weber, should have at once adopted "the young Berliner," is one of the many pieces of evidence in proof of the qualities, social and artistic, which secured for Mendelssohn the life-long regard of the wisest and most famous men of his time.

Zelter's correspondence with Goethe is contained in three bulky volumes, and imbedded in these are to be found letters of deep interest on the subject of Zelter's favorite pupil. It is impossible to read Karl Mendelssohn's work without feeling gratitude to Zelter, who, although a proverb in Berlin for roughness, uneven temper, and Spartan discipline, assuredly did his duty by Mendelssohn with a thoroughness and conscientiousness that were never forgotten by his famous pupil. One of Zelter's peculiarities consisted in his hoarding and gloating over a private collection of Sebastian Bach's works. The Passions-Musik, the B minor mass, the glorious Magnificat were to him golden fruit in the garden of Hesperides, and he the dragon to watch them. On Friday evenings his pupils, Felix and Fanny Mendelssohn included, were allowed the high honor of practising Bach's music, to the passionate delight of their souls, and, it must be added, the imminent danger of hurting their voices. But this early apprenticeship to such noble study was of priceless value to Felix, who in after years succeeded Zelter as "restorer of Bach to the Germans." Mendelssohn's father never uttered truer words than the following: "It is an undoubted fact that without Zelter your own musical tendencies would have been of a totally different nature." Felix was Zelter's debtor for another good turn—a personal introduction to Goethe. The prospect of this visit to Weimar threw the whole Mendelssohn family into a flutter. "Just imagine (his mother writes to a relative in Paris), the little urchin has the good luck before him of visiting Weimar with Zelter. Zelter wishes to introduce him to Goethe. You may imagine what it costs me to part with the dear child, although only for a few weeks. Still, I reckon it no small advantage to be introduced to Goethe under such circumstances, to live under his roof, and receive the great man's blessing. I am glad, too, he will have this little trip as a diversion; he is naturally inclined to be over-studious for his age." Old Zelter and the brilliant boy arrived at Weimar. They put up at "The Elephant," and Felix, who seems never to have lost a single moment, made a sketch of Cranach's house, and informed himself of the extent and powers of the Weimar church organ, before making his youthful bow to the Geheimrath. After dinner the boy played Bach's fugues, and extemporized for a couple of hours in Goethe's presence. From that moment Goethe became his friend. Mendelssohn literally came, saw, and conquered. His glorious powers received the imprimatur of Hummel, and after he had passed the dreadful ordeal of playing at sight Mozart's and Beethoven's music from manuscript, Goethe made up his mind that an infant prodigy was no myth or delusion. Goethe had heard Mozart as a boy of seven years old play at Frankfurt, and he told Zelter that, as compared with Mendelssohn's performance, when the latter was a few years older than Mozart, it was "as the lapping of a child to the refined conversation of a full-grown man." It is delightful to read of Goethe presenting the young musician with a manuscript sheet of "Faust," and the poet's delight at receiving Mendelssohn's translation of the "Andria" of Terence, and saying "it would be a resource to the scholars and artists at Weimar in the long winter evenings." After a fortnight or more of Mendelssohn's music Goethe could not endure a common-place performance. He soon sent another invitation to Felix, and this time Mendelssohn's parents came with their son. Once more Goethe himself opened the piano, with the words, "Come and wake up for me all the winged spirits which have been so long asleep here. You are my David. Should I become miserable and ill, banish my evil dreams with your playing; I will never, like Saul, hurl a spear after you." To see how faithfully Goethe abided by his promise, we must refer our readers to Dr. Karl Mendelssohn's interesting pages. After a lapse of five years, when Felix had developed such exceptional powers, it is curious to read of the lad being taken to Paris, the father wishing to consult Cherubini as to the son's adopting music as his vocation. The old Italian was the terror of young artists, and merciless in criticism even of such men as Halévy and Auber. In spite of himself he was awed into an unwilling prophecy. The lad played the pianoforte part in a quartette of his own, and Cherubini and a number of Parisian artists were present. The oracle thus delivered himself:—"Ce garçon est riche, il fera bien, il fait même déjà bien, mais il dépense trop a son argent, il met trop d'étoffe dans son habit." As a preventative against this over-tailoring, he added, "Je lui parlerai, alors il fera bien." Mendelssohn's criticism on his Mécènes is really admirable; he compares Cherubini to "a burnt out volcano, which flashes forth flame occasionally, but is completely covered with ashes and stones."

Cherubini and Berlioz.

A writer in the London Musical World has been calling out from the recently published "Memoires" of Hector Berlioz, (which consist mainly if not wholly of the "Voyages en Allemagne, Italie," &c., which appeared a long time ago during the author's lifetime), the several passages below, in which he relates his interviews with Cherubini. No doubt the old master was severe and bearish in his manner towards those whom he suspected to be little better than upstarts; but, after all, Cherubini's music is to-day more fresh and interesting than ever; how is it with that of Berlioz (outside of Paris)?

Cherubini and Berlioz were, in music, as far as the two poles asunder; the one was an out-and-out romanticist; the other, an intolerant classic. War was declared between them the very first day they met. Their meeting, which took place in the library of the Conservatory, was a genuine comedy scene. The foes were about to separate, and definitively lose sight of each other; it was after the second performance of the Symphonie fantastique. According to the regulations governing the course to be taken by the "grand prix," Berlioz was on the point of leaving Paris to make his way across Italy to Rome. To quote his own words:—"The reader may imagine the rage excited in Cherubini's breast by all these heterodox questions (romanticism in music), and all the noise to which I had given rise. Cherubini's trusty followers had furnished him with an account of the last rehearsal of the abominable symphony; the next day he happened to pass the door of the concert-room as the public were entering it. Some one stopped him and said:—'Well, Monsieur Cherubini, are you not coming to hear Berlioz's new composition?'—'I do not require to know how to do a thing as it ought not to be done,' he replied, in his bad French, and with the air of a cat, down whose throat you might attempt to thrust a quantity of mustard. Matters were very much worse, however, after the concert had proved successful. He appeared as if he had swallowed the mustard. He spoke no more; he sneezed."

Some few days afterwards, he sent for Berlioz.

"You are going to start for Italy?"

"Yes, sir."

"Your name will be erased from the registers of the Conservatory; your studies are terminated. It strikes me though that—that—that you ought to have come and paid me a visit. Peo—peo—people do not leave this place as they would a stable."

"I was," remarks Berlioz, "on the point of replying:—'Why should not they do so, when they are treated like so many brutes?' But I had the good sense to restrain myself, and even to assure our amiable director that I had never thought of leaving Paris without coming to bid him good-bye and thanking him for all his kindness."

At one of his early concerts, Berlioz and the old Italian maestro had another passage of arms, somewhat similar to their meeting in the library.

To be allowed the use of the large hall of the Conservatory, Berlioz required the authorization of M. Stothènes de la Rochefoucault, Superintendent of Fine Arts, and, moreover, the consent of Cherubini. M. de la Rochefoucault made no difficulty in granting Berlioz's request. Cherubini, on the contrary, directly the project was mentioned, flew into a rage.

"You wish to give a concert, eh?" he inquired, in his usual graceful way.

"Yes, sir."

"You must obtain the permission of the Superintendent of Fine Arts."

"I have obtained it."

"Has Monsieur la Rochefoucault given his consent?"

"Yes, sir, he has."

"But I—I—I do not consent. I oppose your having the hall."

"You cannot have any good reason for refusing it me, as the Conservatory is not using it at present, and as, for the next fortnight, it will be completely free."

"But I tell you I will not have you give the concert. Everyone is in the country, and you will take nothing."

"I do not reckon on gaining anything by it. My sole aim in giving it is to make myself known."

"There is no necessity for your being known. Besides, to give a concert, money is requisite. Have you any to spare?"

"Yes, sir."

"Oh—well, wha—wha—what do you intend performing?"

"Two overtures, some fragments from an opera, my Cantata on the death of Ophelia—"

"What—the Competition Cantata? I will not have it! It is bad; it—it—cannot be performed."

"That is your opinion, but I am glad to say that I, too have an opinion about it. A bad pianist may have been unable to accompany it, but that is no reason why a good orchestra should not be capable of the task."

"Then you—you—wish to offer an insult to the Academy?"

The polite answers with which Berlioz responded to Cherubini's objections, only exasperated the Italian maestro all the more. "I will not have it!—I will not have it!"—was his sole answer to all Berlioz urged. At length the latter had to have recourse to official intervention of the Superintendent of Fine Arts. "Be kind enough to read that, sir," said Berlioz, handing Cherubini the order signed, "La Rochefoucault." From being white, Cherubini turned green. After reading his superior's letter over and over again, he returned it to Berlioz without uttering a single word.

Music Abroad.

VIENNA. On the 7th of January, Mr. GEORGE L. OSGOOD, our young Boston tenor singer, after several years of study in Berlin and Milan, gave his first concert, choosing Vienna for the place. He succeeded in winning the warm sympathies of a cultivated audience. His programme included an Aria by Bach: "Ich will nur Dir zu Ehren leben," from the Cantata for New Year's Day; Recit. and Andante for the violin, by Spohr (played by Herr Grün); two songs by Schubert ("Erstarrung," from the Winterreise, and "Halt," from Die schöne Müllerin); Piano Sonata, op. 2, No. 3, by Beethoven (Fräulein Joël); Songs: "Kommen und Scheiden," Schumann, and "A Dream," Rubinstein; Bach's Chaconne for Violin; and three Songs by Robert Franz: "Du hast mich verlassen, Jamie," "Schlummerlied" (Tieck), and "Frage nicht" (Lenau). The Kunst-Blätter says:

"The concert-giver was somewhat nervous, so that his voice seemed constrained in the Aria by Bach. But later, in the Schumann song, having gotten over his embarrassment, the singer unfolded all the richness and charm of his beautiful voice, which through the warmth of feeling enraptured and transported the listeners. The two Schubert songs, too, exercised the same penetrating effect. Osgood is a genuine Schumann mood-singer, one who sings with understanding and with deep, warm feeling. His delivery is tasteful and noble, as fascinating as his voice, which has the sympathetic ring of a pronounced, clear tenor, is perfectly equal in all the registers, and of good power and compass. . . . One saw on his first appearance, that he had here to do with a well-schooled singer, who is in earnest with his art."

"Both 'Word' and 'Tone' have been equally a matter of careful culture with him. Every word, every syllable could be heard in the farthest corner of the hall, and even in pianissimo passages were distinctly perceptible. But this excellence of distinctness is the fruit of long years of searching studies, (such as few of our German singers care to undertake)."

"As we hear, Osgood made his studies at first with Sieber in Berlin; and afterwards for two years he was under the instruction of Lamperti in Milan as a concert and oratorio singer. His knowledge and ability are really remarkable. He knows well how to deliver, to characterize, to individualize, and, what is the main thing, how to reach the heart. The formation of his voice, his mode of taking the note, is correct, and he is master of the technical means which enable him to overcome the difficulties of florid music, even the coloraturen of Bach and Schumann.—There are few singers who, like Osgood, in their youth combine a thorough school with the most fortunate natural endowments. Nothing is wanting to this artist, to make him fully recognized, except a little more courage. . . . The concert-giver was distinguished by repeated and persistent plaudits and recalls."

Other critical notices agree substantially with the above, some adding that Osgood has studied with Robert Franz in Halle, as well as in Berlin and Milan.

From the Vienna correspondence of the Signale, Dec. 15, we translate the following:

"ANTON BRUNNEN passes the winter with us in a three-fold capacity: as virtuoso, as composer, and as artistic director of the 'Society of Friends of Music' and its Singing Society. In the last character Vienna had had no opportunity to know him until the first Society concert; and although the waiting public received him coldly as he came to the director's desk, the ice was quickly broken by the performance of the Eroica. Even in the first movement, which Rubinstein took rather more moderately and broadly than was usual, there was but one voice in the hall about his talent for conducting; even to the minutest detail it showed the thinking and experienced musician. So too, in the second concert, Schubert's C-major Symphony was received in the same way, though many thought the Scherzo and Finale taken too fast. Of Handel's Coronation Hymns (George II., 1727) Nos. 1 and 4 were selected, the latter making the greatest impression. Mendelssohn's 114th Psalm, like all the similar works of this master, enjoyed this time its usual effect; while, on the contrary, of Bach's Cantata: "Ein feste Burg," only the closing Chorus made its usual impression. Two capella choruses were greatly applauded: a hearty Christmas Song in a popular style, and an Offertorium: Non nobis Domine, by Haydn. The latter, hitherto unknown, celebrated as it were its centenary resurrection, and made a surprising impression by its serious and lapidary character, so different from Haydn's usually cheerful style of writing. Both score and parts have just been published by Rieter-Biedermann, and this chorus (originally with organ accompaniment) will surely soon become domesticated in churches and in singing societies.

"The first Philharmonic Concerts brought us a Symphony by Raff, entitled 'Im Walde,' whose weakness of invention is vainly covered by external effects; the public showed no liking for it. All the more noisily was Wagner's Huldigungs-Marsch received, which many strangely took for the Kaiser-Marsch and demanded a repetition. Concertmeister Heckmann from Leipzig played Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. The excellent pianist, Sophie Menter, hardly recovered from a sickness, did not play Schumann's Concerto with her wonted ease. The Anacreon Overture, the seventh Symphony of Beethoven, and the music to Rosamunde (Schubert) were the remaining numbers of the two concerts.

"The Singakademie in its first concert produced, among other things, for the first time a Christmas Song, both text and music by Peter Cornelius, and repeated Handel's Allegro ed il Penseroso. On this occasion the Vienna Männergesangsverein brought out Mendelssohn's 'Edipus in Colonus,' the declamation and connecting poem being given by the best talents of the Burg theatre." These are but a few of the concerts reported of.

The operas given up to Dec. 15 were: Rienzi (Wagner) 6 times; Romeo, Domino noir, Faust, L'Africaine, 5 times each; Tannhäuser, Don Juan, Lohengrin, Mignon, Meistersinger, 4 times each; Fra Diavolo, Euryanthe, Prophetie, Favorita, Norma, "Flying Dutchman," Trovatore, Judith, "Marriage of Figaro," 3 times each. Fourteen other operas were given once or twice. Wagner had the most evenings (21); then Meyerbeer, 11; Gounod, 10; Mozart, 9; Auber, 9; Weber and Donizetti, 5 each; Thomas and Verdi, 4 each. The other composers (Gluck, Adam, Flotow, Halevy, Marschner, Boieldieu, Beethoven) had to content themselves with one, two or three evenings.

COLOGNE.—Through the performance of Handel's Theodora the fifth Gürzenich concert became the most interesting of the season, and in the general opinion the finest. The principal singers were: in the part of Theodora, Frau Bellingrath-Wagner; Irene (Contralto), Frau Joachim; Valens (Bass), Herr Krolop of Berlin; Septimius (Tenor), Herr Wagner of Cologne. Ferdinand Hiller, who conducted, had with a discreet hand (says the Signale) given the work the livelier coloring of a modern instrumentation. (See Hiller's description of the Oratorio on another page).

LEIPZIG. The 10th Gewandhaus Concert (Dec. 21) offered: Overture to "Manfred," by Reinecke; Aria from the opera "Der Haiddeckacht," by F. von Holstein, sung by Frau Peschka-Leutner; Beethoven's Concerto in G, played by Herr Wallenstein of Frankfurt; Symphony (No. 1, in C) by S. Jadasohn; Songs: ("Das Maiglöcklein," by Reinecke, "Du bist die Ruh," Schubert, and "Ich wandre nicht," Schumann; Rondo Brillant for piano and orchestra, Mendelssohn; and Overture to Der Freyschütz, this being the fiftieth anniversary of its first performance in Leipzig.

The concert of Chamber Music (Dec. 4), by Reinecke, David, Röntgen, &c., presented Beethoven's string Quintet in C minor, op. 104; Trio in B flat, op. 52, by Rubinstein; and Schubert's Octet for strings, with clarinet, bassoon and horn.

—At the Euterpe Concert of the next day were given: Schumann's Overture to Schiller's "Bride of Messina;" Aria from Gluck's Orpheus (Frl. Minna Borée); Violin Concerto, Mendelssohn (Concertmeister Rich. Himmelstoss of Breslau); Beethoven's Eroica Symphony; Songs by von Holstein and Taubert; Romance for the violin (first time), by B. Scholz.

The operas given at the Stadt-Theatre in December were: "Oberon," "Flying Dutchman," "Zampa," "Huguenots," Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor;" "Tannhäuser;" Kreutzer's "Nachtlager von Granada;" Halevy's "Jewess;" the "Meister-singer;" "Der Freyschütz," and Gounod's "Faust."

For the 11th Gewandhaus Concert (Jan. 1) the programme was: Overture to Die Zauberflöte, Mozart; Aria from Spohr's Faust, sung by Frl. von Hasselt-Barth of Coburg; Unfinished Symphony in B minor, Schubert; Introduction and Rondo brillant (op. 70, B minor) by Schubert, arranged for solo violin and orchestra by David, and the solo played by him; Songs by Schubert and Mozart; Sarabande and Tambourin for violin and figured bass, by Lécclair, arranged with piano accompaniment and played by Concertmaster David;—Part II. Beethoven's 7th Symphony.

At the twelfth Gewandhaus Concert, Herr Leopold Auer played Spohr's Ninth Violin Concerto, and pieces by Paganini, Bachrich, and himself. He was warmly applauded. Mlle. Hänsch, from Dresden, sang a cavatina from Rossini's Semiramide, and songs by Schubert and Bach, without creating any particular sensation. The orchestral pieces were symphony D minor, Schumann; Overture to Anacreon, Cherubini; and Overture to Richard III., Volkmann; the last was new here.

HAMBURG. The next novelty at the Stadttheater will be a grand five-act opera, with ballet, entitled Cantarini. The libretto is by Herr M. C. Lindau, and the music by Mr. Henry Hugh Pierson, who has resided for some years in Stuttgart.

DRESDEN. A new opera, Hermione, by Herr Max Bruch, has been accepted at the Royal Operahouse.

DUSSELDORF. At the fourth concert given by the General Musical Association, the programme comprised the Overture to Les deux Journées, Cherubini; a "Rhapsody," Brahms (Madame Joachim); Concerto in G major, Beethoven (Madame Clara Schumann); Pianoforte Solos, Schumann, Gluck, and Mendelssohn; Songs, Schumann, Schubert, and Mendelssohn; Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, Schumann.

STUTTGART. A new opera, Dornröschen (The Sleeping Beauty), words by Herr Pasqué, music by Herr Gottfried von Linder, has been produced with unequivocal success. Though the libretto is entitled romantic, everything takes place according to the regular laws of nature, as in La Dame Blanche, the well-known story being simply related. The music is among the best new music heard on the stage for some time, and, considering it is a first effort, augurs well for the future career of the young composer. Herr Braun, Herr Schütty, and Mlle. Telini, representatives of the three principal parts, acquitted themselves admirably; so did the orchestra, under the direction of Herr Abert.

VIENNA. M. Anton Rubinstein lately gave a grand concert. Among the audience were the Abbate Franz Liszt, and Herr Hans von Bülow. M. Rubinstein's opera, Feramosa, will be produced at the Royal Operahouse.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE. On the 3d inst., Weber's Der Freyschütz was played here for the 250th time. It was preceded by a Festspiel, written in honor of the occasion.

PARIS. The programme for the Conservatoire Concerts of Jan. 7 and 14 was the same: 1. Symphony in D, Beethoven; 2. Fragment from "La Damnation de Faust," Berlioz (including Air of Mephistopheles, by M. Caron; Chorus of Gnomes and Sylphs; Ballet of Sylphs; Recitative; Chorus of soldiers and song of students); 3. Midsummer Night's Dream music, Mendelssohn. The Berlioz pieces were encored, as they were also in M. Pasdeloup's Popular Concert of the same week, of which the programme was this: March by Meyerbeer; Beethoven's Cminor Symphony; "Menuet des Follets" and "Valse des Sylphes" from Berlioz's Damnation de Faust; Serenade for violin, alto and 'cello, Beethoven; Overture to Oberon, Weber.

For his concert of the week following M. Pasdeloup offered: Symphony in B flat, Haydn; Air from the Ballet "Prometheus," Beethoven; Marche Héroïque, Saint-Saëns; Beethoven's Septuor (with all the strings); Overture to Le Jeune Henri, Méhul.—For Jan. 21st: Marche funèbre, in memory of Henri Rognault (first time), by Leneveu; Mendelssohn's Reformation Symphony; Intermezzo, Lachner; Quintet in A, Mozart; Overture to Leonore, Beethoven.

BERLIN. Dec. 9. Symphony Solide of the Royal Orchestra: Overture ("Namenfeier"), op. 115, Beethoven; Symphony in E flat, Haydn; Dance of Furies and of Blessed Spirits from Gluck's Orpheus; Unfinished Symphony by Schubert; Overture: "Weihe des Hauses," op. 124, Beethoven.—Subscription Concert of Deppe's Sinfonie-Capelle: Overture to "Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; Aria from Handel's "Semele" (Frl. Borée, of Leipzig); Spohr's 11th Violin Concerto; Beethoven's 9th Symphony with Chorus.

Dec. 15. Bach's Mass in B minor, at the Singakademie.

Dec. 22. Fourth Symphony Soirée of the Royal Orchestra: Beethoven's 1st Symphony, in C; Overture to "Ali Baba," Cherubini; Ov. to "Euryanthe," Weber; C-major Symphony, Mozart.

At the Royal Opera, Dec. 25-31: Weber's Freyschütz, Gounod's Macbeth, Meyerbeer's Huguenots, Wagner's Meistersinger, Mendelssohn's Antigone music, Mozart's Don Juan.

London.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY. Handel's Deborah, revived on Dec. 10, 1869, was repeated yesterday week to the satisfaction of a numerous audience. Unquestionably there are vitality and power in this work such as the composer could hardly have imagined when, stimulated by the unexpected success of his first oratorio, Esther, he used up a lot of old matter and produced his second. In 1763, Handel wanted money to carry out a desperate operatic enterprise, and the construction of Deborah shows that he knew how to subordinate art to the exigencies of a failing treasury. Perhaps no more conspicuous example of musical book-making exists. Out of fifteen choruses ten are adapted from the Hamburg Fusion, the Coronation Anthem, and the Dixit Dominus, composed at Rome; while the airs, with one or two exceptions, show more regard for ad captandum effects than for genuine merit. There is, indeed, reason to conclude that the master regarded Deborah as a pièce d'occasion. Otherwise, he would not have given the parts of Barak and Sisera to a couple of male altos, because he happened to have them in his company; nor would he have omitted tenor airs altogether, because, at the moment, he kept no tenor vocalist in pay.

It will not do, then, to look at Deborah from the stand-point of high artistic purport. Handel was no hero when putting it together; but simply a man who wanted to turn an honest penny by humoring what seemed the passing fancy of the public. Yet, even so, he could not help producing music for all time. When twitted with the long days spent upon his Creation, Haydn answered that the work was meant to last; and we know that it is the things of slow growth which endure. Handel could be independent of these natural laws. If he blew a bubble to give momentary pleasure, it hardened into a crystal sphere by contact with the breath of his genius. There is music in Deborah, no matter whence it came, able to atone for greater faults than we have pointed out—music of the noblest character, genuine Handelian thunderbolts. But in what work of importance by the same hand do not these excellencies appear? Therefore, while giving the Sacred Harmonic Society credit, because of the revival of Deborah, we should be glad to know that other revivals are at hand. Theodora, the last but one of Handel's oratorios, and the pet child of his old age has recently commended itself to the music-lovers of Cologne, while London amateurs know no more of it than "Angels ever bright and fair" or "He saw the lovely youth." Here, at all events, is a reproach which the society would do itself honor by wiping away.

The performance of Deborah gave just satisfaction, inasmuch as the choruses, with hardly an instance to the contrary, were rendered vigorously and well. To name all the successes would be to go through the concerted pieces number by number. Enough, therefore, if we single out for special praise "Immortal Lord of earth and skies," "O, blast, with thy tremendous brow," "See the proud Chief," and the finale, "Let our glad songs." These are masterpieces, and in a masterly manner they were performed. Madame Lemmens-Sherrington did all that was possible with the thankless part of Deborah, whom neither the librettist nor the composer shows to advantage. Her delivery of the invocation, "By that adorable decree," was marked by appropriate dignity; while "Choirs of angels all around Thee," and "In Jehovah's awful sight," received fitting treatment at the hands of this favorite artist. Miss Elton gave the music of Barak with spirit enough to atone for the incongruous association of a military hero and a woman's voice. She was much applauded after "All danger disdaining," as well as after "In the battle fame pursuing," to the success of which, however, Mr. James Coward's organ obligato greatly contributed. Thanks to Sir M. Costa, Siera was presented by a tenor, Mr. Kerr Gedge, for whom the recitatives and air, "At my feet extended low," had been adapted. Mr. Gedge sang carefully, and thus helped to make the absence of a second hero with a woman's voice additionally acceptable. The two airs of Abinoam were given by Mr. Lewis Thomas, whose delivery of "Fears such as tender fathers shed," gained the chief honor by winning the only encore of the evening. A word in praise of the song would be superfluous, and we can hardly go further in praise of the singer than when we state that he did justice to his theme. Mrs. Sidney Smith and Mr. Smythson undertook the subordinate solo parts, and Sir M. Costa conducted, earning double honor by being also the author of discreetly written and effective "additional accompaniments."—Times.

CRYSTAL PALACE. The fourth Concert contained among other points of interest two novelties at these concerts, namely Liszt's Piano-forte Concerto in E flat, and Reinecke's Notturmo, for horn and orchestra; the overtures were "Idomeno" (Mozart), and "Leonora," No. 3 (Beethoven); and the Symphony Mozart's in G minor. The novelties were only remarkable for the exercise of memory shown by Mr. Dannreuther, who played the Liszt concerto without the book. As music there is nothing to be said in its favor. It is a mere chaos and formless void, with here and there a glimmer of the potential light which never fully comes. Mr. Dannreuther achieved plenty of tours de force, and his playing generally was in excess of the intelligence of the composition. Reinecke's Notturmo for horn and orchestra has nothing specially objectionable about it, and equally nothing specially meritorious. The masterpieces of Mozart and Beethoven were admirably performed and served to sandwich the German novelties perfectly. Mme. Bentham Fernandez and Mr. Bentham were the vocalists, and sang extracts from "Don Giovanni," "Le Nozze," and "Il Trovatore" with every grace of expression.—Orchestra, Feb. 2.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—On Saturday the 400th concert of the series was celebrated in a worthy fashion. Besides the usual quartet, appeared Mme. Goddard as pianist and Mr. Sims Reeves as singer. The room was naturally crowded. The chief piece was Mozart's D major quintet, with Mme. Néruda, MM. Straus, Ries, Piatti and Zerbini: the closing quartet was that in B minor by Mendelssohn. Mme. Goddard, who played Handel's "Suite de Pièces" in E major, including the "Harmonious Blacksmith," was encored as a matter of course; and Mr. Sims Reeves's fate in "Adelaida" was equally easy to predict. On Monday Mme. Arabella Goddard reappeared for the purpose of offering a tribute to the memory of Dussek, whose sonata in C minor (one of the three dedicated to Clementi) held the place of honor on the programme. It was a first performance. The composition is in three movements—a bold opening allegro with good contrasts of episodic subjects—an interesting adagio marked by tender and pathetic melody and containing clever modulations—and an animated rondo, wherein the brilliancy of the themes affords every opportunity for a pianist like Mme. Goddard. The whole work is admirably laid out—the form is perfect, yet the composer's genius shows itself unconstrained. It need not be added that the execution was all that those acquainted with the artist were entitled to expect—a finished performance, in short. This sonata will be heard again with increased interest. Mozart's sonata in B flat for piano and violin brought the two ladies together.

Schumann's string quartet in A minor and Hummel's well-known D minor septet made up the instrumental programme, the latter taking in Mme. Goddard (piano-forte), MM. Radcliffe (flute), Barret (oboe), Paquis (corn), Sharp (viola), Piatti (violin-cello), and Reynolds (double bass). The vocalist was Mr. Bentham, who sang Gluck's "Sin dall'età," and Schubert's "Evening Breezes" in a thoroughly praiseworthy manner. Sir Julius Benedict accompanied with customary delicacy.—Ibid.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, FEB. 24, 1872.

Chamber Music.

[The brevity of several of these notices is owing to the fact that we wrote them for our last number, while our space was growing "beautifully less," and they failed to gain admission after all.]

ERNST PERABO's third Matinée (Feb. 2) offered a more interesting programme than before. Beethoven's short Sonata in two movements (op. 78, F sharp major), one of his most unique and beautiful, was very finely played, saving a tendency to hurry in the fiery first Allegro. Mr. Perabo's arrangement for two hands of the Andante from Norbert Burgmüller's unfinished Symphony, op. 11, grew in interest as it went on. A Prelude and Minuet by Krause, op. 13, had more of life and individuality than the preceding specimens of that composer. A four-hand arrangement (played with Mr. LANG) of the heretofore unknown "Tragic Symphony," in C minor, by Schubert, in four movements, which is by no means comparable to the great one in C major, made a very agreeable impression; the slow movement has a deep and tender beauty. We sympathize to a great extent, however, with those who ask: "Why play arrangements, when there is so much fine music written for the piano which we have not heard?" Besides, four hands on the piano give a very vague idea of a Symphony which one has not heard already from the orchestra.

Very much to our regret we had to lose Mr. Perabo's fourth and last Matinée, with the most interesting programme of them all. We look to Mr. Perabo alone among our concert-givers for a hearing of that last of Beethoven's Sonatas, of which he has made a special and a very earnest study; and strange as the work is, he always interests his audience with it. The Advertiser says:

MR. PERABO'S FOURTH AND LAST MATINÉE CONCERT was given at the Wesleyan Hall yesterday afternoon in the presence of a fine audience. The programme was of unusual interest, including two numbers which were heard in Boston for the first time. The concert opened with Beethoven's Sonata in C minor, op. 111, which was rendered in a very thoughtful and zealous, if not imaginative, style. The serenata from Bennett's Sonata, op. 13, and the gavotte by Auguste Dupont, from "Trois Danses dans le Style ancien," which were given by Mr. Perabo at one of his earlier concerts, were repeated by request, and it gives us pleasure to say that Mr. Perabo improved greatly upon his former rendering of the serenata, making a great advance in the delicacy of his treatment. Four of a set of préludes, by Friedrich Gernsheim, op. 2, compositions new to this city, made up together the third number of the programme. They proved to be bright and interesting little moreaux, the fifth and sixth especially being full of what the Germans call "fresh life," and they lost none of their interest under Mr. Perabo's vigorous hands. The great feature of the concert, however, was a symphony in B flat major by Schubert, composed in 1816, arranged for four hands by Hugo Ulrich, and in that form only, just published in Leipzig. The symphony was in four movements: a. Allegro; b. Andante con moto; c. Menuetto; d. Finale—Allegro vivace; and it was finely performed by Mr. Perabo. Without attempting any analysis of so extended a work we may say that it was of great interest throughout and that its second and fourth movements were peculiarly beautiful and inspiring. The Allegro abounded in pure and strongly-defined melody, but was more like a movement from a sonata than from a symphony; and on first impression it seemed as if the Menuetto might have been written by any well-instructed composer. But the Andante and the Finale were noble in their strength and breadth of style, and impressed alike by the richness and suggestiveness of their melodies and by the warmth and fullness of their harmonies.

MENDELSSOHN'S BIRTHDAY was celebrated on Saturday evening, Feb. 3, by the QUINTETTE CLUB which bears his name, at the house of Mr. THOMAS RYAN. A goodly number of the old friends of the Club were present as invited guests; the adornments of the rooms were in the highest degree æsthetic and appropriate; the whole sphere and spirit of the place in triumphant contrast to the bitter storm that raged without; and the music (all from Mendelssohn) was most choice, fraught with dear associations with the first days of the Club (founded in 1849), and all executed con amore, Mr. LANG taking the part set down to Mr. PARKER, whom the storm detained.

Quartet, No. 1.

Duet: "O wert thou in the could blast."

Mrs. Weston and Mrs. Sawyer.

Andante and variations for Piano and Violoncello, op. 17.

Messrs. Lang and Fries.

"Song, "Zuleika."

Mrs. Weston.

Songs without words, for Piano.

J. C. D. Parker.

Quintet in B flat, op. 87.

Miss ANNA MEHLIG has given a second series of three Piano-forte Recitals in Mechanics' Hall, before audiences of the same appreciative character, if not quite so large in number as before (that was not to be expected), yet increasing from concert to concert. The first occurred on Wednesday afternoon, Feb. 7, offering perhaps the finest programme of either series. It began with Beethoven's "Sonata appassionata" (op. 57, F minor), as some publisher has named it. It is full of fire and passion to be sure, both in the opening and the final Allegro with its wild fugue-like impetuosity, and of deep, solemn, tranquil feeling in the Andante and its thoughtful variations. Miss Mehlig was soon absorbed in the spirit of the music, and through all its phases of expression did rare justice to the work. For all its strength and all its delicacy she was in feeling, in understanding and in technical ability prepared. One reads this in her look and action, as well as in the tones struck out or flowing from her fingers.

Then came a great piano work by Bach, which had been played in one of the Symphony Concerts by Miss Krebs: the Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue. Admirably as it was then brought out, with what seemed perfect clearness and precision, the present rendering made it still more beautiful; for to those qualities Miss Mehlig added a more subtle and poetic charm. Our only question was whether those great mountain chains of full chords, which alternate with the wonderful fragmentary recitative of the first part, had better be run both up and down in arpeggio phrases, as Miss Mehlig played them, and according to what we understand to be the traditional way; or whether they would not stand in grander contrast with the recitative by being built up solidly from base to summit without the descending process. The loveliness of the Fugue, in F major, was made quite appreciable to all, however slight their technical acquaintance with the Fugue principle and form.

The Capriccio by Mendelssohn, No. 1 of Op. 33, in A minor, one of the most fresh, original and beautiful of his smaller creations, was a charming piece to follow. And Schubert's quaint, half-playful, piquant Impromptu in B flat—Andante with ingenious, fascinating Variations, was "recited" to a charm. Three little pieces by Schumann followed fitly: first, a Romance in F sharp; then two of the most characteristic of the Waldscenen, so fragrant of the woods, namely: "The bird as prophet" and the "Hunting Song," of which we spoke not long ago when Mr. Leonhard played them. They were most welcome again, and suffered nothing in the execution, though somewhat in their isolation from the charmed circle of the dozen little pieces. The familiar Chopin Polonaise in A flat, played with a superb fire and freedom, closed a concert that was thoroughly enjoyed.

The second Recital (Saturday, Feb. 10) offered these selections:

Fantasia and Sonata.	Mozart.
{ a. Allegretto.	Haydn.
{ b. Impromptu. A flat.	Schubert.
{ c. Caprice.	Mendelssohn.
Etude Symphonique.	Schumann.
Impromptu. A flat.	Chopin.
Gnomesreigen.	Seeling.
Barcarolle.	Rubinstein.
Valse.	"
Tannhauser March.	Liszt.

The best known of Mozart's piano works, perhaps, the Fantasia in C minor, with its great length, so apt to prove fatiguing in a public performance, and still requiring the Sonata in three movements for its completion, was a pretty good test of the pianist's power of keeping the interest alive throughout a very long and (many would say) somewhat faded classic of our school days. That the work at every point is beautiful, poetic, full of meaning, every one knows who ever studied it in the right moment by himself; but it is a dangerous task for any but an artist of the first rank in a concert room. Miss Mehlig met its full requirements. The little Rondo of Haydn blazed up as cheerfully after it, as the sudden rekindling of the fire upon the hearth after you have long sat musing while the room grew dark; and that whole triplet of little pieces was most charming, the artist entering fully into the mood of each.

Of Schumann's "Etude Symphonique, en forme de variations,"—one of his earlier, but decidedly one of his very greatest pianoforte works—we had occasion to speak once before, some five years ago, when it was played for the first time here by Mr. Perabo in a Symphony Concert. We do not remember that it has ever been played here again until now. Schumann takes for his theme a very pregnant, grand and solemn melody in C sharp minor, invented by an amateur, and first states it with an almost orchestral breadth of harmony, in a style most grandiose and impressive. Then he proceeds to develop and bring out all its hidden meaning in a series of twelve remarkable "variations," or rather transformations,—such variations as Beethoven sometimes wrote; for each one is a marvellous surprise, a positive addition to the thought, although the outlines of the original theme are always discernible and bind the whole together. There is great contrast in them; they traverse a wide range of shifting moods and fancies, with a deep feeling always underlying; and the series concludes with a powerful march, which is worked out at length as if with an inexhaustible momentum. Very few piano compositions (which mean anything) are nearly as difficult, and so tax the whole strength as well as finer faculties of the performer. Miss Mehlig's rendering was a signal triumph both in execution and poetic reproduction.

The other pieces were all made as interesting as need be in their several ways; the "Dances of the Gnomes" by Seeling (whoever he may be) being a pretty fancy; the Rubinstein Barcarolle quite true to its title; while in the Minstrels' March to the Contrast, from Tannhäuser, Liszt shows his great gift for transcription in a unique and most successful manner.

Monday afternoon, Feb. 12, brought the series to a close which seemed too speedy. Here is the programme as printed:

Sonata, D minor. Op.	Beethoven.
Praeludium and Fugue, G minor, for the Organ.	Bach.
Arranged for Piano by Liszt.
Nachttueck.	Schumann.
Toccata.	"
Walderauschen. Elfenreigen and Ave Maria,	Liszt.
Etudes de Concert.	"
Boires de Vienne.	Tausig.
Scherzo, B minor.	Chopin.

The Beethoven Sonata, Op. 31, No. 2,—sometimes associated with Shakespeare's "Tempest"—was interpreted with a fine and true poetic feeling. Technical finish, light and shade, &c., are presupposed in all this lady's renderings. The great Organ Fantasia and Fugue of Bach in G minor, as transcribed by Liszt, was no novelty to those who had heard Miss Mehlig during the two past years. Yet it can never be other than new and grand and inexhaustible, however many times one hears it played in such consummate style. After this gigantic work, another followed: a repetition, by request, of the "Etudes Symphoniques," instead of the two less important Schumann pieces set down in the programme. Of course on further acquaintance the audience were still more impressed by it, and the interpreter seemed almost to have improved upon her own admirable rendering.

The three pieces by Liszt were strange enough, and affected various listeners in widely different degrees of liking and dislike. The "Walderauschen" (which we suppose means the rush of the wind through the woods) was to us more wild and fearful than it was musical. The "Elfenreigen" (Dances of the Elves) had been played here by Miss Topp, and is a pretty fairy fancy. The Ave Maria had a certain as it were mystical monotony, keeping one a long time on the rack of expectation of something coming, which must have come while our thoughts were wool-gathering if it came at all.

Miss Mehlig will return next month to play in a couple of concerts to be given by Mr. Peck.

Mr. B. J. LANG began his second series of four Concerts, at the Globe Theatre again, on Thursday, Feb. 14, at 3 P.M. The attendance was flattering both in character and numbers; the social and artistic atmosphere and the surroundings very pleasant. The programme consisted of three numbers, all classical and choice, and works of importance. He had the aid of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, who contributed the opening piece, the genial and beautiful string Quartet by Mozart (No. 8) in F. It was impossible not to enjoy it, especially the slower second movement (Allegretto), although the four instruments had not established so perfect a mutual understanding as they might have done. There was a good deal of scrambling through the intricate mazes of the swift Finale. Next, for a Piano Solo, Mr. LANG played a very large and serious Nocturne by Chopin in C minor (op. 48), one very seldom heard in concert rooms, but one of the noblest and profoundest of them all in its deep mood of feeling. Beginning calmly, grandly, it is treacherously easy for a while; but as "the heart mutes the fire burns," the music grows excited and more full of movement, offering strange problems for the fingers with no time to think how they may best be solved. Mr. Lang had no difficulty, however, and made all clear and effective to the end. To eke out its brevity he also played one of the most admired of Chopin's Ballades with rare grace and finesse.

The pièce de resistance was the second Piano Concerto of Beethoven, in B flat, op. 19, never played but once before in Boston, we believe, and then by Mr. Lang himself with orchestra in a Symphony Concert. This time he had for accompaniment a second piano (Mr. SUMNER), the string Quartet (SCHULTZE, MEISEL, RYAN and FRIES), a Double Bass and a flute (HEINDL). It is not one of Beethoven's three great Concertos; the step from this to No. 3, in C minor, is about as wide as that from the second to the Heroic Symphony. The first movement (Allegro con brio), with a long orchestral introduction, is a little thin and commonplace for Beethoven, but genial and Mozartish, and summed up with a good deal of effect in the Cadenza by Moscheles, and Mr. Lang made the most of it. The Adagio, with its wealth of delicate florid embellishments was rendered with the utmost evenness and fluency; and the piquant Rondo (Allegro molto), 6-8 measure, was made as bright and crisp as possible. It was an admirable rendering throughout.

Mr. Lang's second concert will be on Thursday, Feb. 29, the programme consisting of Beethoven's String Quartet in F minor, No. 7; four Nocturnes by Schumann, op. 23; and Mendelssohn's Sonata in D, op. 58, for Piano and Violoncello.

NILSSON OPERA. The Swedish singer with all her fascination is again with us,—only for these two weeks, and, sad to say, upon a Farewell visit! The operas this week have been Mignon (first time), Fra Diavolo, Lucia, and Trovatore; and "Mignon" will be repeated, there is no need to tell, this afternoon. Of the brilliant success of the opening night, and Nilsson's most unique and marvellously beautiful and touching impersonation, both in voice and action, of Mignon we must speak next time, for now we go to press too early on account of the Nation's Holiday.

ROBERT FRANZ. The concert to be given by Messrs. Leonhard and Eichberg, in honor of this noble song composer and interpreter of Bach and Handel, will take place next Saturday evening, March 2, at the beautiful Mechanics' Hall in Bedford Street. Tickets, at $2.00, sold privately. Programme of the very choicest.

GEORGE L. OSGOOD. Under the head "Music Abroad" will be found an account of our young Boston Tenor's first concert, given in Vienna, and with marked success. For four years and a half he has been studying hard in Germany and Italy, and is now beginning to show the fruits. On the 27th ult. Mr. Osgood was to sing in the Singakademie at Halle, at the personal request of Robert Franz, who esteems him as a singer admirably qualified to give the true expression to his songs. (Mr. Otto Dresel, still in Leipzig, was to go over to play his accompaniments). On the 6th Feb. he was to sing in Hamburg in the first production of the Franz arrangement of Handel's "L'Allegro ed il Penseroso;" and again in the Hamburg Philharmonic Concert an Aria and songs. Afterwards in Dresden, Berlin, Breslau, &c. People in Germany seem to be astonished that "an American" should become a German "Liedersaenger."

After a brief stay in London, Osgood will probably return to us next summer, and be of great service to us in the Oratorios and nobler kinds of concerts.

WAGNER IN ITALY. The letter from Florence on the first pages of this paper comes to us from a distinguished source: Madame LAUSSOR, who is the soul and actual conductress of the "Cherubini Society," of whose doings we have given some accounts from time to time. Her views are well expressed and entitled to high consideration. But we may question whether she has rightly guessed the secret of the interest which the Italians have begun to feel in Wagner. We do not think the Italians are any fresher and more open to new manifestations of genius than the Germans; nor are the latter any more, nor half so much the slaves of theories and of traditions, as the former. Is it not rather due to that sensationalism, that eagerness for new "effects," &c., to which the Italians have been so long educated through their own Verdi and the like?

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, FEB. 12.—The representation of three really good operas (two of which are new to most of us) in one week, is certainly a subject for congratulation, and this is what the Parepa-Rosa troupe has done, besides giving us three works of ordinary merit.

"La Gazza Ladra," "The Marriage of Figaro," "The Water-Carrier"—all are so beautiful that I can only make use of the expression once applied to Dickens' novels, and say, "the best is the one I last heard."

First in order came "La Gazza Ladra," an opera which, though it is performed in Paris, has not been given, I believe, in New York, for twenty years. The lively, but somewhat absurd story, on which the Libretto is founded, can be traced back to a French drama "La Pie Voleuse," which, it is said, caught the eye of Paer, who thought he would like to set it to music; but cruel Rossini, learning of this, coolly sat down, scribbled for a day or two, after his usual manner, and created a work which ranks with "Wm. Tell" [?] and the immortal "Barber." If the work itself is new to us, not so the beautiful overture which every one knows as well as the old story of the young man in the pit [query: was his name José?] at Milan, who was so irritated by the roll of the drums, in the opening, that he swore he would have the composer's blood, and went about for days with a stiletto in the hope of meeting him.

The opera was given here in four acts, with Mrs. Van Zandt as Ninetta. She sang well, and gained much applause, particularly in the famous cavatina: "Di piacer mi balza il cor." The opera also contains some charming music for the contralto, which was agreeably rendered by Mrs. Seguin, who pleased also by her acting, a point in which most of the troupe fail.

One of the finest numbers is the magnificent preghiera in the first act: "Ah name benefico," which is suggestive of Mozart. Mr. Rosa deserves the gratitude of the public for giving us this admirable work. By all means let us hear more of it.

Next came Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," which was sung with the usual abridgement of the last act, Mme. Parepa, of course, taking the role of Susanna, and, as there are so many beautiful numbers in which she takes part, this evening was perhaps the most enjoyable of all.

This brings us to the "Water-Carrier," the analysis of which was recently published in your columns. This noble work (and here again Mr. Rosa should be thanked) was produced last Saturday evening. One hearing of such a work can convey but a faint idea of its merits, although the overture and one of the entr'actes are not new to me.

No better interpretation could be desired than that which Mme. Rosa gave to such music as fell to her share, and in her only solo she was most heartily encored.

Some fault might be found with the chorus, and the want of a good tenor was painfully apparent in this, as in all the representations during the week. The orchestra was too loud, thus marring the effect of the first number (Savoyard's Song, G minor), but this is apt to be the case. The other representations given during the week, were: "Un Ballo in Maschera," "Maritana," and (Saturday Matinée) "The Bohemian Girl."

The audience was good throughout the week, and at the matinee, the house was literally crammed.—Query,—If a more namby-pamby opera than the "Bohemian Girl" could be written, would a building like the Boston Colosseum be large enough to contain the crowds of delighted hearers it would attract?

Leaving the Academy it is but a few steps to a dimly lighted room, at one end of which we deacry two grand pianos. This also is well-filled, and the crowd extends far out into the great Hall which opens behind it. Here there is such hushed and breathless attention to the music that we might imagine ourselves at the Salle Pleyel in Paris, were it not for the absence of that frequent and quick murmur of approbation, during the performance of a morceau, which does more to encourage the artist than the solid round of applause which follows.

It is the second of those agreeable matinées at Steinway's which I mentioned in my last letter. Here is the programme:

Trio. F major, op. 80.....	Schumann.
Mozart. Milia, Sarasate and Berguer.
Cavatina. "Betty".....	Donizetti.
Mrs. Philip D. Gulager.
Fantasia. On Gounod's "Faust".....	Sarasate.
Senor Sarasate.
Duo. Sonata in A, op. 69.....	Beethoven.
Mr. S. B. Mills and Mr. F. Berguer.
Fantasia. "Midsummer Night's Dream".....	F. List.
Mr. S. B. Mills.
Song. "Love Dreams," (with Violin Obligato.).....	Duchauer.
Mrs. Philip D. Gulager and Senor Sarasate.
Melancholie.....	Primo.
Senor Sarasate.
Duo for two Pianos. Rondo, C major.....	Chopin.
Mr. Wm. F. Mills and Mr. S. B. Mills.

Schumann's noble Trio and the Beethoven Duo were executed in a masterly manner, as might have been expected.

Signor Sarasate gained much applause in his piece de resistance (Fantasia on Faust) and played for encore, a lovely cradle song (violin and piano). The other solo pieces I did not hear. The well-known Rondo in C major which ended the programme was well played. How wonderfully beautiful it is no one who has ever heard it need be told.

The Onslow Quintette Soirée is announced for tomorrow evening at Chickering, and Santley will sing in "Zampa" this evening. Some of the papers naively hope that "his previous success in the concert room will be confirmed in the more trying ordeal of of Opera." A. A. C.

CAIRO. M. Reyer, the well-known musical critic who had gone to Egypt expressly in order to be present at the first representation of Verdi's new opera, Aida, sends a long account of the new work by the author of the Trovatore to the Journal des Débats. After having been present at three performances, and after a careful study of the score, M. Reyer is of opinion that Verdi's new opera is "a very remarkable and interesting work, certain to be appreciated in France as well as in Italy." Verdi, M. Reyer thinks, has made decided progress.

"Certainly the old Verdi still survives; we find him, in Aida, with his exaggerations, his sharp oppositions, his negligencies of style, and his wildness (emportemens). But another Verdi, touched with Germanism, also manifests himself, with a clever manner, with a science and tact of which we did not think him capable; with all the artifices of fugue and counterpoint, coupling tones with rare ingenuity, breaking the old forms of melody, even those of his own preference, . . . giving to the accompaniment more interest, often more importance than the melody itself. . . . Those who know the abrupt nature and the undisciplined character of the Italian master will see something more and something better than vague promises for the future in the aspirations and tendencies which Aida reveals."

The manner in which the libretto of Aida was written is somewhat curious. M. Mariette, the celebrated Egyptologist, first wrote the story in French prose; it was then turned into French verse, by M. Camille du Lode, and finally put into Italian verse by Signor Ghislanzoni. The scene of action is at Memphis and Thebes, at the "time of the power of the Pharaohs"—not a very precise date, as M. Reyer remarks. The curtain rises on the garden of the king's palace at Memphis. The high priest, Ramphis, enters to announce to Radamès, Captain of the Royal Guard, that the Ethiopians are in revolt, and threaten to invade the valley of the Nile. The sacred Isis has been consulted, and has named the warrior who is to repel the foe. Radamès mentally hopes that he may be the leader chosen by the deity to save his country, in order that he may be allowed to wed Aida, the favorite slave of his royal master. He is unaware that Aida is really the daughter of the king of Ethiopia, whom he hopes to help to conquer, and that Amneris, her mistress, is in love with himself. It is soon announced by the King that the choice of the deity has fallen on Ramadès, who is solemnly invested with the sacred armor in the temple of Vulcan (sic). The solemn scene in the temple, with mystic dances and religious hymns, is said by M. Reyer to be one of the most successful, as well as one of the most highly colored, of the whole opera. The second act opens in a saloon in the palace of the Princess Amneris. Here Aida, led on by the kindness of her mistress, confesses her love for Radamès. A violent scene of jealousy takes place, which is broken off by the return of Radamès in triumph, after a victory over the father of the unfortunate Aida. This return of Radamès is of course the occasion of a splendid procession, which is closed by a group of Ethiopian prisoners, amid whom is Amonasro, the father of Aida. The king gives his daughter Amneris to Radamès, as a recompense for his success. The next scene shows us Amonasro begging his daughter to steal from her lover the secret of his plans against the Ethiopians, who have again risen in revolt. Aida promises, hoping to be able to fly to her own land with her father and lover. She obtains the secret from Radamès, who is at once surprised and denounced by Amneris. The last scene shows Radamès and Aida in prison, both condemned to die. The curtain falls on their lamentations and hopes of meeting in another world.

M. Reyer can find no words sufficient to express his admiration for the scenery and costume, both of which have been executed under the superintendence of Mariette-Bey, and are consequently of rigorous archaeological exactitude. "The execution is excellent." In short, M. Reyer is in ecstasies; but, as he tells us that he has met with an excellent reception from the Khedive, we may perhaps ascribe some of his enthusiasm to the natural partiality of a musician for a Prince who brings out new operas on such a magnificent scale.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Annabel Lee. 4. E to e. Leslie. 40
"It was many and many a year ago
In a kingdom by the sea,
That a maiden lived that you may know
By the name of Annabel Lee."
The well-known lines by Poe, set to pretty music, with the appropriate "shiver" in the melody.
Maudie and the Blue bird. 2. C to d. Hackleton. 30
"Gay little blue-bird, up in the tree, Merrily singing a song for me."
A beautiful little song for a girl or boy. As such songs are not over plenty, secure it for your juvenile friends.
Shall I win her if I woo her? 3. Bb to f. Fernald. 30
"Love was never deeper, truer,
Where the angel footsteps fell?"
Sweet song by an anxious lover. Anxious lovers will please notice the price and enclose;—will be sent, post-paid, &c.
Love is at the Helm. Barcarolle. 3. C to f. Thomas. 40
"By shores of chilling sadness,
Where sorrows overwhelm,
We'll glide in peaceful gladness,
For Love is at the helm!"
A Barcarolle or boat-song, with a very graceful, gliding movement. Composed for Santley.
There's a heart beating for somebody. 3. Eb to g. McFarren. 30
"Rainy and rough sets the day,
There's a heart beating for somebody."
The well-known beautiful words by Chas. Swain. One of the sweetest of "welcome home" songs.

Instrumental.

- Elk's Galop. 3. E. Wellman. 40
Dedicated to the N. Y. Lodge, B. P. O. E., whatever that may be, and is spirited, pretty, easy, and brilliant, and has a handsome title.
Rays of Sunlight Galop. 3. Bb. Fernald. 40
Quite easy with the exception of the octave passages, and pretty throughout. Fine portrait of C. H. Phillips on the title.
Tanbert's Cradle Song. 3. D. 30
Farfaletta Mazurka. 3. C. 30 are Nos. 25 and 27 of Kinkel's "Crystal Gems."
The author has the happy tact of arranging music simply without spoiling it. Very good instructive pieces, as are the others of the set.
Stockton House Quadrille. 4. H. Sanderson. 60
Fine view of the great hotel mentioned above is on the title page. The Quadrille itself is massive, brilliant,—powerful,—in the characteristic style of the composer. Must be splendid when performed by a full band, for a large company of dancers, such as might be assembled in the great halls of the "Stockton."
The Rocky Mountains Waltzes. A Set of Waltzes for the Far West. 3. Daly. 40
Not the "Far West," as the "Rockies" are now somewhere near the centre of civilization. The waltzes are well put together, have a bright, metallic brilliancy, and must, in those regions so recently a wilderness, be agreeable substitutes for the music of the dances of our copper-colored brethren.
Six Recreations Enfantines. Becker. 10
No. 1. Rondino. 10
2. Sad Story. 10
3. Cuckoo's Galop. 10
4. Let us play Soldiers. 10
5. Hunting Song. 10
6. Evening Song. 20
They are about of the 8d degree of difficulty, and very correctly and "classically" composed. Will please teachers who need short and cheap pieces for young scholars, a little advanced in their studies.

Books.

- THE OFFERTORIUM. A Complete Collection of Music for the Catholic Church. Wm. O. Fiske. Cloth, $2.75; Boards, $2.50
Masses, Vespers, Anthems, Hymns for Offertory, Benediction, and all Special Occasions. A Requiem Mass, Holy Week Services, Responses, &c.
A large number of pieces, most of them having the recommendation of being not difficult, and within the reach of ordinary singers.
WILSON'S BOOK OF CHANTS. Henry Wilson. Organist at Christ Church, Hartford Conn. Boards, $1.75; Cloth, 2.00
Includes many Chants which have been great favorites in Hartford, and will be, no doubt, wherever practiced.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. a small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 807.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAR. 9, 1872.

VOL. XXXI. No. 25.

Robert Franz.

(Translated for this Journal from the German of A. W. AMBROS.*)

The genuine artist is like the man in the Gospel, who prepares his banquet without asking what sort of guests will sit down at his table, or even troubling himself as to whether there will be any guests at all, and whether he may count upon their thanks. It is a real blessing for him that he has one friend to comfort him and compensate for all: and that is Art. How else could Sebastian Bach have lived in his very narrow Leipzig Cantor's chamber, up in his gloomy Thomas Kirche organ choir; taken to task by the venerable periwigs, his superiors, because his organ playing was too artistic, his style of composition not church-like! Ah! one could weep tears of blood to read his Promemoria to the Court of Dresden, and find mentioned there the "innocently suffered mortifications," and the "shortenings of the emoluments" (which must have caused anxiety enough to father Sebastian with his host of children, especially as the said "emoluments" at any rate were rather meagre)—and how Bach wants nothing but the title of a court composer; and, to prove that he is not inexperienced in the church style, appends the Kyrie and Gloria of a certain Mass in B minor to the petition, all written out in parts, as neat as copperplate, with their own hands, by himself and his devoted, helpful wife—(actually he was so fortunate as to be decorated, in 1736, with the proud title of a "Royal Polish and Electoral Saxon Court Composer"! Or how would Mozart have lived, on whom a high protector set his valuation of "talent decide" (as if there could have been any doubt about that!), and who by meagre concert receipts, meagre pay for lessons, and meagre remuneration from publishers, helped himself along meagrely and wretchedly, until he had worked himself to death and did not leave enough behind to pay for—a grave? Or Franz Schubert, to whom the publishers sent back his manuscripts (such manuscripts might be called, after the analogy of a well-known bookseller's term, "Autorskräbe") "because the compositions were too difficult, or because they, the publishers, had their hands full with the works of Frederic Kalkbrenner!"

When Schubert died, there was scarcely anything of his works in vogue, except "The Maiden's Lament," the "Erl King" and the "Wanderer;" the last indeed enjoyed especial favor. The noblest part remained for some time unregarded. On the contrary, the song sparrows, who came flying along behind this nightingale, were heard twittering on all sides. These after-born of Schubert, for whom the world, of which it is written: "extra non est vita, et si est vita non est ita," ceased where the point of St. Stephen's tower could no longer be seen, and whose thoughts had not crossed the line (by which is to be understood here not the equator, but the so-called outermost "lines" of Vienna, Wall and Graben), were also true eclectics. Schubert—a very weakened and diluted Schubert to be sure—furnished the foundation. He was strongly tempered with Bellini, whose not ignoble, but mournfully elegiac, tamely sentimental, languishingly world-dolorous (welt-schmerzlich-matte), nervously unstrung music ravished the dilettanti, patrons of the Italian Opera, and reigned over the operatic stage, like the real Katerjammer after the champagne intoxication of Rossini.

* "Bunte Blätter: Skizzen und Studien für Freunde der Musik und der bildenden Kunst," von A. W. AMBROS. (Leipzig, 1872. F. R. O. Leuckart).

Even Spohr's sevenths and ninths and suspensions were occasionally laid under contribution. Sometimes, too, an accompanying French Horn or violoncello was awkwardly logged in (herbein commodirt), to mingle its "tones full of swelling longing" with the song. While to the North, above all in Leipzig, as the central point, a new era announced itself, and the sets of Mendelssohn's Songs, with and without words, began, like blooming beds of flowers, one after another, to shed abroad lustre and color and fragrance, these gentlemen under the shadow of St. Stephen's tower were cooking their coarse cheap soups, for which they had their "great public," as Mephisto rightly prophesied, at least wherever the nobler elements did not exist to counteract them. Every public official's daughter, who loved her father's secretary dearly, but alas! (for the distinction of ranks was too great) without hope, bathed her sentimentality in Proch's "Alpine Horn" or "Farewell," and when she came in the last song to the words: "Fare thee well, beloved life, ne'er may fortune turn from thee," how she would sing out of tune for love and love's sweet woe, if she had not been singing out of tune before,—by no means an uncommon thing!

Where are they now, with all their glory, after scarce a single generation? Where the "works" of Frederic Kalkbrenner? The "Alpine Horn" and the "Farewell"? And in what imperishable lustre shines the fame of Schubert! How popular he has become! I almost think, the genial (gemüthliche) child of Vienna would laugh right heartily at the sight of the marble tablet on the modest house in the Vienna suburbs with the inscription, in gold letters: "Schubert's Birthplace;" or were he, who bore among his friends the comical nick-name "Schwammerl," the next time he walked out into the city park, to see his own corpulent "Schwammerl" figure set upon a pedestal in monumental bronze. The old Bible saying always occurs to us, that we build costly monuments to people, who have not (to be sure) slain our forefathers, as the Bible goes on to say, but have at least left them unregarded. But, by Heaven! it is almost better so, that a noble genius, undisturbed by importunate admirers and the shouting choros of applause from all the multitude, should round out and complete the pure circle of his activity, in a quiet, obscure life, and that his apotheosis, like that of a Roman Caesar, should be spared until after his departure from this earthly sphere; better so than that a nomen and a lumen should come borne onward upon the great idolatrous car of Juggernaut,—a crowd of followers and admirers drag the heavy vehicle along, others of "the party" push behind, and the greatest enthusiasts, mad with jubilee, throw themselves under the wheels and let themselves be crushed to death. Is it any wonder, then, that such a Triumphant should all in silence, or even not in silence, esteem himself a God? Weber, on the contrary, after the unprecedented success of the first performance of Der Freyschütz in Berlin, writes in his day-book: "Soli Deo gloria!"—Beethoven replies to a young lady enthusiast who wrote him a letter: "Give the laurel to Mozart and Haydn, but to me not yet." At the right time the laurel comes, and turns at last into a crown of stars.

Every man, especially the artist, is always judged in public opinion either by the best or by the worst that he has done or made. Often a single work of an artist obstructs the view of all the rest, at least for the public. Weber on this account had finally a spite against his Freyschütz. So too for most people

Schubert was merely a "song-composer;"—his Symphonies, piano-forte works, &c., remained comparatively in the shade.

In an attractively and amiably written book,* rich in fine and intellectual traits, which has recently appeared, I find this passage: "By far the most eminent amongst Schubert's followers in the realm of Song, are Felix Mendelssohn and Robert Schumann, and indeed the latter in a higher degree than the former." To these two names I would add a third, making the harmonic trichord complete, the name ROBERT FRANZ, the singer of songs (Lieder-singer) to whom I on this special field perhaps would reach an even fuller laurel than to Schumann, great as the internal affinity between their songs may be.

I read on farther, and I find the expression: that, "although we are indebted to a Mendelssohn for much that is most deep and from the inmost soul, yet neither of the two, in the poetic contents of their songs, is to be placed by the side of Franz Schubert; for the one as well as the other lacks that naïveté, which distinguishes Schubert in so high a degree, and which is evermore the sign of genius." This remark, it seems to me, goes to the heart of the matter; and I will add to it this further one: that to me Robert Franz seems worthy of that fuller laurel, because in him I think I recognize that "depth and inwardness" of Schumann united with the naïveté of Schubert. Granting that Franz has in his songs, with finest artist hand, know how to use the last and highest means of his art; granting that for the technique of his accompaniments he has availed himself of the entire perfection into which the modern treatment of the instrument has shaped itself; granting that every detail with him is worked out and finished with the fineness of a miniature: still his songs seem as if they had streamed forth, of themselves, without pains, without reflexion, (which you feel very sensibly at times in Schumann), from a rich, deep, beautiful soul's life, just as the flower exhales its fragrance. The Schubertians, who would like to bury Beethoven's "Liederkreis an die entfernte Geliebte," his "Wachtelschlag," "Nachtlied," songs to Goethe's poems, &c., as deep as possible beneath the master's Symphony scores, lest some one or another should deem the "Quail" song and the "Mignon" song comparable to the analogous compositions of Schubert, and should venture to remark how, after all, Beethoven was by far the higher spirit as compared with the freshness of perception and quick sensibility we find in Schubert,—the Schubertians will exclaim high treason, if I openly declare, that to me Robert Franz in the worth and beauty of his songs stands by the side of Franz Schubert, if not also in the fulness and the richness thereof; for who among modern writers can claim for himself that fulness of motives, that variety of characterization, which knows always how to find the right tone amid themes as different as possible, that freshness of life, or, if you will, that delight in all the forms of life, that high originality, which we find in Schubert?

* "Deutsche Lieddichter von Sebastian Bach bis auf die Gegenwart," (German Composers, from J. S. Bach to the present time), by Dr. ERN. NAUMANN.—The book contains lectures which the author had delivered before young ladies—for this end as excellent as possible, and earnestly to be commended therefore to reading ladies. It is a sort of genuine ladies wine—the finest Muscat-Lünel. Occasionally, too, our author presents nous autres men with a glass of "genuine Constantia from the Cape." As such I reckon the intelligent, deeply searching remarks on Handel's Oratorios in comparison with Bach's religious music, the valuable discussion upon Mozart's Figaro, &c. I wish the book may have the widest circulation, and that the young ladies may find in other intellectual departments a teacher as amiable, as noble in his tone of thought, as well informed, as they do here in music.

A striking remark is made by the unknown author of an essay upon Robert Franz (in the Deutsche Musikzeitung, Oct. 27, 1860), in which a comparative glance is also cast upon Franz Schubert; to-wit: "Schubert for the most part chooses picturesque situations for his subjects (a Winter journey, Miller songs, Ossian songs, Goethe's Gretchen, Erlking, Suleika, &c.); and here the accompaniment to the melody stands out with very independent, graphic prominence; of pure mood songs, songs expressing states of mind or feeling merely, Schubert knows almost nothing; of Heine's songs he has composed only six." I would add: "If Franz Schubert is the blue, golden sunny day, whose light irradiates and transfigures all the fulness of the world with its phenomena, so is Robert Franz the still, serious night beneath the wide, eternal starry heavens, where all the outlines blend together in great quiet masses fading into twilight. His muse is like the Lotus blossom of his own wonderful song, which unveils its flower face to the rising moon, and 'blüht und glüht und leuchtet.'" Robert Franz, quite the contrary to Schubert, has composed almost only "mood songs;" hence it is just Heine's poetry which he prefers to treat; and that of Lenau also. At any rate, if we name Mendelssohn and Schumann as the legitimate followers of Schubert, we must name with them as the third (or as the foremost) Robert Franz. Whoever is fond of play upon words, suggestive alliterations, may please himself with noting how singularly the names: "Franz Schubert, Robert Schumann, Robert Franz" run into one another in their very sound.

The name Robert Franz is everywhere named with the highest respect. "Justly," says the author of the essay above cited, "is he counted with Schubert and Schumann as the third German song composer." (Again another Triad!) His songs are becoming recognized and praised as classic flowers of German Tone-Art. But could the songs themselves take up the word, they would perhaps exclaim, after the analogy of one of Leasing's epigrams: "We should like to be less praised and more sung." Our parlor singers, of both sexes, are shy of a Franz song; it makes demands upon them which go far beyond the twelve tables of the law of the Salon; and the young man who has to accompany Miss Adalberta Zephyrina in a song of Franz, casts a glance into the book and on the piano accompaniment, and thinks "he must study that over first." The concert singers finger over the leaves of a volume of our master's songs, seeking in vain for songs of which the concluding phrases are a translation into music of the ancient vox plaudite (Applaud, good people!).

What should they make, for example, of such a song as "Es hat die Rose sich beklagt" (The Rose complaineth to itself), Op. 42, No. 5, which flies by like a fleeting breath of rosy fragrance? Yet would the singers only search more carefully, they would find some things well adapted for setting a hundred or more pairs of hands in motion in a concert room; like that one pulsing with the fieriest life, "Er ist gekommen in Sturm und Regen, (Op. 4, No. 7). This song, to be sure, with its excited and impassioned impetus, over-reaches the most peculiar style of the composer, that which forms the ground feature of his music. I have already likened this ground feature to the solemn, silent, dreamy night—perhaps it speaks the purest and deepest from that incomparable song in this sense; "Weil auf mir, du dunkles Auge" (Op. 9, No. 3)—no official preghiera, but a prayer out of the deepest soul; in a somewhat different vein is the majestic "Ave Maria," transfigured in the golden glow of sunset.

Franz, as we have said, inclines to Lenau's poetry, and he has composed a set of his "Schullieder" (Op. 2). But to the poetry of Heine he is drawn only where the poet allows his feeling to speak out purely, without killing itself, as he sometimes does, in the last verse, by an ironical dagger thrust. He also likes the poetry of Eichendorff, with its dreamy murmur of fountains and lilac fragrance. Also those reflective poems known under the name of Mirza Schaffy, where from beneath the Oriental turban a European eye looks roguishly and confidently out at us, are welcome to him. In every instance Franz chooses his texts with a fine feeling—better indeed than Schumann, whom, with all love and reverent appreciation, I cannot acquit of some mistakes in this regard; for, to give a definite example, to compose a poem like "Die Kartenschlaegerin," or "Die rothe Hanne," is a mistake; and the choral refrain (ad libitum) in the latter song: "Gott sei der rothen Hanne gnädig, der Widdieb liegt in sich'rer Hut," shows an inconceivable want of taste (I really can find no milder word) for a Schumann. What miserable song texts Weber had to put up with! He has preserved the mostly very little poets, whose names we read at the head of his songs, in the spirit of his music, where they have kept well to the present day.

(To be Continued).

Richard Wagner.

AN AUTOBIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

From the London "Observer."

The sketch in question forms the opening number of vol. I. of Wagner's collected writings, which we reviewed some weeks ago, and extends up to 1842. As we are in a condition to supply additional facts, we think it would be worth while to give some extracts, and to carry the sketch on to the present day. The literature concerning Wagner's artistic doings has reached dimensions of surprising magnitude; ever since 1845, when Tannhäuser was produced at Dresden, all manner of competent critics have assailed the musician of the future, or broken a lance in his honor, so that long before our day their unfortunate victim has attained the distinction of being, if not the best understood, certainly the best-abused artist in Europe.

Wagner's books and dramas must be made to speak for themselves; but if ever a biography he written it would be best done by himself, and on the scheme of Goethe's Wahrheit und Dichtung, wherein all that appertains to the author's spiritual development is carried out in full, and personal details are but slightly sketched, or even colored, as artistic necessity would dictate. In the mean time the following facts may not be unwelcome:—

Wilhelm Richard Wagner was born 22d of May, 1813. His father, an officer of police, died six months after his birth. His step-father, Ludwig Geyer, was an actor and a painter, as well as the author of several comedies. He took his family to Dresden, and had the intention of bringing up Richard as a painter, but the boy was invincibly awkward at drawing. Geyer, too, died early, and just before his death, Richard, seven years old, was taught to play several tunes on the piano, and it was then first surmised that he might possibly possess talents for music. At nine he was sent to the Kreuzschule, at Dresden, with a view to the usual university career. His sisters at that time learned to play the piano properly; he listened without receiving instruction himself. At length a tutor was propounded, "Cornelius Nepos." He was induced to give him pianoforte lessons. Soon after the first finger exercises, the boy was caught studying by ear the overture to Der Freischütz. The master thought him a hopeless case, and was not far wrong, for Wagner has to the present day continued playing the piano in an abominable fashion. But music, though he was enthusiastic about it, was but an accessory to his studies, Greek, Latin, mythology, and ancient history being the main points. He made poems too. Once, in his eleventh year, the task of making a poem upon the death of a lately deceased member of the school was proposed to the pupils; Wagner's, being the best, was printed, after the removal of much bombastic excrement. Now, of all things, he wished to become a poet. He sketched tragedies in the ancient Greek form, and he passed muster in the school for a clever fellow in literis. As a member of third form he translated the first twelve books of the Odyssey; he learnt English, too, so as to be able to read Shakespeare properly, and he translated bits metrically. As a fruit of this study an immense tragedy was projected by the lad, a concoction made up of Hamlet and King Lear on a grand scale. Forty-two men died in the course of it, and he was obliged to make the greater number return as ghosts, so as to keep the last act sufficiently stocked with dramatis personæ. He was at work on this play for two years, left Dresden during its progress and came to Leipsic. Here, at the concerts of the Gewandhaus it was, that the works of Beethoven and Mozart, especially the former, made an enormous impression upon him, and, in imitation of Beethoven's Egmont, he wanted to add similar music to his play. Meanwhile his family had discovered that he had allowed this pursuit entirely to supersede his attention to philology, and there were, of course, endless troubles and recriminations in consequence. But he was not to be stopped. He wrote overtures for grand orchestra, a sonata, a quartet, &c. One overture, which he describes as the culminating point of his musical absurdities, was actually performed at the Leipsic Theatre. The public laughed at it, but the composer was much impressed by this first appearance in public.

Soon after this, and while he was a student at the Leipsic University, he felt the necessity of a strict and regular study of music, and he found the right man for his purpose in Theodor Weinlig, who was cantor at the Thomas School. With him he went through a thorough course of counterpoint, and laid a solid foundation for his future artistic development. Now were brought forth a considerable number of works, an overture, a symphony, the libretto, and some musical numbers for a tragic opera, &c. The year 1833 he spent at Würzburg, on a visit to a brother, an experienced singer, composing an opera in three acts, Die Feen, for which the story was taken from Gozzi's Woman Snake. After this, another opera, Das Liebesverbot, after Shakspeare's Measure for Measure, was completed. It was a difficult subject, and he was imprudent enough to give a performance of it at Magdeburg, in 1836, where for two years he had been conductor at the theatre, after only twelve days' preparation. The result was null, though some numbers which had been tolerably sung were applauded. The Magdeburg Theatre failed soon after this, and Wagner went to Berlin, with the hope of getting his opera performed there; failed, of course, and then, penniless and encumbered with debts, he accepted a conductorship at the theatre of Königsberg. There, in 1836, he married, and composed an overture, Rule Britannia. In 1837, we find him conductor at the theatre of Riga, and making sketches for his five-act tragic opera, Rienzi, which, as is well known, was the first of his works that has gained acceptance at most European opera-houses. He executed it on an immense scale, so as to make it suitable for the largest theatres only. With two acts of it finished, he started without money or connections, and without the smallest definite plan of action, for Paris.

At Boulogne, where he rested some weeks, he made the acquaintance of Meyerbeer, who, after seeing the score of Rienzi, gave him letters of introduction to the musical and theatrical notabilities of Paris. In consequence of these, things looked bright for some little time at Paris, but he soon found that to gain a hearing in Paris without the aid of influential friends on the spot (Meyerbeer did not stay there for any length of time during the two years of Wagner's sojourn) was a Herculean task beyond the reach even of such indomitable energy as his. He kept himself alive by writing articles for the Gazette Musicale, composing songs to French words, and, lastly, when things took a particularly unfavorable turn, by making arrangements for publishers of operatic tunes for all sorts of instruments. We have ourselves seen airs from Donizetti's Favorita, arranged by Wagner for the cornet-piston. Of serious work, during these years, an overture to Goethe's Faust, the final three acts of Rienzi, and the poem and music to his Fliegende Holländer, which latter was composed in seven weeks, must be enumerated. Giving up all hopes of Paris, he sent the score of Rienzi to the Court Theatre of Dresden. It was accepted, performed with immense success, in 1842, and Wagner, who had followed it to Dresden, found himself of a sudden the most popular man there, and the King of Saxony's court Capellmeister. A performance of Der Fliegende Holländer followed on the 2d January, 1845; and now, amidst the arduous duties of a principal conductorship at the Dresden Opera, one of the largest of German theatres, at which the performances are continued all the year round, and the répertoire is most varied, he conceived and executed the poems and music to Tannhäuser and Lohengrin, the cantata, Das Liebesmahl der Apostel, and the poems to Die Meistersinger and Siegfried's Tod.

The revolution of 1849, in which Wagner took active part with written or spoken addresses, put an end to his connection with Dresden; he had to fly, and to seek refuge at Zurich. During the next ten years he appeared before the public, if we except a few concerts which he conducted here and there, amongst which we may mention the eight concerts of the London Philharmonic Society in the season of 1815 only as a writer on musical æsthetics. In 1852, he was at work on the poems of Das Rheingold and Die Walküre, the composition of which was completed in 1854, and in '55 he began Tristan und Isolde and Siegfried. It had, during ten years of exile, been impossible for him to witness a performance in German of any of his dramatic works. Tannhauser, Der Hollaender, and Rienzi had become prime favorites everywhere in Germany, yet it was not until 1861 that he was allowed to return to his country. On the 9th of May in that year he heard Lohengrin for the first time at Vienna. Two months before that Tannhauser had been hooted off the stage at the Grand Opera of Paris, by the members of the Jockey Club. In 1863, he appeared at Vienna, Prague, Leipzig, St. Petersburg, Moscow, Pesth, &c., conducting orchestral concerts with brilliant success; and in May, 1866, King Ludwig II. called him to Munich where, in 1865, Tristan, in 1868, Die Meistersinger, in 1869, Das Rheingold, and in 1870, Die Walküre were performed, for the first time; the last, too, without the composer's co-operation. In August of that year he was married a second time, to Cosima von Bülow, née Liszt.

It would seem that his artistic career is about to reach its culminating point in the course of next year, when his most elaborate works—Der Ring der Nebelungen, a trilogy; Die Walküre, Siegfried, Götterdämmerung, with a preparatory evening, Das Rheingold, are to be produced under his own direction, at a theatre to be built for the purpose at Bayreuth. The shares, issued for seats during three successive performances of four evenings each, have been eagerly bought up; and thus the pecuniary difficulty, which so long stood in the way of Wagner's realizing this, his most cherished project, is at last overcome. Let these performances turn out a defeat of Sedan for his opponents, or of Waterloo for him; it is, at all events, beyond dispute that they will be the most interesting, and the most carefully prepared musical performances, that Germany has ever seen.

Handel's First Oratorios.

However ancient may be the musical mystery and the Roman oratory drama, it is very clear the Handel oratorio is a growth upon the Racine, Lulli, and Rameau concert spirituelle, or sacred drama, invented by Mme. de Maintenon for the gratification of the French king and the display of her troupe of beautiful girls in the convent of St. Cyr. Lulli's "Athaliah" and "Esther" set to the opera or drama by Racine was not the "Esther" of Handel, which Colman described in his diary as "an opera without acting, the singers being in a sort of gallery," for it was written in the right theatrical vein, and had all the advantage of suitable action and representative dress. Such was the French oratorio. At the first presentation of Handel's "Esther" in England—Handel takes the Racine and Lulli subject—it was played in character by the Chapel Royal boys; but when afterwards given to the general public the drama was performed without dress and action. From the construction of the dramas of "Esther," "Deborah," "Belshazzar," "Joseph," "Jephtha," "Joshua," and others of the Biblical cast it is plain Handel had the scene and the stage in his mind's eye, and would have mounted his sacred operas with all due dramatic accessories, had not English tastes and customs forbidden the experiment.

Handel's first attempts in oratorio were modelled on the prevalent fashion of songs and duets, and but short choruses. In this country it was difficult in his day to get native singers capable of singing his solo music, and the Italians were not always at hand, nor at his disposal, nor qualified to sing in the English language. It was necessary therefore to make a change, and to rely more upon the chorus than the solo singer. Although when Handel displaced Dr. Pepusch as Chapel Master to the Duke of Chandos, he had composed some large anthems, still it was not until ten years afterwards (1731) that he commenced to write his big choral compositions for the oratorio.

The "Acis and Galatea" was first remodelled, and then the "Esther," which in its new form was produced in 1732 "in the manner of a Coronation Service." After this came the "Deborah," given, 1733, in the Italian Opera House in the Haymarket. It was advertised as an opera, "a dramatic entertainment," and the house was to be filled up in "a particular manner." "Deborah" was a great success, and it led to the "Athaliah"—another Racine drama and also a great favorite.

With "Deborah" Handel began his odd, strange, and curious way of "making up" his sacred dramas. With the "Israel in Egypt" he borrowed from his neighbors—with the "Deborah" he pillaged from his own works. In 1717 he composed his now well-known Passione music; in 1707 he had written some Vesper Psalm choruses at Rome, and in 1727 he had composed the new anthem music for the Coronation of George II. The "Deborah" has some gorgeous choral music written expressly for the work, but much of the oratorio is a compilation from the Vesper Psalms, the Passione and the Coronation music. The chorus "Plead Thy just cause" is manipulated out of the "Dixit Dominus," and so also is "See the proud chief." "The King shall rejoice" supplies the music to "The Great King of kings," and the choruses "Let thy deeds," and "Despair all around," together with the two Hallelujah choruses, are selected from the Coronation music. The grand choral opening "Immortal Lord" terminates with a make up from the Queen Anne's Birthday Ode for 1713. As it is with the choruses so it is with songs—some of which are transplantations from the "Passione," others from the Birthday Ode. But there is in the new music a manifest advance in form and size. Bach, in 1729, had appeared with his great double choir and double orchestra "Passione" of the St. Matthew, and by 1732 it may well be conceived that Handel had heard of this gigantic undertaking, and had made up his mind to do something equally large should opportunity and means allow him. He had imitated the Court oratorio of St. Cyr, taken the "Esther" of Lulli for his model, and would now condescend to take a leaf out of the folio of the great Leipzig contrapuntist. In general brilliancy of melody, a clear, rolling on accompaniment, simple, straightforward counterpoint, grand and noble points, and a perpetual swing of unmistakable rhythm, Handel well knew he could enter the field with any living composer, and beat him perhaps in all these points. His long experience as a dramatic composer had taught him the strength and the weakness of human ears and human heads, and no one knew better than he what was required to create and sustain interest. He could write with superlative grandeur, with expressive force, with great pictorial effect, and with the deepest pathos, but he had the wit to feel that these were things to be held in reserve, and that for ordinary attraction—a go on—trot, trot, trot, and in rather a subliminary style, was the order best adapted to suit our English public. Artful contrivance, and appropriate and deep-seated expression might do in Leipzig, and in a Leipzig church, but would fail in London, and in a London theatre. Handel relied then on his fire and energy, his unexampled command over mechanism, his good memory, his ready wit: and in his first oratorios his exuberance, ingenuity, and felicitous execution, his stately and ever-moving accompaniments, his quick and characteristic expression take the place of those sublimer bursts which so mark his later oratorios. It is not that his science is less deep, his harmony less profound, his feeling less acute, his perception less vivid; but in these first works, introducing the new thing called an oratorio into this country, Handel had to be cautious and wary, and in some sense to feel his way.

The great charm of Handel's early work is its freshness: the composer seems to rejoice over what he is doing, and is neither in lack of matter or time to say it. Perhaps the most effective piece of writing in the "Deborah" is the chorus which ends the first act—the Hallelujah chorus, from the Coronation Anthem, "Let Thy Hand be strengthened." It is not so long as the "Hallelujah" which ends this oratorio, and which is taken from the Coronation Anthem "The King shall rejoice;" nor is it so elaborate. It is simply conceived in the best Italian way, and there is nothing to check its clear conception from the first bar to the last. In power it is enormous, and the effect is beyond measure exhilarating. As a model for church music to be used in a cathedral, it is not only unexceptionable but unparalleled. What a charm would be the services in Westminster Abbey and St. Paul's Cathedral if music like this could be heard in these two high churches! Its best recommendation remains; it is as easy to execute, as it is grand in result, needing but little rehearsal from either singers or players of but moderate pretensions. Although we describe it as an early work, the term must be received with some qualification. George II. was crowned in 1727, Handel was sixteen years of age at the commencement of the century, and he was therefore forty-three when writing this Coronation Music. He was in the prime of life, and it must be borne in mind that although he did not really commence oratorio composition until 1731, he had composed over forty operas, and had never ceased writing from the time when he first took up the pen to write the music for the Thanksgiving Day Service celebrated in St. Paul's, in the presence of Queen Anne, for the peace of Utrecht.

The public are now familiar with the opera, or oratorio, of "Deborah," and there remains the unheard oratorio of "Athaliah." The "Athaliah" proves the third of what may be termed Handel's early oratorios, and it is a most lively, genial, brilliant, and magnificent composition. A great favorite it was in Handel's day, and it still retains all its elements of popularity.

"Athaliah" was repeatedly performed at Exeter Hall in the days when Joseph Surman was sole monarch of that place, and why it should ever have been laid on one side is beyond comprehension. The overture is one of the best Handel ever made; the Baal music is altogether charming; the priests' music is superb; and the destruction of "Athaliah" and her idolatrous crew is gorgeously fine and overwhelming. If from its reproduction Mendelssohn's "Elijah" should lose some little of its interest, the musical public will be the gainers, and may learn how the young oratorio composer of 1847 studied at the feet of the great oratorio composer of 1733. No doubt there have been found out many new ways of making music during the intervening century, but none even yet has been produced which can rival or approach the strength and solidity of the Handelian system. It is a method that made both Handel and Bach, and its secret is not generally known to music makers. Every presentation of an unknown oratorio of Handel will be a republication of his method of composing, by which our modern composers will be enlightened, the singer instructed, and the general public delighted.—London Orchestra.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Wm. Mason's Piano Technics.

BY W. B. MATHews.

The modern art of piano-playing dates no further back than Hummel, and in its more distinctive development, only so far as Thalberg, Liszt, and Chopin. The pianoforte itself in its present sonority, delicate action, and expressive tone, has been achieved for the first time by manufacturing firms still in the full tide of successful operation.

The first great attempt to provide a course of exercises calculated to develop all the necessary muscles was by Hummel, and filled a book of five or six hundred pages. By diligent study of this work it was possible for one to acquire a technique adequate to the performance of classic music; but for the works of Liszt and Chopin it affords no adequate preparation. For many years Bach's "Well-Tempered Clavier" was the dependence of teachers for rendering the fingers independent of each other. Of late, however, this work has been going out of use, for the reason that it is inadequate to the development of a sufficiently vigorous touch to elicit the sonorous tone that modern taste requires.

There are also a large number of "Studies" by Czerny and others, each designed to meet some particular mechanical deficiency. But excellent as these are, they require too much time; and this because they are not sufficiently radical. The few simple principles that underlie the use of the hand in piano-playing are therein nowhere developed. The same is true, but in a less degree, of Plaidy's excellent system of technics. Too much stress is laid upon the so-called "five-finger" position of the hand, to the serious neglect of certain important classes of muscles (as will hereafter appear), and not enough provision is made for that variety of touch and emphasis which expressive playing so largely requires.

All these elaborate systems meet one formidable adversary in the fact that the great piano virtuosi have each some favorite exercise, always of a simple character, by the diligent practice of which they manage to keep their hands in serviceable condition. For instance, Thalberg used scales with accents; Liszt uses this exercise:

played ascending and descending with each pair of fingers in turn. This same exercise, if I am correctly informed, is Miss Mehlig's usual dependence. Dreychock practiced arpeggios. Wehli depends on scales. Now it stands to reason that if elaborate volumes of Etudes like Czerny's and Köhler's are necessary to develop the hand to a reasonable efficiency, a similar course of practice will be necessary in order to keep it in that state when once attained. But that simple means serve to keep the hand in an efficient state, the practice of the great virtuosi referred to, sufficiently proves.

A more complete system of practice than those of Thalberg, Liszt, or Dreychock, and a far more simple and radical one than those of Czerny, Köhler, and the others, has been developed by Mr. William Mason, and after undergoing the test of a number of years' use in teaching, was published in the last part of "Mason and Hoadley's New Method for Piano-forte" in 1867. My first knowledge of this system was drawn solely from the book when first published. My first impression was that the distinctive feature of the new system was the accentuation, and the use of this I found to be very much to the advantage of my pupils, as it gave their playing a decision and characteristic energy which before was wanting. I found also that it greatly improved their sense of rhythm; but at the same time, especially in the case of those who practiced on poor pianos, or who were wanting in a delicate musical ear, I found that the practice of accentuation in groups of twos, threes, and fours, if long continued, had the effect to render the touch exceedingly dry and unmusical.

Nearly two years ago I had the opportunity of observing the method in which Mr. Mason himself applied the system, and then I learned that it was his practice to keep the pupil but a very short time on the proximate accents (the twos, threes, and fours), and to go immediately to the larger systems of grouping, the eights, nines and sixteens; and that especially the nines held a very high place in his estimation. By degrees, also, I discovered that the great distinguishing trait of his system of exercises was not in the accentuation, but in the peculiar combination of arpeggio and scale practice, together with his own modification of Liszt's two-finger exercise; and that this combination was based on a practical experience of the benefit therefrom derived, as well as from a philosophical analysis of the various groups of muscles employed in piano-playing. And of this rationale of technique I propose now to speak.

In playing the pianoforte there are three classes of motions employed by the fingers. First, and simplest, the direct vertical action of the fingers, as required in the five-finger exercises, the hand remaining quiet but not rigid. Second, the lateral adjustment of the fingers so as to bring each over its own key. This class of actions enters into the performance of all scales, arpeggios, and, in short, all passages except five-finger exercises. And this requires the careful training of the lateral muscles of the fingers—a point fatally overlooked in elementary practice hitherto. Third, the complete flexion of all the joints of the fingers, as partly illustrated on pages 40 and 62 of Mason and Hoadley's Method. These three classes embrace, I believe, all the finger actions that enter into playing. There remains the action of the hand in chords and octaves, and the training of the arm to measure skips accurately. Let us now discuss in detail the exercises resorted to for each of these three kinds of action.

Contrary to precedent, Mr. Mason spends very little time in the practice of the first class of motions, for these enter into all the others, and a moderate amount of attention at the outset is sufficient to establish the proper method of performing them. The beginner takes first the two finger exercise, thus:

The first finger is placed on C and held down with a steady pressure; the second finger is extended, straight, so as to bring the point about an inch above the key, and the D is struck in the act of instantly shutting the finger, as illustrated in the case of the whole hand by the cuts on pages 40 and 62 as before mentioned. This exercise is to be played very slowly, not more than one note a second, up and down the scale one octave, at least ten times. Then comes exactly the same thing with the second and third fingers, and then with the third and fourth. A similar routine is gone through with the left hand. The points on which caution is necessary are two: See that the first key is held down exactly until the second is struck; Second, take care to have the second key struck with a sweeping motion of the point of the finger as it passes from its raised position extended to its point of contact with the palm of the hand (as when the fist is doubled up); this finger strikes the key in passing, and the moment of contact between the finger and the key is as short as possible. Both keys are struck somewhat firmly, so as to give out a bold, sonorous tone. In this way great strength and independence of finger are acquired. In time, however, a certain hardness will begin to manifest itself in the touch, and this must be met when it appears with the rapid and light practice of the same exercise, the motion being now confined to what anatomists call the joints of the first phalanx of the fingers. In giving this exercise to pupils the teacher should play it in concert with them; in this way they acquire the proper movement much more rapidly.

Of this exercise much might be said. These two kinds of touch, the clinging and the staccato or elastic, afford a summary of the art of phrasing; for the clinging touch we use to carry a melody, and the elastic or staccato to terminate a phrase. It brings into action in the simplest and surest way possible, the sustained tension of certain muscles in prolonging a tone, and the instantaneous flexion of all the joints of the fingers and all the contractile muscles.

In a twenty years' diligent study of the piano and piano-teaching, I have never found another one exercise that would alone go so far to keep the hand in good condition as the systematic practice of this for twenty minutes a day.

Mr. Mason's second "best hold" (as somebody out West says) is the arpeggio of the diminished chord and its changes, as treated in the Method before referred to. A new pupil is first given the chord by being made to place his thumb on C, and then omit two keys and put down the next finger, and so on till all are down. Thus is obtained the diminished chord of C; and so learned the pupil will never forget it. The first few weeks' practice on the arpeggio of this chord is done by the hands separately, the left hand coming up four octaves, and the right hand playing down. This is done at first without accentuation, until the pupil playing slowly can easily find the right keys to strike. It is then accented in fours, beginning with the first tone, according to the pattern given in Nos. 174 and 175, on page 195 of Mason & Hoadley's Method. When the diminished chord can be well done in these ways, the "harmonic changes" are introduced, with small scholars one at a time; with larger ones, two changes at a lesson. The value of the changes lies in this, that each new adjustment places the lateral or tumbrici muscles of the fingers in a different relative tension. And the value of this arpeggio in general consists in the separation it gives the fingers, and in using the third finger as often as the first and second, whereas the scale employs this weak finger only half as often. As soon as the accentuation of eights has been well mastered, the pupil is introduced to that of threes, and through that to nines, as in Nos. 177 and 178 in the same book. The reason of placing the threes and nines after the fours is that in the latter the accent falls on the same finger throughout the exercise, while in threes and nines the accent never falls on the same finger twice in succession.

The grouping of nines makes it necessary to carry the arpeggio up and down nine times before it terminates with an accent on the lower key. And this at once affords the pupil great assistance in sustained performance, one of the greatest difficulties the beginner meets; for in this case the whole mind is given to the effort to come through successfully the whole nine times, no attention being diverted to the effort to follow notes with the eye. As soon as the individual arpeggios are carried through each nine times easily, the pupil is given a routine performance, embracing the diminished chord and the six harmonic changes, (Nos. 180, 181, 182, 187, 188 and 189), each of which in succession is played up and down once, in the accent of nines, and the whole routine is repeated nine times, in all sixty three times up and down the key-board. This exercise looks formidable in the description, but if led up to properly, it is easily understood by small scholars, and practiced with great interest.

The advantage of using the hands separately in this way consists in a greater certainty that the left hand accents and plays cleanly, as well as the right; and as each one is carried in its easiest direction, a finger touch is more readily obtained. That the playing is to be perfectly legato, I need not say. Should there be any difficulty about this, have the exercise practiced very slowly (one note a second) and while the finger holds the key, let the next finger be raised preparatory to striking the next key, so that the moment when the stroke begins the point of the finger is at least an inch from the key. The advantages of the accentuation are to be found in the cultivation of the pupil's sense of rhythm, the more intelligent training of the finger to strike heavy or light at will, and the consequent cultivation of the ear to discriminate and listen for equality or emphasis, according to the artistic requirement of the moment. After a thorough course of this kind extending through at least two diminished chords and their changes, both hands are employed together in sixths, according to Nos. 196, etc.

In scale practice, Mr. Mason employs the accent of nines, chiefly, through a compass at first of one octave, then of two and four; and in each compass through all the major scales. At first rapidity is not sought. The fingering is made more certain and the hands more independent by the canon form, as in No. 147 of the book; only he uses here also the accent, beginning with the first note of the left hand. This canon form is extremely valuable, and scholars practice it with great interest. Next in gradation of difficulty comes the scale practice in velocity, according to the directions given on page 41. This is at first to reach but one octave; then let it be extended one or two notes at each lesson until four octaves compass is reached, which you may be sure will not be in a short time. At every lesson, however, give a different scale. What is wanted is perfect equality in all keys. This velocity practice requires a firm and resonant tone to begin with, a leggiere touch in passing, and a sharp, quick blow on the final key—like the crack of a whip.

These, in brief, are the elements of Mr. Mason's finger technique. I ought to add that the chromatic scale is treated with accents, canon and velocity, the same as the diatonic, but with less persistence. It remains now to speak of his method of combining them into a system of daily practice. And this can quickly be explained. Forty-five minutes a day practice on these exercises will give an excellent parlor technique; and an hour and a quarter a day will give a concert technique;—at least, so says Mr. Mason. To the forty-five minute part of the rule I can bear testimony. The work is divided as follows: two-finger exercise, ten minutes; arpeggio, twenty minutes; scales, (in the different methods) fifteen minutes; total 45 minutes. And from frequent experiments I have no hesitation in declaring that this amount of practice so distributed is easier done by the pupil, and results in a more brilliant, flexible, and delicate technique, than two hours a day exclusively devoted to the best exercises of Czerny, Köhler, and the others. And in this way the pupil, out of two hours' practice, has an hour and a quarter left to study real music, and this, after all, is the true chief end of piano lessons. Technique is only a means of artistic performance, and must be kept in due subjection thereto; but it cannot be kept in due subjection by the allotment of twice as much practice to exercises as to music.

Whatever the teacher may say, the pupil will always regard as of the most importance the points on which she spends most time.

Should these observations have the effect to cause some other piano teacher to break his "lasting silence," I shall be exceedingly glad; for methods are to be improved only by free interchange of criticism.

Mlle. Nilsson in Opera.

(From the Boston Daily Advertiser, March 4).

Boston has said farewell to the great singer whose magic skill has brought so many of us under a spell more complete and more enchanting than that which any other artist has been able to weave. The programme of Friday evening, offensive as it was to that sense of harmony and of unity which is keenest in the most highly cultivated minds, had the merit of introducing Mlle. Nilsson in three representative yet strongly contrasted impersonations; and the pathetic and poetic loveliness of her Lucia, the gay witchery and vivacity of her Martha and the subtle delicacy and intense, restrained passion of her Marguerite will linger long in the memories of the listeners, heightening the remarkable versatility and creative power of the artist who presented them.

It would seem as if the series of performances which was given on Friday night would be of itself sufficient to settle the question of Mlle. Nilsson's rank as an operatic performer with every sensitive and appreciative mind. But we are bound not to forget that the consciousness of her superlative merit, how clear soever it was at first, has steadily grown and developed in every one who has faithfully followed and studied her impersonations: the better she is known the more complete and wonderful does her genius appear; and in this fact alone we discover the application of a test of real greatness which seldom or never deceives. From this judgment, which has been passed upon Mlle. Nilsson by the best critical as well as popular opinion of Europe and America, we are aware that some persons in this country of genuine musical taste and unquestionable culture dissent; but the explanation of their disagreement will be found, we suspect, in the circumstance that they have seen but little of her operatic performance, and have formed an opinion upon insufficient consideration. Such an artist as Nilsson cannot, of course, be comprehended, even as to her method, in a few scattered hearings. And if all who are competent to judge of her rank as a performer, would but follow her carefully through an entire series of her operatic assumptions, we do not think it presumptuous to assert that their verdict would be practically unanimous as to her extraordinary rank. We make no account, we hardly need to say, of those who are so jaundiced by personal prejudice or so blinded by personal interest as to be incapable of doing justice, or of those pitiful clamorers whose simple theory of criticism consists in valuing artists in inverse proportion to the price of tickets affixed by their managers. But as things are, what reason can be urged against the claim which is made in behalf of Mlle. Nilsson for the first place among the operatic artistes who have appeared in this country since the days of Grist? We have never heard of but one, and that was founded upon the ludicrous conception of what alone constitutes a great singer which may be described as peculiar to America. Very many of us insist that our vocal music, like our oratory, must be delivered ore rotundo; that the loudest in song and in speech are alike entitled to the highest honor. Mlle. Nilsson's voice, these persons tell us, is not so inflexibly true to the pitch, not so full, so strong, so brilliant and so sonorous as Mme. Rosa's, for example, and therefore she is not so great a singer as the latter, or as some other artistes of similar qualifications. It is vain to suggest to such critics that Nilsson's voice is exquisitely and wonderfully sweet, that it has a delicacy of tone which is literally incomparable, that it is perfectly cultivated, remarkably flexible, and very pure; to all this they merely reply that it does not fill their ears as do the big, sonorous organs. And if one goes further and asserts that for the expressive quality, which is the first and highest characteristic of a great singer's voice, Mlle. Nilsson is preëminent, the remark is very likely to be met with sheer uncomprehending vacancy. We do not mean to say that people of good taste have not the right to prefer one order of voices to another, according to their capacity for pleasing the ear; but we do protest against the absurd, crude and inert judgment which insists upon despising and depreciating all voices which are not of a certain calibre and style; it would be only just as barbarous or as childish to sneer at a tea rose for not being a cactus, or to scorn the fragrance of the lily of the valley because it is weaker than that of the magnolia.

In discussing the question of preëminence upon the operatic stage, however, the standard of comparison has one element which is absolutely certain, and which may be fairly called self-evident. Assuming, in two candidates for the highest places, voices of decided power and of great beauty, sweetness and cultivation—though the degree of eminence in these qualities may be widely different—that one will inevitably carry away the palm who has the higher capacity for the expression of thought and feeling and the greater gift for exciting the emotions of her audience. And, judging by this unerring rule, the unprejudiced critic is compelled to assign to Mlle. Nilsson the first position among all the artistes who have appeared in opera in this country during the past fifteen years, and the second place among all those who have ever favored America with their impersonations; and this without derogation or depreciation of the high and honorable claims of other great and eminent performers. The test first mentioned is indeed one which is easily applied, and whose results it is impossible for anything but the blindest perversity to misinterpret.

Mlle. Nilsson inspires her listeners with "thoughts above the reaches of their souls"; she interprets the idea of the composer so that it is carried home to the consciousness of the dullest spectator; and she sways the hearts of those who hear her as with the very inspiration of eloquence. Look into the faces of her auditors, and you shall see something far better and far higher than that expression of half-animal enjoyment which comes from drinking the sweetness of melodies. It is not alone that she is—as her few detractors carelessly admit—a great actress; she is that indeed, but she is also a great dramatic singer. Her faultless phrasing and her perfect grace and finish of style do much to make her so, but she adds to these that inexplicable power of charging her music with the exact degree and shade of feeling which her genius recognizes as demanded by the composition and the situation. Oftentimes indeed,—as we have said on other occasions,—she transcends the conception of her composer, and gives to his work a fullness, a fervor and an intensity which proceeds rather from her own soul than from his. The power of interpreting her music emotionally, of extracting from it, as it were, every smallest portion of its sentiment, is exhibited in the minutest details as well as in the main conceptions of her renderings. The grand ideas of the aria, recitative, or declamatory passage are grasped most accurately yet most imaginatively, and every delicate phase and variation of the thought is followed and expressed with a subtle skill which is almost pictorial in its character.

Almost numberless illustrations might be given of this marvellous double power, but some of the most striking are to be found in Mlle. Nilsson's renderings of "Non conosco il bel suol" from "Mignon," of her part in the "Leggendaria Rondinella" of the same work, of "Ah! fors'è lui" from "La Traviata," of the recitative and air in the "Mad Scene" from "Lucia," of "D'amor sul di rosee," from "Il Trovatore," and of all her music in the great third act of "Faust." And this gift of emotional expression in her music is of course supplemented and intensified by her commanding powers as a purely dramatic artiste. As an actress, as all who have seen her admit, she is really great; her power reaches from archness and coquetry to the highest form of passion and of agony; everywhere it is vital, magnetic and impressive. We have not even taken into account the personal beauty of the artiste, her perfect grace of motion, and the marvellous skill and freedom in action and gesture which at once delights the eyes and stirs the minds of all who see her. Outside these things, and beyond all that has been rehearsed, there remains the gift of unquestioned genius, which informs and vitalizes all her operatic assumptions. Nothing short of this will account for that undefined and indefinable charm which rests upon all her works as an artiste; nothing else will explain the swift electric power which flashes at single moments from single tones and looks and gestures; nothing but this could avail to make the efforts of other performers, who are unquestionably great, seem dull and tame and colorless beside hers. That she has the producing power of genius has, in truth, been seen again and again; she created the part of Ophelia in Thomas's "Hamlet;" she recreated his Mignon; she has substituted a poetic and passionate Lucia for Donizetti's insignificant heroine; she has made the commonplace Leonora of "Il Trovatore" absolutely grand in her intensity; and she has interpreted the Marguerite of Gounod with a subtlety, an insight and an imaginative grasp which have never been approached upon our operatic stage. Mlle. Nilsson came to this country after she had won the high favor of the first European critics and had conquered the audiences of its two greatest capitals. The unprecedented success of her American career speaks well for the taste of the leaders of our public opinion and for the susceptibility of our people to the best and noblest interpretation of the divinest of the arts.

The Musical Pitch.

Musicians are a combative race—they revel in pitched battles. The diapason dispute is again revived, and vibratory movements are the order, or rather disorder of the day. It is no longer a prima donna or a tenor who has commenced the conflict, but a select body of amateurs, artists and manufacturers, who, in a conclave at the Royal Albert Hall have passed a pronouncement proclaiming the pitch of 528 double vibrations of the C, adopted by the Society of Arts some years since, and which is the standard agreed upon at Stuttgart, in 1834, at a congress of professors. This Swabian diapason is to be the ruling fork at the recitals of the next International Exhibition, provided Her Majesty's Commissioners ratify the resolution. It may be remembered that the Stuttgart pitch of the Adolphi mathematicians and musicians was never adopted except on paper; but the Oratorio Concerts opened originally in St. James's Hall with another pitch—that which was made the subject of an Imperial Decree in France, the C = 522, and which now prevails in that and other countries. But Mr. Barnby, after fighting a good battle, had to strike his flag and revert to the Philharmonic pitch, which has existed so many years. A ludicrous attempt by the National Choral Society to use a pitch C = 508, suggested by Herr Manns, was a complete fiasco in Exeter Hall. Now it is agreed on all hands that some uniform standard is highly desirable; but it is a vexed question amongst musicians, at home and abroad, whether it is necessary to disturb the status quo, for the outlay would involve a large expenditure throughout the country, and the query, "Who is to pay?" has never been satisfactorily answered. The fact is, that without legislative enactment no uniformity will ever be attained, and Parliament as yet has not manifested any very special sympathy for musical matters. As things stand, after last Saturday's manifesto there will be in the present season diverse diapasons. Assuming that her Majesty's Commissioners sanction the Stuttgart pitch, the Royal Albert organ must be altered, and the leading instrumentalists playing on the wood and brass must purchase new instruments. At the Royal Italian Opera, Mme. Patti has carried her point with the Impresario, who will enforce the French diapason. The Sacred Harmonic Society, and Philharmonic Society, the Crystal Palace, etc., will assuredly adopt the Stuttgart pitch. We shall have some curious charimaris arising out of the varied standards of tonality. One curious fact connected with the Stuttgart pitch does not appear to have transpired at the recent gathering, of which Mr. John Hullah was president. There is a famed tenor in the Wurtemberg capital, with a magnificent chest voice, who can launch the high C sharp with electrical force. It was at the instigation of this artist, Herr Sontheim, that the congress to change the pitch was held, the King of Wurtemberg having been alarmed at the notion of losing such a popular singer for a few vibrations more or less in existing diapasons. But after the expense had been incurred, and it was considerable, of establishing the newly adopted diapason, Herr Sontheim disliked the change so much, that he insisted upon a restoration of the original pitch, and he sings with no uncertain sound, to the old standard, at this very time. Mr. Sims Reeves, who took such a prominent part in the agitation for altering our Philharmonic standard, proclaiming it to be destructive to his voice, has never, during his career, been singing more finely, with his organ in better condition, than since the pitch of the Oratorio Concerts was abandoned. The fact is, that transposition can always be resorted to to relieve a singer in distress. The C = 528 of the opera houses and concert rooms will never be altered, until the financial outlay is provided for, and the hard working and ill-paid artists, who will have to provide new instruments, are compensated. —London Orchestra.

COLOGNE.—Third Soirée for Chamber Music: Pianoforte Quartet, Schumann; String Quartet, in C minor, Op. 25, Gernsheim; and Quintet, C major, Schubert.—Sixth Gürzenich Concert: Overture to Oberon, Weber; tenor air from Euryanthe, Weber (Herr Augustin Raff, from Mayence); Violin Concerto, Bruch (Herr Leopold Auer, from St. Petersburg); "Nordische Sommernacht," Gernsheim; Andante and Minuet, from the first Canoniche Suite, Grimm; Violin Solos, Ries and Auer; and Second Symphony, Mendelssohn.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MARCH 9, 1872.

Italian Opera.—Nilsson.

The brief farewell season (eight nights and two matinées) of the fascinating Swedish singer and her lyrico-dramatic associates is of the past. Despite the enormous prices, the multitude of other entertainments, musical, theatrical, literary, the inclement weather much of the time, and despite fashionable Lent, it was a fortnight of crowded houses (except on one or two "off nights"—meaning in this case sans-Nilsson nights), and success almost unprecedented. Indeed so great was the enthusiasm about this fine and rare individuality in song and lyrical impersonation; so almost universal had become the conviction of her positive genius, in addition to the charms of voice and person; so versatile and subtle had she proved herself in throwing all her own individuality into the individuality of each successive rôle, however different, and re-creating it and giving it a new life, hacknied as it might have been for years, that even such wretched trash as Verdi's Trovatore, with Nilsson in it, drew two crammed and eager houses. We do not believe that any other singer at this day could keep the same hold on an experienced music-loving public with so indifferent and commonplace a repertoire; for the whole fortnight offered only one new piece, Mignon, and of the old familiar pieces not one great one, not one work of genius ever fresh, except Rossini's Barbiere for an "off" night. The well-worn and fatiguing names of Lucia di Lammermoor, Il Trovatore, Martha, Fra Diavolo (the last two really bright and charming if not heard too often) exhaust the list.

Miss Nilsson's Lucia, in the general opinion, even transcended her revivification of the part when she was here before. Her subtle genius clothes itself in the cast off garments of an outlived heroine, and quickens into life the unsuspected ideal which it found within there. The virginal purity and sweetness, the tremulous forebodings of a young heart fearing its own too great happiness, in the first scene; the tragic pathos of the betrothal; even that most painful of all things to witness on the stage, ordinarily, the crazy scene, all became beautiful, consistent, luminous with Art's pure imaginative halo, in her new reproduction. And how exquisitely she sang! How wonderfully the pure, silvery voice revelled in the florid ecstasy of the bravura in the mad scene!—Martha, on the other hand, for Nilsson, is pure play and self-recovery almost; with inimitable grace and archness her elastic voice and spirits go with the gay current of the music, her every look and motion musical as her song. In such things she never quite repeats herself; it is hearty, sincere play and partly improvised. All the more natural the tenderness, when her heart feels the serious side of the adventure. Verdi's Trovatore we had not ventured to witness for at least a decade. The impression that we got of it when we heard its first performance in this country, in New York, and which we recorded then at length, was never modified by further hearings. In plot most barbarous and cruel; in its would-be characters unreal,—some of them mere scarecrows of a sensational melodrama; in its music hard and overstrained, with plenty of ingenuity, but not a spark of genius, and, what is worse, devoid of human tenderness, effective only, not emotional,—the pervading musical motive of the piece being a sort of idée fixe in the crazed brain of a gypsy woman of the whirling flame and smoke of her mother's burning at the stake, and the famous Miserere of the last scene being but the dismal prelude to another burning,—its popularity is only to be accounted for upon the same principle with the vulgar passion for reading of horrible crimes and murders in the newspapers, besides the charm which strong, brilliant, quasi impassioned, intense singing has for the peculiar class of music-lovers who still cling to the modern Italian opera as their ideal of strong if not healthy musical expression. This time we heard it once for the sake of the new Leonora. But the play as a whole, the characters, the music were the same as of old, only more so; too much good music, too many works of genius had intervened, widening the gulf between true Art and bugaboo productions of this cheap order. Its iron-clad and soulless melodies, full of jerk and perpetual sforzando, so trying to the voices—tunes which seem to have been forged upon those gypsy anvils—have just the charm of acrobatic feats. Of musical working out of themes, of subtle and fine traits of accompaniment, of true artistic development, of pervading geniality, there is nothing. The Miserere is effective, by many admired; but is it not morbid, artificial, without religion or a deep sincerity of any kind, and does it not dismally pall upon repeated hearing? The one relief was Nilsson; the one part that admits of any idealism, such as she would be sure to find in it, is that of Leonora. That she did put life and soul into the only human personage in the absurd plot,—and even that a tame one without a Nilsson—must be admitted; and it is new evidence of her creative power that she could make it beautiful, touching, noble,—in action always, in song wherever the cold, wilful music would admit,—and this amidst such ghastly companionship, a ray of pure white light in such a lurid atmosphere, was proof enough that her power transcends the mere sensational, that her Art is sincere. Yet why may we not hear her in music better worthy of her, in music which she loves far better than she can love this, in works like Don Giovanni, Figaro, Fidelio,—or in something new like Hamlet, all of which she was both ready and eager, on her part, to give? When shall we have Opera management, which will not make all secondary to hopes of gain, content to minister to Art itself, with faith enough in man to know that it will pay—reasonably and surely? Never till Opera becomes a local institution.—Nilsson could breathe life into the Leonora; it were too much to expect that BRIGNOLI could do the same for that nonentity the Troubadour, although he has some pretty songs, which the stout gentle tenor sings as well as ever, being in good voice of late. But whether he be Troubadour or be Edgardo, he is pretty much the same. The gypsy Azucena is a somewhat picturesque, though morbid, crazed and gloomy part; Miss CARY sang it very finely, with rich, telling voice, and acted well. The Count di Luna is simply a bugbear of jealousy and cruelty; a very coarse instrument with two strings. The anvils can no longer be galvanized into new life, since they have become Gilmorized; why not let G. have them altogether and hammer on them to his heart's content!

The event of the fortnight was the Mignon of Ambrose Thomas, heard here for the first time. It was given three times, and with increasing interest. As a drama merely it is lively, natural, and very picturesque, the plot being based on Goethe's Wilhelm Meister, with a difference, but reproducing some of its characters, as Mignon, the light-hearted flirt and actress Philina, and indeed Meister himself, with some fidelity. The old harper is merged into Lothario. The contrasts of character are very happy for an opera of half light, half serious, not tragic, nature. The scenes and groupings are all attractive and pleasantly exciting. Every part was cleverly presented, and all well accompanied. But the centre of interest from the beginning, about all the time, is the mysterious poor child Mignon.—Nilsson's Mignon, who has just stepped out from Ary Scheffer's picture. On the first night you are so absorbed in her that you scarcely take note of the music as such. At any rate the music, if not great, if not very learned or original, is not obtrusive; never offensive though those clapping cadenzas, &c., of modern operas, purely designed to catch encores and interrupt the current of the drama; you only feel that it is graceful, light for the most part, often delicate, not too suggestive of other people's music, and that it floats the drama easily and smoothly. A second time, you discover, that though the Overture is trivial, and dance melodies abound, bright and fresh ones (precisely suited to the gay and pretty part of Philina, and the voice and style of Mlle. DUVAL, who never looked or sang so charmingly in any other part), though in just the serious and important moments (as where Mignon discovers Wilhelm's love for her and rushes to his arms) the music is found wanting; and though there is not much continuous working up of themes;—yet it is full of delicate and dainty bits, both in voices and in instrumentation; traits that reveal an author of refinement, and indeed one who is conversant with the classical masters. Little turns and modulations, ehaste and sparing, but effective, even reminded us at times of such traits in the "Water-Carrier", and we find that Thomas studied in the French Conservatoire while Cherubini was director. One is haunted, among other piquant little morceaux, by the very quaint, light, antique sounding little entr'acte (Gavotte) played before the second act, and recurring once or twice again.

The principal air for Mignon: "Kenst du das Land" (the opera was sung in Italian) is not remarkable for such a theme, and doubtless passed by many unsuspected, if they did not follow the libretto. Yet it is touching, delicate, and appropriate enough, and is made beautifully eloquent with Nilsson's voice and free and glowing action as she recalls the blue Italian skies. The duet of "the swallows," too, with the old harper (who turns out at last to be her father) is full of a keen childlike joy and sense of nature. There is a good serious song for Wilhelm in the latter part, though the promise of the opening is hardly kept, by which CAROUL won an encore; and indeed in this, as in the entire rôle, his singing, action, whole appearance, were as good and artist-like as one could wish. There are some beautiful concerted pieces, also; particularly a Trio leading into a general ensemble in the first act, and the love duet of Mignon and Wilhelm in the last act.

Hear it a third time, and while the music holds its own,—although it does not satisfy just where you need it most,—and even continues to reveal unnoticed beauties in detail, the unique charm and power of Nilsson's Mignon still grow on you and rivet your attention chiefly, and yet so wholesomely that you can afford a hearty recognition all the while to her companions, including, besides those already mentioned, Mons. JAMET, so dignified and so affecting in his search for his lost child, as well as the minor part of Laertes the actor (Mr. LYALL) and the enamored little page (Mlle. FERRETTI, with her one song), besides the chorus of the gypsy crew. But Mignon is in constant action from the moment that she is rudely roused from sleep (looking as if that sleep were just the only solace left for the poor child in this life) to dance the egg dance, to the last scene of the play. And how consistently and perfectly, with unobtrusive song and action, she realizes every shifting phase and moment of the character, can only be conceived through actual sight and hearing. There could not be a part more suited to her, though Margaret in Faust is one of higher reach and more intensity; she is a sort of Mignon, wonderingly led on by her own genius and by favoring fortune out of obscurity into a rich new world of life.

It is needless for us now to characterize her singing, or to recall in detail all the fine imaginative traits in her impersonation of the Mignon of Thomas, which, if not Goethe's, could not have existed without that for its haunting and inimitable model. Of the first task we have, after a fashion, tried to acquit ourselves before; the latter, seeing it so well done, we may safely leave to the critic of the Advertiser, whose last word on "Nilsson in Opera," also, we have found so much to our mind that we were tempted to transfer it to our columns. This writer says, and we say mainly with him :

The Nigron of the novel, like the plot of the novel, almost loses its identity in passing into the substance of the opera; she loses much of her spirituality, taken on much of the common earth, and almost wholly ceases to be weird and mysterious. And yet who but Mlle. Nilsson could be capable of the infinite variety of feeling and expression which the character demands? The sweet naïveté and touching simplicity of the young girl when first she is rescued from her hateful life among the gypsies; the suggestions of her origin and childhood exquisitely, though dimly, shadowed in her prayer to the Virgin; the strange, soul-yearning that finds its utterance in the lovely melody which describes the home of her heart and of her hope; the birth of love amidst tears and sighs and little jealousies and great agonies; and the final realizations of the daughter's and the woman's longing,—all these are gathered together in the impersonation of Mlle. Nilsson, and are joined in a creature of real flesh and blood, but wonderful in the variety of her phases, moods and manifestations. The delivery of her great [?] song, "Non consoci il bel suol," was without exception the most vivid piece of dramatic song which we can recall. The meaning of each sentence—nay, of every word—breathed and burned upon the lips of the singer, and each change in the thought was carried home to the consciousness of the spectator by action so subtle, so expressive and, above all, so magnificently strong and free as to carry upon itself the stamp of genius. The grand gesture with which, in the first stanza, Mlle. Nilsson indicated the sweep of the "cloudless heaven" of the Italian sky was worthy of Rachael or of Ristori, and the yearning of tone and of action which accompanied the utterances of the second stanza was indescribable in its simplicity and pathos. Kindred with this, though again varied and discriminated from it in a hundred ways—we must count the singing and acting of the artiste in the scene in which she seeks to take her own life and in which she calls down curses upon her rival, and in the whole of the last act, in which she awakens as out of a heavy sleep to the ecstasy of a new life and a new love. In direct contrast with all this were the scenes in the second part, in which her native vanity and love of dress were called into play, and in which she is exposed to the torment of witnessing the flirtations of the man of her heart with the seductive Filina. In the former she was charming with a freshness, a brilliancy, and a gracefulness which completely eclipsed the efforts of other performers in similar parts, and in the latter the spirit and variety of her action were nothing short of amazing. Impatience, disgust, anger and grief chased each other through her face and found utterance in every motion, every posture and every muttered word; every part of her person seemed eloquent with meaning, and yet no action or pose was repeated, even long after it seemed as if the gamut of impatient expression was exhausted. The whole performance, indeed, was unique and wonderful in its coherence, its life, its imaginative power and its immense fertility of invention; its beauty was a thing to dream of; its pathos seemed drawn from nature itself; and its sprightliness, its vividness and force made even the best efforts of other artists seem pale, weak and tasteless.

Mr. Capoul as Guglielmo displayed the exquisite delicacy and graceful warmth of style which now identify him to all the patrons of the opera as almost the first of operatic lovers.

Concerts.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION. The eighth Symphony Concert (Friday afternoon, Feb. 23d) proved more interesting than many had anticipated, who had (not without reason) some misgivings about works of new composers. To our feeling it was a quite enjoyable, good concert, but not precisely of the best. It opened with a Concert Overture by Gade (in C major, No. 3, Op. 14), never played here before. It has not the taking color contrasts of the "Ossian" and the "Highlands" overture, but it is a spirited, large, massive composition, richly instrumented for the full orchestra throughout,—perhaps too uniformly so, and in the composer's Northern, dreamy vein, yet without any sentimental weakness. It was well played and made a grand impression. The exquisite Andante and Adagio (Nos. 4 and 5) from Beethoven's "Prometheus" Ballet music followed, with nice rendering, and never was the beauty of the violoncello melody and variations (Mr. HART-DEGEN), and the answering phrases of the flutes, clarionets and bassoons, more appreciable; one breathes a sweet contentment and repose in music so sincere and simple and yet so refined. The third of Beethoven's Piano Concertos, that in C minor, is certainly a noble and delightful work, ranking commonly, and justly, as only next to those in E flat and in G. The orchestration is rich, original and striking in comparison with its predecessors, and the pianoforte part offers high argument and field for any artist's best interpretative powers. Mr. J. C. D. PARKER played it carefully and conscientiously, with good conception, and very delicate, nice phrasing in many passages, only with hardly enough of fire and freedom. In the thoughtful, self-communing vein of the Largo movement here, as well as the Adagio in the G-major Concerto, so characteristic of Beethoven, we seem to catch the secret of the real meaning (in a poetic sense) of a Concerto combining the piano with an orchestra, which some have thought so unfit to be coupled. Is it not the tone-post improvising, talking to himself upon his instrument and calling in the voices of the orchestra, invisible as it were, for sympathetic confirmation and society to his own beautiful but solitary thought? This does not hold, of course, of mere parade concertos.

The Symphony, forming the chief portion of the Second Part, was new here, and by a composer whom we have had only once before, in an Orchestral Suite last year,—Joachim Raff. This was his second Symphony, op. 140, in C major, earlier than the one called "Im Walde" which Theo. Thomas gave here once. Though Raff has affinities with Liszt and Wagner, this Symphony adheres to the classical models in form, and is a large, musicianlike and earnest work throughout its four long movements; interesting as a whole, strikingly so in parts, though we fail to detect in it a spark of new and individual genius, anything, however beautiful or clever, which the existence of Schumann's, Schubert's Mendelssohn's music might not account for in a man of talent, musical organization and study. There are felicitous ideas in it, with skilful working up, and very varied and effective instrumentation. The first Allegro, in 6-4 measure, is broad and stately, uniformly full like the Gade Overture. The Andante has a beautiful and pregnant melody, which is developed through a long and interesting series of transformations and recurrences, with a fine fugued episode in one part, and all growing to a superb climax. The Scherzo is fanciful and pleasing, particularly the running passages in thirds between the reeds and flutes in the Trio. A stately Andante maestoso ushers in a brilliant, spirited Finale (Allegro con Spirito). The work is full of difficulties, but was bravely mastered by the orchestra, and held the interest of the great audience to the end.

Schumann's elastic, tripping little Scherzo, from the "Overture, Scherzo and Finale," op. 52, with the pretty answering phrases of oboe and clarinet in the Trio, made a refreshing, genial conclusion. That is a work of genius.

This week's Concert offered a noble programme: Mendelssohn's Overture to "Athalia" (almost new with orchestra); Schumann's Piano Concerto, played by HUGO LEONHARD;—Overture: "Tausend und Eine Nacht" (first time), by Taubert; and the great Schumann Symphony in C (No. 2).

There remains but one more concert of the series, the tenth, on Thursday, March 31, which also will be a grand one: Part I. Beethoven's Overture in C, op. 124 ("Weibe des Hauses"); Mendelssohn's D-minor Concerto, played by Miss MERTLE; Cherubini's Overture to "Lodolka" (first time). Part II.—Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques" for piano solo (Miss MERTLE); and the "Heroic Symphony" of Beethoven.

There is still to come, however, the annual benefit concert of our long-tried and excellent Conductor, CARL ZERRAHN, on Wednesday Evening, April 10. Goethe's "Egmont," read by Miss CHARLOTTE CUSHMAN, with Beethoven's music to it, by the Harvard Orchestra, [the songs by Mrs. J. W. WATSON] will make up the whole feast, and a right noble one. Mr. Zerrahn deserves and undoubtedly will have a crowded house.

The Soirée in honor of ROBERT FRANZ, given at Mechanics' Hall last Saturday evening by Messrs. LEONHARD and EICHBERG, was highly successful in spite of the bad luck of falling on the stormiest night of the winter. This kept not a few away who had purchased tickets; yet the attendance was large and cheering. Musically the whole affair was most artistic and delightful. Could it be otherwise with such a programme, such interpreters, such an audience and such a motive?

Trio for Piano, Violin, and 'Cello, Op. 70, No. 1. Beethoven.
Messrs. Leonhard, Eichberg, and Hartdegen.
Songs, from Liederkreis. Schumann.
Mr. Carl Glogner Castelli.
Piano Solo, Ballade, Op. 38, F major. Chopin.
Mr. Leonhard.
Songs. Rob. Franz.
Mrs. Barry.
Quintet, Op. 44, [piano and strings. Schumann.

The instrumental pieces (the "Geister" Trio, the great Schumann Quintet, and the Chopin Ballade, so gently musing and suddenly so passionate,) had been heard in the Matinées of the same artists. Nothing could be better worth repeating. Mr. GLOGNER chose two of the finest songs of Schumann,—one of them the "Mondnacht," and sang them with a delicate appreciation. Mrs. BARRY was in her best voice and mood and sang four Franz songs con amore and to a charm. These were characteristic and well contrasted: viz. the solemn, mystical "Im Rhein, im heiligen Strome"; the "Aprillaunen" (likening the humors of a mistress to those of April); the wild and grand "Am Meer;" and Goethe's airy and fantastic Mailed ("Zwischen Hecken und Dorn," &c.),—the last two in English. One only wished to hear more songs of Franz ad libitum, and let the storm without there roar! Who did not regret the absence of Mr. Kreissmann, who more than any singer, from the first, has brought these winged little creatures (these "kleine Lieder") home to us, and who did not think of him with sympathy in his severe long illness? Pity too that our young Osgood's return could not have been hastened! And to make all whole and perfect, Mr. Dresel also ought to have been there in person, as he was in spirit.

Mr. LANG's second concert at the Globe was a very fine one, but further record now is crowded out. The next will be next Thursday afternoon and will present a Concerto by Bach for two violins; a four-hand composition by Mr. Bradlee, an accomplished amateur of our city; Chopin's Etude in C sharp minor, op. 25: and a Trio in B flat by Rubinstein.

The Poultry Concert at Music Hall.

Music Hall has had a varied experience during the past winter. The Dolbys, Peck's Popular Concerts, Mrs. Moulton, Mme. Parepa-Rosa, Adelaide Phillips, Theodore Thomas's Orchestra, the Handel and Haydn Oratorios, the Grand Duke, a masquerade ball, and numberless other entertainments, have been given there, comprising every class of music from oratorio down to vulgar dapper tunes. The music of the past, of the present, and of the future, has had its hearing; and the most refined and most uncultivated tastes have been gratified in turn. But, after all, it was art that reigned supreme through all. Nature had enjoyed none of the tone-feasts that had been so lavishly spread. The winter went out and the spring came in with an entertainment that remedied this painful omission, and gave to the public Nature's music in its purest form, in the shape of a Poultry Concert. We cannot say, after a fair hearing, that we do not prefer art, after all. We feel that we are educated up to that, and that life is too short to unlearn what we have learned. We must in all frankness add, that we do not think the music that has prevailed at Music Hall for the past week is of a class that is likely to become permanently popular, though we would recommend a study of it to those of our orchestral leaders who are languishing for new effects to keep the popular taste in a proper condition of degradation. The chorus that was in progress as we entered the hall was strikingly like a Lied Scherzo, and proved to us that the abuse heaped upon that composer for his strained and unnatural effects has been quite undeserved. Judged from the hen and rooster point of view, his music has all the beauty and simplicity of nature to recommend it to notice.

The performers were, as a rule, in capital voice and spirits. A fine solo, with a clucking chorus, was given by a lusty Shanghai rooster with a rich contralto voice. The lower tones came out clear and full, and his technique was all that could be desired. One or two bravura passages were given with great power and effect, and rang through the hall with trumpet-like majesty. A noble old turkey gobbler essayed an Allegretto Capriccioso, but he was evidently suffering under a severe cold, which was to be greatly regretted, as we expected a great treat from his full yet sympathetic baritone voice. A Spangled Poland hen executed some fine staccato passages, and a Spanish game-cock attempted an intricate bolero, which would have created a great sensation, had not one of the audience rudely poked him in the breast with a walking-cane, and interrupted him in the midst of a splendid point d'orgue in D, in alt. A Brahmapootra hen made a fiasco in essaying a cadenza beyond her powers, but her method was perfect. A pleasing concerted piece was adroitly rendered by four mottled ganders, but we grieve to be forced to state that they did not sing in tune. But it was in the ensembles that the performers showed to the best advantage. Fugues whose complications would have driven Bach into a despairing frenzy of envy were delivered in the most faultless manner. The glorious basses of the male turkeys and Shanghai roosters rolled along in the most even manner, and blended finely with the shrill-tenors of the game-cocks, and the sweet and sympathetic alto of the ganders. It is but just to the amiable and obliging custodian of Music Hall to state that the performers were all greatly inclined to Peck. As a whole, the affair was a grand success, and the directors of Music Hall deserve the grateful thanks of the entire community for that refined devotion to musical art that induced them to give the public an opportunity of hearing this intellectual treat in the same hall in which Handel's "Messiah," Mendelssohn's "Elijah," and Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony" have been so gloriously rendered.—Gazette, March 2.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, Feb. 19.—Monday evening, debut of SARTLEY in Zampa. He acquitted himself creditably, and did not seem to be very much embarrassed in the presence of a New York audience, although some of our critics persist in considering it a trying ordeal for him.

The house was literally crammed. There was hushed and eager anticipation throughout the familiar overture, the opening chorus, and the music which follows, until the famed Robber Chief stepped upon the stage, and was greeted with round upon round of applause. The part of Zampa is written for the tenor voice; but such is the range of Sartley's magnificent organ that a little transposition brings the music entirely within his own. His voice is, for a baritone, what that of Sims Reeves is for a tenor, or Nilsson's for a soprano, or Alboni's for a contralto. Throughout its whole range there is not one bad note. One is conscious of a certain dignity in his singing which tells of power in reserve,—but intensely dramatic his singing is not, or at least was not on this occasion. His acting was perhaps somewhat different from the manner in which we should expect a real pirate to conduct himself, and he has been criticized on this ground; but surely anything is better than the hair-tearing performances of the traditional stage villain.

The music of Zampa affords a fine ground for the display of his splendid voice, and it is in this opera that he is most famous—although he sings in many others which are musically to be preferred.

Tuesday. Don Juan was played, and to a good house despite the storm. Wednesday. Second appearance of Sartley in Zampa. Friday. Benefit of Mrs. Seguin who appeared as Nancy (or Julia) in Martha, with Mme. Rosa as Martha. Saturday. Fra Diavolo, with Sartley, and (matinée) a second performance of Don Juan. This week we are to have German Opera, at the Grand Opera House, by the MULDER FABBRI Troupe. A. A. C.

Music Abroad.

London.

MME. CAMILLA URSO, whose rare merits as a violinist are so well known in our American cities, after playing with great success in Paris, has arrived in London. We can readily believe it when we hear that the press there not long since was unanimous in her praise, after her performance of the Mendelssohn Concerto at the Crystal Palace. She is now engaged as leading violin in the six classical soirées given at St. George's Hall under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Ganz, beginning Saturday, Feb. 24 and continued weekly. In the string quartet she is associated with three first-class artists. The first programme contained: Posthumous Quartet by Schubert; Trio in C minor, Beethoven; Quartet for piano and strings, in B flat, Hummel. We are glad to see that Mme. Urso is following a classical direction, and trust that it will lead her round to us again at some not distant day.

DR. FERDINAND HILLER leaves London this evening for the continent. The stay among us of the illustrious German musician has been provokingly short. He has played, with splendid success, at Manchester, at Liverpool, and at the Crystal Palace, Sydenham (of which more in our next). He plays, to-day, with Signor Piatti, a magnificent sonata for pianoforte and violoncello (Op. 22), which he composed at Milan, as far back as 1838. And this is all we shall hear, in the year 1872, of Ferdinand Hiller! Tant pis! We should have liked him to remain with us during the whole season, so that occasion might have been afforded us to pay him the honors which are so justly his due.—Mus. World, Feb. 17.

THE ORATORIO CONCERTS.—Bach's Sacred Oratorio, (The Passion), according to St. Matthew, is announced for performance at the Sixth Subscription

Concert on Tuesday next. This sublime work was re-introduced at the Oratorio Concerts the season before last, and will now be heard under Mr. Barnby's direction for the third time. Its introduction in the service at Westminster Abbey on Maunday Thursday, last year, has considerably added to the interest which had previously attached to the performances of this work. The principal artists are to be Madame Cora de Wilhorst, Miss Julia Elton, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Thurlay Beale, and Herr Stockhausen, and a special feature will be the presence of Dr. Stainer, the new organist of St. Paul's, who is to preside at the pianoforte used for accompanying the recitatives.

MME. ARABELLA GODDARD. As this great English pianist is coming to America next September, the following, from the Pall Mall Gazette, will be read with interest:

One of the special attractions at the Monday Popular Concerts is, of course, the piano forte playing, and two of the most striking features in the first programme were the pianoforte solo of the first part and the duet for violin and pianoforte of the second. Beethoven's astonishing "Thirty-two variations on an original air in C minor"—astonishing, above all, for their variety and originality, no two being alike, no one being like a variation by any other composer—were played in masterly style by Mme. Arabella Goddard. The piece is not one of the most "popular" in the Monday Popular repertory; and nothing but the most perfect execution, such as on this occasion it received, could render it interesting to the general public. To familiarize, however, the said general public with works of this character is precisely the object, with which, artistically speaking, the Monday Popular Concerts were established. In Dussek's "Sonata in B flat major for pianoforte and violin," the music speaks for itself, and nothing but absolutely bad performance could destroy its beauty. How thoroughly beautiful, then, must it have been in the hands of two such artists as Mme. Arabella Goddard and Mme. Norman-Néruda, who both played con amore, and both enlisted in the completest manner the sympathy and admiration of their audience! The concert terminated with Mendelssohn's superb trio in C minor, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello (Mme. Arabella Goddard, Mme. Norman-Néruda, and Signor Piatti); an old favorite at these concerts, where it has been given no less than nineteen times.

MME. CLARA SCHUMANN. "There is nothing"—says the Standard, Feb. 6, in a notice of Mme. Schumann's return to the Monday Popular Concerts—"in which English audiences differ so much from those of the Continent as in the consistent respect they show a great name, even occasionally after the brilliancy of the talents which created it has faded or passed away. Numerous are the instances on record of foreign artists appealing successfully to English audiences, who would not venture to trust to the recollections of former achievements in their own country. This conservatism of early opinions has its advantages as well as its disadvantages. Amongst the former may be cited the security which foreign artists feel that time strengthens their claim on an English public, and that they are not subject to the fitful moods of volatile and capricious audiences. The disadvantages we need not enumerate, nor allude to the fact that we sometimes sacrifice our critical acumen on the altars of consistency and "auld lang syne." Madame Schumann has been long enough in this country to feel that dependence may be placed on her numerous friends and admirers, and if any doubts may have risen in her mind during her temporary retirement from the scene of some of her honors they must have been dispelled by the cordial reception she met with last evening."

FRANKFURT-ON-THAINE.—Mme. Clara Schumann played at the seventh Museum Concert. The compositions selected were Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in G major; Schumann's "Canon for the Studies for a Pedal Grand;" and Mendelssohn's Rondo Capriccioso, Op. 14. The orchestral pieces were Spohr's third Symphony, in C minor, and M. Anton Rubinstein's Overture in B flat major. The vocalist was a young lady of the name of Regan, already favorably known by having appeared at these concerts last season.

DRESDEN. The fourth Symphony Concert of the Royal Kapelle (Jan. 39) had for programme: Part I. Overture to Anacreon, Cherubini; Symphony: "Am Imatra" (first time), by Th. Berthold, based on recollections of certain scenes in Finland and its mythological legends. Part II. Overture to Coriolan Beethoven; "Jupiter" Symphony, Mozart.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- A Cluster of Pearls. Song and Cho. 3. F to f. C. H. Smith. 30
"My darling's a cluster of many rare jewels,
The number I never yet found."
A jewel of a song, certainly. Melody uncommonly sweet.
- On the Sands. 3. Ab to c. Vandewater. 30
"Sweetly she smiled on me,
On the sands;
While the warm sunshine fell
On weed, pebble and shell."
Written with exquisite taste. Words by Geo. Arnold.
- Easter Anthem. Christ the Lord is risen to-day. 4. Ab. Wilson. 75
Has the usual variety of solo and chorus passages, and is a fine, new, spirited affair.
- After the Opera is over. 3. Eb to d. Leybourne. 30
"Live in the squares of Belgravia,
And the pleasures of life you will see."
- Come home early, Papa. Song & Cho. 3. G to g. Christie. 40
"Come home early, will you, Papa?
I shall watch along the street."
Beautiful home song, with equally beautiful title. Dexter Smith wrote it.
- Under the leaves that fall. 4. A to f. Warren. 30
"Under the leaves that fall,
Angels shall guard thee well."
An elegant melody, and unusually pretty accompaniment, with almost an independent air of its own.
- O fair Dove! O fond Dove! 3. F to D. Gatty. 30
"But a dove that perched upon the mast,
Did mourn,—and mourn,—and mourn.
O dove with the white, white breast,
Let me alone; the dream is my own,
And my heart is full of rest."
None but Jean Ingelow could write that, and to say that the music is perfectly appropriate is sufficient praise.
- Love will shine all through. 4. A to c. Piasuti. 40
"Earth will bloom, and cheeks will burn
With blushes many a one."
Words from "The Aftersglow." Sweet music, and the well engraved portrait of the Sweet Singer on the title.
- Blinks of the Staff. Comic. 3. D to f. Connolly. 30
"I'm your Captain Blinks of the staff."
First cousin to "Captain Jinks"
- She wandered down the mountain. Illustrated Title. 4. C to g. Cloy. 40
"A bird was singing its psalm of rest,
But she heeded not its song."
A very effective and affecting song for a concert singer.
- Toddlings through the Lanciers. 3. Bb to f. Connolly. 30
"Merry happy Lanciers."
Meant to be comic, but if you substitute "tripping" for "toddlings" it becomes a very pretty and merry song any way.
- The Dew is Sparkling. (Erblinck der Thau.) 4. F to g. Rubinstein. 30
"The moon sheds on all a soft silvery light,
The nightingale sings in the gloaming."
A fine German English song, with a peculiar movement which may be called Russian-German.

Instrumental.

- Mignon. Fantasia brillante. 5. Ab. Ketterer. 60
The favorite air of Ambrose Thomas's opera, rendered of course, as Ketterer must render them, in a very brilliant and effective manner.
- Martha. For 4 hands. 5. S. Smith. 1.25
In various keys, of course. A good piece for exhibitions.
- Thousand and One Night Waltz. 4 hands. 3. Strauss. 1.25
Arranged from air in Offenbach's "Indico." Don't know about 1001 nights, but think that one might dance 501 times to it without much weariness. Splendid!
- Flirtation. Polka Mazurka. 3. G. Waud. 35
Very piquant and neat, and more brilliant than most mazurkas.
- Artist's Life Waltz. 4 hands. 3. Strauss. 1.25
Has Strauss's usual brilliancy, and with the power of 4 hands upon it will lift the feet of dance-lovers, whether they will or no.
- Rays of Hope. Mazurka Elegante. 4. C. Warren. 30
Rightly named, and has some very well contrived octave and left-hand passages.
- Valse brillante en Octaves. 5. Bb. Concors. 35
Pretty good as an Octave, and very good as an Octave study.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, ° on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, ♯ above the staff.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 808. BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAR. 23, 1872. VOL. XXXI. No. 26.

Robert Franz.

[Continued from page 194.]

(Translated for this Journal from the German of A. W. AMBROS.)*

Among the song poets represented in the works of Franz, the name of Wilhelm Osterwald occurs very often: a friend of his (as may be seen by the dedication of Op. 21), who seems to have written many a poem full of thought and feeling expressly for the composer. But through all these books of songs there breathes the breath of a peculiar melancholy that seizes on the soul, something like the secret sorrow of a noble heart. And this trait must live in the composer's inmost being, with such infinite truth, such utter absence of all conscious purpose and affectation does it express itself. This is not that false sentimentality, which paints itself pale in order to look interesting, and which pulls out its handkerchief drenched with eau de Cologne before all the world, to wipe away the tears that will not flow. Moreover, Franz's melancholy has nothing morbid, nothing nervous; it comes out of a healthy soul; significant men, says Aristotle, are commonly of a melancholy temperament.—Upon the dreamy sadness of Chopin's enchanted tone-poems, on the contrary, we look with the same painful sympathy that we regard a maiden in consumption, who for that very reason looks transfigured like an angel. It is in this mood of dreamy sadness, pensive melancholy, that Franz perhaps most nearly coincides with Schumann in his songs. The "Night Song of a Hermit," the "Earliest Green" of Schumann, and others of like character, might be works of Robert Franz; and vice versa, much may be found in Franz which might, without injury, be transplanted into the Schumann field. In the most dry and painful manner, perhaps, this melancholy trait expresses itself with Franz in "Des Müden Abendlied" (Evening Song of the Weary One), Op. 26, No. 4. But Franz can also, if not laugh out aloud, at least smile occasionally, and enjoy himself as heartily as an innocent child.

It is characteristic of him, that he is so cheerfully excited, above all things, by May and May's delights, by Spring and rambles in the open air. There are songs of his, from which whole flocks of nightingales and larks come fluttering forth. Where Spring and love and the desire for roaming form a triple alliance with one another, there all is full of blossoms and of sunshine; one can hardly hear the song: "In dem frischen grünen Walde" (In the fresh green wood), op. 41, No. 4, without feeling something like the breath of the delightful time of May. Very remarkably are the two elements of love's pain and love's delight united in the song: "Unter'm weissen Baume sitzend" (Under the white tree sitting), Op. 40, No. 3. How sullen and ill-humored, how full of wintry frost the beginning! and how warm and lovely it becomes when the blooming tree shakes down its snow shower of blossoms on the singer's head—triplets upon triplets! How charming is the long protracted tone of the conclusion of each melodic period in Op. 23, No. 2 ("Es ist mir wie dem kleinen Walddöglein zu Muth") ("Tis like the little wood bird in my soul"); and on the other hand how hard and biting is the winter frost in the composition of Lenau's "Vor Kälte ist die Luft erstarrt" (The air is stiffened with the cold), Op. 21, No. 5. Along with that seat of Spring Franz always brings it to a brisk and comfortable cheerfulness, as in the splendid song (Op. 36, No. 6): "Nun hat mein Stecken gute Rust" (Now hath my staff good rest). At the same time Franz knows very well, where it is necessary, how to paint in detail, even to the single verse. There are songs of his, small in compass, but great in matter, in which, if I may so speak, a whole romantic opera is contained in nuce. As such I reckon that marvellously thrilling legend-like song (Op. 35, No. 4): "Und wo noch kein Wanderer 'gangen" (And where no wanderer yet has gone). Mendelssohn has composed it too, and excellently. Just take the pains to follow the detail painting in "The Lotus blossom," (Op. 25, No. 1),—a detail painting nowhere trivial: we actually see the "sunkon head" of the flower, the evening twilight creeps on, it grows dark (where it descends to B flat), the moon comes up and mounts aloft, the waves glimmer, its image is mirrored in the water (the melody in the middle part), its light magically and powerfully awakens the slumbering flower, it lifts its "pious flower face," it "trembles and weeps for love and love's woe."

Another main feature in the songs of Franz is the tendency to the Volkslied character,—not in that very reflective way, in which songs otherwise artistic often seek to make themselves interesting through the "Volks tone," but in that thoroughly true and unpretentious way peculiar to Franz alone. He does not go to work, on purpose, to write something "Volkslied-like;" he fashions it all finely and artistically, and yet the heart-strengthening fragrance of the Volks song is wafted towards us. Exceedingly charming pieces in the refined Volks tone are the songs: "Lieber Schatz sei wieder gut mir" (Op. 26, No. 2), and "Mein Schatz ist auf der Wanderschaft" (Op. 40, No. 1),—the latter a charming picture of maiden-like defiance. A song which takes more of an artistic direction, without forsaking the Volks tone, is that excellent one: "Die Sonn' ist hin," by Otto Roquette, (op. 35, No. 3). Mark the wonderful fineness of the rhythm in this song, or the false ending of each strophe in F major, with the rapid turn toward A minor in the final chords. In other songs, like "Zu Strassburg auf der Schanz" (Op. 12, No. 2) the composer abandons himself directly to the tone of the most primitive Volks-song. The artistic instinct with which he enters into many a poem taking this direction, is astonishing.

So again in the song (composed to a very good translation of the manuscript): "Ach ihr Wälder, dunkle Wälder, Miletiner Wälder" (Op. 40, No. 5), Franz hit the most peculiar tone of the old Bohemian Volkslied in a way that may be called really wonderful, so that the song goes even better with the old original Slavonic text. Hence a poet like Robert Burns, who, without giving up the forms and expressions of artistic poetry, lets the strong ring of the People's poetry resound through his poems, is most particularly welcome to Robert Franz, and actually we meet the name of Burns quite often in his books of songs. It is in keeping with this partiality for the Volks-song, that Franz so often retains the strophe form, whereas our moderns mostly like to "compose through." These songs of Franz at first sight look as if they also were composed through; but if you look nearer, you remark that the second, the third strophe is only the first re-written; and this procedure justifies itself by the fact that the composer in the repetitions sometimes introduces what seem to be very small, but are in fact very essential changes;—one of the most beautiful and striking is in the last stanza of "Die Sonn' ist hin." It is quite astonishing how the same music fits so characteristically the different text of the single stanzas; for example: "Es hat die Rose sich beklagt," and: "Da hab' ich ihr zum Trost gesagt."

Franz has an extraordinarily fine feeling for seizing as it were the spiritual atmosphere of each song text and giving it a music which, musically taken, has the same atmosphere; of course the song and words must harmonize! His artistic means are often peculiar enough; thus frequently his harmony strays into the domain of the old church tones. At times his music positively ennobles the text. Heine's poem: "Im Rhein, im heiligen Strome" (In the Rhine, in the sacred river), for instance, is a passing fancy, based upon the correct observation, that lovers believe they see everywhere the image of the beloved; and in picture galleries what striking accidental portraits of the fair objects of their devotion look down on them from all the walls! Franz has too much respect before the Cologne Cathedral and its famous picture, to employ any other than the "legend tone" here in his musical narration; so reads the super-scription of the song (Op. 18, No. 2). How extremely simple the whole turn of the harmony! Does not the venerable Dom stand bodily before us? The last words: "Die Augen, die Lippen, die Wangen, die gleichen der Liebsten genau," Franz whispers softly and quickly, as it were abashed. With Heine we see the somewhat frivolous traveller, who runs for a moment into the Dom, and by the Dom picture is reminded of nothing but his lady love; with Franz it is the pious pilgrim, with whom devotion and love blend in one pure feeling of the heart.

Where such fine expression is sought and found, of course an important part must fall to the accompanying piano. Otto Gumprecht in his "Musikalische Charakterbilder" calls attention to the deep interior connection of Schubert's Song with the Beethoven Piano Sonata. Something analogous might be found still earlier in the sonatas and songs of Mozart and Haydn, and again later in Mendelssohn. The piano arrangements of Franz and Schumann stand in like manner in the most intimate connection with the newest phase of piano-forte playing. "Schumann's songs," said some one, half in earnest, half in joke, "are pianoforte Etudes with the occasional accompaniment of a voice part." That, as I have said, was meant only half in earnest; but look, for example, at Schumann's Davidbündler dances, and then at his songs, and say, whether the latter do not almost seem as if a voice part had associated itself with the former, in order to enlighten us about the meaning of those significant musical riddles. These accompaniments are often little tone-poems in themselves. And so too it is with Franz;—and yet his accompaniment is not a thing outwardly attached and fitted to a song; voice and piano form one whole together. Doubly remarkable it may be called, therefore, that sometimes you may strike out the voice part, and there will still be an interesting piece of music left, in which we desire nothing more and nothing miss. This is almost literally true of the song "Die Harrende" (in Op. 35); the piano part alone gives a piano piece, and indeed a very brilliant piano piece, with a singing melody in the middle register. The same holds good of the song: "Willkommen mein Wald" (Op. 21, No. 1), whose piano accompaniment, almost as it stands, might represent a beautiful "song without words."

Franz is not too lavish with his tone-paintings; one of the most charming is the piano part of "Ach, wenn ich doch ein Immchen wär" (Ah, were I but a little bee), op. 3, No. 6. His tone-paintings are modest and discreet, mostly mere allusions. How many others would have roared and thundered in the "Rhino Falls" (op. 44, No. 6), instead of the light, but spirited and striking sketch, by means of a short triplet motive, with which Franz contents himself! In a similar manner he portrays the solemn repose and grandeur of the sea (op. 36, No. 1; op. 39, Nos. 2 and 3); the motion of the waves (op. 9, No. 6; op. 25, No. 6; op. 40, No. 2); and the procession of the clouds (Op. 30, No. 6), &c., &c.

* "Bunte Blätter: Skizzen und Studien für Freunde der Musik und der bildenden Kunst," von A. W. AMBROS. (Leipzig, 1872. F. E. C. Leuckart).

That Robert Franz is a musical lyrist, has been already several times declared emphatically (See Essay in the Deutsche Musikzeitung above cited); but he is a lyrist in the highest sense of the word, as Uhland, Rückert, &c., are in poetry. Whether for that reason Uhland, Rückert, and the like, do not stand upon the summits of Parnassus, and must be consigned to a lower region until they shall have sung their public to death with epodes of four and twenty eantos, I leave undecided. There have been critics who complained that Franz "had never once attempted larger forms,"* and sought the explanation in "the weakness of his individuality." So in future we must bring with us a cord measure when we have to judge of paintings, and must lay musical scores, &c., on the decimal scales, that from their physical weight we may draw right conclusions as to their musical merit. But it seems to me, that no one has raised similar objections in the case of the above named German poets, or of the Greeks Pindar, Theocritus, &c.;—that Petrarch is immortal through his sonnets, not his epic "Africa;" that Horace counts among the first of poets, although he has left behind him only Odes and witty Causeries, which he calls partly Satires, partly Epistles. Perhaps, however, Robert Franz will some fine day surprise the gentlemen with an Oratorio. At all events he has the necessary counterpoint, knowledge of instrumentation and mastery of greater forms in store for such a task.

(Conclusion next time.)

* They have had the answer they deserved in a paper by Julius Schäffer: "Two Reviewers of Robert Franz."

Henry Fothergill Chorley.

(From the Orchestra, Feb. 23.)

On Friday evening last the musical world sustained a shock by the announcement of the death of Mr. Henry F. Chorley, which happened suddenly of heart disease. So unexpected was the fatality which put an end to an honorable and laborious life, that up to within a very few hours of his death, Mr. Chorley carried on his usual literary work, amassing materials for his future publication, and within a week of his decease an article of his appeared in this journal. At that time Mr. Chorley little anticipated—we will not say his death, but even retirement from active work. Though he had professedly withdrawn from his critical career, he was turning his attention to that other department in which also he had made known his name, and contemplated within a short time resuming his pen as a musical historiographer. At the same time we have reason for believing that despite his severance from the Athenæum, active labor as a recorder of current life in music was not distasteful to him.

Henry Fothergill Chorley died in his sixty-fourth year. Born at the close of 1808 of a good old Lancashire family, he entered while a boy, the office of Messrs. Rathbone in Liverpool, but found commerce uncongenial, and made his escape from it to enter the ranks of literature. While yet in his teens he arrived in London seeking employment, but having few qualifications beyond his hopes, his diligence, and a smattering of music acquired from Mr. Zengheer Hermann, the conductor at that period of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society. Young Mr. Chorley was not daunted; he strove hard—got at first a little hack work to do, then was admitted from time to time into the periodicals, and at last attracted the notice of the conductors of the Athenæum in so far as to secure him a post on that journal. His connection with the Athenæum is now a matter of history. For thirty-five years he conducted the musical department of the paper; and the fearless honesty and candor with which he discharged his duties have never at any time been impeached even by those who have impugned his judgment. But in the main his judgment on art-points proved as sound as his conscience; and results justified him. At a time when Gounod vainly sought a hearing in this country, when "Faust" lay unheeded in its dust on a publisher's shelf, Mr. Chorley persistently pleaded the merits of the French composer and his master-piece. So unwearied was this advocacy, that at last those interested in the discovery of a new mine in opera resolved to give the Frenchman a trial: the result was a magnificent success, and the town soon went mad on the airs in "Faust." To Mr. Chorley we are also indebted for the discovery of Mr. Arthur Sullivan, a musician who has in these recent times justified the confidence of his Mentor. The young and aspiring beginner, in fact, might always rely on Mr. Chorley's encouraging word and good advice: at the same time neither court nor flattery secured from him an insincere support. Mr. Chorley was above fear and favor—a warm advocate of what he really held to be the true, a bitter opponent of what he deemed the false in art. Of the several abuses of our musical system he was an uncompromising foe: with cliques and coteries he would have nothing to do, nor did he allow the amenities of life to override his personal regard for truth. He had certain crotchets—as all men have who possess deep convictions and are honest in the expression of them; and he was, for a man who resolutely held his own, curiously sensitive toward the opinions of others. But, we take it, this susceptibility was rather a fear of losing the public regard than a dread of individual censure, and arose from a scrupulous anxiety not to be misunderstood.

To Mr. Chorley's published works we need only make reference: they are in every musical reader's mind at the mention of "Modern German Music," "Modern Operas," and "Thirty Years' Musical Recollections." His librettos (albeit at one time the subject of fierce ridicule in Punch) exhibit scholarship and grace, and certainly a greater share of poetical expression than usually falls to writing of this class. Take in evidence the song in the "Amber Witch," the book which he wrote for Wallace's music.

When the elves at dawn do pass,
Leaving pearls along the grass,
And a drowsy light is creeping o'er the sea,
When the blushes of the east
Tell that weary night hath ceased,
And the cheering day come back for you and me;
When the stars are growing dim,
And the birds begin their hymn,
And the new-born flowers are drinking from the air,
I cannot choose but sing,
How delightful is the spring,
And the early morning hour how very fair.

There is glory in July,
When the burning sun on high
Makes the roses red as goblets full of wine.
There is wealth in Autumn sheaves,
And the golden vineyard leaves,
When the moon doth like a shield of silver shine.
But their beauties more agree,
With mature ones than with me,
Who have never known a sorrow or a care;
And I cannot choose but sing,
I love better far the Spring
With its early morning hour so very fair.

The graceful vivacity of the foregoing is on a level with the tenderness of the poetic idea. As much may be said of the other librettos of Mr. Chorley—the "May Queen," set by Sir Sterndale Bennett, the "St. Cecilia," set by Sir Julius Benedict, the "Kentworth" and "Sapphire Necklace," written for Mr. Sullivan, and the "Faust," translated from, and fitted to the music of, the French score. This most profitless and worrying task, enough to starve and annihilate all fancy and poetic sensibility in him who undertakes it—was carried out by Mr. Chorley as well as it could be done. His songs, which are numerous, all show a certain culture and refinement; in the case of translations they are remarkable rather for original treatment than fidelity. Thus the English version of the "Berceuse," by Gounod, is Chorley's rather than Hugo's; and the "Nazareth" also (in which he is again fettered by the exigencies of French music) is Chorley's altogether; the French poet being wholly flung aside.

The task of the writer of "words" for music, whether single songs or elaborate libretti, is, as far as regards public recognition, a most unthankful one. The composer, as a rule, monopolizes all the credit. Musical criticism and musical "recollections" have little influence in making a name even in musical society so called. As far as such a reputation can be earned, it has been done by Mr. Chorley; and deservedly so; for in addition to his natural and acquired qualifications, and to his constant rectitude, he threw all his energy into the work of the hour; whatever he did he did with all his might.

Sir Sterndale Bennett's Career.

[From Musical Recollections of the Last Half Century, in Tinsley's Magazine.]

The career of this eminent musical composer, like that of many others of his countrymen in science, art, and commerce, was of a chequered character. Born in 1816, at Sheffield in Yorkshire, he had the misfortune to lose not only his father—Robert Bennett, a musician of more than average ability, and the organist of the parish church of that town—but his mother also, at so early an age that he has scarcely any recollections of them. Not very long after this severe loss—indeed, whilst he was only three years old—he was taken charge of by his grandfather, John Bennett, who held the appointment of vicar choral, or lay clerk, in King's College, Cambridge. Having discerned the dawning of musical genius in his interesting protégé, and with a view to make the acquirement of musical theory and practice a means for the future livelihood of the somewhat precocious boy, John Bennett entered him as a chorister of his own college when he had reached his eighth year, the age at which boys are usually admitted into cathedral and collegiate choirs—those nurseries of musical, as they ought also to be, agreeably to the statutes of founders and benefactors, but which they now are not, of classical education. Here William Sterndale Bennett's progress was so rapid, and his talent so obvious, that he attracted the attention of the Rev. W. P. Hamilton, a member of Peter House, and speedily secured his patronage. This gentleman, being persuaded that the gifted chorister of King's could have no chance of rising to future eminence if he remained merely as a singing-boy in the choir of that college, neglected as to his musical no less than as to his ordinary education, made interest with the authorities of the Royal Academy of Music, then but recently established in Hanover Square, London, who admitted him into that institution at the earliest moment its rules permitted—ten years of age—and forthwith took charge of his studies. In entering this musical seminary it is customary for a pupil to make choice of the instrument which he purposes to adopt as his speciality in after-life. This choice, however, not precluding the possibility of change at some future time, William Sterndale Bennett, after a short time, gave up the violin as his instrument, and finally abandoned it for the pianoforte. The usefulness of his first selection was, however, of considerable service to him in the prosecution of his studies, since it not only gave him a greater insight into the means of writing for stringed instruments, but enabled him, by the correct judgment of the ear, to decide at once as to the key-note of any chord, and even of any single note, which might be struck. This peculiarity is indeed possessed by violin players in a much more accurate degree than by those of any other instrument; and it needs no elaborate proof to indicate how highly important and advantageous the acquirement of such a faculty must be to any musician who makes composition his study and pursuit.

The violin having been discarded for the pianoforte, William Sterndale Bennett now assiduously applied himself to obtain a mastery of the mechanical difficulties of the latter instrument. No sooner had the crude system of musical notation and the strict rules of harmony been mastered, than William Sterndale Bennett turned his attention to composition, and produced, as one of the first specimens of his talent, that which was afterwards to give him more perhaps of a continental than of a native renown—a symphony written upon the models of Haydn and Mozart. This symphony was much admired, not only for the freshness of its phrases, but on account of the cleverness of the instrumentation by which every motivo was colored. The fertility of William Sterndale Bennett's musical invention, whilst under Mr. Charles Lucas's tuition, was considerable. He was incessantly at work, and produced in rapid succession a series of fugues, as well as an overture to the "Tempest," which indicated unquestionable talent and the largest promise.

In the year 1836, after he had left the Royal Academy of Music, having published several of his early compositions, William Sterndale Bennett had the good fortune to make the acquaintance and win the esteem and regard of Mendelssohn. By the invitation, and at the earnest entreaty, of that great and accomplished maestro, he was induced to visit Germany and take up his residence at Leipsic, where several of his works, particularly his overtures the "Naiads" and "Waldnymph,"—written after he had left England—and his pianoforte concerto in C minor, were performed at the celebrated Gewandhaus Concerts, under Mendelssohn's own personal direction. So great is its popularity, that the former of these compositions is constantly played at Leipzig, no less than in every other town of Germany where purely classical music is cultivated; indeed, no "scheme" of thoroughly acknowledged merit or character is ever drawn for the best German instrumental concerts without the "Naiades" overture forming one of its chief features. In spite of the promise indicated by his compositions, and the assurance of success if he could but enjoy the benefits of continental experience, the world had hitherto not smiled very benignantly upon the rising professor. His published compositions were much too classical to command a rapid sale, and but for the liberality of Messrs. Broadwood and Sons, the renowned pianoforte makers, it is doubtful if the youthful aspirant could have even accepted the patronage of Mendelssohn. They, however, stepped in to his assistance, and sent him on his way, with such encouragement as only delicacy of feeling and kindness of heart can proffer. They had confidence both in the integrity and the talent of William Sterndale Bennett, and they have not been disappointed in him, either as a man or as a musician.

Whilst residing in Germany, where he remained during the years 1837 and 1838, William Sterndale Bennett often played in public at the Gewandhaus Concerts—his own concerto in C minor most frequently—and also brought out several of the overtures he had previously written, but not published in England, all of which, especially the "Naiades," as has been mentioned, being most favorably received. At the end of two years—years of intense application and study—he returned to London, where he established himself, and at once obtained the highest reputation as a composer, a pianist, and a teacher of music. At this time he had the good fortune to make the acquaintance and win the affections of Miss Wood—the daughter of Captain Wood, an officer in the Royal Navy, who resided at Southampton—herself an accomplished pianist from having had the advantage of being instructed by Mrs. Anderson. A few years after William Sterndale Bennett's return to London he married this lady, with whom he lived in the most perfect harmony and affection of married life until the year 1866, when after several months of severe affliction, she died, to the almost inconsolable grief of her husband and three children—two sons and a daughter—who survive her. Whilst paying his addresses to this lady, he wrote an overture—amongst the most facile and elegant of his several orchestral preludes—now well known from being annexed to his popular cantata, the "May Queen," composed expressly for the Musical Festival at Leeds in 1858, which he himself conducted. This overture, to which he had at first given the title "Marie-le-Bois," had not been previously published. Soon after his return from Germany, and his establishment in London, William Sterndale Bennett brought out his overtures, the "Naiades" and "Wood Nymphs," better known at Leipzig by its German title, "Wald-nymphen," and afterwards that which he had entitled "Parisina," previously to his leaving England. These orchestral preludes contain many elegant and original specimens of part-writing, and fully confirm Mendelssohn's judgment respecting their merit. After producing these compositions, he gave his attention almost exclusively to tuition, and has rarely devoted himself to the higher department of his profession, except when any special occasion has called for the exercise of his powers.

Of late years, with the exception of the cantatas written to order—the "May Queen" for Leeds; that for the opening of the great International Exhibition of 1862; the fantasia-overture, "Paradise and the Peri," for the Jubilee Concert of the Philharmonic Society; and his Ode for the installation of the Duke of Devonshire as Chancellor of the University of Cambridge—the last three works all thrown off in 1862—William Sterndale Bennett has published nothing of note; neither has he prepared any other works upon the theory and study of music than his Classical Practice for the Pianoforte, which appeared in 1841, and a Discourse upon Harmony, which followed in 1849. Truly, therefore, may every lover of music indorse the following remarks, recently made respecting him by another eminent musical professor, Herr Ernst Pauer: "For myself, I must be permitted to express my regret that this accomplished master now writes so little, and leaves an expectant public without fresh publications. Has the minstrel hung up his lyre forever? It is hoped not." At the installation of the Marquis of Salisbury as Chancellor of the University of Oxford, and successor to the late Earl of Derby, during the Commemoration (June 22d) of 1870, the degree of D. C. L. was conferred on William Sterndale Bennett, honoris causa; and at the close of last year the honor of knighthood was granted him by her most gracious Majesty, at the same time that the like distinction was awarded to Julius Benedict.

Karl Klauser.

MUSICAL SKETCH BY LEOPOLD DAMROSCH.

[Our older readers must have noticed in these columns, once or twice each year, almost from the beginning of our paper, short reports and programmes, very classical, of concerts given at a Young Ladies' School in Farmington, Connecticut, under the direction of an earnest, sterling teacher, who all this time seems to have been more fond of solid good work in a corner than of the notoriety which musical men vastly his inferiors strive to achieve by advertising rather than by worth. Most of the newspapers,—not to speak of all the rabble of mere advertising so-called musical journals which have sprung up within a few years, mostly in the interest of what is low and therefore jealous of the good name of honest Art—have sided so instinctively for some time with the latter type, that it is refreshing to meet now and then in one of them some hearty praise of unambitious merit. Such we find in a late number of the New York Bell-Blatiristisches Journal; we are only sorry that we have to go outside of the English language for it. But we deem it worth the trouble of translating; let our readers judge whether it is not at least better reading than the "Jubilee Notes" which fill every newspaper, morning and evening, ad nauseam.]

In one of the broad and lovely valleys of Connecticut, picturesquely encompassed far and wide by mountain chains, lies the little rural town of Farmington, remote from the bustle of the world, stretching away in sweet contemplative repose. It seems a place made to bring healing to souls suffering and shaken by the storms of life; but equally well fitted for the silent preparation of young minds for active life hereafter. And in fact the latter constitutes today the chief importance of Farmington, since Miss SARAH PORTER* has founded there her educational institute for young ladies and made it one of the most distinguished in the land. Miss Porter is one of the noblest, most ideal female natures who have ever taken upon themselves the hard duties of educating the young. Averse to all mere show, always going to the heart of the matter, and gifted with tough energy of character, she has been ever conscious of the high and serious import of her task, and may now, after five and twenty years of strenuous labor, look back with pride and satisfaction on the results which she has realized. Her school, far from being a mere parade establishment, in which the "fashionable" arts and sciences are done up in the fashionable manner, and the mind made susceptible to all sorts of worldly nonsense, is much more a true home, a place of culture, rich in blessings, for the young maidens who have the good fortune to be received into it. What contributed above all to the elevation of the institution was the conscientious circumspection with which Miss Porter went to work in the selection of teachers. Thus, twenty years ago, when musical instruction was first undertaken in her school, she applied first to the celebrated Professor Marx in Berlin; then, when the negotiations with him fell through, to the then president of the Philharmonic Society in New York, Henry Timm, whose achievements as a teacher are famous through the land. In a lucky hour Timm made known the application to his friend and pupil KLAUSER, and through his mediation the right man came to the right place.

Karl Klauser, born in 1823 in St. Petersburg, after his parents had emigrated from German Switzerland to Russia, early showed a pronounced inclination for music; but his father had destined him for the business of a bookseller, and for that he had to prepare himself. In this calling he passed through his years of apprenticeship and travel, not without feeling deep scruples at having to be unfaithful to his beloved Music, until the year 1848 came, and cut this knot, as well as many more important ones. Klauser bade adieu forever to the book trade, and now threw himself with all zeal into musical studies, to regain the calling for which the inmost bias of his nature had designed him from the first. In 1850 he emigrated to the United States and lived for five years in New York, then a sort of musical wilderness, in which many a clever musician, to escape utter misery, was obliged to march in military bands and beat the cymbals, or seek his bread with blackened face among the Negro Minstrels. Klauser, with his small means and fine musical instincts, had also a hard fight of it in New York; so that the engagement to work under such favorable auspices in Farmington must have seemed a true redemption to him. He went there in 1855, and found in the excellent head of the institution such appreciative support in all his earnest efforts, that the most favorable results were swift to show themselves.

Klauser had early learned to see that, to work successfully for Art in America, one must proceed not from above downward, but through thorough pedagogical instruction from below upward. Art as such was little cherished in the land at that time; jingling virtuosity and humbug did their best to ruin a half cultivated taste entirely; and amongst teaching musicians there were only a few who had the courage and capacity to go to work to purify and to reform. Then it was that Klauser entered upon his highly responsible place with a determination, which can never be enough appreciated, to labor for the true interests of Art, setting an honorable example to his colleagues. The aim he sought was not to turn out jinglers on the piano. He wished above all to work upon the taste and help to form, what was most needed,—a musical public. To this end he selected the matter of his teaching with the greatest conscientiousness, using the classical music of the great German masters as the best basis for the musical culture of his pupils. But not content with that, he enriched the current editions of many compositions with a fulness of instructive additions, which infinitely increased their value for instruction. Many a corrupt text in the old editions was critically rectified; countless little errors, handed down like a hereditary disease in all the older editions, were weeded out; old violin bow marks were changed into pianoforte legatos; triplets and sextoles made obvious to the eye; the execution of certain passages facilitated by division between the two hands, &c. Moreover the fingering was carefully marked according to the modern principles, established by Liszt and Bülow (especially in the latter's edition of Cramer's studies); so too the execution of the appoggiature, mordenti, and other embellishments, for which the signs formerly in use gave no sure guidance to the scholar, were exactly indicated; in short, whatever could be done in this direction to render pianoforte instruction really fruitful, was done with judgment and with conscientiousness by Klauser. These works grew so in number and importance, that the publishing firm of J. Schuberth & Co. exerted themselves to get them, and have published, one after another, nearly a thousand piano compositions in the critically revised editions of Klauser. The catalogue of these Klauser editions, recently issued, embraces a selection of the most useful works for instruction of Beethoven, Mozart, Weber, Field, Chopin, Mendelssohn, Schumann, and others; moreover three collections of instructive piano compositions containing principally pleasing pieces for performance, together with more solid, such as Kuhlau and Moscheles; pieces by Ascher, Herz, Stephen Heller, Jaell, and many others, so far as they contain a useful kernel of technique—finally a collection of Studies in the most progressive order possible, from Plaidy's and Schmitt's five-finger exercises to the Cramer Etudes.

Every single one of these volumes speaks for the exceptional capacity which Klauser has brought to his labor. But were we called upon to designate some editions which appear to us the most successful, we would name: those of Beethoven, op. 2, No. 2, op. 31, No. 3; Chopin: Mazurkas, op. 6 and 7, Bal- laden, op. 23 and 47, Tarantelle, op. 43; Field: Nocturnes, Nos. 11, 14, 15; various Songs without Words by Mendelssohn; some editions of Heller, Henselt and Liszt; as well as Studies by Plaidy, Czerny (op. 740, No. 2), A. Schmitt, (op. 16), and many more too numerous to mention. Many of these editions belong to the best so far existing, and may claim the further honor of priority. Thus for example the editions by Kroll and Lebert did not appear until those by Klausner were three quarters published.

* A sister of the new President of Yale College.—Ta.

Klausner has also made himself serviceable by arrangements of orchestral and chamber music for the piano. Thus we have from him (mostly published by Breitkopf and Härtel and by Schubert & Co.): "A Faust Overture" by Wagner, and Schumann's "Genoveva" Overture, for eight hands; Schumann's "Davidsbündler" and "Etudes Symphoniques" for 4 hands; Schumann's Quartets, first Symphony (B flat), Romance and Scherzo from the fourth (in D minor), and Liszt's "Preludes" for 2 hands,—all excellent arrangements, convenient for execution, to which the whole musical world, including some of the coryphæi thereof, like Liszt, have paid the tribute of acknowledgment.

Admire the industry of this musician, who, burdened with ten hours of lesson giving every day, has still freshness and elasticity enough left to bear all the mental application which these other occupations claim! Think of the incessant striving of this man, who still knows how to find more hours for study of the most various scores of ancient and of modern time, for the reading of all that is worth reading of the current literature of music, especially for all that is calculated to keep the solitary dweller there in Farmington in contact with the intellectual movements of the present day!

To the special services which Klausner has rendered to the school at Farmington, and we may say to the musical culture of North America in general, belong the concerts which he has established, occurring three or four times yearly in the rooms of the institution, for which the audience is composed almost exclusively of the teachers and pupils of the school. We will resist the temptation to speak of the charming aspect of this youthful circle of listeners, of the fresh Spring-like impression which the tender buds of maidenhood in the florally decorated parlors make on the invited artists. But if one would know what sterling concert programmes are, programmes of the purest artistic tendency, of the severest choice among the good and best, he has only to study those of the Farmingtonian soirées and matinées. They would be an ornament to any concert room in the world, and satisfy the selectest circle of listeners. There above all are represented the masters of the classic time, like Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Cherubini, but without any one-sided exclusiveness. Side by side with them stand Mendelssohn, Schubert, Schumann, also Berlioz and Liszt, and others. The staple of these concerts is composed of Sonatas, Trios and Quartets, to which are added instrumental and vocal solos—always avoiding all sweetish Italian and frivolous French sing-song. For the execution of this music the best talents in the land have been enlisted; for instance Thomas, Mosenthal, Matska, Bergner, Bergmann, Kopta, Dr. Damrosch, Mille, Mason, Drexel, von Inten, Parker, the Mendelssohn Quintette Club of Boston, Miss Mehlig, Miss Krebe, Mme. Damrosch, and others, have taken part, some of them often, in these concerts.

And now observe the earnestness, the devotion, with which this music, costing such a strain on mind and feeling, is listened to (one might say, learned through listening) by the fair young audience, the unaffected joy and excitement beaming in their faces; and you must admit that nowhere can the musician go with more zeal and devotion to his work, than in the artistic atmosphere of these music rooms of Farmington, where the great object is to fill young, unsophisticated, deeply susceptible souls with the poetry, the magic of genuine Art works. And, on the other hand, how significant, how lasting must be the effects of these most immediate and most penetrating music lessons on the development of the young maidens! When they go back into their family circles after several years study in Farmington, or when they establish later their own domestic hearth, then their imagination, which has been accustomed only to the pure and noble, will turn constantly toward the good; their judgment will have gained sure standpoints; and to these hearers will the good musician have to turn, who has it earnestly at heart to do his Art some really fruitful service, rather than to earn cheap laurels by common ear tickling virtuosity. Only by such uninterrupted efforts, as these of Klausner, can a great and truly musical public ever grow up in America. Therefore honor to the man who, one of the first, has set out upon his artistic mission with earnestness and decision, and who now, after some seventeen years of toil, has already been able to send out more than 600 young apostles of his musical faith into all parts of North America!

The example of Klausner has not remained without imitation. Little colonies, building onward in the same spirit, now exist in Springfield, Albany and some other places. May a good spirit spread them over all the land!

And now, before we close this sketch, let the friendly reader accompany us into the almost new and charmingly situated house of Klausner, and cast a glance into the family circle which surrounds the modest and industrious man. A brave-hearted, amiable wife, born in Switzerland, and seven children diffuse peace and gladness through the house, each carefully striving to make the life as pleasant as possible. Occupations in the garden, woods and field vary the daily household works and studies; and one of the particular passions of the active master of the house is angling for fishes in the fine Summer days. But when Klausner goes a fishing, always something besides comes out of it; for on the bank of the brook, beside the fisher, lies some kind of a musical work; and many of his excellent editions, many of his arrangements owe their origin to these still hours of seclusion!

The Ninth Symphony Concert.

[From the Boston Daily Advertiser.]

A most enjoyable concert was yesterday's. Each one of the numbers on the programme was good, three out of the four compositions of the first rank, the execution excellent, and the arrangement harmonious. The principal share of work fell to the orchestra, which acquitted itself excellently under Mr. Zerrahn's careful and intelligent leadership, and in point of elegance, honest and efficient playing it compares favorably with any in the land. The most important work on the programme was the last one. Schumann's second symphony, in C-major. We cannot enter here on a critical discussion of the merits of this work. But we may mention a few points in it. And first let us say that this is "music of the future" which we admire. In a criticism which Moscheles wrote in 1836, on one of Schumann's piano sonatas, the old master, though half doubting their success, speaks of a new school of musicians. Among them he mentioned Liszt and Schumann. He calls it the romantic school, and states it as a peculiarity of Schumann that he avoids the modulations of the old school. Now the music of the future, as Schumann himself calls it, fully conscious of his aims, intends to avoid just those old turns and phrases which the imitators of Mozart and Haydn had repeated ad nauseam. New forms in melody and harmony, new musical ideas, originality, became the watchwords of the new school. Schumann succeeded to wed his new ideas, his new harmonic and melodic forms with beauty and fitness, as this symphony proves. A second point, which seems worthy of mention, is the closeness of the form and the general polyphonic treatment of the themes. Indeed the Scherzo and the last movement, the "Allegro molto vivace," are so full of contrapuntal work, that it is a rare joy to notice the strength and solidity of the musical structure. Of the grandeur, the beauty, the glorious strength, the sweetness of motives, it would be useless to speak; that was felt by every musical person present. Nor need we mention the wondrous instrumentation; that also was felt in the joy it gave. The moodiness of the first movement the author himself ascribes to the resistance of his mind, when conceiving it, to the bodily illness which he had scarcely shaken off. The three other movements pleasantly relieved it. And the work in its totality will forever remain one of the most momentous in all musical literature. The piano concerto in A-minor was written at about the same time with the symphony. It is likewise a work of the highest rank. The composer, deviating from the usual manner of writing concertos for a solo instrument, gave quite as much work to the orchestra as to the piano. And yesterday the orchestra and Mr. Leonhard both did their best to perform the work in the highest style of art. We can hardly add any praise of Mr. Leonhard to what we said of his playing in the fourth symphony concert. With him we are always sure of hearing the intentions of the composers fully, most clearly and artistically expressed. If we might use an expression not strictly musical, we should say his declamation is faultless.

The "Athalie" overture by Mendelssohn is too well known to need comment. It was performed in former years, as early as the time of the Germanians. Its solemn choruses and plaintive melodies were most impressively and satisfactorily rendered by the orchestra. The novelty, Taubert's overture to the Arabian Nights' Tales, is a good and quite spirited work. The motives are characteristic, the fantastic sing song of the Arabian fairy tale is easily discernable, and whatever else the composer intended to tell us of Scheherezade and of her threatening fate is intelligibly expressed. The instrumentation seems unnecessarily thin in some places. Still it is a good work, and will bear repetition.

Musical Correspondence.

(Too late for last time.)

NEW YORK, MARCH 1.—The Grand Opera House, one of the most beautiful and commodious theatres in the city, was lately the scene of a somewhat difficult enterprise, which was undertaken by the MULDER FABBRI Troupe, lately of the Stadt Theatre. This company actually gave eight representations during the week ending February 24, [six evenings and two matinées] with a change of opera every evening. The list included "The Merry Wives of Windsor," [twice], "Ivanhoe," "Martha," "L'Africaine," "Der Freyschütz," [twice], and "Don Juan." This week they gave us three representations, as follows: "L'Africaine," "Der Freischütz," and "Il Trovatore." Mme. Inez Fabbri, Mlle. Anna Rosetti, and Mlle. Anna Elzer were the sopranos. Mme. Fabbri's voice is somewhat worn, but she acquitted herself creditably and made a good impression, particularly as L'Africaine. Mlle. Elzer is very young, (only fourteen I believe), but she is already a remarkable singer, though she needs more culture and study to develop her voice. Mr. Muller has a very pleasant baritone, which he used to advantage; and Carl Formes is inimitable as an actor, though hardly a trace remains of his once magnificent voice. As any attempt to produce good music is worthy of some respect and charity, I will refrain from any remarks respecting the tenor and the chorus, although they had no respect for our racked and tortured nerves.

I inclose programmes of two Piano-forte Soirées given by Mr. RICHARD HOFFMAN at Chickering's Rooms.

Saturday, Jan. 27.

Second Trio, (Allegro energico, Andante, Scherzo, Finale.) Op. 66. Mendelssohn.
Mr. J. Burke, Mr. F. Bergner, and Mr. Hoffman.
"Im Walde." Op. 86, No. 3. S. Heller.
Introduction and Tarantella R. Hoffman.
Mr. Hoffman.
Sonata in A, (Allegro molto, Andante, Presto), No. 2. Mozart.
Mr. Burke and Mr. Hoffman.
Ballade. Op. 23. Chopin.
Mr. Hoffman.
Solo. Reverie. Bergner.
Bergner.
Selections from the "Panses Fugitives." (by request.) Heller and Ernst.
Mr. Burke and Mr. Hoffman.
"Pastorella and "The Banjo." Gottschalk.
Mr. Hoffman.

Saturday, Feb. 24.

Trio. Op. 26. (Andante con Moto, Scherzo, Finale.
Mr. J. Burke, Mr. F. Bergner, and Mr. Hoffman.

Clavier Stücke.....F. Schubert.
Valse in A flat.....Chopin.
Grande Sonate. Op. 69. [Alto, Scherzo and Finale].....Beethoven.
Mr. Berger and Mr. Hoffman.

First Prelude. Arranged by Gounod.....S. Bach.
Mr. Burke, Mr. Berger, and Mr. Hoffman
Song without Words. Book 8, No. 6.....Mendelssohn.
Polonaise. Op. 14.....E. Lubeck.
Mr. Hoffman.
Reverie. Solo Violin.....Vieuxtemps.
Mr. Burke.
Caprice. "Rigoletto.".....R. Hoffman.
Mr. Hoffman.

The reputation which Mr. Hoffman holds here as an artist and composer, is enough to secure the success of these soirées, which are the most brilliant and recherché of gatherings, besides being of great interest musically. The next soirée is announced for March 23.

At the last MILLS and SARASATE matinée, Saturday, Feb. 24, the programme contained "in deference to generally expressed desire, several numbers of a more popular character than heretofore": i.e., Mr. Mills's "Fairy Fingers" and "Mazourka," Tausig's "Caprice Waltz"; and Gounod's "Hymn to St. Cecilia" (substituted for a Duo from "Oberon"). Beethoven's Trio in E flat, and a Waltz and Romance by Chopin (encore) were the main features of interest. A. A. C.

NEW YORK, MARCH 9.—The week just ending is one of unusual interest to music lovers, and the numerous matters which deserve mention are hardly to be justly treated within the limit of a single letter. Therefore I can send only a few musical notes upon subjects many of which deserve exhaustive analysis and criticism.

Beginning with the fourth Philharmonic Concert on Saturday evening, March 2, I send the programme, which was as follows:

Symphony, No. 2, in E minor.....F. L. Ritter.
Aria from "Iphigenie in Aulide".....Gluck.
Mr. Franz Remmert.
Concerto for the Piano in A minor.....Schumann.
Miss Anna Mehlig.
Overture, "Coriolanus".....Beethoven.
Aria from "Jean de Paris".....Boieldieu.
Mr. Franz Remmert.
Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes".....Liszt.

The performance of a Symphony the composer of which is still living, and which (still worse) was written in America, has spread consternation into the ranks of our conservative critics, and most of the papers (The Tribune notably excepted) have adopted indiscriminate condemnation as the safest course. With the indistinct impression left by a single hearing, it seems to me that the work is worthy of the occasion on which it was produced, and that further acquaintance with the score would reveal much that is not at first apparent. The work, without being vulgarly "descriptive," is supposed to be the musical embodiment of Byron's "Sardanapalus," each movement being illustrative of some portion of that poem. It opens with an Allegro (E minor), graceful and sensuous at first, but ending in a long wailing note which leads to the Scherzo Allegretto (E major), a charming movement somewhat Mendelssohnian in character. Then a pause, the only break in the Symphony, followed by a beautiful Andante (Myrrha's soliloquy), in which the influence of Beethoven is perceptible. From this we are led by an ingenious modulation to the final Allegro (E minor) denoting the catastrophe of the poem. The work seems to be written in an earnest and scholarly spirit, with a conscientious disregard for those tricks which please the fancy of superficial listeners, and, if the work does not awaken enthusiasm, it must at least add to the high reputation the composer has already earned by his Symphony, No. 1.

Schumann's A-minor Concerto was rendered by Miss Mehlig in the best manner, and was received with much applause. The Orchestra, both in the Symphony and the Overture to Coriolanus, was almost unexceptionable. At no time during the season have they played so well. In Liszt's "Preludes," however, the performance was rather unsatisfactory.

Messrs. DAMROSCH and FRUCKNER gave their fourth soirée at Steinway's Rooms on Monday evening, March 4, with the following programme:

Trio. G, Op. 1, No. 2 For Piano, Violin and 'Cello.
Beethoven.
Messrs. Fruckner, Damrosch and Berger.
Songs: a. "My Song is like the Evening Air."
b. "The Warrior's Death.".....F. L. Ritter.
Mr. W. C. Balrd.
Piano Solos: a. "Splundered," from "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner.....Liszt.
b. "The Erl King," by Schubert.
Mr. Dionys Fruckner.
Song. "Nazareth".....Gounod.
Mr. W. C. Balrd.
Elegie for Violin.....Ernst.
Dr. Damrosch.
Quartet in D minor. For two Violins, Viola and 'Cello.
Allegro, Andante con Variationi. Scherzo, Presto.
Messrs. Damrosch, Matzka, Schuessel and Berger.

"Mignon" claimed my attention that evening, but I remained long enough to hear the Beethoven Trio, and felt richly repaid for so doing. The three players entered well into the spirit of the work; and that they understand each other thoroughly was evidently—particularly in the Largo, where the piano, violin and 'cello hold strange convers-like three mysterious spirits. Here the instruments were nicely balanced and the performance of this passage, with the charming Scherzo which follows, and indeed of the whole Trio, was very satisfactory.

Miss ANNA MEHLIG announces a series of three pianoforte matinées at Steinway's. The first took place March 6th. Beethoven's great "Sonata Appassionata" led the programme, and was rendered with indescribable grace and poetic fire. The attendance at this matinée was so large that the smaller hall could not accommodate the audience, and the two remaining matinées are to be given in the large hall.

The NILSSON OPERA, which began on Monday, bids fair to eclipse even the last season, and I am informed that the receipts for the four representations this week amount to more than $19,000. The Operas were Mignon, Martha, Trovatore and Saust. In my next letter I will give a brief review of the season. A. A. C.

ELBING, (EASTERN PRUSSIA) FEB. 18.—A very large and fashionable audience were assembled a few nights ago in the spacious Concert Hall of the Philharmonic Society, to listen to the beautiful rendering of the following programme by Dr. Hans von Bülow:

Hummel: Grand Fantasia, Op. 18, Eb.
Introduction, Allegro, Adagio, Finale.
Mendelssohn:
a. Prelude and Fugue, Op. 35, No. 1, E min.
b. Characteristic Pieces from Op. 7.
Beethoven:
a. Adagio and Variation, Op. 34.
b. Rondo Capriccioso, Op. 129 [ouv. posth.].
Chopin:
a. 2 Notturmos, Op. 27.
b. Tarantella, Op. 43.
c. Valse brillante, Op. 42.
Liszt: Rhapsodie Espagnole [les folles d'Espagne.—17th Century.—La Jota Aragonesa.—17th Century.]

To-morrow we are promised the appearance of Herr Capellmeister Ries, violinist, and Herr Brüll, pianist, both of them eminent artists, who will give, among others, Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata. Concert follows here upon Concert, and all of them are of the highest order. M. B.

Music Abroad.

LEIPZIG.—The report which lately went the round of all the musical papers, to the effect that Herr Ferdinand David intends resigning his post at the Gewandhaus Concerts and also at the Theatre, has one slight drawback: there is not a particle of truth in it.—The fourteenth Gewandhaus Concert commenced with a new composition, an overture, entitled: "Normannenfahrt," by Herr A. Dietrich. This was followed by a second novelty: "Morgenhymne," for male chorus and orchestra, from the same pen. Both were well received. Herr Oscar Beringer, from London, played Reinecke's Concerto in F sharp minor, and Carl Tausig's Ungarische Zigeunerweisen. Mdlle. Klauwell sang with telling effect the air, "Frag' ich mein beklommen Herz," better known as "Una voce poco fa," from Il Barbiere. The concert wound up with Beethoven's Fourth Symphony.—A new three-act opera: Der Erbe von Morley, words and music by Herr Franz von Holstein, already favorably known as the composer of Der Haidenschacht, has just been produced at the Stadttheater. It went off exceedingly well, the author-composer being vociferously summoned to appear before the footlights on the first night. A great many competent judges, however, are not quite so ecstatic about the new opera as are Herr von Holstein's friends.

At the Sixteenth Gewandhaus Concert, Herr Hagar played Lindnar's Violoncello Concerto in E minor. Herr Jäger, from the Royal Operahouse, Dresden, sang an air from Euryanthe, and "Die Allmacht," by Schubert. Signor Alphonso Readano played Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E minor, and pieces by Chopin and Mendelssohn. Signor Rendano is a pupil of Thalberg's, but received the finishing touches of his musical education at the Conservatory here. The purely orchestral pieces—Cherubini's overture to Les Abencerages, and Mendelssohn's Symphony in A minor.

BAYREUTH.—The 22nd of May, Wednesday in Whitsun week, is definitely fixed on for laying the foundation stone of the Wagner Festival Stage-Play-Theatre, and Wagnerites from all parts are expected to be present at the ceremony. According to the plan at present adopted for the proceedings, it is the intention of Herr Richard Wagner to gather round him, on the occasion, all the musical celebrities of Germany, and, profiting by their attendance, to make the great feature of the day a magnificent concert in the Operahouse here. If report may be credited, the Munich Academic Vocal Union, also, is to be invited. Herr Wagner himself will conduct the concert, or at least certain pieces. Of course the inhabitants of Bayreuth will do all in their power to entertain their guests, who are expected to be very numerous. Herr Wagner has purchased a plot of ground immediately adjoining the Hofgarten, and on it he means to have a private house for himself erected. This house is to resemble exactly his villa in Switzerland. It will be only one story high. There will be a colonnade in front, and a verandah running round the sides and back.

EDINBURGH. During the three days Festival of Orchestral Music last week, the following works were performed, several of them for the first time to a Scottish audience: Overtures, Abencerages, Der Freischütz, Fidelio, Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage, Im Hochland (Gade), Mirella, and Tannhäuser; Symphonies: Mozart's in C (Jupiter), Beethoven's in F, No. 9, Schubert's (unfinished) in B minor; Pianoforte Concertos: Beethoven's No. 3 and Mendelssohn's No. 1; Rode's A minor Violin Concerto. Also Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, Schumann; Prelude to Lohengrin, and March, Tannhäuser, Wagner; Entr'acte, König Manfred, Reinecke; Konariniskaja, Glinka. Such a feast of orchestral music has seldom, if ever, been heard in the Scottish capital, and the efficiency of Mr. Hallé's Manchester orchestra is unanimously attested by all the Edinburgh papers, the execution of the above works being spoken of as in the highest degree satisfactory: Mus. World, Feb. 24.

London.

The directors of the Oratorio concerts seem bent upon doing all that lies in their power to make popular Bach's Passion according to St. Matthew; and our notion is, that they are going the right way to work. About the value of the music—its lofty dignity, dramatic force, and intensely religious expression—there cannot be two opinions. In such a case it is only needful to go on performing it. Sooner or later the public will recognize the merit of which we speak, and the work will rank with the great sacred masterpieces already dear to English tastes. Of course there must be a loss at the beginning of such a process; but from this the managers of the Oratorio Concerts have not shrunk. Their reward is at hand, if they will persevere a little longer. The Passion was repeated in Exeter Hall, on Tuesday week, to a very large and, seemingly, appreciative audience, who had excellent reasons for satisfaction with the manner in which all concerned did their work. We do not remember hearing a more careful, or more judicious performance. The orchestra and chorus were admirable, and it would be hard to excel the refinement with which the numerous unaccompanied chorales were sung. As regards the soloists—Madame de Wilhorst, Miss Elton, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Beale, and Herr Stockhausen—it will suffice to say that they emulated the chorus in care and zeal; Mr. Lloyd doing especially well with the arduous recitatives of the Evangelist. Mr. Docker was at the organ, Dr. Stainer accompanying the recitatives upon the pianoforte, and Mr. Barnby occupying the conductor's seat, a place for which he has very rapidly qualified himself.—March 2d Madame Schumann gave the first of two pianoforte recitals in St. James Hall, on Thursday week. The programme, which was very interesting, contained Schubert's Sonata in A minor (Op. 42); Beethoven's Variations in C minor; a selection from Schumann's Kreisleriana; and his romance in C minor (Op. 111); a Gavotte by Gluck, and two of Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte. The performance of so much music in such differing styles, was a severe task for a pianist who is no longer young. Madame Schumann, however, acquitted herself with sustained energy, and played from first to last after her best manner. How much the recital was enjoyed by the amateurs present may be imagined. Some vocal pieces were contributed by Madlle Anna Regan, the accompanist being Sir Julius Benedict.

MONDAY POPULAR. Mid Lent warns us that these capital concerts are coming to a close. There remain, in fact, only two more—on the regular subscription nights—or four, including the ensuing Saturday afternoon recitals.

On Saturday, the 24th—the programme included Mendelssohn's favorite (stringed) quintet in B flat ("by desire"), and Beethoven's beautiful pianoforte trio in E flat (Op. 70.) Herr Joachim led the quintet.

and M^{rs}. Schumann was pianiste. She played for solos, her late husband's "Nachtstück," followed by the Intermezzo, and Scherzino, in they keys (respectively) of F, E flat minor, and B flat. Herr Joachim played Handel's sonata in A major, one of 12 "for a violin or a German flute," supposed to have been written for the Prince of Wales.

On Monday night, the eve of the Thanksgiving Day, the programme was as follows:—

Quintet in C major, Op. 29.....Beethoven.
MM. Joachim, L. Ries, Straus, Zerbini, and Platti.
Song.

Miss Edith Wynne.
Andante and Variations, in E flat major, Op. 82, for Piano-forte alone.....Mendelssohn.
M^{rs}. Schumann.

Quartet, in A major, op. 26.....Brahms.
[First performance at the Popular Concerts.]
M^{rs}. Schumann, MM. Joachim, Straus, and Platti.
Song.

Miss Edith Wynne.
Quartet, in B flat, Op. 76, No. 4.....Haydn.
MM. Joachim, L. Ries, Straus, and Platti.
Conductor—Mr. Zerbini.

Madame Schumann played her solo (marked Op. 82 amongst the posthumous works) so much to the satisfaction of the audience that she was twice recalled. The second recall amounted to an encore. The pièce de répétition, (also one of Mendelssohn's) is known as the short "Prestissimo" movement in E minor.

The songs were highly successful. As a recognition of the forthcoming great day of national jubilee, the first part of the concert concluded with the "Thanksgiving" adagio from Beethoven's (posthumous) quartet in A minor (Op. 132), known as canzona di ringraziamento. This "song of thanksgiving" will hardly bear detachment from the body of the quartet; and the effect we cannot conscientiously describe as otherwise than heavy and lugubrious. Of course the intention cannot be too warmly commended; but the choice of subject was not, we opine, felicitous. Madame Schumann is to play the Sonata Appassionata on Monday next.—Standard.

THE LABOR OF A PIANIST.—Of all the discoveries for which we are indebted to German professors, one just published by Professor Schmidt may claim to rank among the most singular. Hearing Herr Rubinstein play at a concert, he took it into his head to count the notes which that famous pianist had played by heart, and found them to amount to 62,990, fully justifying therefore an assertion previously made by the physiologist Flaring, that a pianist's calling lays about the heaviest tax of any upon the memory. Herr Schmidt was, however, not satisfied with this enumeration. Applying Austrian neukreutzers as a dynamometer, he tested the pressure requisite to strike a key on Herr Rubinstein's piano, and found it to be equivalent to 24 neukreutzers, which is 21.5 ounces. The force exerted by the pianist in playing the 62,990 note piece he therefrom calculated to amount to nearly 94 12 cwt. Herr Schmidt then intruded into Herr von Bülow's room and tried his piano, which had a harder touch, but which no doubt Herr Rubinstein could have played on perfectly well. Here the pressure would have amounted to 118 1-10 cwt. The discovery may be of interest to pianists who are unaware how great an effort of muscle they go through in playing a piece, but surely it requires a German professor to draw such a lesson from a concert.—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE KING'S CROWER.—A London paper says of an ancient ridiculous usage in the Court of St. James: It is only right, at the commencement of Lent, to call Sir Charles Dilke's attention to the gratifying fact that the office of the King's Cock-crower has been abolished. The duty of this official was to crow the hour each night within the precincts of the palace during Lent, instead of calling it out like an ordinary watchman. The last instance on record of the cock-crower performing his duties was on the first Ash Wednesday after the ascension of the House of Hanover, when the unfortunate man got in to sad trouble; for George II., then Prince of Wales, being disturbed at supper by the cock-crower entering the room and making an unpleasant noise to announce that it was "past ten o'clock," imagined that some insult was intended, and was with difficulty made to understand that such was not the case. There is, however, reason to fear that the office existed for some time as a sinecure after its duties had ceased to be performed, for in Dobrett's Imperial Calendar for 1822 the "cock and cryer at Scotland yard" appears in the list of persons holding appointments in the Lord Steward's department of the royal household.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MARCH 23, 1872.

Concerts.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.—The programme of the ninth Symphony Concert was made up mainly of most noble music,—a great Symphony, a great Piano Concerto, a great Overture—works of genius all three,—and for something lighter by way of variety and relaxation another Overture, heard for the first time, which is at least genial and pleasing, and by a composer worthy to be known.

Overture to Racine's "Athalie," Op. 74.....Mendelssohn.
Piano-Forte Concerto, in A minor, Op. 54.....Schumann.
Allegro affettuoso. Intermezzo [Andantino gracioso].
Allegro Vivace.
Hugo Leonhard.

Overture: "Tausend und Eine Nacht" [Arabian Nights' Tales], Op. 129.....Taubert.
Symphony, No. 2, in C major, Op. 61.....Schumann.
Sostenuto assai; Allegro ma non troppo.—Scherzo.—
Adagio espressivo—Allegro molto vivace.

Mendelssohn's Overture to Athalie, however familiar through pianoforte arrangements, or seemingly familiar through recurrence of its themes in choruses which have been sung in vocal clubs, had probably not been heard in Boston from an orchestra since it was first introduced here by the "Germanians" in December 1852. The solemn opening theme, with brass instruments, is grandly religious, and by its rich sonority and noble harmony awakens expectation which is not disappointed, either in the recurrence of this theme again and again with heightened interest, or in the gentler, plaintive character of the contrasted theme, or in the logical unfolding and completion of the composition into a symmetrical impressive whole. The rendering was very satisfactory, and the wonder was not uncommon among the audience why so grand and beautiful an Overture by Mendelssohn should have remained unknown to our younger generations of concert goers. Again the want of a player on the harp was felt in Boston; its arpeggios were represented on a grand piano.

If there be any great composer whose works have steadily, if slowly, gained a deep hold on the sympathies of the largest truly musical public in our city, it is Schumann. His one Pianoforte Concerto, in A minor, is not only one of his most perfect inspirations, worked out with a masterly completeness, but one of the most admirable and most delightful compositions in that form by whomsoever. Indeed we should hardly dare to claim a higher place for any other piano concerto, after we have excepted those in G and in E flat by Beethoven. Whenever it has been heard in these concerts, beginning five or six years back, it has proved profoundly interesting to a goodly number of the more appreciative; but now we think, at least after this last consummate interpretation by Mr. LEONHARD, the general voice spontaneously and warmly owns its charm. Never, before, perhaps, had a concerto involved the entire orchestra so deeply; here we cannot say that the pianist is "seconded" by the other instruments, for they are part and parcel of the whole, as indispensable as the piano. And their coöperation is no easy matter; each must put its whole soul and skill into the complex, harmonious work. For the most part the orchestra did so this time, and with capital effect; but there were one or two slips, which it is well that audiences generally do not perceive, if only the whole current of the performance be musical and spirited and clear. Mr. Leonhard was never more sure of himself in technique or in the brain and soul part of his work. He is an interpreter in the higher sense, when he has to do with musical creations of so high an order. In deed it is largely due to him that Schumann has this winter become so much better known among us. He almost surpassed himself in all the essential requirements of a perfect rendering. Through all its phases of expression, strong or subtle, all its perpetual variety of fresh springing fancies, the work came out one clear, consistent, glowing whole. Mr. Leonhard excels in clear, significant phrasing; the important note always tells; no point is lost; in short, the meaning of the work, as well as of every phrase and modulation in it, comes out with unmistakable vitality. It is needless to tell with what breadth of style and certainty of purpose as of execution he interpreted the marvellously rich first movement; or how sense and soul were held enchanted by the poetic grace and delicacy of the Intermezzo. What most caused our wonder this time was the unflagging persistency and perfect evenness and clearness, with which the flying fingers thrived the subtle (seemingly endless) maze of florid melody in the Finale,—endless, but never once beginning to become less interesting. What finer musical experience than to hear such a composition speaking for itself without let or hindrance!

Taubert's pretty, fanciful and really genial little Overture, suggested by, and certainly in some degree suggestive of the Arabian Nights' Tales, was not there to be measured by the standard of a great work. A great work was not what was needed, seeing that one of the solidest, most formidable of great works was to follow, as another great work had preceded. Something light, without being trivial or vulgar, something fanciful and graceful, just for relief and recreation, was the thing. At the same time it was well to have something new, and well for once to give a specimen of so honored a composer as the chief Kapellmeister and Conductor of the Royal Sinfonie Soirées at Berlin for many years; one of the ripest and ablest musicians of the age, who has composed a very respectable opera of "Macbeth," instrumental and vocal works in all forms, but has shown most of real individual genius perhaps in his great variety of most poetic, sometimes exquisitely humorous children's songs.

There is something of the spirit of these latter in the Overture we have just heard. It has a local Oriental color, an "Eastern sing-song" pervading it; and it is full of pretty, dreamy fancies, ever returning to the old starting point,—a quaint figurative prelude of a few bars for a viola obligato. There is much charming, flickering play of color; beautiful solo bits for flute, horn and so forth, while consistent form is followed to the end. Too much of sketchy outline here and there, too many thin places in respect to instrumentation,—thinness not redeemed by contrapuntal subtlety—was the chief want felt.

The grandeur, the inexhaustible wealth and beauty of the great Schumann Symphony in C was appreciated by the great mass of the audience far more fully than it has ever been before. For indeed the whole work was superbly rendered. This Symphony is evidently a favorite with our Conductor, CARL ZERBAHN, and justly so; he seemed to make the orchestra all feel it with him, so that it all came out with life and power, enchaining every hearer. We have described this noble work so fully on former occasions of its performance, that we will not run the risk of here repeating an old story.

The tenth and final Concert, too late for notice now, took place last Thursday, with the following programme:

Overture: "Weihe des Hauses," in C, Op. 124, Beethoven; Piano Concerto in D minor, Mendelssohn, (Miss ANNA MEHLIG); Overture to "Lodoiska," Cherubini.—Piano Solo; "Etudes Symphoniques," Schumann; Heroic Symphony, Beethoven.

Mr. B. J. LANG'S CONCERTS, at the Globe. The charming little Theatre has been fuller each time. The programme (as printed) for the second Concert, Thursday afternoon, Feb. 29, was as follows:

Quartet in F minor, No. 7.....Beethoven.
Allegro con brio.—Allegretto ma non troppo.—Allegro assai.

Four Nocturnes, op. 28.....Schumann.
Grand Sonata in D major, op. 58.....Mendelssohn.
[For Piano and Violoncello.]

Allegro assai.—Allegretto scherzando.—Molto allegro e vivace.

Instead of the four Nocturnes, however, Mr. Lang played only the first,—so interesting in itself, so well interpreted, that one could not be quite resigned to the withholding of its promised three companions. But he had inserted just before it (in compliance with many requests, as well as with an artist's wish to improve upon the former rendering as a whole), a repetition of the beautiful Concerto in B flat of Beethoven. And indeed the wish was realized; it did go better in the general coöperation of the string quartet, &c., which represented the orchestral accompaniment. And we confess, on further hearing, to have found the work more pregnant with meaning and more interesting than we were aware before. It was a choice feast, only to enjoy that one Concerto played so finely.

The Beethoven Quartet in F minor was wrongly set down as No. 7. It is No. 11, (Op. 95.) One which we do not remember to have heard the Mendelssohn Quintette Club play before; too dreamy, deep and mystical, too subtly woven to be understood at once, or even readily recalled after a single hearing; but very beautiful, inducing a mood of thought and feeling for which it were a blessing to exchange the every-day experience. So far as we could judge, it was very fairly rendered; but the theatre is not the place to hear such things to best advantage; the sound of the strings is greatly swallowed up and deadened by the surrounding scenery and spaces overhead; the tones lose their vitality and must be grasped and followed by an effort of the will and understanding. The Mendelssohn Sonata is a vital, very satisfying, large and generous creation, and was admirably played by Mr. LANG and Mr. WULF FRIES.

The programme of the third Concert, March 14, read thus:

Concerto for two violins.....J. S. Bach.
Theme and Variations.....J. Bradley.
For the Pianoforte, 4 hands.
Etude in C sharp minor, op. 25.....Chopin.
Trio for Pianoforte, Violin and Violoncello in B flat major, op. 52.....Rubinstein.
Allegro.—Adagio.—Presto.—Allegro appassionato.

The smothering influence of the place, before alluded to, operated particularly as a damper on the right enjoyment of the Bach Concerto for two violins, which was nicely played by Messrs. SCHULTZE and MEISEL. The two quick movements (first and third), with tones so dwindled away and marrowless from that cause, doubtless appeared dry to many, in spite of much intrinsic beauty. The beautiful and tender cantabile of the slow middle movement, however, made a fine impression. The four-hand piece by Mr. BRADLEE, one of our most accomplished amateurs, indeed an earnest musician in a true and thorough sense, gave much pleasure. The theme is fresh and captivating, and the Variations are by no means commonplace; they are skilful, genial developments and transformations of the theme. The work of course had all fair treatment under the hands of Messrs. PERABO and LANG. And to the same competent interpreters we were indebted for a treat not promised in the programme, a four-hand outlining of the first movement of Rubinstein's "Ocean" Symphony, which we found full of poetry and beauty, largely laid out and elaborated with a master hand. The other movements are said to be not worthy of the first; yet one would fain hear and know that for himself. Perhaps an orchestra will some day give us the true opportunity.

Verily Rubinstein is in the ascendant! For the Trio (played con amore and with great life and spirit by Messrs. Lang, Schultze and Fries), charmed the audience, unfolding richer and richer as it went on. You feel the power of a creative and inventive mind throughout. There are strains of choral grandeur, in full rich chords, in the Adagio. The Scherzo (Presto) is laughingly bright and sportive, now and then running over with laughter, but never beyond the means of graceful recovery. And the Finale is full of well sustained fire. We cannot describe it, we lack the tenacious memory for that; we can only say that we enjoyed it with the rest, and shall be glad of another chance to know it better.

Chopin's Etude in C sharp minor (No. 7 of Op. 25), is one of the most profound and weighty of his slow and brooding movements. It opens with a musing violoncello-like Cantabile for the left hand, at first alone, then joined by a simpler companion melody in the upper part, with intermediate harmony, as still the musing, singing bass goes on, kindling into all sorts of subtle and impassioned figuration and embellishment. As a technical étude it presents great difficulties; but these the hearer was not allowed to think of, so fully was he made to feel the charm and meaning of the piece. That long upward and downward rushing scale passage (marked fff) of some sixty notes in the time of six quavers (still in the bass part) was given with magnificent and thrilling energy.

Next Thursday afternoon (March 28) we have the last of these pleasant occasions. Three works comprise the programme; viz: Bach's Concerto in D minor, for three pianos (Messrs. LANG, LEONHARD and PARKER); two movements of a Quintet in C by Vincent Lachner; third Piano Concerto (C minor) by Beethoven.

ORGAN CONCERTS. It was a real comfort to listen for an hour to some good organ music, after a long privation of that same. On Saturday noon, March 9, Mr. J. K. PAINE gave an "Organ Recital" on the great organ of the Boston Music Hall. (It was put down on the bills as the 208th Concert of the N. E. Conservatory of Music; when, we wonder, did the Organ cease to give concerts in its own name?)

Mr. Paine began with one of Bach's noblest Fugues, that in E minor, with the so-called "Wedge" theme; the eye must see it to know what that means:

This theme is magnificently developed into an exhaustive fugue, which is remarkably clear and easily followed for a work of so complex a character. The instrument was in worse order than we ever knew, frozen up by the March winds perhaps; but in spite of so great a drawback Mr. Paine gave a most satisfactory rendering of the work. Next he played the Adagio and Finale from one of those sweet, inward, heart-felt organ poems, the Trio Sonatas by the same inexhaustible and matchless Bach. It is the sweetest kind of rest to sit, alone or in a silent company, and listen to these thoughtful, tranquil, sincere conversations between three voices; for which the sweeter stops of the organ are selected. They sound so unpretending that an idle listener does not give them credit for the tithe of meaning and of beauty there is in them.

Mendelssohn's splendid Sonata in A, ending with the lovely Andante tranquillo, was the next piece, charmingly played and with judicious choice of stops. A thoughtful and truly organ-like improvisation held attention profitably for a few minutes, and the concert closed with Mr. Paine's learnedly wrought, effective "Concert piece" on the Austrian Hymn, a fragment of the melody being used to good advantage as a fugue theme for the finale.

We recall also with pleasure an organ concert given under the same auspices, two or three months ago, by Mr. DUDLEY BUCK, who, besides an interesting Sonata of his own in four movements (E flat), and some ingenious variations on a Scotch air, showing skill in the combinations of stops, also proved himself at home in the Bach school by a good rendering of the great Passacaglia. He also played a Rondo Grazioso, in a pleasing style, by Spohr.

THE MUSICAL SOIREE given by Mr. CHRISTIAN SUCKOW, the violinist, at Brackett's Hall yesterday afternoon was less successful than had been anticipated by those persons who knew the principal performer by reputation. The programme was entirely disarranged by the unavoidable tardiness of some of the artists, and by Mr. Sprague's temporary illness,—which did not prevent him, however, from taking part with Mr. Packard in a very neatly rendered duet from Verdi. The other pieces performed were, "My Heart's in the Highlands," sung with much expression by Mr. Packard; Beethoven's Trio for the piano, violin and violoncello, op. 70, No. 1, played by Mr. J. K. Paine, Mr. Schultze and Mr. Wulf Fries; and a noble air by Handel, beautifully performed by Mr. Fries. Mr. Suckow's right arm was suffering from the effects of an accident, we understand, and on that account he was neither able to give the numbers assigned to him on the programme, nor to do himself justice in the rendering of what he undertook to play. "The Mocking Bird" with variations, an odd melange of Folk Songs, and another work of a similar character, scarcely furnish opportunity for a fresh artist to distinguish himself; but if we are to form any opinion at all concerning Mr. Suckow's skill from his performance of yesterday afternoon, we shall be obliged to conclude that his strong point is in the imitation of the singing, squeaking and twittering of birds and of the other interesting sounds in which the woods and mountains are prolific.

The above, from the Advertiser of Saturday last, about describes an occasion which was by no means uninteresting. Mr. Suckow plays a sort of violin peculiar to his native district in Norway, an instrument of great antiquity, having "twelve strings." That is, the usual four strings are supplemented by eight fine wire strings underneath, which vibrate in harmonics with the principal strings which alone come in contact with the bow. It bears resemblance to the viol d'amour; a soft, sweet tone is produced at the expense of the searching quality and power of the violin proper. It is good for the pretty sentimental tricks and imitations, the harmonic effects, &c., rather than for true classical violin playing. In all these things Mr. Suckow showed himself an adept; one might say, he played all sorts of flutes, flageolets, cornets, distant drums, hurdy-gurdies, cuckoos, nightingales, &c., &c.,—in short every instrument, except the violin. He is a man of genial, kindly aspect, and seems really to do these things con amore and with a certain sentiment of romance.

OF MR. PECK'S two excellent popular concerts, comprising Miss Kellogg, Miss Mehlig, and Mr. Santley for the last time, and of Miss Mehlig's two Piano Recitals at Brackett's Hall [the last this afternoon] we must speak next time.

"CLOUD PICTURES," by Francis H. Underwood. If any of our friends would read some charming stories, in which music plays a chief part, we commend to them this fascinating and elegant little volume, which appeared last Christmas. For the rest we simply say Amen to all that is said in the following notice from the Gazette:

This handsome book contains four stories, entitled respectively, "The Exile of von Adelstein's Soul," "Topankalon," "Herr Regenbogen's Concert," "A Great Organ Prelude." The style is chaste and graceful, and there is a delicate vein of poetic fancy running through them that is both refined and tender. The first story is one of great power and originality, intensely dramatic, and admirably worked out. It is Hoffmannesque in style, but without that morbid repulsiveness that characterizes the tales of the great German romancer. "Topankalon" is an exquisitely delicate conception, charmingly elaborated and developed, and of high poetic merit. In fact, it is a prose poem, exhibiting rare imaginative qualities. Mr. Underwood is seen at his best in this production, in which the fascinations of style vie with the efforts of fancy for the mastery, and combine to create one of the most delightful of fantasies. "Herr Regenbogen's Concert" has appeared before, but is reprinted here with alterations. "The Great Organ Prelude" was written for Dwight's Journal, and is not the least pleasant of the pieces of which this volume is composed. The book, both in matter and in manner, cannot fail to add to its author's reputation. The elegant garb in which it appears is worthy of it, and this is the highest praise that can be bestowed. It is one of the handsomest specimens of typography of the season. The paper is fine, the type large and clear, the binding elegant, and the execution in general of the finest order. It is published by Lee & Shepard.

New York Philharmonic.—Prof. F. L. Ritter's Second Symphony.

The Tribune of March 4, says:

Prof. Ritter's Symphony is a new work, and this was its first performance. It is a musical illustration of Byron's "Sardanapalus," or to speak more correctly it is supposed to have been suggested by the reading of the tragedy, and the spirit of its different movements corresponds with the frame of mind inspired by the poem. It is in no sense what is called "programme music," and Prof. Ritter remembers the great truth which so many lose sight of, that the function of music is not to imitate but to suggest, and that a composition which must be interpreted by an elaborate verbal description is music of a base and imperfect order. Without expecting us, therefore, to follow in his symphony the action of the drama, he has taken certain passages as texts, so to speak, and built upon them an Allegretto moderato corresponding to the picture of the great king as he "lolls crowned with roses," a Scherzo, symbolical of the royal revels, an Andante suggested by Myrrha's soliloquy, and an Allegro con spirito, in which we catch the furious spirit of the final catastrophe. The orchestra under Mr. Bergmann gave a careful and refined interpretation of this work, and the impression produced by it was highly pleasing. If we say that it shows Prof. Ritter to have been a reverent and intelligent student of Beethoven, we do not mean to imply that he has borrowed anything from the great master except a method of treating his own ideas: and of course he could not have looked to a better model. The style of the first movement seems to us particularly good. It is simple, fluent, and forcible. With a single long drawn note (the poet's "woe—woe to the unrivaled city!") it passes at once into the charming Scherzo allegretto. The Andante is plaintive and sombre. In the final Allegretto the composer has given a somewhat freer rein to his fancy, and made a little approach toward the exuberance of the modern school, but he never becomes either coarse or fantastic. The whole symphony is characterized by a sort of composure which indicates a writer sure of his resources and master of all his instruments. The scoring is solid and rich, without being showy, and abounds in beautiful touches. We doubt whether such a work would captivate the multitude, but it will earn the respect of connoisseurs and increase the reputation which Prof. Ritter already enjoys as one of the most accomplished and scholarly of our resident composers.

The orchestral pieces in the second part were well played—the Overture better than the Symphonic Poem; and for once we can give hearty praise to all the solos. We never heard Mr. Remmert sing so well before; while Miss Mehlig's performance of the lovely Schumann concerto was simply delicious.

The pieces announced for the Fifth concert are Beethoven's Heroic symphony, Bargiel's "Prometheus" overture, and Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave." Mr. Bergner is to be the solo player.

The Weekly Review says of the new Symphony.

Prof. Ritter employs the wealth at his command with a free and liberal, but not a lavish or wasteful hand. His moderation shows sound judgment and judicious taste, if not some self-denial, for it is easy to perceive that he is a thorough master of instrumentation and all the highly colored appliances of the modern school.

The first movement of Mr. Ritter's Symphony, Allegro moderato, in E minor, 3-4 time, commences with a dash of austerity, which outburst gives way readily to a bright, clear, luxurious representation of jovial revel and enjoyment, full of sensuous elegance and attraction. This view closes with a severe warning blast and prescient wail of woe, and the next movement succeeds, without break, Scherzo allegretto, E major, in 6-8 time, which carries out the glimpse of the royal reveller's spirit in the first movement with heightened effect; at first in a defiant strain, and finally in a softened and voluptuous mood, with a very successful endeavor to fix the sparks of beauty's heavenly ray, which gives a pearly lustre to the composer's melting and flowing rhythm.

After an interval of rest here a majestic andante in A minor, 2-4 time, depicts an introspective and saddened spirit such as we may well suppose to have actuated the beautiful Greek slave, Myrrha, who despised her bonds, and yet loved her enamored lord and possessor. The pensive humiliation breathed by the movement become soon charged with Greek fire and devotion, and by a masterly modulation, piu mosso, leads gracefully without interval, to the final movement, Allegro con Spirito, returning to E minor, 4-4 which dashes into the martial vein, and draws freely upon the instrumental resources of the art. The coloring here is bold, rich, decided and striking, and even when the clamor of the conflict seems to have subsided the lofty strain of kingly daring is still maintained and the hues and harmonies deepen and swell with the indomitable magnanimity of death-defying heroism, till the fatal and sublime climax is reached, and, leaving their mortal ashes a prey to the flames kindled by their own hand, the two immortal spirits soar from earth on the wings of love to their eternal home.

Such is the outline of the instrumental drama, and its inarticulate thoughts and language are intelligibly and eloquently conveyed.

The Symphony is remarkable for clearness and symmetry. It does not attempt to dive into the unfathomable, and yet its meaning is profound and replete with infinite suggestion. The means employed are all legitimate and yet novel, fresh and individual. We felt it to be the impress of preceding great masters on the work, as we see Shakespeare in Milton, and both in Byron, but that advancement on the progress of others does not affect the originality of the production, which judging from a first hearing, and first impressions are often the most generally correct, stamps the composer as a writer of genius.

Prof. Ritter's Symphony finds another warm welcome in Mr. Jerome Hopkins's queer Orpheonist and Philharmonic Journal, from which we quote:

As years advance we confess to greater lenience in judgment of new musical works, which lack a decided originality, so long as they unfold other beauties of almost every description, such as clearness, nobility of conception, carefully-weighted correlation of parts, effective instrumentation, absence of affectation, healthy poetic sentiment, breadth of treatment, and a sufficient adherence to the rules of form to betray the scholiast without exposing the cloven foot of the pedant, just enough in fact to make the cultivated listener feel comfortable, to reassure him that he is not wasting his time, and to start the glittering tear of sympathy with the composer, no matter who he may be.

The symphony opens with three chords in A minor, followed by a sotto voce passage of modulations prior to the entrance upon the tonic E minor, the key of the work. The movements are (1) Allegretto moderato, (2) Scherzo Allegretto, (3) Andante and (4) Allegro furioso. This last title possesses a slight flavor of romanticism which we do not like, but n'importe.

There is a splendid sequence in the first movement when the brass instruments come in, which alone would save any symphony. To be sure this reminds one a little of the brazen dissonance on the interval of the second in Schumann's number 4, but only in the fact of its being brass and being a sequence, in other respects it is an original thought nobly handled. The first and second movements are connected by a short harmonic progression, ended with one long note, which introduces the charming Scherzo in E major, in 3-8 time, and in which the alternation of the graceful theme by the wood instruments and violins is skillfully wrought out. The audience took a genuine delight in this movement, the finale of which is a fine specimen of melodic inversions. The interest was kept up throughout the whole.

The Andante in A minor pleased us least, because the beauty of the commencement is not sustained, nor does it seem to possess that oneness traditionally associated with the movement. It is broken into in a ruthless style, by an heroic alla marcia obtrusion, for which we could find no justification and in which there seemed less attractiveness. But we may be mistaken, and possibly a second hearing would cause us to alter our opinion. We thought we detected a reminiscence of Beethoven's number 7 in this movement.

The Allegro furioso also possesses a Schumannesque introduction, and we cannot tell why it should be so. This is an open question to be sure, and there is perhaps, no reason why short introductions should not be allowed to symphonic movements unless because they are combersome, and are not always harmonically in taste. Our principal objection, however, is that they destroy the feeling of completeness of each movement and cause a symphony to resemble a huge overture, thus denying to the audience their few moments of rest where it is needed, where applause is expected, and where it ought to come in. Thus, in a measure, the chances of success of the work are lessened by forcing the listeners to become fatigued before its culmination.

This movement, although to us the least interesting, yet seems to have greater labor expended upon it than any of the others. It abounds in counterpoint imitation, fuguetta, inversions and augmentations, which are lavished without stint, but all without relieving the listener from a feeling of oppression. When just before the finale the composer adopts what contrapuntists call "an harmonic march" (and a rather transparent one too) for a peroration, we confess we are a little disappointed. If we do not mistake, Mendelssohn has a similar "come down" at the end of his Meeres-stille overture, where the simple diatonic scale is unduly exalted, but the effect upon us has always been one of dissatisfaction.

With these slight blemishes—added to which we would point out a passage of unnecessary consecutive fifths just after the brazen sequences before mentioned, in the first movement—this symphony of Mr. Ritter's is a truly grand and masterly work, and is one to which repeated hearings can give greater charm. We think that, so far as we have had ears to hear, it is by all odds the greatest work of the kind yet composed in this country.

Its best features are undoubtedly counterpoint, harmonic dispersions and sequential writing. Its greatest weakness, we think, consists of want of strong contrasts, dearth of salient motives—excepting in the Scherzo—and lack of boldness of conception. The instrumentation is throughout a great advance over that in Mr. Ritter's first symphony, and excepting a certain high A in the trumpets—which Berlioz would have called "hazardous,"—it seemed to us irreproachable and, in certain passages, rarely sonorous.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Come with me. (Vieni Meccò. 3. C to G. Campana. 40

For Soprano and Alto, or Soprano and Bass.
"Waves are sleeping, and roses are dreaming."
An elegant duet, and quite easy.

Kiss and make up. Song and Chorus. 3. F to f. Smith. 30

"Oh, forget the harsh word spoken,
Kiss and make it up, my sweet!"
Very pretty. May belong to the "complete lover's library" which is to be, [perhaps], by means of which musical courtships, flirtations, "pops," tips and reconciliations may be gone through with without a single word spoken.

My own true love to my Dying Day. 3. D minor to f. Malloy. 40

"Back, ah! come back. Ah! well away.
But my own true love comes not any day."
As first heard, it classes itself with the lulling minor airs which Bridget croons over the cradle of the household pet. But it grows on one, and is really a very delicate and beautiful Irish ballad.

Golden Slumbers. 4 part song. 3. C to e. Cummings. 35

"Golden slumbers kiss your eyes,
Smiles awake you when you rise.
Rock them! Lullaby."

Of thee. 3. F to f. Sargent. 30

"The sounds of toil are hushed, love,
And the slumbering world is still."
A very graceful ballad.

Unspoken Love. 3. C to d. Sainton-Dolby. 40

"I was too proud the truth to show,
And so we parted long ago."
Fine concert song. Illustrated title.

O, weep not that I leave the shore. (The Veteran's Son). 3. E♭ to f. Fehr. 35

A good patriotic ballad.

Well-a-day. 4. A♭ to e. Randegger. 50

"Love should be true,
Should be true as the star."
Magnificent. Beautiful lithograph portrait of Miss Addie Ryan, who includes this among her popular concert songs.

Instrumental.

Polka des Montagnards. (Bauer Polka. 3. G. Eggard. 60

Properly "Polka of the Peasants" or "Rustic Polka," and introduces the bizarre melodies suitable for a German country jollification, in a skillful manner.

Souvenir de Mignon. 5. D. Hess. 60

A few of the favorites of the new opera. The "Priere," the "Styrienne," the "Berceuse," and elegant changes and variations.

Kaiserstadt Walts. (Emperor City). 3. E. Alt. 65

A kind of military air in the form of a waltz, composed in honor of Berlin and the Emperor. Very good.

Fleurette. Caprice Impromptu. 4. G. C. Gottschalk. 50

Very original and piquant.

Jolly Sisters Galop. 3. F. Zikoff. 40

It is no easy thing to write a galop that is not just like all other galops. But Mr. Z. has done it, and made a pretty thing.

Ruth Walts. 3. C. Willing. 30

Very spirited and new. Those who are Willing to try it, will play it many times after.

Valse Caprice. 5. E♭. Rubinstein. 1.00

Fine lithograph portrait of the great player. Excellent music, and not at all out of the reach of ordinary players.

La Penseroso. Song without words. 2. A♭. Howard, arr'd by Wilson. 25

Easy, but very good.

Prima Donna of a Night. Lanciers. 3. Pratt. 35

Jolly Brothers. 3. " 30

Two well-arranged sets, melodies partly from Offenbach.

Books.

THE CULPRIT FAY. Cantata for Female Voices. J. L. Ensign. 1.00

All who are familiar with Joseph Rodman Drake's gem of a poem, the perfection of delicacy and sweetness, will only require that the accompanying music shall also be sweet and melodious. This music is so. Probably one of the prettiest things that can be desired for practice in Ladies' Seminars.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, E flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

D W I G H T ' S
JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

JOHN S. DWIGHT, EDITOR.

VOLUME XXXII

BOSTON:
PUBLISHED BY OLIVER DITSON AND COMPANY, 277 WASHINGTON STREET, 1873.

Reprint Edition 1967

JOHNSON REPRINT CORP.
NEW YORK—LONDON

ARNO PRESS, INC.
NEW YORK, N.Y.

Library of Congress Catalog Card No. 67-24725

Manufactured in the U.S.A. by Arno Press Inc.

INDEX.

- Abt, Franz, in America, 246, 255, (See "Peace Jubilee"); Sketch of..... 264
 Additional Accompaniments to Bach and Handel..... 109, 118, 121, 137, 145, 200, 300
 A Dilettante to the Death, (Lond. Mus. World) 177
 A Matter of Principle: Herr Stockhausen's letter..... 219
 Ambros, A. W. Translations from his "Bunte Blaetter;" on Robert Franz, 193, 201, 209; on Music in Italy..... 240
 American Art and German Magnanimity, (H. W. Beecher)..... 72
 A Musical Prince..... 206
 Ancient Miracle Plays. (Mrs. L. M. Child)..... 146
 Ancient Musical Instruments. (Chas. Reade)..... 290, 307, 250
 Angier, Rev. Joseph: Obituary Notice..... 23
 A Parisian Institution (the Claque)..... 92
 Apollo Club, in Boston. (See Concerts)
 Apollo versus Beethoven! Reply to Harper's "Envy Chair."..... 383
 "Arcadian" Symphony by G. F. Bristow..... 300
 Art: essential to true Opera (London Mus. World), 96; Individualism in (M. A. Coquerel), 190; in the Public Schools of Boston (Advertiser)..... 154, 161, 170, 235
 A Title Page: "Jonah, an Oratorio," (A. W. T.)..... 95
 Auber, F. E. Obituary Notices of, 27, 82; the Comedy Composer, (Lond. Orch.), 41; Auber, a Study, by B. Jouvin..... 50, 53
 A Warning Unheeded, (E. Naumann)..... 240
- Bach, J. S. His Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue, G, 100; his St. Matthew Passion at Worcester, Engl. 324; at Westminster Abbey, 17, 21, 221, 234; at Boston, 22, 29, 34, 46, 48, 53, 69; at Gloucester Fest. (Engl.) 100; "cuts" in the St. John and Matthew Passions (letter from J. Stockhausen), 219; St. John Passion in London, 229; analyzed by G. A. Macfarren, 242; his Cantata "Ein feste Burg," 49; Orchestral Suite in D, 143; Organ Toccata in F, arranged for Orchestra by Esser, 181; his Chorales, 203; Chaconne for Violin, 150; his Vocal Works, and Handel's (Letter of Robert Franz, 100, 118, 121, 137, 145; what R. Franz has done for them (A. W. Ambros), 200; do. 220
 Ballads, English, and Dolby's Ballad Concerts, 126; Atlantic Monthly on..... 244
 Bands, Martial and Civic, 103; French, German and English at the "Peace Jubilee," 204, 277, 283, 287
- Beethoven: his Eighth Symphony, 6; Pastoral do., 134; "Eroica" do. (R. Wagner's conception of it), 257; first Symphony, 342, 344; Seventh, do., 351; his 4 "Leonore" Overt's, 143, 413; Overture "Weihe des Hauses," 214; his Piano Concertos, 191, 100, 230, 391; music to "Ruins of Athens," 224, 374; to "Egmont,"..... 222
 Beethoven Centennial, (by Rev. R. L. Collier, 2; at Bonn, 85, 98, 103, 119 (B. J. L.); "Beethoven" by R. Wagner, extracts from..... 273
 Beethoven: Thayer's Life of, second vol. 79; (reviewed by Dr. Ed. Hanslick), 140; his interview with Schubert (Haweis), 211; Bust of, by Story..... 250
 Belgian Artisans' Choir..... 203
 Benedict, Sir Julius..... 13
 Bennett, Sir Wm. Sterndale, 13, 202, 259 (Punch); Schumann's notice of, in 1837, 220; his "Woman of Samaria"..... 54
- Berlioz: and Cherubini..... 188
 Blind, The: Musical Education of..... 227, 205
 Bologna, Music in..... 300
 Boston Hubbub, The (N. Y. Albion), 267; Boston Pomposo (Lond. Orch.)..... 267
 Boston: Musical prospect for 1871-2, 70, 115; for 1872-3, 204; Music in its Public Schools, 18, 20, 30, 52, 246, 380; Public Library: Musical Department of, 87; Singers Abroad..... 94
 Braham, John: his Career, (Lond. Mus. World, 1854)..... 171, 178
 Brahms, Johannes: his Serenade in A minor, 204
 Brandes, Mlle. the Pianist..... 13
 Bristow, Geo. F. His "Arcadian" Symphony, 300
 British Orchestral Society, The..... 367
 Buck, Dudley: his Motets, 153; appointed Organist to Boston Music Hall..... 205
 Buelow, Hans von: (by Ferd. Hiller), 213; his Life and Works..... 65
 Burgmüller, Norbert: Sketch of; his Piano Concerto..... 151
 Byrd, William: his Madrigals..... 208
- Campanini, Italo, the Tenor Singer..... 248
 Capoul, M., the French Tenor..... 71, 70, 110, 108
 Carafa, Michael. Obituary..... 303
 Carreno, Miss Teresa, the pianist..... 327
 Carey, Henry..... 236
 Cary, Miss Annie Louise..... 230
 Charity Children, the: their Singing at St. Paul's (J. Hullah), 68; do. (Lond. Choir), 241
 Cherubini: his "Water Carrier," 134, 173, 183, 200; C. and Berlioz, 188; his Overture to "Lodoiska," 214; to "Les Abencerrages"..... 374
 Chicago, Pyro-Musically Considered..... 124
 Chickering Piano, The..... 223
 Chopin: Recollections of, and Liszt. By Lenz, 377; his "Krakowiak"..... 308
 Chorley, H. F. Obituary sketch of..... 202
 Church Music Association, The, in N. York, 162, 364
 Church Music. (J. S. D.)..... 238
 Cirillo, Signor, the Singing teacher from Naples..... 281, 318
 Clementi, Muzio, 74; Described by Moscheles, 337
 Claque, The, a Parisian Institution..... 92
 Competitive Trials of Vocal Associations in Belgium. (Ferd. Hiller)..... 306
 Concerto Organ Playing at the Royal Albert Hall. (Lond. Orch.)..... 93
- CONCERTS IN BOSTON:
 Apollo Club..... 135, 254, 374
 Boston Conservatory..... 231, 230, 247
 Cary, Miss Annie Louise..... 230
 Chamber Concerts..... 406, 414
 Daum, Hermann: Farewell..... 7
 Dixey, R. C. Concert for Museum of Fine Arts, 15; "Lohengrin" music..... 231
 English Ballad Concerts: Mr. Geo. Dolby's Troupe, 126
 Finkenstaedt, Miss Anna: Private Piano Matinee, 318
 Germania Band: Promenade Concerts..... 55
 Handel and Haydn Society: Easter Oratorios ("Messiah" and "Creation," with Mlle. Nilsson), 7; Triennial Festival of 1871, 15, 22, 29, 30, 32, 34, 38, 46, 48, 53, 62, 69; "Thanksgiving Oratorios" ("Elijah" and "Judas Maccabeus," with Miss Edith Wynne, Mme. Patey, W. H. Cummings and Stanley, 142; Christmas: "St. Paul" and "Messiah" (with same artists), 159; Stabat Mater, &c., with the English singers, 174; "Messiah" at Christmas, 358; "Elijah" and "Judas Maccabeus," with Mme. Rudersdorff, Miss Faiman, Mr. Varley, Mr. Whitney, &c..... 390
 Harvard Musical Association: Symphony Concerts, 6; Seventh Season, 110, 127, 134, 143, 151, 163, 166, 180, 181, 190, 204, 206, 214; Eighth Season, 295, 327, 335, 342, 343, 344, 351, 366, 374, 378, 383, 391, 397, 406, 413
 Heine, Joseph, the blind Violinist..... 111, 223
 Hills, J. A. Piano Recital..... 136
- Krebs, Miss Marie: Piano Recitals..... 7, 23
 Kreissmann, Aug., Testimonial to..... 300, 414
 Kutaleb, Aug., Matinee..... 239
 Lang, B. J. Chamber Concerts at the "Globe," 191, 214; Symphony Concerts with his pupils, 214, 223, 230, 239
 Leachard, Hugo, and Julius Eichberg: Trio Matinees, 127, 143, 149, 150, 167, 167, 173, 183; Concert in honor of Robt. Franz, 191, 199; Matinees, 382, 391, 407
 Listemann Quartet Matinees..... 14, 23
 Mehlig, Miss Anna: Piano Recitals, 167, 175, 190, 223, 413
 Mendelssohn Glee Club of New York..... 23
 Mendelssohn Quintette Club..... 318, 391, 398, 407
 Messrs. Summer, Apthorp, Adams and Tucker (B. J. Lang's pupils): Piano Concerts..... 14, 23
 Moulton, Mrs. Charles..... 127, 135
 National Musical Congress..... 52, 56, 64
 New England Conservatory..... 215, 247, 335
 Organ Concerts, Music Hall: J. K. Faine, 207; B. Buck..... 207, 295
 Osgood, Geo. L., in Chelsea..... 310
 Parepa-Rosa, Mme..... 111
 Peace Jubilee (P. S. Gilmore's International of 1872), 184, 120, 163, 255, 262, 263, 267, 269, 270, 275, 277, 279, 282, 286
 Peck, A. P., Annual Benefit Concert, 15; Popular Concerts..... 111, 335, 359
 Perabo, Ernst..... 14, 23, 167, 173, 190, 414
 Petersilea, Carlyle: Piano Recitals, 167, 335; Beethoven Recitals..... 255
 Phillips, Miss Adelaide..... 111
 Popular Orchestral Concerts..... 335
 Public School Children..... 30, 246
 Rudersdorff, Mme. Erminia, and her Concert troupe (Miss Alice Fairman, Miss Therese Liebe, Mr. Nelson Varley)..... 271, 295, 367, 375, 382
 Rubinstein, Anton (with H. Wieniawski, Mlle. Liebhart and Mlle. Orpeny)..... 326, 334, 361
 Strakosch Concerts, (Carlotta Patti, Miss Cary, Teresa Carreno, Sig. Mario and Emil. Saurer)..... 318, 327
 Suckow, Christian: Soirée..... 207
 Thayer, Eugene: Free Organ Recitals..... 23, 47, 335
 Thomas Theodore: Orchestral Concerts, 15, 150, 151, 222, 350
 Zerrahn, Carl: Annual Concert..... 6, 223
- Concours International of Singers at Verviers, 306
 Conducting from Memory. By Ferd. Hiller, 280
 Conservatory, The, at Naples, 108, 281; at Leipzig, 252; at Paris..... 300
- CORRESPONDENCE:
 Berlin, Prussia..... 352
 Bonn, Germany..... 103
 Brooklyn, N. Y..... 246, 381
 Chicago..... 124, 150, 244, 302, 335, 380
 Dresden..... 415
 Farmington, Conn..... 63
 Florence, Italy: Wagner's "Lohengrin"..... 185
 Hartford, Conn..... 24
 London..... 69, 144
 Milwaukee..... 194
 New York, 16, 20, 34, 111, 128, 135, 152, 167, 176, 183, 191, 200, 204, 215, 223, 231, 245, 246, 261, 279, 311, 319, 321, 331, 341, 349, 365, 373, 381, 389, 415
 Philadelphia, 16, 136, 150, 215, 223, 228, 232, 239, 246, 340, 348, 357, 358, 366, 390, 392, 400, 407
 Washington, D. C..... 256
- Costa, Sir Michael: his Orchestra at Drury Lane..... 80
 Crammings. Lond. Mus. World..... 316
 Cramer, J. B., 74; Described by Moscheles, 312, 328
 Crystal Palace Concerts, London, 85, 100, 220, 300, 368; "National Music Meetings" at..... 277
 Cummings, Wm. H., the English Tenor, 81, 80, 120, 142, 174; his "Fairy Ring" Cantata..... 253
 Curwin, Rev. J. His musical influence in England..... 84
 Cusins, W. G.: his Oratorio "Gideon"..... 106

Darley, W. H. W. Obituary Notice of. Philadelphia Bulletin.....206
 Demorest, Miss Vienna: Concert in N. York (Sun).....27
 Distant Music. H. C. Lunn in Lond. Mus. Times.....226
 Dolby Troupe of English Singers, The, 80, 120, 142, 174
 Doria, Miss Clara.....183
 Drasdil, Miss Anna, the Contralto singer.....358
 Drayton, Henry. Obituary.....310
 Dublin University, music at 164; musical Lecture at.....165
 Duprez: his School of Singing.....25
 Dussek: his Piano Sonatas.....399

 Echo in Music. Butler.....95
 Ellerton, J. Lodge, Death of.....407
 Elvey, Sir George J.....13
 English Opera. Once a Week. (See Opera).....168
 English Schools, Music in.....236
 Erba, Dionysius: Did Handel borrow from him? Lond. Orch......107
 Esser, Heinrich. Obituary notice of.....303
 Evenings at the Theatre in Italy. E. Hanslick.....369

 Fairman, Miss Alice, the English Contralto, 351, 367, 390
 Familiar Music. Globe.....213
 Fétis, F. J. Obituary sketch of his Life, 15, 43; his Library.....228
 Fiddle, Facts about. Chas. Reade.....307
 Finkenstaedt, Miss Anna, the Pianist.....318
 Form in Music.....355, 363, 402
 Franz, Robert: his Songs, 135, 192, 199, 201, 208, 382, 398; his added accompaniments to Bach and Handel, 135, 109, 118, 121, 137, 145, 208, 398; Complimentary Concert to, in Boston.....199
 Friburg: its Organ and Keeper (Story about Mendelssohn).....108

 Gade, N. W. His third Symphony, in A minor, 182; second do, in E.....351
 German National Hymns.....322
 German Works on Music, Recent.....184
 Gillott Sale, The, of Musical Instruments.....250
 Gilmore, Patrick S., and "Peace Jubilees," 84, 120, 163, 255, 262, 263, 277, 282, 286; his Book (Nation), 163; his "Guns" and Handel's Fireworks Music.....250
 Glogner-Castelli, Carl.....166
 Goddard, Mme. Arabella, 200, 220; her Farewell in London.....306, 408
 Goethe: and Mendelssohn, 187, 284, 339; his Frederike, 256; his Songs (J. S. I.).....347
 Godfrey, Dan., and his Grenadier Band.....283
 Gossec. From the French.....385, 393, 401, 409
 Gounod, Charles: his Mass, 36; his grievances in England.....364
 Grist, Julia, (by N. P. Willis).....314

 Hagen, Theodore. Obituary notice of.....167
 Halle, Germ., described by C. Loewe.....90, 113
 Handel: as an Oratorio writer, 77; his "Israel in Egypt," 38; "Joshua," 49; "Dettingen Te Deum," 61; "Judas Macabæus," 142, 390; "Theodora," 185; "Deborah," 189, 195; "Athaliah," 195; "Messiah," 358; "L'Allegro," &c., 320; his Fireworks music, 250; Arias from his Italian Operas, arranged by R. Franz, 135, 382, 383, 398; his Oboe Concertos, 143; Organ Concertos, 259; Additional Accompaniments to his Oratorios, &c. (Letter by Robert Franz), 109, 118, 121, 137, 145, 209, 390; an Educator in England.....155
 Handel or Erba. London Orchestra.....107
 Handel and Haydn Society. Annual Meetings and Reports, 40, 44, 55; its first Oratorio performance (in 1815).....150
 "Harvard" Symphony Concerts, The, and Harper's "Easy Chair,".....378, 383
 Hawels, Rev. H. R. Extract from his "Music and Morals".....265
 Hayden, Charles R., the Tenor singer.....390, 407
 Haydn: compared with Handel, 77; his Oxford Symphony, 151; Symphony in E flat, 366; other Symphonies, 183, 349; his Cantata "Ariadne at Naxos," 342, 344; Imperial Mass.....364
 "Heavy" Music.....88

Hiller, Ferdinand: in London, 4, 11, 13; his "Nala and Damayanti," 4, 11; his "Chit-chat" in the Koelnische Zeitung, 213, 306; his 60th Birthday at Cologne.....149
 Hints on Musical Worship. J. S. D.....238
 History of Music; Mr. J. K. Paine's Lectures on the.....8, 11
 Hoffman, Richard, the Pianist.....182, 383
 Home Music. [S. M. C.].....57
 'Home, Sweet Home.' By Donizetti, or by Bishop? London Papers.....167
 Horsley, C. E. His Reminiscences of Mendelssohn, 345, 353, 360; directs Church Mus. Association in New York.....364
 Hullah, John: his influence in England.....84
 Hummel, J. N.....74

 Improvement in Popular Song Writing. Atlantic Monthly.....244
 Individualism in Art. M. Coquerel.....130
 Inside Views of the Jubilee Chorus. Daily Advertiser.....267
 Italian Opera in London: The Season reviewed. Times.....292
 Italy, Music in, by Ambros, 249; Evenings at the Theatre in [Hanslick].....369

 Joachim, Joseph: in London, 5, 269; his Hungarian Concerto.....269
 Joachim, Mme. Analia.....13, 371
 Jullien, L. A., in England.....84
 "Jullien II" (Louis George). Eve. Gazette.....138

 Kalkbrenner, the Pianist.....74, 193, 313
 Kapellmeister Music [Hamburg].....416
 Klausner, Karl: Sketch of by L. Damrosch.....203
 Krebs, Marie, the Pianist, 7; [See Concerts] 158
 Kreissmann, Aug. Testimonial Concert to.....399, 414

 Lanner, the Waltz Composer.....314
 Lausot, Mme. J. Letter from, about "Lohegrin" in Italy.....185, 191
 Leipzig: its Fairs and Music, 133; its Conservatory, 252; its Gewandhaus Concerts, 148, 164, 175, 189, 205, 215, 221, 237, 272, 352, 359, 397
 Leopold I., Emperor of Germany: his Devotion to Music.....177
 Liebe, Fr. Therese, the Violinist.....343, 367, 383
 Light, Waves of, and of Sound. Prof. Tyndall.....371
 Lind-Goldschmidt, Mme. in Florence, 165; Libel on.....15
 Liszt, Franz: and Rubinstein, 147, 180; his Concert at Pesth, 230; his Piano Concertos, 159; "Don Juan" Fantasia, 159; his "Symphonic Poems," 180, 182; Described by Richard Wagner, 180; L. and Chopin, Lenz's Recollections of.....377
 Loewe, Carl: his Story of his Early Life, 73, 81, 89, 97, 105, 113; his Autobiography reviewed by Hanslick.....297
 Lucca, Pauline: at St. Petersburg; Letter from Olga Eisheim, 212; in London, 253; in New York, 321, 325, 333; in Philadelphia, 358; in Boston.....375

 Macfarren, G. A. His Cantata "Outward Bound".....328
 Madrigals, Rise and Progress of, in England [Dr. Rimbault].....298
 Mario, Signor: Sketch of, by himself, and his Retirement, 77, 83; his Repertory, 83; revisits America.....317, 318, 327
 Mason, Dr. Lowell. Obituary Notice.....295
 Mason, William: his Piano Technics, by W. S. B. Mathews.....195
 Matthews, Charles, a Card from.....348
 Mazzini's Musical Opinions.....304
 Mehlig, Miss Anna.....159, 164, 166, 167, 223 [See also Concerts].
 Mendelssohn. More Letters by, 57, 66; and his Reformation Symphony [M. Coquerel], 131; his "Elijah," 142, 390; "St. Paul" in St. Paul's, 355, 372; M. and the Freiburg Organ, 188; and Goethe, 187; his Songs, 183, 407; Overture to "Athaliah," 206, 343; "Meeresstille" Overture (Schumann), 284; Personal Recollections of by F. Rahles, 252; by his English Pupil (C. E. Horsley), 345, 353, 361; in Paris in his Youth, 308; My first meeting with, at Goethe's house, by Prof. Lobe, 339; his Death [by Moschel].....356
 Meyerbeer: his influence on the Art of Singing, 17; as a Leader.....301

Milton and Music. College Herald.....161
 Miracle Plays, The Ancient. Mrs. Child.....146
 Modesty in Musicians.....103
 Moscheles, I. His Biography by his Widow (Hanslick), 305; in London (from the Biography).....313, 329, 337
 Moulton, Mrs. Charles.....123, 127, 132, 135
 Mozart: his "Idomeneo," 45, 260; his "Nozze di Figaro" Overture, 398; his Concert Arias, 134, 342, 344, 360, 383, 406; Symphony No. 6, in C, 143; Piano Concertos, 181; his unpublished Ballet "Les Petits Riens," 404; Sonata in D for two Pianos.....407
 Musical Festivals: The Festival Season (Ed.) 62; do. [Lond. Orch.], 115; Handel Triennial at Crystal Palace, London, 59, 63, 69; Lower Rhine, at Cologne, 62, 49; Handel and Haydn Soc., Triennial, Boston, 62, 30, 46, 53; Worcester, Mass., 336; Cincinnati, 376; Gloucester, Engl., 63, 106; Worcester, Engl., 312, 319, 324; Norwich, Engl., 312, 328; Saengerfest at New York, 61; at St. Louis, 288; Beethoven Centenary at Bonn, 85, 98, 103, 119; the First at Birmingham [1768].....410 (See also "Peace Jubilee," and Concerts.)
 Musical Congress, the "National," in Boston, 52, 64; Form, 355, 363, 402; Pitch, 197; Maxims (Schumann) 217; Education of the Blind [Lond. Mirror], 227; Worship, (J. S. D.), 238; Instruments, Ancient (Chas. Reade), 266, 307; Culture in Naples, 281; Supper Party, a. [N. P. Willis].....314
 Music: its Origin and Influence, [Quart. Rev.], 90; the new German, 11; M. "Light" and "Heavy" [J. S. D.], 87; Familiar [Globe], 213; "Passion" in [Haweis] 213; Distant.....226
 Music: in Boston Public Schools. [Dr. J. B. Upham], 18, 26, 386; Annual Exhibitions, 39, 52, 246; in Boston Public Library, 67; in Spain, 139; M. and Drawing in Boston Schools [Mr. Underwood's Report], 235; in English Schools.....236
 Music Lessons, S. M. C.....79
 Music School, the "Normal," [W. S. B. Mathews].....302
 Music and Statuary in our Public Schools... 19

 MUSIC ABROAD. [See also CORRESPONDENCE :
 Baden-Baden.....384
 Bayreuth.....83, 140, 164, 205, 253, 360
 Berlin, 5, 26, 37, 46, 63, 165, 176, 189, 214, 253, 263, 317, 384
 Bologna.....149, 169, 177, 185
 Bonn.....85, 98, 119, 397
 Breslau.....149, 394
 Brussels.....117, 253
 Carlsruhe.....165, 384
 Cairo, (Egypt).....192
 Cologne.....6, 29, 37, 49, 149, 176, 189, 197, 213, 221, 312, 328, 376, 384
 Cassel.....271, 384
 Constantinople.....294
 Darmstadt.....360
 Dresden.....189, 200, 216, 384
 Dublin.....164, 165
 Dusseldorf.....165, 189, 227, 271, 272, 285, 370
 Eilburg.....205
 Elbing, Prussia.....205
 Frankfurt-on-the-Main.....5, 149, 189, 200, 384
 Florence.....165, 185, 369
 Geneva.....253
 Gloucester, England.....106
 Glasgow.....147
 Hamburg.....5, 165, 189, 384, 416
 Halle.....216, 221
 Hanover.....223
 Leipzig.....71, 86, 133, 148, 164, 165, 175, 189, 205, 215, 221, 237, 252, 272, 311, 352, 369, 384, 397
 London.....4, 11, 12, 13, 17, 20, 21, 26, 37, 45, 60, 63, 68, 71, 76, 82, 83, 85, 83, 94, 117, 144, 165, 189, 200, 205, 219, 220, 227, 228, 234, 236, 237, 241, 248, 253, 259, 269, 272, 277, 284, 290, 292, 293, 294, 312, 348, 356, 360, 367, 372, 386, 416
 Madrid.....136
 Milan.....117, 184, 237, 272, 312
 Munich.....117, 149, 293, 312, 327, 330, 384, 397
 Naples.....29, 108, 241, 281
 Norwich, [Engl.].....294, 312, 328
 New Zealand.....226
 Oberammergau.....32, 67, 74, 146
 Paris.....82, 88, 117, 139, 148, 165, 189, 216, 244, 300, 312, 376, 384, 397, 415
 Pesth.....117, 230, 397
 Prague.....5, 166
 Rome.....176
 Salzburg.....117
 The Hague.....312
 St. Petersburg.....212
 Strasburg.....95, 117
 Stuttgart.....189, 397
 Verviers, [Belgium].....306
 Vienna, 5, 28, 86, 117, 149, 184, 188, 189, 222, 237, 247, 254, 256, 294, 312, 300, 371, 384, 397, 416
 Weimar.....384
 Worcester, [Engl.].....294, 312, 319, 324
 Yokohama, [Japan].....14

 MUSIC IN VOLS. XXXI. and XXXII.:
 Bach's "St. Matthew Passion Music," completed from page 18.

MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE: (See also CORRESPONDENCE):

Binghampton, N. Y.	302
Chelsea, Mass.	310
Chicago	303
Cincinnati	376
Farmington, Conn.	63, 158, 203
Milwaukee	376
New York	27, 35, 36, 61, 70, 71, 72, 88, 93, 104, 111, 123, 128, 135, 136, 141, 157, 162, 207, 212, 240, 263, 284, 317, 325, 335, 364, 379, 383
Philadelphia	7, 16, 72, 111, 136, 157
Salem, Mass.	66
St. Louis	298
Worcester, Mass.	7, 336, 378

Naples: its Advantages to the musical student, 108, 280; its Opera	241
National Anthem. [Lond. Standard]	235;
Songs [Hon. S. Salisbury]	332
National Hymn, Wanted a. Neue Berliner Musik Zeitung	322
National Music Meetings at the Crystal Palace	277, 284
Necrology, of Musicians	303, 309
Negro Folk Songs. N. Y. Weekly Review	411
New Musical Instrument: Atkins's "Hook Harmonium"	72
Nilsson, Christine, (Mme. Rouzand) : in Oratorio, 7; in Opera, 119, 121, 135, 141, 152, 191, 197, 108, 212, 215, 232; her Marriage	283, 290
"Normal" Music School, The. [W. S. B. Mathews]	302
Norman-Neruda, Mme., the Violinist	46
"Nothing new under the Sun," a Saxon Gilmore in 1615	301

Opera: a History of, by C. Schulze, 1, 10, 25, 41; O. and the Art of Singing (C. Glogner-Castelli) 9, 17, 25; Can it be dissociated from Art? [Lond. Mus. World] 96; the Earliest in England	168
Opera in Boston : Italian [Nilsson, Capoul, Jamet, &c.], 119, 121, 191, 197, 198; English [Parepa-Rosa troupe], 174, 183; Luc-ca and Kellogg, 375; in Philadelphia, 232, 358, 366; in New York, 200, 212, 215, 228, 231, 311, 321, 325, 333, 341, 349, 415
Opera in London, 4, 13, 82, 144, 228, 238, 248, 253, 272, 285, 291, 292; in Paris, 139, 248, 300, 384, 397; in Berlin, 28, 37, 216, 384; in Dresden, 384; Cologne, 384; in Vienna, 29, 222, 247, 312, 384, 397, 416; Munich 384; Hamburg, 384, 416; Italy, 144, 238, 241, 249, 312, 369; in St. Petersburg, 212; in Leipzig	221, 237, 252, 272, 384
Oratorios. New: Lond. Orchestra , 76; O. Question in New York, 93; the first in Boston	159
Orchestra. The Soul of the, 94; of Ladies from Vienna	104
Orchestras in our Theatres. Atlantic Monthly	370
Orchestral Players. Hawes	281
Organs: at Royal Albert Hall, 90; Handel's 259
Organ Playing; at Royal Albert Hall, 93; in Boston	207, 205
Organs and Organ Playing. Lond. Orch.	251
Organist. The Oldest in America	381
Orpheon Free Vocal School in New York. Letter from Jerome Hopkins	128
Osgood, George L., the Boston Tenor, 188, 191, 216, 263, 310, 351

Paganini, Nic. From the German	225, 233
Passion Play at Ober-Ammergau	67, 74, 146
"Passion" in Music. Music and Morals	213
Patey, Mme., the English Contralto, 126, 142, 174
Patti [Carlotta] and Mario. N. Y. Tribune	317
Pauer, Herr: his Piano Recital in London	147
Paulus, M. George and his French Band, 264, 277
"Peace Jubilee" Gilmore's International. [See Concerts.]
Peschka-Leutner, Mme.	287
Piano-Forte Playing: Mason & Hoadley's System for Beginners	36, 195
Piano-Forte; The Chickering	223
Pierson, Dr. Henry Hugh. Obituary Notice	396
Pitch, Musical	197

POETRY:

Ballad of the Boston Fire, Nov. 10, 1872. G. P. Lathrop	337
Chicago, (Oct. 10, 1871). Bret Harle	121
Faith: a Sonnet	73
Goods gone—something gone! From Goethe. J. S. D.	338
Mozart: a Sonnet. Celia Thaxter	321
My Old Red Violin. Harper's Weekly	169
Nilsson's Madman: a Prison Soliloquy. N. Y. Eve. Post	185
Parnass. From Goethe. J. S. D.	345
Regrets	97
Science: a Sonnet. X.	338
Shadows: a Sonnet. X.	265
Shadows: do.	265

Tears	105
Telegrams	85
The Grand Orchestra. Henry Ames Blood	225
The Love of God. Mrs. Richard Greenough	371
The Music of the Future, by a Modern. Lond.	273
Spectator	321
The Morning Glory: a Sonnet	80
The Organ Blower. O. W. Holmes	161
To Beethoven: a Sonnet, by C. Woman's Journal	409
When the Elves at dawn do pass. H. F. Chorley	292
"Where did you come from, Baby dear?" Geo. MacDonald	113
Poniatowski, Prince, as a Composer	266
Prima-Donnas. Lond. Globe	316
Programmes, Specimens of at Gilmore's "Jubilee"	279
Potter, Cipriani: Obituary Notices	122, 138
Poultry Concert in the Boston Music Hall. Eve. Gazette	199
Raff, Joachim. His second Symphony, 199; 4th do. in G minor, 365; his "Forest" Symphony, 380; Quartet, op. 77	398
Rameau, J. P.	383, 393
Refinement	388
Reinecke, Carl: Biographical Sketch of, by E. J. Butler, 101; in London, 229; his Concertstueck, op. 38	230
Rembrandt: M. Coquerel's Lecture	130
Ritter, F. L. His second ('Sardanapalus') Symphony, 207; his "History of Music," 335
Rosa, Parepa, Mme.	285
Rossini: his 'La Gazza Ladra'	175, 191
Rouzand, Mme. (See Nilsson)
Royal Albert Hall in London	12, 20, 218
Rubini. From La Revue des Deux Mondes , 1854	122, 131
Rubinstein, Anton: his artistic career. Lond. Choir , 147, 331; Estimate of by Dr. H. W. Bellows, 357; his 'Etude Infernale,' 151; Concerto in D minor, 158, 376; in G, 181, 183; 'Ocean' Symphony, 158, 222, 391; Trio in B flat, op. 52, 2, 7; Quintet, op. 59, 399; Piano Compositions, 335, 414; R. in New York, 317, 319, 321, 325, 349, 365, 373; in Boston, 326, 334, 367; in Philadelphia	381
Rudersdorff, Mme. Erminia, 31; in Boston, 69, 266, 303, 343, 344, 359, 367, 382, 390
Salem, Mass., Oratorio Society	66
Santley, Charles, the English Baritone, 126, 136, 142, 144, 174, 200, 253
Sarasate, Senor, the Violinist	245
Saro, Herr, and his Prussian Grenadier Band	271, 283, 287
Schneider, John, the German Organist	93
Schubert, Franz: Sketch of his Life and Works, by Haweis, 210, 218; Unveiling of his Statue in Vienna, 254; his Overture to "Alfonso and Estrella," 134, 342; Symphony in B flat, 190; his Songs [Ambros]	193
Schumann, Mme. Clara	200, 371, 396, 416
Schumann, Robert: his Music, 11; (Arcadian) 379; his Life by Wasielewski, translated by Miss Alger, 149; his Literary Works to be translated, 149; his "Manfred" music, 134, 400; Concertstueck in G, 391; Sonatas for Piano and Violin, 150, 167; Romances for Oboe and Piano, 150, 219; Quartet with Piano, 150, 414; Quintet with Piano, 382, 414; Trio do. op. 110, 399; Symphony in D minor, 151, 398; in C, 204, 206; Overture to 'Bride of Messina,' 159; to 'Genoveva,' 166, 342, 348; 'Carneval,' 326; Fantasie, op. 17, for Piano, 175; 'Waldscenen,' 190; Etudes Symphoniques, 191, 416; Piano Concerto, 206; his Songs [Ambros], 193; his Rules for young Musicians (translated by J. S. D.), 217; his Estimate of W. Sterndale Bennett	220
Score, a Musical: defined by Ferd. Hiller	288
Simon, Jules: his address at the Conservatoire in Paris	300
Singing, the Art of, (C. Glogner-Castelli), 9, 17, 25, 33; Do. by W. H. Daniell, 388, 395, 404, 411; how taught in Naples, and by Italians in America, 281; in Tune and out of Tune. Guide Musical	308
Slave Melodies of the South	411
Sobolewski, Edward. Obituary Notice	309
Soloists, and their Perils. Haweis	265
Sonata Form, The. By W. G. McNaught	402
Song Writers: What is required of them	129
Song Writing, Improvement in. Atlantic Monthly	244
Sound Waves. Prof. Tyndall	370
Standbridge, J. C. B. Obituary Notice. Philad. Bulletin	157

"Star-Spangled Banner," &c. Its Origin, by Hon. S. Salisbury	332
Sterling, Miss Antoinette	157
Stockhausen, Julius: his Letter on 'A Matter of Principle'	219
Story, Wm. W. His Bust of Beethoven	256
Strauss, Johann: in America, 263, 270, 276, 286; the Father and the Sons	314
Stuttgart Conservatory of Music	397
Suckow, Christian, the Norwegian Violinist	207
Supper Party, a Musical. N. P. Willis	314
Symphony Concerts, The, in Boston, and Harpers's "Easy Chair"	373, 383
Taglioni, Mme. Lond. Echo	79
Tartini: his Violin Music	383
Taubert, Wm. His Overture: 'Tausend und Eine Nacht'	206
Tausen-ism. From the German of W. Tappert	139
Tausig, Carl, Obituary Notice and Life of 86; Do. by H. von Buelow	116, 125, 137
Taylor, S. P., Organist	381
Tenors, What is becoming of our	260
Thalberg, Sigismund: Obituary Notice of, 27, 43; recalled by Harper's "Easy Chair"	51
Thayer, A. W. His Life of Beethoven, 70, 140; Visit to Boston	79
Thomas, Ambrose: his 'Mignon,' 141, 197, 198; 'Hamlet'	212, 215
Thomas, Theodore, and his Orchestra. (See Concerts.) His mixed Programmes, 150; his 'Summer Nights' (concerts) at Central Park Garden, 246, 284, 311; at Steinway Hall	341, 365, 381
Those Names! [A 'Jubilee' trick]	263
Three New Musical Knights, The. Lond. Orch.	13
To Be, or Not to Be (a 'native composer')	28
Tune, and Out of Tune, in Singing	308
Türk,—as Teacher, described by C. Löwe	97
Tyndall, Prof., on Waves of Sound, Water and Light	370
Ulrich, Hugo. Obituary Notice	303
Urso, Mme. Camille, the Violinist	200, 367
Varley, Nelson, the English Tenor	366, 383, 391, 414
Verdi: his 'Aida' at Cairo	191
Voice, The Human: Mr. G. V. Lee's Theory of, 315, 323; How to Use it (W. H. Daniell)	388, 395, 404, 411
Wachtel, the German Tenor, Letter from D. E. F. Philadelphia	179
Wagner, Richard: his Music, 12; in Berlin, 37; in Vienna, 257; in London, 408; his 'Lohengrin,' 33, 149, (R. Franz), 151; do. in Italy, 169, 177, 185, 191, 369; his Festival at Bayreuth, 88, 117, 149, 184, 205, (E. Hanslick's letter), 257; his Speech on laying the Corner Stone, 258; his Kaiser March, 151; his Collected Writings, 172; his Opinion of Liszt, 180; his Autobiography, 194; his Essay on Beethoven, 273; his 'Ritt der Walküren,' 351; Wagner Union in New York	415
Waltz, the true Tempo of the. N. Y. Weekly Review	276
Waltz Composers	276, 314
Wanted: a National Hymn. Lond. Mus. World	322
Warning, A. Unheeded: a Frenchman on 'Der Freyschuetz'	240
Waves of Sound, Water and Light. Tyndall	370
Weber, Von: his Overture to 'The Ruler of the Spirits,' 166, 343, 344; his 'Der Freyschuetz,' 240; in Italy, 369; his Piano Music	334
Whitney, M. W., the Bass Singer	358, 390, 406
What is becoming of our Tenors? Guide Musical	260
What lack we yet, (as to Singing Societies in Boston)?	78
What the ('Jubilee') Chorus thinks of itself. Daily Advertiser	261
Wieniawski, Henri, the Violinist, 317, 319, 321, 325, 326, 334, 340, 365, 367
Wieprecht, Wilhelm: Obituary notice of, 303; Anecdote of	311
Wilbye John: his Madrigals	298
Wilhelmi the Violinist	352
Wizard of the G-String, The. [See Paganini]
Wynne, Miss Edith, the English Soprano, 126, 142, 174
Zapfenstreich, the, in Berlin	317
Zelter and his Pupil	284, 339

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 809.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 6, 1872.

VOL. XXXII. No. 1.

Robert Franz.

(Translated for this Journal from the German of A. W. ARMBROG. *)

(Concluded from page 302.)

One of the most noteworthy and important sides of Franz's artistic character I have not yet considered: his relationship, his intimate affinity, indeed, with JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH. His love and veneration for the great Cantor of the Thomas Kirche is founded in his inmost nature: it has in it a trait of elective affinity. When Hanslick, for example, frankly confessed that to him certain works of Bach were "strange, cold, unintelligible," it is almost touching to hear how Franz, as Hanslick says, "sought to convert him"† to these very works. Hear Franz's own words, written at that time to Hanslick about Bach's Church Cantatas: "If you will look at these Cantatas with a mind unprejudiced, I doubt not for a moment that you will be in rapture with their lofty spirit. But first you must approach the master closely with your heart and feeling; the winnowing and equalizing understanding will of itself already find its own account in it. Happy should I be, could I contribute a little to your more lively interest in the immeasurable greatness of the man. When you have once buried yourself in his style, then he will take your soul prisoner and will weave a net about you, as he has about the souls of our favorites in Art, of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Schumann: he put them in chains, so as to make them all the freer! And this may every one experience through Bach;—for this must he be brought nearer to mankind!"

I do not care to imitate those travelling apprentices, who run after a passing coach, and secretly climb up behind, to spare their own legs and get a lift over a piece of the way; dropping the simile, I do not like to use other people's labor through quotations, covering myself against the charge of plagiarism through the celebrated goose-foot-treaty ("—") concluded by a silent mutual understanding among authors. But this time I know of nothing better I could say,—at the most "with but a slight change of words," than what the author of the excellent article on Robert Franz in the Deutsche Musikzeitung has said about the spiritual affinity between Bach and Franz:—"Franz works his way up to his own independence through a new influence, not perceptible in Schubert, and therefore all the more significant for him, namely through Sebastian Bach. What this greatest lyricist was for him in a purely musical regard, may be seen in the following: In general the polyphonic work predominates; hence the melody is an organic member of the whole, ingrown with the accompaniment; in Franz's melody we find Bach's peculiar turns in rich abundance. The modulations are laid out on a large, broad plan; Franz mostly modulates into the nearest related keys; hence the play of colors, the perpetual alternation between major and minor in many of his songs, as distinguished from the classical music, which mostly modulates in the tonic, dominant and subdominant. Herein consists the new and peculiar feature of the song melody of Franz, that it announces a free appropriation of the Bach method in the formation of melodies. A careful observer will find, that his leading themes always contain definite, self-centred, beautiful and simple harmonic relations; that even without the bass they give an intelligible image, bearing the bass as it were within themselves."

And so Franz, reverencing the old Bach like a saint, has turned his whole attention, with a devout enthusiasm, with an understanding, which one cannot help admiring, to the task of bringing the vocal compositions of Bach and of his great soul's brother and contemporary, Handel, nearer to us inheritors of the great times of Art, through his pious and judicious completions of their orchestral accompaniment. "These labors," remarks Hanslick, "have furthered in a remarkable degree the diffusion and acceptance of those works, and have converted many an one to Bach, who, shrinking as if frost-bitten from the cold skeleton of the original score, could not draw near the master with his heart." I think, when Franz crosses the market place in Halle, the bronze statue of Handel must nod to him familiarly; and so too in Leipzig the old Bach (who from a niche in his monument, as from a very narrow little window of the blissful immortality, peeps out into our perishable world of time, and, being thus hemmed in, cannot possibly nod) must, if he sees Franz pass by, a guest in Leipzig, at least allow his grim but kindly Cantor's face to light up with a smile of benediction. The beautiful saying of Goethe's Tasso:

"Homer forgot himself, his whole existence
Was to the contemplation of two men devoted," can be applied here with full justice, if instead of the name of the old Greek aidos we put the name of our aidos of Halle. Bach and Handel! Those truly are two men worthy of one's contemplation.

There are people, who, like watchmen of the musical Zion, cry fire at the mere sight of the Robert Franz "Bearbeitungen." Instead of "Bearbeitungen" I would rather call them "necessary completions in the style of the original." Not in the least will it do to compare them (as has been done) with "paintings over of precious old originals"; for what is painted over becomes inseparable from the old art work, and hands profane, incompetent, may ruin a miracle of Art forever. Who can look upon Leonardo's Supper in Milan, or the great Andrea del Sarto in Berlin without deep pain? But even were one to reject the Franz arrangements altogether, he can still return to the originals, and to their magro stretto (as the pious people in Rome call the strictest fast days). But Handel and Bach themselves would probably decline with thanks the invitation, should you bid them as guests to the aforesaid magro stretto. With the old masters a large musical work was not so much a draft at sight on future immortality, as it was, short and good, a musical service which they wished to perform to the honor of God and of Art upon some stated occasion; a performance, in which they, sitting at the thousand-voiced gigantic instrument, the organ, coöperated powerfully with their own artistic giant personality. In the hands of the singers, violinists and players of wind instruments they had of course to place their parts, in black and white; but they themselves from their organ filled out, conducted and controlled all this music, acting as the very soul of it. To work out an organ part for themselves, or have anything more before their eyes than a mere ciphered Bass, never occurred to them; the great orator speaks most persuasively, when he has merely noted down the points of his discourse, leaving the execution in detail to the inspiration of the moment; not when he reads from the manuscript carefully prepared at his writing desk at home. "Est Deus in nobis, agitante calescimus illo:" thought the old masters; and Handel at the most wrote down for himself the word of command: "Let the Organ sound!" But how shall the organ sound? That is the question. I must beg the reader's pardon if I make use again of my old comparison of a coach rolling by. Very beautifully and strikingly says Hanslick of the "Bearbeitungen" of older works by Robert Franz: "That the majority of the accompanied vocal compositions of older masters can only produce a lively effect to-day, when an artistic helping hand fills up the gaps in them, makes the sonority complete, and carries out directions only hinted, is admitted by all musicians, who comprehend the music as a living art and not as a mere archaeological study. The only difference can be about the measure and the method of such aids. But we know that most of the old works were not performed with literal adherence to the scores. The figured Bass in these scores proves, that improvisation on the organ or the clavicord came in by way of complement; and it is well authenticated that Bach especially, having a very insufficient orchestra at his command, made his accompaniment almost the main affair; indeed he was compelled to do so. 'He who will rightly understand the delicate in thorough bass and what accompanying a thing well means,' writes the old Mitzler, 'must hear the great J. S. Bach, who so accompanies every general bass to a solo, that one would think it a Concerto, and that the melody, as he makes it at first hand, had been already set beforehand.' Compared to the sonorous life and fulness, which Bach's Cantatas gained under his own hands, the scores as they have been handed down are merely sketches of scores, to which the flesh and bloom are wanting more or less. If these score sketches—contrary to the purpose of the master—are literally reproduced, the Arias and Duets, particularly with the indefatigable obligato instruments running at their side, sound meagre, empty, often actually repulsive, and enable us to understand the malicious saying of a 'modern,' who on hearing one of Bach's Arias with Violin obligato, remarked: That sounds as when a mother goes a-begging with her child. The restoration and completion of Bach's scores in the spirit of the master is a task of infinite difficulty. Pedantic philologists, to whom the dead letter is all in all, will never accomplish it; quite as little the mere men of routine, whose first thought is of making it easier of performance. Only an artist nature, one who is himself a tone-poet, will bring to the task the fine, sure instinct as to what is permissible in such after-creation, how conscientiously true to the text he must keep himself, 'what is becoming,' and how far he may add 'what is pleasing.' This gift has none received in richer measure, this art none exercised with greater mastery, than Robert Franz. In close affinity with the Bach spirit, Franz has, with a fineness of feeling that is without an equal, divined from the dead scores how the old master must have conceived the living execution in his own mind."

Robert Franz himself in his pamphlet: "Offener Brief an Eduard Hanslick über Bearbeitungen älterer Tonwerke," has expressed himself upon this subject in such a worthy, calm, convincing manner, that the rest of us no longer need come forward as apologists for him. We shall do better, ere concluding, to cast a glance on the museum of noble art works which Franz has, as it were, unburied from the volcanic bed of ashes and given to the world again.

* "Deutsche Blätter: Skizzen und Studien für Freunde der Musik und der bildenden Kunst," von A. W. ARMBROG. (Leipzig, 1872. F. B. C. Leuckart).

† See Hanslick's clever feuilleton in the Vienna Neue Freie Presse [Oct. 1871]: "Robert Franz's Pamphlet on the Arrangement [Bearbeitung] of the Vocal Compositions of Bach and Handel,"—translated in DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC, Oct. to Dec. 1871.

Above all, a number (ten) of Bach's Cantatas, his Magnificat, his Funeral Ode, the St. Matthew Passion Music, a rich selection of Arias (nine for each of the four voices);—six Duets from the high Mass, from various Cantatas, &c. From Handel, twelve Arias out of his Italian Operas for Soprano; twelve ditto for Contralto, and twelve Duets from various Operas and the Chamber Duets; the Jubilate (both full score and for voices with piano); and soon will follow L'Allegro, il Penseroso ed il Moderato.*—To these German masterworks must be added the Italian: Astorga's Stabat Mater, and Francesco Durante's Magnificat (full Score and Piano). And, thrown in as it were, a fine orchestral elaboration of the favorite jubilant Aria of Bach: "Mein gläubiges Herze" (My heart ever faithful). What a world of music! Whoever would fully comprehend the service Franz has done, let him take for example the twelve Handel Arias and compare them with the old London edition of the same in the collection called Apollo's Feast. This with its dry accompaniment, designed with reference to the coöperation of the Cembalo, will perhaps remind him of Ezekiel's field of bones; while in the Franz arrangement he may see how the bones have returned to life, and in their place stand heavenly forms, full of immortal youth. We have been wont to look mysterious and shrug our shoulders, when Handel's Operas were mentioned (for the Oratorios we had respect!), and we scarce believed it in Chrysander, when we read how he speaks of them with love and with enthusiasm. The slight correction we get through these Arias and Duets, does us really no harm at all. When we remain utterly enchanted after the Siciliano from Rinaldo ("Il vostro Maggio"); when the wonderful tone of love in the song of Alcete: "Spera si mio bene," from Admeto, touches our deepest heart; when the impassioned and defiant Aria: "Vanne sorella ingrata," from Radamisto, astonishes us by its dramatic truth; when we greet with joy as a true jewel the Duo: "Io t'abbraccio," from Rodolinda—then we beg pardon of Chrysander for our unbelief and embrace Robert Franz in spirit. How he speaks the Handelian idiom! Not every one can do that. Can there, for instance, be anything more un-Handelian, or more anti-Handelian, than the orchestral accompaniment with which Meyerbeer has Robert-Diabolized the Aria from Rinaldo: "Lascia ch'io pianga?"

So too from our heart we wish, that through the Franz arrangement the public may become better and more nearly acquainted with Astorga and his wonderful Stabat Mater, than it can be through the opera of Abert, who, to be sure, lets his Tasse-Astorga intone the Stabat, but very much in the same way that a certain bookish lady quoted Schiller:

"Ah! His fairest holiday
With the May of life is flown;
The girdle loosed, the veil away,
All the sweet illusion's —over."

Franz shows himself in his Bearbeitungen a contrapuntist, whom the time of Bach and Handel would have rejoiced to call their own. His polyphony does not choose its motives arbitrarily; examine them, and you will find how thoughtfully he forms them out of the material offered in the actual pieces by the old masters themselves. The Bach tone has so become a second nature with him, that in his composition (for instance) of Lenau's song: "Der schwere Abend" (Op. 37, No. 4), the thoroughly interesting accompaniment looks as if John Sebastian Bach on his part, in thankful acknowledgment and reciprocity of kindness, had for once arranged (bearbeitet) a song of Robert Franz. Do you not seem to have the accompaniment to some Bach's Church Cantata before your eyes?

Never to be forgotten is for me the day I passed with Robert Franz in Halle, late in the summer of 1871. We roamed through the valley of the Saal at Giebichenstein; the image of that lovely landscape has so intimately associated itself in my memory with that of Robert Franz, that I cannot separate them. The beautiful sunny day excited our friend to cheerfulness; he spoke with animation of Art, of life—often words which I, as Schumann one day said of Mendelssohn, "would fain have engraved in gold." We walked in Reichardt's garden; we saw the rosebush which Goethe had once planted, and whose twigs are even now beginning to embrace the simple rural dwelling house. Then it seemed to me as if Reichardt came out to meet us, and said to the living master: "Thou hast completed what we once begun!"

Schubert.

(From "Music and Morals," by the Rev. H. E. HAWES, M.A.)

PRECOCIOUS TALENT.

In the parish of Lichtenthal, Vienna, the inhabitants are fond of pointing out a house commonly known by the sign of the "Red Crab," which, in addition to that intelligent and interesting symbol, bears the decoration of a small gray marble tablet, with the inscription "Franz Schubert's Geburtshaus." On the right hand is a sculptured lyre, on the left a wreath, with the date of the composer's birth, January 31, 1797.

Franz Schubert was the youngest son of Franz and Elizabeth Schubert; he had eighteen brothers and sisters, few of whom lived very long. His father was a poor schoolmaster, who, having little else to bestow upon his children, took care to give them a good education. "When he was five years old," his father writes, "I prepared him for elementary instruction, and at six I sent him to school; he was always one of the first among his fellow students." As in the case of Mozart and Mendelssohn, the ruling passion was early manifested, and nature seemed to feel that a career so soon to be closed by untimely death must be begun with the tottering steps and early lisp of childhood. From the first, Schubert entered upon music as a prince enters upon his own dominions. What others toiled for he won almost without an effort. Melody flowed from him like perfume from a rose; harmony was the native atmosphere he breathed. Like Handel and Beethoven, he retained no master for long, and soon learned to do without the assistance of any. His father began to teach him music, but found that he had somehow mastered the rudiments for himself. Holzer, the Lichtenthal choir master, took him in hand, but observed that "whenever he wanted to teach him anything, he knew it already;" and some years afterward Salieri,* who considered himself superior to Mozart, admitted that his pupil Schubert was a born genius, and could do whatever he chose. At the age of eleven Schubert was a good singer, and also an accomplished violinist; the composing mania soon afterward set in, and at thirteen his consumption of music-paper was something enormous. Overtures, symphonies, quartets, and vocal pieces were always forthcoming, and enjoyed the advantage of being performed every evening at the concerts of the "Convict" school, where he was now being educated—Schubert regarding this as by far the most important part of the day's work. At times music had to be pursued under difficulties; Adagios had to be written between the pauses of grammar and mathematics, and Prestos finished off when the master's back was turned. Movements had to be practiced, under some discouragements, during the hours of relaxation. "On one occasion," writes a friend, "I represented the audience: there was no fire, and the room was frightfully cold!" At the age of eleven he had been admitted as chorister into the Imperial choir, then under the direction of Salieri, where he remained until 1813, when his voice broke. There can be no doubt that Salieri, the avowed rival of Mozart, and as narrow and jealous a man as ever lived, was very fond of Schubert, and exercised an important influence over his studies, and yet it would be impossible to conceive of two minds musically less congenial. Salieri was devoted to Italian tradition, and was never even familiar with the German language, although he had lived in Germany for fifty years. Schubert was the apostle of German romanticism, and almost the founder of the German ballad, as distinct from the French and Italian Romance. Schubert thought Beethoven a great composer—Salieri considered him a very much overrated man;

* Salieri, born 1750, died 1825, now chiefly remembered as the person to whom Beethoven dedicated three sonatas.

† A sort of free grammar-school where poor students were boarded gratuitously.

Schubert worshipped Mozart, Salieri did not appreciate him. It was evident that persons holding such dissimilar views would not long remain in the relation of master and pupil, and one day, after a bitter dispute over a Mass of Schubert's, out of which Salieri had struck all the passages which savored of Haydn or Mozart, the recalcitrant pupil refused to have anything more to do with such a man as a teacher. It is pleasing, however, to find that this difference of opinion was not followed by any personal estrangement; and while Schubert always remained grateful to Salieri, Salieri watched with affectionate interest the rapid progress of his favorite pupil.

EARLY COMPOSITIONS.

The boyish life of Schubert was not marked by any peculiarities apart from his devotion to music. He was light-hearted, disposed to make the best of his scanty income, a dutiful and obedient son, fond of society, and of all kinds of amusement. We find nothing to account for the lugubrious titles which belong to so many of his early works, and which seem to fall across the spring-time of his life like the prophetic shadows of coming sorrow and disappointment. Between the ages of eleven and sixteen his compositions were "A Complaint," "Hagar's Lament," "The Parricide," and "A Corpse Fantasia!" He left the "Convict Academy" in his seventeenth year (1813), and, returning to his father's house, engaged himself vigorously in the tuition of little boys. The next three years were passed in this delightful occupation, but the continuous stream of his music never ceased, and 1815 is marked as the most prolific year of his life. It witnessed the production of more than a hundred songs, half a dozen operas and operettas, several symphonic pieces, church music, chamber music, etc., etc. It is remarkable that at this early period he wrote some of his finest songs; and that, while many of his larger works at that time, and for some years afterward, continued to bear a strong resemblance to Mozart, some of these ballads are like no one but himself at his very best. Such are the "Mignon Songs," 1815, and the "Songs from Ossian."

Early in 1816 Schubert produced the most popular of all his works, "The Erl King." It was composed, characteristically enough, in the true Schubertian fashion. One afternoon when Schubert was alone in the little room allotted to him in his father's poems, he read the "Erl King." The rushing sound of the wind and the terrors of the enchanted forest were instantly changed for him into realities. Every line of the poem seemed to flow into strange unearthly music as he read, and seizing a pen, he dashed down the song nearly as it is, in just the time necessary for the mechanical writing.

The song so hastily composed was destined to have a remarkable future. It was sung some years after by Vogl at Vienna, and produced a great sensation. The timid publishers who had hitherto declined to publish Schubert's compositions now began to think him a young man of some talent, and Diabelli was induced to engrave and sell the song. Schubert got little enough, but in a few months the publisher made over £80 by it, and have since realized thousands. A few hours before his death, and when he was quite blind, Jean Paul desired to have it sung to him. Two years before Goethe's death (1830), and two years after Schubert's, Mme. Schröder Devrient was passing through Weimar, and sang some songs to the aged poet; among them was the "Erl King." Goethe was deeply affected, and taking Schröder's hand between both his hands, he kissed her forehead, and added, "A thousand thanks for this grand artistic performance: I heard the composition once before, and it did not please me; but when it is given like this, the whole becomes a living picture!" The startling effect produced by Mme. Viardot in this song may still be fresh in the memory of some of our readers.

In 1816 Schubert applied for a small musical appointment at Laibach under government. The salary was only £30 a year; but, although now a rising young man, and highly recommended by Salieri, he proved unsuccessful. However, he was not destined to struggle much longer with the trials of the pedagogue's vocation, and soon afterward he consented to take up his abode in the house of his friend Schober. Schubert soon gathered about him a small but congenial circle of friends, and from the very scanty biographical materials before us we are able to catch some glimpses of them.

HIS FRIENDS.

Schober was several years his friend's senior, and lived a quiet bachelor life with his widowed mother. He was not especially musical himself, but passionately attached to art in all its forms, and when unable to give, was all the more ready to receive. Schober was a poet, but his great merit will always consist in having recognized and assisted Schubert in the days of his obscurity, and the one poem by which he will be longest remembered is the poem inscribed on his friend's coffin, beginning,

* Lately published, both Score and Piano arrangement, in a most elegant edition, by F. E. C. Leuckart, Leipzig.

"Der Friede sei mit dir, du engelreine Seele!"
"All bliss be thine, thou pure angelic soul!"

Gahy was a close friend of Schubert's, especially toward the close of his short life. He was a first-rate pianist, and with him Schubert studied Beethoven's symphonies, arranged for four hands, which could then so seldom be heard, besides immense quantities of his own fantasies, marches, and endless piano-forte movements.

At once the most singular and the most intimate of Schubert's friends was Mayrhofer, the poet. Tall and slight, with delicate features and a little sarcastic smile, he came and went, sometimes burning with generous emotions, at others silent and lethargic. He seemed to be swayed by conflicting passions, over which he had no control. He was constantly writing poetry, which Schubert was constantly setting to music. But as time went on, his nervous malady developed itself. He wrote less, and for hours gave himself up to the dreams of confirmed hypochondria. He held a small post under government. One morning, going into his office as usual, he endeavored in vain to fix his attention. He soon rose from his desk, and, after a few turns up and down the room, went up to the top of the house. A window on the landing stood wide open—he rushed to it, and sprang from a great height into the street below. He was found quite unconscious, and expired in a few moments.

Schubert could not have got on well without the brothers HÜTTENBRENNER; to the end of his life they fetched and carried for him in the most exemplary manner. They puffed him incessantly at home and abroad; they bullied his publishers, abused his creditors, carried on much of his correspondence, and not unfrequently paid his debts; they were unwearied in acts of kindness and devotion to him—never frozen by his occasional moroseness—never soured or offended by the brusqueness of his manner. They have still in their possession many of his MSS., every scrap of which they have carefully preserved, with the exception of two of his early operas, which the housemaid unluckily used to light the fires with.

The last and most important of this little coterie was JOHANN MICHAEL VOGL, born in 1768. He was educated in a monastery, and although he sang for twenty years in the Viennese opera, he never lost his habits of meditation and study, and might often be met with a volume of the New Testament, Marcus Aurelius, or Thomas à Kempis in his hand. Twenty years older than Schubert, and possessed of a certain breadth and nobleness of character in which his friend was somewhat deficient, he very soon acquired a great ascendancy over him. They became fast friends, and Vogl was the first to introduce Schubert to the Viennese public. He could hardly have been more fortunate in his interpreter. Vogl not only possessed a remarkably fine voice, perfect intonation, and true musical feeling, but he was universally respected and admired; and as he had ample means of studying the real spirit of Schubert's songs, so he had frequent opportunities of extending their popularity.

HIS APPEARANCE.

Schubert himself was now about twenty years old. His outward appearance was not prepossessing; he was short, with a slight stoop; his face was puffy, and his hair grizzled; he was fleshy without strength, and pale without delicacy. These unpleasant characteristics did not improve with years. They were partly, no doubt, constitutional, but confirmed by sedentary, perhaps irregular habits, and we are not surprised to find his doctors, some years later, recommending him to take fresh air and exercise. Schubert, though a warm hearted, was not always a genial friend, and his occasional fits of depression would sometimes pass into sullenness and apathy; but music was a never-failing remedy, and Gahy used to say that, however unsympathizing and cross he might be, playing a duet always seemed to warm him up, so that, toward the close, he became quite a pleasant companion. Hüttenbrenner, it is true, called him a tyrant because he was in the habit of getting snarled for his excessive admiration "The fellow," growled out Schubert, "likes everything I do!" Schubert did not shine in general society. He possessed neither the political sympathies of Beethoven, nor the wide culture of Mendelssohn and Schumann. Almost always the greatest man present, he was frequently the least noticed; and while drawing-room plaudits were often freely lavished upon some gifted singer, few thought of thanking the stout, awkward, and silent figure who sat at the piano and accompanied the thrilling melodies which had sprang from his own heart. Only when music was the subject of discussion would he occasionally speak like one who had a right to be heard. At such times his face would seem to lose all that was coarse or repulsive, his eyes would sparkle with the hidden fire of genius, and his voice grow tremulous with emotion.

WORK AND ROMANCE.

In 1818, Count Esterhazy, a Hungarian nobleman, with his wife Rosine, and his two daughters Marie and Caroline, aged respectively fourteen and eleven, passed the winter at Vienna. Schubert, who, as a rule, refused to give music lessons, was induced in this one instance to waive his objections, and entered this nobleman's house in the capacity of music-master. He found the whole family passionately devoted to the art. Marie had a beautiful soprano voice, Caroline and her mother sang contralto, Baron Schönstein took the tenor, and the Count completed the quartet by singing bass. Many of Schubert's most beautiful quartets were written for the Esterhazy family; among them, "The Prayer before the Battle," on the words of La Motte Fouqué, and numbers of his songs (such as "Abendlied," "Morgengruss," "Blondel au Marien," and "Ungeduld") were inspired by the charms of their society, and the scenes which he visited with them.

At the close of the season the family thought of leaving Vienna; but Schubert had become necessary to them, and they could not bear to part with him, so he went back with them to Hungary. Count Esterhazy's estate was situated at the foot of the Styrian Hills, and here it was that Schubert fell in love with the youngest daughter, Caroline Esterhazy. As his affectionate intercourse with the family was never interrupted, we may suppose that Schubert kept his own counsel at first, and was never indiscreet enough to press his suit. The little girl was far too young to be embarrassed by his attentions, and when she grew older, and may have begun to understand the nature of his sentiments, she was still so fond of him and his music that, although she never reciprocated his love, there was no open rupture between them. Caroline played at platonic affection with great success, and afterward married comfortably. She could, however, sometimes be a little cruel, and once she reproached her lover with never having dedicated any thing to her. "What's the use," cried poor Schubert, "when you have already got it!"

Had not art been his real mistress, he would probably have been still more inconsolable. Perhaps no one ever knew what he suffered from this disappointment in early love. Even with his most intimate friends he was always very reserved on these subjects. That he was not insensible to the charms of other women is certain, and in the matter of passing intrigues he was perhaps neither better nor worse than many other young men. But it is also certain that no time or absence ever changed his feelings toward Caroline Esterhazy, for whom he entertained to the last day of his life the same hopeless and unrequited passion. In Baron Schönstein, the family tenor, he found another powerful and appreciative admirer, and a vocalist second only to Vogl. "Dans les Salons," writes Liszt in 1838, "j'entends avec un plaisir très vif, et souvent avec une émotion qui allait jusqu'aux larmes, un amateur le Baron Schönstein dirait les Lieder de Schubert—Schubert, le musicien, le plus poète qui fut jamais!"

Schubert was not a happy man, and as he advanced in life he lost more and more of his natural gayety and flow of spirits, and at times would even sink into fits of the deepest despondency. He writes to a dear friend in 1824:

"You are so good and kind that you will forgive me much which others take ill of me—in a word, I feel myself the most wretched and unhappy being in the world! Imagine a man whose health will never come right again, and who, in his despair, grows restless and makes things worse—a man whose brilliant hopes have all come to naught, to whom the happiness of love and friendship offers nothing but sorrow and bitterness, whom the feeling—the inspiring feeling, at least of the beautiful threatens to abandon forever, and ask yourself whether such a one must not be miserable? Every night when I go to sleep I hope that I may never wake again, and every morning renews the grief of yesterday; my affairs are going badly—we have never any money."

No doubt Schubert suffered from the exhaustion and relapse which is the torment of all highly sensitive and imaginative temperaments. But his troubles, after all, were far from imaginary. Step by step life was turning out for him a detailed and irremediable failure. Crossed in early love he devoted himself the more passionately to art, and with what results? He had, indeed, a small knot of admirers, but to the public at large he was comparatively unknown. He set about fifty of Goethe's songs to music, and sent some of them to the poet, but never got any acknowledgment, nor was it until after his death that Goethe paid him the compliment of a tardy recognition. Although many of his airs were treasured up in the monasteries, when Weber came to Vienna in 1823 he was unacquainted with any of his music, and called him a dolt; and in 1826, when Schubert humbly applied for the place of vice organist at the Imperial Chapel, Chapel-master Eybler had never heard of him as a composer, and recommended Weigl, who was accordingly chosen instead. Although the publishers accepted a few of his songs, he constantly saw the works of men like Kalkbrenner and Remberg preferred to his own. Of his two great operas, Alfonso and Estrella was practically a failure, and Fierabras was neither paid for nor performed. Public singers not unfrequently refused to sing his music, and his last and greatest symphony, the Seventh [9th?], was pronounced to be too hard for the band, and cast aside. Much of his failure may be attributed, no doubt, to his constant refusal to modify his compositions, or write them down to the public taste. His behavior toward patrons and publishers was not conciliatory; he was born without the "get on" faculty in him, and was eminently deficient in what a modern preacher has called the "divine quality of tact." In the midst of all these disappointments, although Schubert was never deterred from expressing his opinion, his judgment of his rivals was never embittered or unjust. He was absolutely without malice or envy, and a warm eulogist of Weber and even Rossini, although both of these favorites were flaunting their plumage in the sunshine while he was withering in the shade.

In 1824 he revisited the Esterhazys in Hungary. His little love was now sixteen, but with her dawning womanhood there was no dawn of hope for him. And yet he was not unhappy in her society. His many troubles had made him so accustomed to pain—it was so natural for joy to be bitter, and life to be "mixed with death," "and now," he writes, "I am more capable of finding peace and happiness in myself." All through the bright summer months, far into the autumn, he staid there. Many must have been the quiet country rambles he enjoyed with this beloved family. Marie seems now to have become his confidante, and from the tender sympathy she gave him, and the care she took of every scrap of his handwriting, we may well believe that a softer feeling than that of mere friendship may have arisen in her breast as they wandered together among the Styrian Hills, or listened to the woodland notes which seem to be still ringing through some of his inspired melodies. Gentle hearts!—where are they now?—the honest Count and Rosine—the laughing, affectionate girls—the simple-hearted, the gifted, the neglected Schubert!—not one of them survives, only these memories—like those sad garlands of immortelles, which are even now from year to year laid upon the tomb of Germany's greatest song-writer.

There remains little more to be told of Schubert's life; yet one scene before the last must not be passed by.

BEETHOVEN.

For thirty years Schubert and Beethoven had lived in the same town and had never met. Schubert worshipped at a distance. "Who," he exclaimed, "could hope to do anything after Beethoven?" On their first meeting, Beethoven treated Schubert kindly, but without much appreciation, and contented himself with pointing out to him one or two mistakes in harmony. Being quite deaf, he requested Schubert to write his answers; but the young man's hand shook so from nervousness that he could do and say nothing, and left in the greatest vexation and disappointment. It was only during his last illness that Beethoven learned with surprise that Schubert had composed more than five hundred songs, and from that time till his death he passed many hours over them. His favorites were "Iphigenia," "The Bounds of Humanity," "Omnipotence," "The Young Nun," "Viola," and the Miller's Songs. Between the intervals of his suffering he would read them over and over, and was repeatedly heard to exclaim with enthusiasm, "There is indeed a divine spark in Schubert. I, too, should have set this to music." But the days of Beethoven were numbered, and in March of the year 1827, he was overtaken by his last illness. Several of his friends, hearing of his dangerous state, came to visit him—among them came Schubert, with his friend Hüttenbrenner. Beethoven was lying almost insensible, but as they approached the bed he appeared to rally for a moment, looked fixedly at them, and muttered something unintelligible. Schubert stood gazing at him for some moments in silence, and then suddenly burst into tears and left the room. On the day of the funeral, Schubert and two of his friends were sitting together in a tavern, and after the German fashion, they drank to the soul of the great man whom they had so lately borne to the tomb. It was then proposed to drink to that one of them who should be the first to follow him—and hastily filling up the cup, Schubert drank to himself!

LAST DAYS.

In the following year (1828) he finished his seventh [9th?] and last great Symphony in C, and produced, among other works, the Quintet in C, the Mass in E flat, and the Sonata No. 3 (Hallé edit.), in B flat major. His health had been failing for some time past, but although he now suffered from constant headache and exhaustion, we do not find that he ever relaxed his labors in composition. In the spring he gave his first and last concert. The programme was composed entirely of his own music. The hall was crowded to overflowing; the enthusiasm of Vienna was at length fairly awakened, and the crown of popularity and success seemed at last within his reach; but the hand which should have grasped it was already growing feeble. He thought of going to the hills in July; but when July came he had not sufficient money. He still looked forward to visiting Hungary in the autumn, but was attacked with fever in September, and expired November 19, 1828, not having yet completed his thirty-second year.

He lies near Beethoven, in the crowded cemetery of Währing. On the pedestal beneath his bust is the following inscription:

"Music buried here a rich possession, and yet fairer hope."
Here lies FRANZ SCHUBERT; born Jan. 31, 1797; died Nov. 19, 1828, aged 31 years."
(Conclusion next time.)

Pauline Lucca at St. Petersburg.

A London paper translates the following letter, was addressed, some time since, to the editor of a well-known Berlin paper:—

(To the Editor of the "Staatsbürger Zeitung," Jan. 5th, 1872.)

SIR,—For six years have I been a Russian citizen settled in St. Petersburg, but I never experienced here anything like the mad goings-on during the starring engagement of Mme. Lucca. That an Imperial carriage was sent to meet her; that tip-top aristocrats paid as much as fifty imperials for a single ticket; that the Emperor pressed her hand most graciously behind the scenes, and invited her to supper; that certain high Government officials mounted as far as the gallery, which we Berliners (I am a townsman of yours, you must know) call the amphitheatre, because they could not obtain, even by paying a whole year's salary, a place in keeping with their rank; that a Russian Count gave a thousand roubles for permission to stand behind the scenes; all these are facts which you have most probably learnt from the papers; for the little puss from the Victoria Strasse has quite turned the heads of the newspaper tribe as well as those of everyone else in St. Petersburg. When Adelina Patti was starring it here, I thought that the house by the Neva (which you would call the New Charité, on the banks of the Spree), would have to be increased by the addition of a whole quarter of the town; but Adelina is completely distanced by Pauline. I will merely tell you something about Mme. Lucca's last appearance; when, you must know, she sang the part of Mignon. As for my obtaining a ticket in the regular way, the thing was entirely out of the question. What did I do?—I wrote to Mme. Lucca informing her that I was a Berliner settled here; and that I should like to hear her at least once in my life; and that I wished to know whether, in exchange for money and fair words, I could not, through her mediation, procure a ticket. Who drove up to my house two hours afterward, do you think? Her maid, with an autograph letter from Mme. Lucca herself, and in the letter was a ticket—but for nothing—and she wrote to tell me she was always pleased to meet with a Berliner so far from Berlin. People here have offered me money for the letter, but I would not sell it for—well, I have locked it up for the present, and, if things should ever go wrong with me, I shall exhibit it at so much a head. But now, about what took place in the theatre. Mme. Lucca was called on forty-eight times, for I counted them myself—some of the newspaper writers here assert that they actually counted fifty-three times—she was obliged to repeat every vocal number three and even four times; bouquets, studded with diamonds, and as large as watch-wheels, flew through the air; hats and handkerchiefs were waved—there, as I have said, it was a regular mad-house; everyone was cracked, myself included; in fact, I think I was rather more crazy than the rest; when she opens her mouth, you feel all-overish, so to say. At the conclusion of the opera, I immediately ran out of the door through which the operatic artists pass when they go home. Mme. Lucca's carriage was already there, but the footman had all the trouble in the world to keep a clear passage from the building to the steps of the vehicle. At last she came! "Hats off!" cried some one in French, but he had no need to do so. She nodded right and left, and was about to get into her carriage at once. Not a bit of it. A gentleman in a large fur coat barred her way, and said: "Madame, before you drive off allow me to address a few words to you." She replied: "If you will get into the carriage with me, I will listen to you with pleasure, but you cannot wish me to stand here up to my ankles in mud" (there had been a thaw, and, at such times, all the streets of St. Petersburg are just like what your Chestnut Avenue is). The gentleman opened the door of the carriage, assisted Mme. Lucca and her maid to get in, and then continued: "Madame, a genius sits enthroned upon your brow." Mme. Lucca passed her handkerchief archly over her forehead, as if to wipe the genius off. The gentleman in the fur then went on: "You have enchanted us. Make us a promise to come and perform here next year." At this, the little prima donna laughed aloud, and replied: "Do you believe, honored advocate, that Herr Von Hülsen flings his leaves-of-absence about broadcast in that fashion? He never gives leaves of absence unless legally bound to do so, and, indeed would be delighted, were I never to step over the Berlin frontier." The gentleman cocked his chin in the air, and said: "You are the supreme queen of opera"—He was about to proceed when Mme. Lucca cut him short with these very words: "Aye, that's the bother! I must beg you to let me go, for I should not like returning to Berlin with a cold in the head. Ah—scha! There, you see, it's beginning already. If it last a week or so, the gentlemen of the Berlin press will pull me to pieces in a pretty fashion, and it will be all your fault, my dear sir. Drive on coachman." And off galloped the horses to the Hôtel Demuth. The evening previous to her departure, the officers sent the military bands to serenade her. The national hymns of Russia and Prussia were played alternately, while a crowd of Petersburgers, packed as close as herrings, stood in front of the Hôtel Demuth. I suppose Mme. Lucca is again singing among you, eh?—The above is the narrative of an eye-witness. I send it to you in preference to anyone else, because the Staatsbürger Zeitung, which is frequently marked with a black line now by the Censorship, is read in several establishments, and I should be much pleased at seeing my letter printed in it.—[This wish is gratified. We can assert authoritatively that the projected professional visit to the United States of North America will not be carried out for two or three years. Probably Mme. Lucca sees before her mind's eye Catalani, who earned two million of dollars by her shakes and quavers among the Yankees. Meanwhile, it would be satisfactory were Mme. Lucca, as first lady chamber-singer of the German Emperor, to show herself a little more at the Royal Operahouse, Berlin, which she treats rather too much like a stepmother. —Ed.—Staatsbürger Zeitung.]

A LETTER FROM OLGA EISENIN, LADY OF MDME. PAULINE LUCCA AT ST. PETERSBURGH TO HER COUSIN, HULDA LEIBWEH, IN BERLIN.

(Translated from the Kladderadatch, by her friend Martha Parker.)

My dearest, dearest, popsiwopsiest Hulda. There I never! Life is a comfort, Schiller says, or something like it, in the Gendarme Square at Berlin, where his statue is, but oh—there is nothing comes up to this blessed country, Russia; I vow I have been so delighted and enjoyed myself so much ever since we crossed the frontier that if you was to ask me I could not say whether I had been a standing on my heels or my head, no, that I couldn't. For art, there is only one Russia, and whoever comes here with any kind of a name, only not a bad one in course, will soon be as rich as Pluto, him you know, my love, who was the god of wealth. Oh, you should see the notices on our first appearance in the papers at the theatre, only they a'n't a patch upon the reality. Direkly we got to Königsberg we found a express train with imperial salong carriages a-waiting for us, and what do you think; all the gards and people about the train were Russian Grand-Princes, who had sat leaf to ak in that capacity, so as to be the fast to welcome us to their native shore. The ingin drivour was somebody tip-top, I can tell you, though I must not say who, and even the stoker was as good as our Hülsen, the manager of the Royal opera, at Berlin, and nobody paid the slightest attention to him. Do you call that nothik? At the frunter, there was a lot of millitary and custom ouse officers. As a rool, every passenger is serched, male and female, an they ant too partikkeler, how they does it, which they mite sometimes krease a blush in the cheeks of a respectable young woman. But there was nothink of the sort with us. Oh, dear no. They were as mild as buttermilk and a showing us every perliteness all covered with orders and crosses on their bres, though, as I said, only customouse officers. In the kooipi it was lovely. A fitted up like a pallie, an the eet a streaming throu the oles in the flore like mad, so that we were obliged to old up our legs so as to prevent there a-burning. From time to time we tried to cool ourselves by eating some real hastragan caviare out of a large open jar, which it stood, leastwise, the jar, in the carriage, and then we threw ourselves on the two sofers to indulge in a little dolchefarninety, when all of a sudden we heard from under the pillar of Mad. Lucca's sofer her beautiful hair from the Notsee D. Figaro. You must know the two sofers were large musical boxes. Well, it went on like this till we got to St. Petersburg, where all the aristocracy had come to the stahun to have a good look at us. When we arrived at our hotel, we had scarce time to have a good wash before the Emperor Alexander came to see us, all rapped up in a splendid green fur coat. He was very grashus, and said: "My dear Pauline, Russia is at your feat," and then he offered her a sweetly-pretty foot-warmer to put into her bed, which was all diyermments and gold, because the Russian Court is the richest in all the world, and has diyermment minds of its one in the oral mountings, as likewise the Korkersus. When he went out, the Sar looked very ard at some one who shall be nameless, but tho I showd him down stares, and they were very dark, I mus say he behaved hisself like a perfick gentleman.

* As far as possible, Miss Parker's orthography has been strictly respected. The only material difference between the printed copy and the original MS. is that the former is rather more carefully punctuated than the latter, though for fear of detracting the character of Miss Parker's style even punctuation has not been carried to its utmost limits.—PARKER'S D.

After all this, my darlingest Hulda, just fancy our first appearance as Mozart's Zerliner, when the tikets were sold by orktion for thousands of reobles each, and a chair had to be put at the door for the Grand Prince by the box-keeper who gave him a gold snuff-box set with diyermments, which he says he shall treasure as a mimento of him all his life. When we made our first entrance! Oh, my! What hooting, and shouting, and goings-on! I had often heard of their doings in Russia, but on this 'occasion I said to myself: "Well, seeing's believing, for you could never describe it, so I will not attempt it, which would be madness. When the performance was over, the kurtin had to be rased about forty times, so that I thought the roller would be wore out before they had done, for the Russians can't be stopt when they are wonce set going without a touch of the nout. Well, at last my poor dear Missis was that tired that she was obliged to steel away in Kognitow. So I got in the carriage all by myself. They thought I was Mdme. Lucca, so they took out the horses and dragged me in triumph to our hotel. I didn't underceive them. Why should I? I boughed and smiled just like Missis, and they whorayed till they were horse. I said I did not underceive them; I let them take me for the diver herself, for I never was proud, and virtue is its one reward, as some purren throwd a booki into the carriage winder, in the middle of which was a magnificent bracelit. I kept it, of course, for I looked on it as one of my requisites. Russia is the real country for artists, and I am very glad I came, for what I have already received as presents in hard cash and banknotes, I can't tell you. People say the Amerikuns beat the Russians. I can't believe it, though I do hope it is true, and I am not above confessing as much to you, for we are engaged next year at New York in Amerikker, which is a republik, and close to the equator. I here it is so hot there that people acshully go about without a rag to cover them. That's very shocking, a'n't it, but I must go, for I promised the little missis I would, and the turns offered us best everythink ever known before. I can't help people preferring a state of natchur to the latest fashuns, can I? No! Art before natchur, say I. All for art and no false shame. I shall go, and so I am ever yours, most affecshunately, dear.

OLGA EISENIN.

Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet".

NILSSON AS OPHELIA.

(From the New York Sun, March 23.)

Who would suppose that Mr. Strakosch would have waited till the last night but one of Miss Nilsson's appearance in New York to bring her before the public in an opera that she has made so conspicuously her own as "Hamlet."

He had his own good reasons, doubtless; and whether it was that the season is not yet at an end, except in the imagination of the public, or that "Hamlet" might, if produced earlier, have proved a fiasco, and so injured the campaign, Mr. Strakosch best knows.

At all events, managers have as clear a right to do unexpected things as the rest of mankind; and certainly a twelfth-hour "Hamlet" (supposing always that this is the twelfth hour) is better than none at all.

Ambroise Thomas wrote this opera that Miss Nilsson might sing Ophelia, and he created for her in that character a rôle for which she is eminently fitted, and which gives scope to her varied powers. The opera was first brought out in Paris in March, four years ago.

M. Faure, a splendid singer and an actor of consummate skill, was Hamlet, the rôle filled here last evening by M. Barre. Mme. Queymard was the Queen—certainly no better a representative of the character than Miss Cary proved herself. M. Beival was the King. Jamet assumed the rôle here, and fills it with credit to himself.

The Parisians when the opera was first given were tolerably content with the first act, yawned dreadfully during the second and third, were electrified by the fourth, and endured the fifth. The fate of the opera was not essentially different at the Academy of Music last evening. Here, however, as well as in London, the last act is dispensed with, the opera having reached the culminating point of interest with the death of Ophelia, which occurs at the close of the fourth act.

The libretto is from the same hands that prepared that to "Mignon." Messieurs Carré and Barbier, the inseparables, are the authors, and they have combined against Shakespeare after as gentle a fashion as could have been expected from two Frenchmen bent on subduing the greatest of tragedies to the necessities of the lyric stage. As "Hamlet" is poetical, imaginative, metaphysical, and reflective, it would seem to hold out but slight temptation and every possible disadvantage to the librettist. But the courage of the writers was equal to the occasion, and we have "To be or not to be" (Être ou ne pas être. O mystère !), and a number of other famous passages reduced to musical notation. Hamlet's advice to the players was evidently too much for these daring play writers, and for this they substituted a drinking song. Shade of the divine William! Hamlet singing a drinking song. The wonder is that the perturbed ghost of Shakespeare does not appear upon the stage in place of the rheumatic and jerky apparition of the deceased King that Signor Coletti horrifies us with.

The story during the four acts here given is followed in a sketchy way with tolerable fidelity. The first act opens with a chorus. This seems to be conceded as an operative necessity. Next comes a somewhat elaborate duo between Ophelia and the King—by no means as good as the Hirondelle duo for the same voices in "Mignon." There is also a solo for Laertes (Brignoli), some concerted music, and a final chorus, written in polka time and having a certain vivacity.

The music in this act and also in the two following is well composed and pure and elevated in style, not descending to any trickery to catch the public ear; but there is no disguising the fact that it is very tedious and heavy. Occasionally it lights up for a few bars. Nilsson gives it life by her sweet presence and beautiful singing; Miss Cary does excellently, commanding attention and admiration during her aria in the second act; but the impression constantly returns that Thomas labored with his theme, and that Hercules, not Euterpe, came to his aid. There is a lack of inspiration; the melodies appear not to have come to the composer in spite of himself, but to have been thought out and worked out. It is not till the fourth act that the muse has smiled on him. But here Thomas rose to the situation and redeemed his Opera.

Without the great scene for Ophelia—her mad scene—the opera could not have outlived a second representation.

Miss Nilsson has familiarized us in the concert room with her superb rendering of this scene, but it requires the accessories and facilities of the stage to enable her to do it justice, and of these she availed herself last night to give us the most striking dramatic picture that she has yet presented. And not only the most striking, but by far the loveliest and most affecting.

During the whole of the touching mad scene the audience listened with absorbed attention. The music is full of violent transitions, much of it sparkling and riant, and some of it exceeding plaintive.

The melody of the plaintive portion—almost the only set melody in recognizable form in the whole opera—is not Thomas's own music, but is borrowed from Scandinavian sources, being a Dalecarlian folksong much sung in old days by Jennie Lind. This is repeated by a chorus behind the scenes d bouches fermées. The effect is a very fine one, not given in the concert rendering of the scene. It is an invitation from the water nymphs to Ophelia to join them. She lies down among the rushes, and is floated away upon the current, singing as she goes.

The audience were very much excited as the curtain fell, and recalled Miss Nilsson with bravas more hearty than any she has received during the season.

She brought with her as she reappeared the basket of flowers and the two doves that had been given her at the close of the third act. Every one seemed to have forgotten the tediousness of the preceding acts, and to remember only the beauty of the last one.

Mr. Barre had a very thankless rôle. The music of "Hamlet" is not such as to win for the singer much applause. Moreover, it is exceedingly difficult. It is all the more, therefore, to Mr. Barre's credit that he sang it with such fidelity and conscientiousness.

In no character that he has taken has this gentleman shown himself so much an artist as in this.

To-day at the matinée "Robert le Diable" will be given, and on Monday evening "Hamlet" will be repeated.

Familiar Music.

[From the Boston Globe.]

When and how tunes become popular is a somewhat curious theme for reflection. We wake up some fine morning and hear almost everybody whistling a melody we have never heard before. We wonder whence it has come, and think how pretty it is, and while we are pondering on the subject we find ourselves taking up the strain, and adding our mite toward increasing its circulation. Before the day is over the streets resemble groves of brick and mortar echoing to the shrill piping of the unfeathered songsters. In a week what had been a new thing of beauty, promising to be a joy forever, becomes an intolerable bore, and we wonder how we could have ever seen anything to admire in the dreary, commonplace thing.

At length it ceases as suddenly as it began, and Earth knows it no more. Now, the mystery is, who began to whistle it first! It must have had a beginning, and yet it comes upon us so suddenly from a thousand lips at once, and appears in full bloom without having budded. But this, though strange enough, is less strange than the suddenness with which it ceases to be heard. Who is the last man that whistles a popular melody? The same mystery enshrouds him as attaches to dead donkeys, the which, it is popularly believed, have never been seen by man. And yet there must exist such a being. But when he, too, has deserted the neglected air, it breaks forth again in a new form, and acquires a fresh lease of life through the agency of the barrel organ, and is listened to with a pleasure akin to that which hailed its first appearance; and through this agency it long remains a welcome friend.

It would doubtless be a matter of great surprise if we could possibly know the amount of good that is performed by these abused and much-maligned instruments. No one can have failed to observe the attention they attract whenever they pour forth their strains in the humbler quarters of the city. Children crowd about them with wonder and delight, windows are thrown up and women's toil-worn faces are moved to pleasure; while rugged men stop on their way and for a moment forget the cares of life. The best points of our common nature are brought out, too, in connection with these humble ministers of music—children learn to sympathize with poverty, and it is touching to observe with what eager satisfaction the offspring of the poor bestow their mite upon the organ-grinder if a child accompany him on his way. The poor feel for the poor; and it is from those on whom fortune has refused to smile that the street musician reaps his largest harvest.

There is much complaint against the barrel organ, and every now and then an effort is made to put them down, but it would leave a gap in the enjoyments of the poor, and they have but few enough, that could not be easily filled. If they really be the annoyance they are charged to be, yet it would be kindly to bear with them, for through them a spirit of charity, of sympathy and of tender feeling is perpetuated that would lie dormant were they not to bring it into active play. The love of music is one of the strongest sentiments of the human heart, and while the rich can gratify it by their operas and their concerts, it can only be gratified in the humble through the agency of the barrel organ, which is the concert, opera, symphony and oratorio of the poor.

"Passion" in Music.—Italian and German.

We cannot deny to Italy the gift of sweet and enchanting melody. Rossini has also shown himself a master of the very limited effects of harmony which it suited his purpose to cultivate. Then why is not Rossini as good as Beethoven? Absurd as the question sounds to a musician, it is not an unreasonable one when coming from the general public, and the only answer we can find is this: Not to mention the enormous resources in the study and cultivation of harmony which the Italians, from want of inclination or ability, neglect, the German music is higher than the Italian because it is a truer expression, and a more disciplined expression, of the emotions. To follow a movement of Beethoven is, in the first place, a bracing exercise of the intellect. The emotions evoked, while assuming a double degree of importance by association with the analytic faculty, do not become enervated, because in the masterful grip of the great composer we are conducted through a cycle of naturally progressive feeling, which always ends by leaving the mind recreated, balanced, and ennobled by the exercise. In Beethoven all is restrained, nothing morbid which is not almost instantly corrected, nothing luxurious which is not finally raised into the clear atmosphere of wholesome and brisk activity, or some corrective mood of peaceful self-mastery, or even playfulness. And the emotions thus roused are not vamped up feelings of a jaded appetite, or the false, inconsequent spasms of the sentimentalist. They are such as we have experienced in high moods or passionately sad ones, or in the night, in summer-time, or by the sea; at all events they are unfolded before us, not with the want of perspective, or violent frenzy of a bad dream, but with true gradations in natural succession, and tempered with all the middle tints that go to make up the truth of life. Hence the different nature of the emotional exercises gone through in listening to typical German and typical Italian music. The Italian makes us sentimentalize, the German makes us feel. The sentiment of the one gives the emotional conception of artificial suffering or joy; the natural feeling of the other gives us the emotional conception which belongs to real suffering or joy. The one is stagey—smells of the oil and the rouge pot—the other is real, earnest, natural, and reproduces with irresistible force the deepest emotional experiences of our lives. It is not good to be constantly dissolved in a state of love-melancholy, full of the languor of passion without its real spirit—but that is what Italian music aims at. Again, the violent crises of emotion should come in their right places—like spots of primary color with wastes of gray between them. There are no middle tints in Italian music; the listeners are subjected to shock after shock of emotion—half a dozen smashing surprises, and twenty or thirty spasms and languors in each scene, until at last we become like children who thrust their hands again and again into water charged with electricity, just on purpose to feel the thrill and the release. But that is not healthy emotion—it does not recreate the feelings; it kindles artificial feelings, and makes reality tasteless.

Now whenever feeling is not disciplined, it becomes weak, diseased, and unnatural. It is because German music takes emotion fairly in hand, disciplines it, expresses its depressions in order to remove them, renders with terrible accuracy even its insanity and incoherence in order to give relief through such expression and restore calm, flinches not from the tender and the passionate, stoops to pity, and becomes a very angel in sorrow; it is because German music has probed the humanities and sounded the depths of our nature—taught us how to bring the emotional region not only into the highest activity, but also under the highest control—that we place German music in the first rank, and allow no names to stand before Gluck, Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Spohr, Mendelssohn and Schumann.—Musical and Moral.

Dr. Ferdinand Hiller on Dr. Hans von Bülow.

The Musical World (London) translates the following piece of "Masked Chit-chat" from the Kölnische Zeitung.

We had yesterday a Beethoven Evening, for which we are indebted to Dr. Hans von Bülow. Bülow is one of the generals who divided among themselves the inheritance of Liszt-Alexander—not one of them is an Alexander, but for all that they have managed to drop into very respectable kingdoms of their own. (Should any one consider that this comparison of a great modern pianist with the greatest hero in the history of the world is somewhat too pretentious, we can, on the strength of information derived from the most authentic sources, tell him that the fact: Athenians displayed less enthusiasm for Alexander the Great than the ladies of Berlin once exhibited for Liszt. The most eminent historians bear testimony that there was not one among the former who drank the tea the King had left in his cup.)

Herr von Bülow's audience, though not too numerous, were thoroughly select in a musical sense; and, for several hours, Herr von Bülow kept them in a state of such breathless astonishment, that the feeling at length became almost painful. His playful subjugation of all technical difficulties; his really military strength and power of endurance; his nearly infallible certainty; and his memory, in which all the pieces he played, and who knows how many more which he did not play, appear to be stored as safely as a collection of classics in an oak book-case, caused the audience to forget entirely that they had come to a Beethoven Evening. That Herr von Bülow treated us to so much beautiful, and some magnificent music, was a fact of which most decidedly very few of his hearers thought—it was most emphatically his talent, and his capabilities which absorbed everything else. But this absorption was not of the kind produced by a demoniacally-genial power, when, after falling into a state of passive enthusiasm, we no longer ask what it really is that has plunged us in such intellectual intoxication;—no, Herr von Bülow, at any instant, knows what he wants to do. The performances are the performances of talent, not of genius; though it is perhaps for this very reason that they deserve an especial degree of respect. How much exertion, even with extraordinary natural gifts, is needed to attain such mechanical mastery, laughing at any corporeal considerations, how much vigilant attention, and how great a triumph over mental weariness—can be, perhaps, understood only by him who knows what ambition is capable of effecting.

From the whole nature of Herr von Bülow's talent, it is evident that his mode of executing Beethoven's music is due to deep thought, to ripe deliberation, rather than distinguished by warmth, or suggestive of spontaneous inspiration. As, however, Herr von Bülow has devoted himself with such extraordinary conscientiousness to the study of the great master, we feel astonished at seeing with how little clearness, notwithstanding certain admirable details, the general character of a piece comes out under his fingers. This, however, is perhaps to be traced to these very details. Herr von Bülow appears to experience a difficulty in renouncing for long his mechanical peculiarities. He is fond of the rumbling of the thunder, of ethereal una corda murmurings. But our great masters, radiant with vigor, move only exceptionally in extremes. Nor are fortissimo and pianissimo anything so absolutely and permanently settled that they must everywhere be given in the same way; to what extent each should be carried depends materially, we should say, on the general character of the composition. When, therefore, in a thoughtfully-cheerful and humoristically-touching picture, for instance, as the first movement of the Sonata, Op. 31, No. 3, we meet with instances of sforzandissimo, the impression created is similar to that which would be produced by an individual of polished manners addressing any one in the following terms:—"The most agreeable reminiscences are awakened in my breast by the fact of meeting you again. Where the devil have you been all this time?"

With regard to instances of license on the one side, and almost pedantic observance of the tempo on the other, as exemplified in the playing of Herr von Bülow, there is a great deal to which exception may be taken. But this would lead me too far, and besides, depends too much upon individual views. A protest, however, must undoubtedly be raised against the manner in which Herr von Bülow commenced the fugue in the A-flat major Sonata, Op. 110. That the theme of such a piece should be presented with characteristic clearness is a fact known to every one. But it is too much of a good thing, when the theme is paraded up and down, in a conceited manner, and all the subordinate parts, like distant tones, float along, in scarcely intelligible guise, by the side of it. It is precisely the beautiful freedom with which all the parts move that constitutes the peculiar charm of such a composition. To bring itself alone prominently forward, at the expense of other equally important parts, was something not permissible for the theme of a fugue even in former centuries—how then could anything of the kind be allowed in our democratic age?

Herr von Bülow, like most of the Liszt school, delights in believing not only himself but his instrument likewise capable of enormous things. Liszt, it is true, set the example of this. When Heine, writing of him, said the keys bled under his fingers, and the Viennese were enraptured at seeing him strew the floor of the orchestra with corpses of pianos, such a system, though not always beautiful and agreeable, had something humorous about it, which agreed very well with the exuberant spirits in which Liszt found vent for his geniality. With his successors we do not experience the same impression so deeply; it seems as though they wanted to puff the instruments they use, and to cry to the public:—"There, see what a grand piano like this can stand!"—Bechstein's grand, on which Herr von Bülow played yesterday, went through the ordeal in a really most astounding manner—proving itself a perfect horned Siegfried among pianofortes, the little unprotected place in which not even the grim Hagen von Troje of pianists could succeed in wounding.

Whether Herr von Bülow finds it an irresistible necessity to accompany his playing with an exceedingly lively and almost dramatic swaying and bending of his head, and the upper part of his body, is something we cannot decide. But that it aids the effect of his playing no one will assert. It is particularly advisable to concentrate the attention of the hearer upon the essential element in a performance, when that element is, not simply of itself, but likewise comparatively, the best.

DR. FERDINAND HILLER.

Cologne, March 3d.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 6, 1872.

Symphony Concerts.—Close of the Season.

After seven successful seasons of classical orchestral concerts—in all about 70 concerts—the HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION has reason to feel satisfied with the practical working of the plan in which it has persisted from the first: that namely, of guaranteeing programmes of the highest order to a guaranteed audience of lovers of the best, and never catering to mere selfish interests, vain glory, ignorance and low tastes.

The tenth and last Symphony Concert of the seventh season, which took place on Thursday afternoon, March 21, was eagerly attended, and probably by most listeners was felt to be the most important of the series. Of course any programme which includes so long, so uniformly great and serious a work as the "Heroic Symphony," whether it comes last, or first, or in the middle, must presuppose, for full enjoyment, such a sharp and healthy tone of intellectual appetite as only can exist ideally in a considerable portion of a great audience. Shall Christmas or Thanksgiving dinner be abolished, because we all associate with its happy memories some sense of dullness and satiety?—It was fit that the series should close with a great masterpiece: and, inasmuch as the favorite pianist would surely be expected to play twice, there was no choice but to place the Symphony at the end of all, thus:

Overture, ("Welche der Häuser.") to C. Op. 124. Beethoven.
Piano-forte Concerto, in D minor, Op. 40. Mendelssohn.
Allegro appassionato.—Adagio.—Presto.
Miss Anna Mehlig.
Overture to "Lodoiska." (First time). Cherubini.
Piano Solo, "Etudes Symphoniques" (in the form of Variations), Op. 18. Schumann.
Miss Anna Mehlig.
Heroic Symphony, No. 3, in E flat, Op. 55. Beethoven.
Allegro con brio.—Marcia funebre.—Scherzo.—Finale.

The inaugural or dedication Overture, which Beethoven composed for the opening of a theatre, is grand enough for any great occasion, even of national or world-wide import. (Only pray do not prostitute it to a Gilmore Jubilee!) It is not, artistically, one of his best Overtures; it has not the concentration and unflagging inspiration of the Coriolan, the Egmont, and the Leonora; and yet it is a noble work, bearing the stamp of majesty and power from the beginning to the end, and full of beautiful invention. It had made a deep mark in these concerts several times before.—especially in the centennial Beethoven year. This time it was played uncommonly well; for once we fairly heard the florid jubilation of the bassoon amid the trumpet proclamation in the first part; and never have the violins taken up and carried through the strong Handelian fugue theme in the latter part with more vitality and unity of purpose.

Mendelssohn's D-minor Concerto,—less overdone in concert rooms than the one in G minor, and quite as interesting,—was rendered with consummate grace and clearness, and with fine fervor, by Miss MEHLIG; and with the sympathetic orchestral accompaniment, the delicate tone poem charmed the audience. Of course there would be some not quite prepared, on a first hearing, to rightly comprehend or to enjoy so unique and remarkable a composition as the Schumann Variations, so large and crowded in their harmony, so broadly laid out, that he called them Symphonic Studies. But those who have studied them, or heard them played before in a smaller room, must have felt their originality, their beauty and exhaustless imaginative power growing upon them with each successive variation. They were magnificently played. Not many pianists would undertake to grapple with so arduous a problem.

The Overture to Lodoiska is not one of Cherubini's greatest, and perhaps must take rank after all of those which had been given in these Concerts before (Wassertürker, Medea, Les Abencerrages, Anacron and Faniska.) Yet it is sweet, pure, true-hearted music; with some tender, lovely melodies in it; a little loosely strung together, perhaps, and a little thin; plainly an introduction to a drama rather than a complete musical whole by itself; yet fascinating through the same delicate, chaste traits that abound, not so much in the Overture, but in the incidental music of the play, "The Water-Carrier." As an unpretending, genuine, simple thing, between great works, it won a sincere welcome.

The great, sublime Eroica never seemed greater. If a few were weary with excess of richness and of beauty, the great mass of the audience were spell-bound to the end. From the first bar of the Allegro how it seems to grow before you! The rendering was on the whole about the clearest and the best that we have ever had. Were we to take exception anywhere it would be to the somewhat too slow and dragging—or at least the too unaccented, movement of the Funeral March; you did not feel the march of it enough; and hence, with its great length, so fraught with meaning and with feeling, it produced fatigue. But almost every performance of it that we ever heard was open more or less to the same criticism.

We think we run no risk of contradiction when we say, that this seventh season has been upon the whole the richest and the best in the whole history of the Symphony Concerts, and that the improvement in the Orchestra has been unmistakable; indeed we need no longer look abroad for worthy models of orchestral execution. This in great part, of course, is due to the intelligent, devoted labor of our indefatigable Conductor, Mr. CARL ZERRAHN; and those who mourn that the rich fortnightly feasts are over, have now a double motive for making haste to secure seats at his Annual Benefit Concert, which will occur next Wednesday evening, when the same Orchestra will render all of Beethoven's music to Goethe's Egmont, and portions of the tragedy will be read by our own noble Boston artist, Miss CHARLOTTE CUSHMAN.

Mr. B. J. LANG's fourth and last Concert at the Globe Theatre, on Thursday, March 28, was the most interesting of them all. It began with the famous old Mendelssohn Quintet in B flat, of which the spirited Allegro and the beautiful Adagio were finely played by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club. This was followed by the first movement of Beethoven's Piano Concerto in C minor, No. 3, which Mr. Lang played with mastery ability and taste, the orchestral accompaniment being represented by the quartet of strings, with double bass, flute and a second piano, at which sat Mr. G. W. SUMNER. The Trio by Rubinstein (in B flat) was repeated, to the general gratification, by Messrs. LANG, SCHULTZ and FRIES, who played it with great spirit. The Scherzo and Finale went well, but we hardly found our first impression of the first Allegro, still less of the Adagio, so well confirmed as we had hoped.—A wholesome, happy, glorious finale was formed by the Bach Concerto in D minor for three pianofortes, in which the principal work was shared with Mr. Lang by Mr. LEONHARD and Mr. PARKER, the string quartet accompanying. The concerto is in three short movements: Allegro maestoso, Alla Siciliana, and Allegro. The middle movement is most exquisite, and all the rest is full of health and joy and beauty; all three instruments inspired as by a common genius, each bearing its full part in the melodious conversation, yet neither of them striving to outshine its fellows. The artists did not slight a task so worthy of their best powers; it had been well rehearsed, and it all went to a charm, delighting every listener.

It was a pleasure to learn, by a note at the bottom of the programme, that Mr. Lang, with a group of his full-fledged artist pupils, are to give a series of four Symphony Concerts, with a small Orchestra, in a small hall (Mechanics, Bedford St.), on successive Thursday afternoons, beginning next week, April 11. Besides the orchestral selections, there will be the Hummel Septet, played by Mr. G. W. SUMNER; the Schumann Concerto, by Mr. G. ARTHUR ADAMS; a Concertstück of Carl Reinecke, by Mr. R. C. DIXEY; the Beethoven E-flat Concerto (No. 5), by Mr. H. G. TUCKER; and the Barcarolle from Sterndale Bennett's Concerto, No. 2, by Mr. W. F. ARTHUR. It is hoped that the orchestral selections will include the first movement of Rubinstein's "Ocean" Symphony, a Suite by Lachner, Beethoven's Sestet, Handel's "Water Music," Mendelssohn's "Scottish" Symphony, Schumann's "B-flat" Symphony, Mendelssohn's Overture to "Fingal's Cave," &c., &c.

A very pleasing concert was that given by the N. E. Conservatory of Music at Wesleyan Hall on Tuesday last. This was the programme:

Trio for Piano, Violin and Cello, op. 70 D maj. Beethoven.
Song, "The Rose".....Schumann.
a. { Nocturne in B flat minor, op. 9.....Chopin.
b. { Presto, from the Italian Concerto.....Bach.
a. { Recitative, "And lo! Judas came."
b. { Air, "The Lord is faithful and righteous," from the Oratorio of "St. Peter".....J. K. Paine.
Sonata for Piano and Violin, op. 103, A minor, Schumann.

These choice selections were all artistically rendered. Mrs. BARRY sang Schumann's "Rose, Meer und Sonne," in German, with exquisite purity and truth of feeling. But the most interesting number to the crowded audience was the selection from Mr. Paine's unpublished Oratorio. Of course an orchestra was needed for the full effect; but the composer himself, presiding at the piano, could indicate quite well his own intentions; and the Recitative, telling how Christ was seized, was of a noble thrilling character, with a stormy and appropriate accompaniment. The Air which followed, with violoncello obligato, was very beautiful and tender, chaste in style, and neither common nor affected. From certain hints in the piano part, we should think it must be deeply interesting with the orchestra. The singer entered warmly into the spirit of the music.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, MARCH 28.—On Monday evening, March 25, the curtain fell upon the most successful season of Italian Opera which New York has ever known. When Mr. Strakosch issued his prospectus last fall the enterprise was deemed hazardous, and it was thought that even Nilsson's great genius would fail to insure its success. And what has been the result? With a scale of prices nearly double that of any theatre in Paris, and a chorus and mise-en-scène disgraceful in any civilized country, the demand for seats has been unprecedented, and the house so crowded every night that a late comer found it difficult to secure standing room within view of the stage. The receipts for the last three weeks have been nearly $50,000. From this, and other signs it is plain that the time is come for the establishment here of regular Opera.—an institution which would be liberally patronized by the public; abundantly sustained without subvention, and, if I mistake not, prove remunerative to the manager. We have something like this in prospect for next season, as I understand that Mr. Maretzek has a lease of the Academy for three evenings and one afternoon of each week, from Sept. 30, 1872, to May 1st, 1873, and that he is to give Italian Opera during that time, with Pauline Lucena and Miss Kellogg as Prima Donnas.

Miss Nilsson's farewell season began March 4th and ended on the 25th, consisting of ten nights and three matinees. The repertoire was as follows: Mignon (three times), Martha, Traviata, Faust (twice), Lucia di Lammermoor, Traviata, Robert le Diable (twice), and Hamlet (twice). It will be seen that the management gave us none of the variety which might have been expected, Robert and Hamlet being the only novelties. One reason for this lack of variety may have been the fact that the chorus and scenery were utterly inadequate to anything out of the beaten track. Passing over those Operas that have become household words to us this winter (the most hackneyed of which was most justly and properly denounced in your columns not long since), I will speak briefly of two which are less familiar. After the musical platitudes of Verdi, in refreshing contrast, came the massive chorus and skillful orchestration of "Roberto." We were curious to know what new charm our Prima Donna would add to the character of the Norman maiden, Alice. The cast was distributed as follows: Mlle. Christina Nilsson as Alice; Mlle. Marie Leon Duval, Isabella; Mlle. Billon, Helene; Sig. Brignoli, Roberto; M. Lyall, Rinaldo; M. Josef Jamet, Bertram.

The character of Alice affords little scope for variety of action, for throughout the opera she appears only in the attitude of a gentle and loving soul overshadowed by vague forebodings of a calamity which she knows not how to avert;—a danger which threatens her foster-brother.

There is no display of individual passion, no love, no jealousy; but the versatile genius of the singer, in the absence of that which makes the stock in trade of an ordinary actress, has created an original rôle even here, and her Alice is by far the best impersonation of that character which I have ever seen. From first to last she is moved rather by a holy hatred of evil, than by love for Roberto. In the last act she rises into positive grandeur, and caps the climax by a wonderful stroke of art in the cry "Oh gioia," which is inexpressibly thrilling and dramatic. How well she sang need not be said, and the airs "Vanne, disse al figlio," "Nel lasciar la Normandia," and "Sommo Iddio," as rendered by her, are not to be forgotten.

Mlle. Duval was good as Isabella, and M. Jamet made an excellent Bertram. The score of the Opera was cut and mangled without mercy, to give time for a long and tedious ballet, during which Brignoli, burning with ill concealed rage, stood surrounded by a bevy of resuscitated nuns. The position is a trying one, to be sure, but the part once accepted, he should have made the most of it, and been Roberto instead of Brignoli.

On Friday, March 22nd, the long expected Opera of Hamlet was produced, with the following cast: Mlle. Christina Nilsson as Ophelia; Miss Anna Louisa Cary, The Queen; Signor Brignoli, Laertes; Mons. A. Barre, Hamlet; Signor Colletti, The Ghost; Signor Relehard, Horatio; Mons. Josef Jamet, Claudius; Signor Barilli, Marcellus; Signor Locatelli, Polonius.

The Opera was given in six tableaux, introduced, the first by an overture, and each of the others by a brief orchestral prelude. The first Tableau represents the Palace of the King of Denmark, and the coronation of Gertrude as Queen. It opens with a chorus, followed by a brief aria for the King, which gives place to a choral refrain: "Inni li-ti cantare dobbiamo," when all withdraw from the scene, and Hamlet advances slowly from the back of the stage and is presently joined by Ophelia. This scene contains the exquisite fragment of melody: "Nagar tu puoi la luce" ["Doubt that the stars are fire"], sung by Hamlet, and the air "Angeli eterni," by Ophelia. Then Laertes appears, sings his aria and departs for the war. The act closes with a spirited chorus: "Bando alla mischia."

A solemn and ghostly prelude ushers in Tableau 2nd, "The platform scene," in which an elderly party clad in a complete suit of antique armor, and decorated with a long white veil, announced himself, in sepulchral tones, as "Thy father's spirit." By this time the faces of the auditors offered a more interesting spectacle than anything upon the stage. Some wore a look of blank amazement, others looked amused, others hopelessly bored. It was plain that those who came with preconceived ideas based upon the sparkling and seductive music of Mignon, were doomed to be grievously disappointed.

And so plot and music dragged their slow length along; the former shorn of all its majesty, the latter heavy, though by no means commonplace, through Part 3d (the Palace Gardens), containing an air for Ophelia, an air for the Queen, and a Drinking-song for Hamlet, absurdly substituted for the "advice to the players" of Shakespeare.

Part 4th represents the play within a play, and here the H-brettie, departing from Shakespeare's plot, makes Hamlet denounce the King as his father's murderer.

Part 5th opens with Hamlet's soliloquy, distorted, of course, almost beyond recognition. Then follows the interview between Hamlet and the Queen,—the affair of Polonius being left out,—and the re-appearance of the highly respectable ghost, whose advent was the occasion for an irrelevant smile on the part of the audience.

Part 6th represents the borders of a lake, overhung by willows, and opens with a chorus of peasants. This is succeeded by a light and trivial ballet, continued during the greater part of the scene which follows, and introduced, apparently, as an artistic means of brightening by a bitter irony of contrast the effect of the tragedy.

What follows is beyond the power of words to describe. For, by her histrionic art, aided by some exquisite yet simple music, Miss Nilsson has made of Ophelia's madness and death a personation which I believe to be unequalled by any thing upon the operatic stage. And yet how simple the means by which so great an effect is produced! A few flowers fantastically disposed upon her head; her long hair trailing loosely upon her white attire; her sad eyes, now cast down, anon raised with a look from which reason's sweet light has fled; the pathetic sadness of her voice; the fragments of song cut short by hysterical laughter; the mute appeal of hand and arm. Watch the artist closely as you may, she never repeats herself, never descends to the level of the commonplace. She distributes rosemary and rue among the maidens, and sings to them of "la sirena," the wily siren who sleeps beneath the wave; she motions them to depart; one by one they leave her; the trivial music of the ballet dies away and she is alone. The end is near; with one quick wild look at the peaceful scene around her she springs to the bank, crouches for an instant among the rushes, and is drawn out by the tide. Upborne by her garments she sings until the envious waves drag her down.

"Doubt that the stars are fire,
Doubt that the sun doth move,
Doubt truth to be a liar,
But never doubt, I love."

The opera terminates with a seventh Tableau, in which Hamlet (heaven save the mark) is proclaimed King; Gertrude repents of her evil deeds; and Laertes and Polonius survive. This act, however, is generally dropped, as it was on this occasion, and so we were spared a most ridiculous denouement. This last Tableau includes a duet for the two grave diggers, a soliloquy for Hamlet, &c., &c., but I imagine no one could wish to hear it after the mad scene, which is the proper close of the Opera.

A. A. C.

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH 29.—The chain of musical entertainments which has all winter extended through our city, for the past two weeks seems to have been broken; for only a stray concert or two and a very short season of English Opera have been vouchsafed to us. On Saturday evening Mr. Wolfsohn's Testimonial Concert took place at the Academy of Music. Miss Mehlig and Miss Morensi were the attraction. The programme was entirely too long [there were eleven numbers besides the Pastoral Symphony], but was admirably arranged to suit all tastes. Miss Mehlig played Weber's "Polonaise Brillante," instrumentation by Liszt. Her playing was faultless; not so with the Orchestra, however, for I rarely ever heard such floundering. In the Chopin Nocturne and Tausig's "Weber's Invitation à la Danse" she was unflinched by the orchestra, and her performance was thoroughly agreeable. Miss Morensi has been studying in Europe for five years, and the occasion was her first appearance since her return. She sang Rossini's "Ah! quel giorno" and Millard's "Waiting." She has a powerful and, in her low chest notes, a disagreeable contralto voice. She seems not to know how to manage it; her transition from chest to head is an ugly break as to flexibility; had she not sung the Semiramide air I should have thought that she did not claim that virtue, for her voice is totally destitute of it. I should imagine Schubert's songs for a deep voice, and a few of Mendelssohn's arias would better suit her.

The Pastoral Symphony on the whole was very well given. In the Andante, where the violins have sixteenth notes, and the Flauto Primo has a solo in F, the former were not evenly played. In the Scherzo and Allegro we found the fault that they were too slowly played. The other pieces I am forced to omit mentioning, as I fear I may lack space.

On Tuesday and Wednesday, the 19th and 20th, we had three performances by the Parepa Roma Troupe. "Martha," "Bohemian Girl" and the "Water Carrier" were the operas. The last Mrs. Parepa chose for her farewell benefit. Mrs. Roma herself we never heard of better; in the Seigneur air which she introduces [a great branch of good taste to my mind] she surpassed herself and won great applause. Karl and Cook were excellent also. In "Martha" I was delighted to find how thoroughly Mrs. Seguin has recovered from her recent indisposition. The whole quartet were in capital voice. Castie's upper notes seem a little weary of so much use, and Mr. Campbell inclines to sing a shade sharp, but the audience was charmed. At the Matinée ["Bohemian Girl"] Mrs. Seguin assumed the ungrecious part of the "Gypsy Queen," and introduced an air from Balfe's "Satanella." Parepa in the "Dream" won torrents of applause by the way she held her mezzo-voice B flat at the end. They have gone, not to return for two or three years.

On Saturday evening, March 23d, Mr. Kopta, our favorite violinist, gave a concert. Mr. S. B. Mills, Mr. Jarvis and Mr. Remberts were the attractions. Mr. Mills was glorious in Chopin's Valse et Etude and in Tausig's Soirées de Vienne, [No. 8]. He also played Liszt's Hexameron for two performers, with Mr. Jarvis. The performance was most delightful. The "Suoni la tromba" theme was so clearly brought out at each of its frequent recurrences that not a single note was lost, and the Weber Grand on which they played seemed to strive to do its part too. Mr. Remberts sang Liszt's "Angiolino dal biondo crin," and Wallace's "A Father's Love." He has a good round voice, but is fearfully inclined to sing out of tune. Mr. Kopta played the Andante and Allegro from Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto with elegant finish and taste. In the Hungarian Airs by Ernst he did not play with as much spirit or force as the piece requires. Spohr's D minor quartet (double) was excellently given by a picked double string quartet. The last number on the bill was an Overture by Svereden. I have never heard it before, and it was so strange that I forgot to criticize, I was all wonder at the curious fugue and imitations.

Of the Easter music at the Roman and Episcopal churches I hope to let you know in my next, and also the "Abt" and "Beethoven" Societies' concerts, which occur next week. On April 19 we are to have the "Dettingen Te Deum," and on the 18th Costa's "Eli."

LEIPZIG.—The seventeenth Gewandhaus Concert had for its programme simply Handel's L'Allegro, il Penseroso ed il Moderato (Milton's words), for soli, chorus and orchestra, in the new arrangement ("Bearbeitung") with completed accompaniment, by Robert Franz. The solos were sung by Frau Poschka Leutner, Frä. Gatzschbach, Frä. Borée, and Herren Rebling and Gura. The criticisms in the Signale and the Neue Zeitschrift are warmly in praise of Franz's labor.

The seventh Soirée of Chamber Music, in the hall of the Gewandhaus, Feb. 17, had a thoroughly romantic stamp, the selections being wholly from Schumann and Schubert. Of the former were played the string Quartet in F (op. 41, No. 2), and the Variations for two pianos, op. 46. Schubert was represented by the string Quartet in D minor, and the piano Trio in B flat, op. 99. The principal pianist was a Fräulein Annette Esipoff, who showed extraordinary talent. The second piano in the Schumann Variations was played by Reinecke. Concertmeisters David and Röntgen, and Herren Hermann and Hegar formed the quartet.

A fourth Symphony by Joachim Raff, in G minor, op. 167, is just published both in score and four-hand arrangement.

BERLIN. Among the interesting performances of last month were those of Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," by Stern's Society, Frl. Orgeni giving great satisfaction in the part of the Peri, and Handel's Athalie by the Singakademie.—The Symphony Soirée of the Court Orchestra (Feb. 16) had for programme two Symphonies: by Ullrich, in B minor, and by Beethoven, No. 7, in A; and two Overtures: Spohr's to Faust, and Gade's "In the Highlands." The Quartet Evening of the same date (Herren Schiever, Franke, Wolff and Hausmann) offered three string Quartets: Haydn in G, Schubert in A minor, and Beethoven in F, op. 59.

Feb. 17. Von Bülow's last concert; 19. Concert of the Gustavus Adolphus Society; 21. second Musical Evening of Fuchs; 22. Orchestral Concert of L. E. Bach.—Same evening, Sacred Concert of the Dom Chor, who performed: "History of the Passion and Death of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ," in a capella choruses and recitatives, composed from the four Passions by Heinrich Schütz and published by E. Riedel.

Feb. 24. Second concert (2nd cycle) of the "Symphoniescapelle," aided by the Academic Vocal Society and the pianist Frl. Annette Essipoff from St. Petersburg. Among other things given were three choruses from "King Oedipus" by Bellermann.—Same evening, Handel's Samson in the Luisenkirche; also concert of the Bach Society, under the direction of Dr. Rust.—In short no end of concerts of all sorts.

ROYAL OPERA HOUSE.—The operas in the first half of February were: Wagner's Rienzi; Auber's Masaniello; Marschner's Templer und Jüdin; Spohr's Jessonda; Auber's Fra Diavolo; Meyerbeer's Prophète; Auber's Domino Noir; and Gluck's Armida.

HALLE.—The following is the programme of a concert given under the direction of Herr Brandis, Jan. 27:

Te Deum Laudamus, by Verhulst (Soli by Geo. L. Osgood, of Boston); Pastorale from Bach's second Christmas Cantata; Aria from Handel's L'Allegro, as arranged by Franz, (G. L. Osgood); "Der Gondelfahrer," Schubert; two chorus songs: a. "John Anderson," b. "Das Mädchen von Gowrie," by Dürner; three songs by Franz: a. "Du hast mich verlassen, Jamie!" b. "Schlummerlied," c. "Die Verlassene," (G. L. Osgood); two Chorus Songs by Brandis; "Das Thal des Eppingo," by Rheinberger. Mr. Osgood's piano accompaniments were played by Mr. Drosel, also of Boston.—The Neue Zeitschrift of Leipzig says: "The great hits of the evening were the Franz songs, which we meet at last more frequently in houses and in concerts." Of Osgood it says: "His voice is of a sympathetic quality, excellently schooled; his enunciation a model for singers, his delivery most carefully and finely shaded; in the songs he won all hearts."—An attack of bronchitis compelled Mr. O. to give up his engagement in Hamburg.

DRESDEN. We have before us the programme given by G. L. Osgood, Feb. 21, in the Hôtel de Saxe. It includes: Sonata for piano and violin, by Ed. Grieg, performed by Frl. Hertwig and Herr Heckmann; Recit. and Aria from Mozart's Entführung (Osgood); Piano Solos: Fantasiestück by Volkmann, Passopied and Gavotte by Silas, Valse-Caprice by Raff; Songs by Schubert (Osgood): "Nähe des Geliebten," "Wanderers Nachtlied," "Weinen und Lachen;" Violin Sonata in A, Handel; Songs by Franz (Osgood): "Du hast mich verlassen, Jamie," Goethe's "Mälied," and "Was pocht mein Herz so sehr?"—Here too the singer met with warm recognition and material success.

PARIS.—The Concert at the Conservatoire (Société de Concerts) on Sunday, Feb. 18, had for its programme: Mozart's G-minor Symphony; unaccompanied chorus, "Le Départ," by Mendelssohn; Beethoven's E-flat Piano Concerto, played by M. Delaborde; Air from Gluck's Iphigénie en Tauride, by

M. Boesquin; "fragments" of a Symphony by Saint-Saëns; Chorus from Haydn's Creation.—M. Pasdeloup on the same day, in his Popular Concert at the Winter Circus, gave: Jubel Overture by Auber; Symphony in E flat by Saint-Saëns (Allegro, Marche-Scherzo, Adagio, Finale); Gavotte by Bach; Beethoven's Coriolan Overture; Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" Music.—Same day, at the Châtelet, Henry Litolf gave a popular festival, bringing out for the first time his dramatic Symphony "Les Guefles." Two little violinists, Laura and Mathilda Herman also took part.—Same evening, Concert at the Grand Hotel, under the direction of M. Danbé: Overture: "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; Pavane, Auber; Serenade by Ch. M. Widor, for piano, executed by MM. Donjon, Loye, Danbé, Faure and the author; Finale of Symphony in D, Haydn; Theme and Variations in Beethoven's Septuor; fragments of the Ballet in Meyerbeer's Prophète; Entr'acte in Gounod's La Colombe; Overture to Marie, Herold.—A large Sunday full of music!

Without the fear of Handel before him, M. Wekerlin has composed music to Alexander's Feast, not to Dryden's Ode, but to words by Dorat. It was performed in his second (invitation) concert at the Salle Pleyel, March 2. Le Menestrel thinks the composition does him honor.

Fourth séance of the Société classique at the Salle Erard: Trio in B flat, Beethoven; String Quartet in A, Mendelssohn; Mozart's Quintet for piano, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon; Andante and Variations from Beethoven's fifth Quartet. The pianist was M. Duvernoy.

March 3.—The Concert at the Conservatoire offered: the Heroic Symphony of Beethoven; Scene from Gluck's Alceste, sung by Mme. P. Viardot and M. Caron; "Adieu aux Jeunes Mariés," unaccompanied chorus, by Meyerbeer; fragments from "Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; Air from Gluck's Orphée (Mme. Viardot); fragments from Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust"; Weber's Overture to Oberon. This concert was in aid of the subscription for the deliverance of French territory; yet the music, with the exception of but one piece, was all by composers of the hated German nation! However, we do not blame them for wishing to have a good programme. Goethe says, per contra, in Faust: "Your real German cannot bear a Frenchman, but he likes his wines." The concert realized 18,158 francs, plus "bravos indescriptibles, incalculables." Mme. Viardot Garcia, says the Menestrel, made her first re-appearance after a long absence. "Leaving us in the days of prosperity, she established a school in Germany; hastening to return to us in our adversity, she was unwilling to let herself be heard for the first time in Paris, until she could do it in honor of the deliverance of French soil. This good and beautiful inspiration has won her the double suffrage of the first musical public of the whole world (!), for the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire, without a rival in both hemispheres, it is safe to proclaim it, has formed for itself an incomparable public. This public d'élite did not demand of Mme. Viardot her voice of former days; it bowed before that marvellous accentuation, that incisive expression, that phrasing so rich in its contrasts, hailing with its best bravos the great interpreter of the great Gluck."

At the Concert Populaire, the same day, "it was a great feast for the ears," says our genial authority above quoted. MM. Alard, Franchomme, Trombetta, de Bailly, Mohr, Griess and Lalande executed the Septuor of Beethoven "with an incomparable perfection."

March 10. The programme at the Conservatoire was as follows: Symphony in A major, Mendelssohn; fragment of "Les Sept. Paroles," Dubois; 29th Symphony in G, Haydn; Chorus from Lull's Armide; Overture to Freischütz.—Mme. Viardot and M. Saint-Saëns were to appear at Pasdeloup's concert.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The Little Orphan. (L'Orfanelle). 4. F to g. Arditi. 40

"Mezzinetta pastorella,"

"From the mountains to the city."

Nest, sweet and plaintive. Song easy, but the accompaniment makes it a trifle more difficult.

I'm Number One. 2. Bb to e. Wellman. 30

"I'm first on the list of the nobby swells."

In popular "song and dance" style. Very pretty melody.

Come to the Sea. (Vieni al Mar). Trio, Soprano, Tenor and Alto or Bass. Gordigiani. 60

"To you shore ah, speed thy rowing,

Hasten, hasten, Gondolier!"

Very taking at first hearing, and one of the kind that dwells pleasantly in the memory. Should be a successful concert trio.

Sparkling in the Winter. Song and Chorus. 2. Abbey. 30

Ad to e.

"But for sparkling in the winter—

There is nothing like a sleigh-ride."

Pretty tune and pretty song.

Good Bye, Charlie. 2. Bb to e. Hunt. 30

"When you are away,

Do not forget your Nelly darling."

A sea-side ballad for sailor's brides, and all others.

Thinking of Thee. 3. D to f. Roslofton 30

"The sunset crimson on the heights,

Flushing the cold snow with its kiss."

In excellent taste. A fine song.

O let me love thee. 4. B to g. Pratt. 30

"Oh, let me love thee still, my hope,

Bright spirit of my youthful dreams."

Capable of deep expression.

I am the gayest of the gay. 3. F to d. Operti. 35

"I'm the jolliest, the gayest of the gay,

There's none like me; how could there be?"

A jolly song and dance.

We'll vote for Grant again. Song and Chorus. 2. G to e. Percy. 40

"We'll vote for Grant again, boys."

A campaign song. Vignette title. Let us have a good sing out of this election, anyhow. Every compass.

Any number of thousands can sing it together, (supposing they have the music).

Memory. Trio. Soprano, Contralto and Tenor. 4. G to a. Leslie. 40

"Oh! Memory. Oh! Memory!

When all things change, we fly to thee."

Reminds one of the best opera trios.

Little Baby's gone to sleep. 3. F to f. Benedict. 35

"Through the door the angels made

Darling baby has passed in."

Words by Dexter Smith, who knows how to take hold of "mother's" feelings. Beautiful song.

She was a Spark. 2. G to d. Lee. 30

"She was a Belle,—

And just the girl for me."

Easy come song.

Instrumental.

Devotion de Matin. 5. Eb. Ziefeld. 50

What one might name a "brilliant" sacred melody with a rich workmanship of harmony about it. One can safely commend it highly.

Wine, Women and Song. (Wein, Weib and Gesang). 4 hands. 3. Strauss. 1.00

A well-known favorite, but acquires a sort of "orchestral" character when played with 4 hands.

Cheerfulness. Danse Elegante. 3. C. Voss. 40

Decidedly elegant and neat.

Carlotta Polka. Op. 222. 4. Bb. Kettner. 50

Full of crisp brightness, with occasional legato octave movements for contrast. Requires a light hand.

Saltarello. Op. 266. 4. F. Kettner. 60

Played Presto and includes a succession of very quick, light springs. Rapid as a Tarantella, but of a sweeter quality.

The Snow-Bell. 4. F. Jungmann. 50

Perfectly beautiful. For its full delicate effect, it requires extreme delicacy of touch.

Joy Bells. Idylle. 4. A. Jungmann. 50

Very bright. Among the best.

German Hearts. (Deutsche Herzen). Waltzes. 3. 75

Very brilliant and Strauss-like.

Sparkling Cascade Mazurka. 5. F. Williams. 50

The light arpeggios that constitute a waterfall movement are not often found in mazurkas, but they are very gracefully introduced in this one.

Fairy Favors Waltz. 3. D. Lange. 50

Very pretty waltz. Belongs to the set of pieces called "Fairy Music."

Abbreviations.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. a small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 810. BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 20, 1872. VOL. XXXII. No. 2.

Robert Schumann's Rules for Young Musicians.*

TRANSLATED BY J. S. DWIGHT.

I.

The most important thing is to cultivate the sense of Hearing. Take pains early to distinguish Tones and Keys by the ear. The bell, the window-pane, the cuckoo,—seek to find what tones they each give out.

II.

You must sedulously practise Scales and other finger exercises. But there are many persons who imagine all will be accomplished if they keep on spending many hours each day, till they grow old, in mere mechanical practice. It is about as if one should busy himself daily with repeating the A-B-C as fast as possible, and always faster and faster. Use your time better.

III.

"Dumb piano-fortes," so called, or key-boards without sound, have been invented. Try them long enough to see that they are good for nothing. You cannot learn to speak from the dumb.

IV.

Play in time! The playing of many virtuosos is like the gait of a drunkard. Make not such your models.

V.

Learn betimes the fundamental laws of Harmony.

VI.

Be not frightened by the words, Theory, Thorough Bass, Counterpoint, &c.; they will meet you friendly if you meet them so.

VII.

Never dilly-dally over a piece of music, but attack it briskly; and never play it only half through!

VIII.

Dragging and hurrying are equally great faults.

IX.

Strive to play easy pieces well and beautifully; it is better than to render harder pieces only indifferently well.

X.

Always insist on having your instrument purely tuned.

XI.

You must not only be able to play your little pieces with the fingers; you must be able to hum them over without a piano. Sharpen your imagination so that you may fix in your mind not only the Melody of a composition, but also the Harmony belonging to it.

XII.

Accustom yourself, even though you have but little voice, to sing at sight without the aid of an instrument. The sharpness of your hearing will continually improve by that means. But if you are the possessor of a rich voice, lose not a moment's time, but cultivate it, and consider it the fairest gift which heaven has lent you.

XIII.

You must carry it so far that you can understand a piece of music upon paper.

XIV.

When you are playing, never trouble yourself about who is listening.

XV.

Always play as if a master heard you.

XVI.

If any one lays a composition before you for the first time, for you to play, first read it over.

XVII.

Have you done your musical day's work, and do you feel exhausted? Then do not constrain yourself to further labor. Better rest than work without joy or freshness.

XVIII.

Play nothing, as you grow older, which is merely fashionable. Time is precious. One must have a hundred lives, if he would acquaint himself only with all that is good.

XIX.

Children cannot be brought up on sweetmeats and confectionery to be sound and healthy men. As the physical, so must the mental food be simple and nourishing. The masters have provided amply for the latter; keep to that.

XX.

A player may be very glib with finger-passages; they all in time grow commonplace and must be changed. Only where such facility serves higher ends, is it of any worth.

XXI.

You must not give currency to poor compositions; on the contrary you must do all you can to suppress them.

XXII.

You should neither play poor compositions, nor even listen to them, if you are not obliged to.

XXIII.

Never try to acquire facility in what is called Bravura. Try in a composition to bring out the impression which the composer had in his mind; more than this attempt not; more than this is caricature.

XXIV.

Consider it a monstrosity to alter, or leave out anything, or to introduce any new-fangled ornaments in pieces by a good composer. That is the greatest outrage you can do to Art.

XXV.

In the selection of your pieces for study, ask advice of older players; that will save you much time.

XXVI.

You must gradually make acquaintance with all the more important works of all the important masters.

XXVII.

Be not led astray by the brilliant popularity of the so-called great virtuosi. Think more of the applause of artists, than of that of the multitude.

XXVIII.

Every fashion grows unfashionable again; if you persist in it for years, you find yourself a ridiculous coxcomb in the eyes of everybody.

XXIX.

It is more injury than profit to you to play a great deal before company. Have a regard to other people; but never play anything which, in your inmost soul, you are ashamed of.

XXX.

Omit no opportunity, however, to play with others, in Duos, Trios, &c. It makes your playing fluent, spirited, and easy. Accompany a singer when you can.

XXXI.

If all would play first violin, we could get no orchestra together. Respect each musician, therefore, in his place.

XXXII.

Love your instrument, but do not have the vanity to think it the highest and only one. Consider that there are others quite as fine. Remember, too, that there are singers, that the highest manifestations in Music are through chorus and orchestra combined.

XXXIII.

As you progress, have more to do with scores, than with virtuosi.

XXXIV.

Practice industriously the Fugues of good masters, above all those of JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH. Make the "Well-tempered Clavichord" your daily bread. Then you will surely be a thorough musician.

XXXV.

Seek among your associates those who know more than you.

XXXVI.

For recreation from your musical studies, read the poets frequently. Walk also in the open air!

XXXVII.

Much may be learned from singers, male and female; but do not believe in them for everything.

XXXVIII.

Behind the mountains there live people, too. Be modest; as yet you have discovered and thought nothing which others have not thought and discovered before you. And even if you have done so, regard it as a gift from above, which you have got to share with others.

XXXIX.

The study of the history of Music, supported by the actual hearing of the master compositions of the different epochs, is the shortest way to cure you of self-esteem and vanity.

XL.

A fine book on Music is THIBAUT Ueber Rein-

* Revised and completed from the First Volume of this Journal [1862].

heil der Tonkunst, ("On Purity in the Musical Art.") Read it often as you grow older.

XLII.

If you pass a church and hear the organ playing, go in and listen. If it happens that you have to occupy the organist's seat yourself, try your little fingers, and be amazed before this omnipotence of Music.

XLIII.

Improve every opportunity of practising upon the organ; there is no instrument which takes such speedy revenge on the impure and the slovenly in composition, or in playing, as the organ.

XLIV.

Sing frequently in choruses, especially on the middle parts. This makes you musical.

XLV.

What is it to be musical? You are not so, if, with eyes fastened anxiously upon the notes, you play a piece through painfully to the end. You are not so, if, when some one turns over two pages at once, you stick and cannot go on. But you are musical, if, in a new piece, you anticipate pretty nearly what is coming, and in an old piece, know it by heart; in a word, if you have Music, not in your fingers only, but in your head and heart.

XLVI.

But how does one become musical? Dear child, the main thing, a sharp ear, and a quick power of comprehension, comes, as in all things, from above. But the talent may be improved and elevated. You will become so, not by shutting yourself up all day like a hermit, practising mechanical studies; but by living, many-sided musical intercourse; and especially by constant familiarity with orchestra and chorus.

XLVII.

Acquire in season a clear notion of the compass of the human voice in its four principal classes; listen to it particularly in the chorus; ascertain in what interval its highest power lies, and in what other intervals it is best adapted to the expression of what is soft and tender.

XLVIII.

Listen attentively to all Songs of the People; they are a mine of the most beautiful melodies, and open for you glimpses into the character of different nations.

XLIX.

Exercise yourself early in reading music in the old cleffa. Otherwise, many treasures of the past will remain locked against you.

L.

Reflect early on the tone and character of different instruments; try to impress the peculiar coloring of each upon your ear.

LI.

Do not neglect to hear good Operas.

LII.

Reverence the Old, but meet the New also with a warm heart. Cherish no prejudice against names unknown to you.

LIII.

Do not judge of a composition on a first hearing; what pleases you in the first moment is not always the best. Masters would be studied. Much will become clear to you for the first time in your old age.

LIV.

In judging of compositions, distinguish whether they belong to the artistic category, or only aim at dilettantish entertainment. Stand up for those of the first sort; but do not worry yourself about the others!

LV.

"Melody" is the watchword of the Dilettanti, and certainly there is no music without melody. But understand well what they mean by it; nothing passes for a melody with them, but one that is easily comprehended, or rhythmically pleasing. But there are other melodies of a different stamp; open a volume of Bach, Mozart, or Beethoven, and you see them in a thousand various styles. It is to be hoped that you will soon be weary of the poverty and monotony of the modern Italian opera melodies.

LVI.

If you can find out little melodies for yourself on the piano, it is all very well. But if they come of themselves, when you are not at the piano, then you have still greater reason to rejoice, for then the inner sense of music is astir in you. The fingers must make what the head wills, not vice versa.

LVII.

If you begin to compose, make it all in your head. When you have got a piece all ready, then try it on the instrument. If your music came from your inmost soul, if you have felt it, then it will take effect on others.

LVIII.

If Heaven has bestowed on you a lively imagination, you will often sit in solitary hours spell-bound to your piano, seeking expression for your inmost soul in harmonies; and all the more mysteriously will you feel drawn into magic circles as it were, the more unclear the realm of harmony as yet may be to you. The happiest hours of youth are these. Beware, however, of abandoning yourself too often to a talent which may tempt you to waste power and time on phantoms. Mastery of form, the power of clearly moulding your productions, you will only gain through the sure token of writing. Write, then, more than you improvise.

LIX.

Acquire an early knowledge of directing; watch good directors closely; and form a habit of directing with them, silently, and to yourself. This brings clearness into you.

LX.

Look about you well in life, as also in the other arts and sciences.

LXI.

The Moral Laws are also those of Art.

LXII.

By industry and perseverance you will always carry it higher.

LXIII.

From a pound of iron, bought for a few pence, many thousand watch-springs may be made, whereby the value is increased a hundred thousand fold. The pound which God has given you, improve it faithfully.

LXIV.

Without enthusiasm nothing real comes of Art.

LXV.

Art is not for the end of getting riches. Only become a greater and greater Artist; the rest will come of itself.

LXVI.

Only when the form is entirely clear to you, will the spirit become clear.

LXVII.

Perhaps only genius understands genius fully.

LXVIII.

Some one maintained, that a perfect musician must be able, on the first hearing of a complicated orchestral work, to see it as in bodily score before him. That is the highest that can be conceived of.

LXIX.

There is no end of learning.

Schubert.

(From "Music and Morals," by the Rev. H. E. HAWES, M.A.)
(Concluded from page 212.)

HIS COMPOSITIONS.

We pass from the composer to his works. Works belonging to the highest order of genius depend upon the rare combination of three distinct qualities—(1) Invention, (2) Expression, (3) Concentration. Speaking generally, we may say that Beethoven and Mozart possessed all three. Mendelssohn,* the second and third in the highest degree; Schumann,† the first and third; Schubert, the first and second. As fast as his ideas arose they were poured forth on paper. He was like a gardener bewildered with the luxuriant growth springing up around him. He was too rich for himself—his fancy outgrew his powers of arrangement. Beethoven will often take one dry subject, and, by force of mere labor and concentration, kindle it into life and beauty. Schubert will shower a dozen upon you, and hardly stop to elaborate one. His music is more the work of a gifted dreamer, of one carried along irresistibly by the current of his thoughts, than of one who, like Beethoven, worked at his idea until its expression was without a flaw. His thought possessed Schubert—Beethoven labors till he has possessed his thought.

Schubert has left compositions in every style—operas, church music, symphonies, songs, and unexplored masses of piano-forte music. His operas were uniformly unsuccessful, with the exception of "War in the Household," which is on a very small scale, and has the advantage over all the others of an experienced librettist, Castelli. The truth is that Schubert was probably deficient in the qualities which are necessary to the success of an opera. Besides melody, harmony, facility, and learning, an attention to stage effect, a certain tact of arrangement, and, above all things (what Schubert never possessed), the faculty of coming to an end, are necessary. Any thing like diffuseness is a fault. A successful opera must have definite points to work up to, and a good crisis. How many Italian operas depend upon three situations, one quartet, and a good murder! And how many of them are worth a page of Schubert's music?

Some of his Masses and Psalms are still unpublished; the few we have had the good fortune to hear possess all the breadth and sweetness of his secular works. The twenty-third Psalm, for women's voices, might be sung by a chorus of angels.

Schubert wrote in all seven complete symphonies. Of these, the sixth, in C, is interesting, as showing the transition from the forms of Mozart and Beethoven to true Schubertian. The seventh and last (1828) is a masterpiece, and tastes of nothing but Schubert from beginning to end. Comparisons of merit are usually senseless or unjust, but different qualities are often best observed by the light of contrast. In Schubert's piano-forte music and symphonic writing for strings or full orchestra we miss the firm grip of Beethoven, the masterful art-weaving completeness of Mendelssohn, the learning of Spohr, or even the pure melodic flow of Mozart; grip there is, but it is oftener the grip of Phaëton than the calm might of Apollo; a weaving there is, no doubt, but like the weaving of the Indian loom—beautiful in its very irregularity; learning there is, and that of the highest order, because instinctive; but how often do we find a neglect of its use in the direction of curtailment or finish!—melodies there are in abundance, but they are frequently so crowded upon each other with a destructive exuberance of fancy that we fail to trace their musical connection or affinity. In speaking thus, we are dealing, of course, with characteristics and tendencies, not with invariable qualities. Movements of Schubert might be pointed out as rounded and complete, as connected in thought and perfect in expression, as the highest standard of art could require; but these will be found more often among his piano-forte four-hand and vocal music than in his larger works. We must, however, admit that the exceptions to this rule are triumphant ones, and criticism stands disarmed before such works as the Quintet in C, the Sonata in A minor, and the Seventh [9th?] Symphony.

* The quality, at once delicate, tender, and sublime, of Mendelssohn's creations is not questioned; but the endless though bewitching repetitions, or inversions of the same phrase, and an identity of form which amounts to more than mere mannerism, compel us to admit that the range of his musical ideas was limited.

† Again, extraordinary powers of expression are not denied to Schumann. He sometimes hits you, like Robert Browning, with the force of a sledge-hammer, but you often feel that, like that poet, he is laboring with some thought for which he can find and for which there is no adequate verbal expression.

In describing this symphony, Schumann has not fallen into the shallow mistake of explaining to us the particular thought which the author had in his mind; but, while admitting that probably he had none, and that the music was open to different interpretations, he neither there, nor elsewhere in the mass of his criticism, explains how the same piece of music can mean different things, or why people are so apt to insist upon its meaning something. The fact is, when we say a piece of music is like the sea or the moon, what we really mean is, that it excites in us an emotion like that created by the sea or the moon; but the same music will be the fit expression of any other idea which is calculated to rouse in us the same sort of feeling. As far as music is concerned, it matters not whether your imagination deals with a storm gradually subsiding into calm, passionate sorrow passing into resignation, or silence and night descending upon a battle-field; in each of the above cases the kind of emotion excited is the same, and will find a sort of expression in any of these different conceptions. In illustration of the number of similar ideas which will produce the same emotion, and of the different ways in which the same emotion will find an utterance, see an article in the Argosy, II., by Matthew Browne: "It has seemed to me that no note of pain, shriek of agony, or shout of joy—for either would do—could be strong enough to express sympathy with a meadow of buttercups tossed and retossed by the wind."

How often in Beethoven is it impossible to decide whether he is bantering or scolding, and in Mendelssohn whether he is restless with joy or anxiety!

Thus a very little reflection will show us that music is not necessarily connected with any definite conception. Emotion, not thought, is the sphere of music; and emotion quite as often precedes as follows thought. Although a thought will often, perhaps always, produce an emotion of some kind, it requires a distinct effort of the mind to fit an emotion with its appropriate thought. Emotion is the atmosphere in which thought is steeped—that which lends to thought its tone or temperature—that to which thought is often indebted for half its power. In listening to music, we are like those who gaze through different colored lenses. Now the air is dyed with a fiery hue, but presently a wave of rainbow green, or blue, or orange floats by, and varied tints melt down through infinite gradations, or again rise into eddying contrasts, with such alterations as fitly mirror in the clear depths of harmony the ever changeful and subtle emotions of the soul. Can any words express these? No! Words are but poor interpreters in the realms of emotion. Where all words end, music begins; where they suggest, it realizes; and hence the secret of its strange, ineffable power. It reveals us to ourselves; it represents those modulations and temperamental changes which escape all verbal analysis; it utters what must else remain forever unuttered and unutterable; it feels that deep, ineradicable instinct within us, of which all art is only the reverberated echo—that craving to express, through the medium of the senses, the spiritual and eternal realities which underlie them! Of course, this language of the emotions has to be studied like any other. To the inert or uncultured, music seems but the graceful or forcible union of sounds with words, or a pleasant meaningless vibration of sound alone. But to him who has read the open secret aright, it is a language for the expression of the soul's life beyond all others. The true musician cares very little for your definite ideas, or things which can be expressed by words—he knows you can give him these; what he sighs for is the expression of the immaterial, the impalpable, the great "imponderables" of our nature, and he turns from a world of painted forms and oppressive substances to find the vague and yet perfect rapture of his dream in the wild, invisible beauty of his divine mistress!

Although music appeals simply to the emotions, and represents no definite images in itself, we are justified in using any language which may serve to convey to others our musical impressions. Words will often pave the way for the more subtle operations of music, and unlock the treasures which sound alone can ride, and hence the eternal popularity of song. Into the region of song Schubert found himself forced almost against his will. He could get himself heard in no other, and this, after all, proved to be the sphere in which he was destined to reign supreme. His inspirations came to him in electric flashes of short and overwhelming brilliancy. The white heat of a song like the "Erl King," or "Ungeduld," must have cooled if carried beyond the limits of a song. Nowhere is Schubert so great as in the act of rendering some sudden phase of passion. Songs like "Mignon" and "Marguerite Spinning" remind one of those miracles of photography where the cloud is caught in actual motion—the wave upon the very curl. Schubert was always singing. The Midas of music, everything dissolved itself into a stream of golden melody beneath his touch. All his instrumental works are full of melodies. We need not wonder at the number of his songs. He began by turning every poem he could get hold of into a song, and, had he lived long enough, he would have set the whole German literature to music. But he who, like Coleridge, is always talking, is not always equally well worth listening to. Schubert composed with enormous rapidity, but seldom condensed or pruned sufficiently, and his music sometimes suffers from a certain slipper-and-dressing-gown style, suggestive of a man who was in the habit of rising late, and finishing his breakfast and half a dozen songs together. His warmest admirers cannot be quite blind to an occasional slovenliness in his accompaniments; but, like Shelley, he is so rich in his atmospheric effects that we hardly care to look too nearly at the mechanism. His songs may be divided into seven classes. We can do no more at present than barely enumerate them, pointing out specimens of perfect beauty in illustration of each. We quote the "Wolfenbüttel" edition, in five volumes, edited by Sattler. The first number refers to the volume, the second to the page.

- I. Religious—"Ave Maria," II., 248; "The Young Nun," II., 222.
- II. Supernatural—"The Double," v., 183; "The Ghost's Greeting," III., 431.
- III. Symbolical—"The Crow," II., 409; "The Erl King," I., 2.
- IV. Classical—"Philoctetes," IV., 97; "Æschylus," IV., 125.
- V. Descriptive—"The Poet," II., 406; "A Group in Tatters," I., 112.
- VI. Songs of Meditation—"The Wanderer," I., 20; "Night and Dreams," II., 225.
- VII. Songs of Passion—"Mignon," IV., 176; "Thine is my heart," I., 122; "By the Sea," v., 181; "Anne Lyle," II., 348.

Notwithstanding the opinion of an illustrious critic to the contrary, we must be allowed to doubt whether Schubert ever reached his climax. Those works of his latest period not manifestly darkened by the shadows of approaching death—e. g., "Seventh Symphony" and "A minor Sonata"—bear the most distinct marks of progress; and during the last year of his life he had applied himself with vigor to the study of Bach, Handel, and the stricter forms of fugue and counterpoint. What the result of such severe studies might have been upon a mind so discursive we can only conjecture. He might have added to his own richness more of Beethoven's power and of Mendelssohn's finish; but, in the words of Schumann, "He has done enough;" and as we take a last glance at the vast and beautiful array of his compositions, we can only exclaim again with Liszt: "Schubert!—Schubert, le musicien, le plus poète qui fut jamais!"

A Matter of Principle.

(From the London Musical World, March 30.)

We have been asked by Herr Stockhausen to publish the letter which appears below, and do not hesitate to grant his request, for reasons quite apart from the personal matters involved. Into the dispute between Herr Stockhausen and Mr. Barnby we must decline to enter as partisans of one side or the other; and it need hardly be said that our columns will be as open to the defence of the latter as they now are to the attack of the former. Herr Stockhausen writes as follows:—

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

DEAR SIR,—Publicity being the only means by which a singer can defend his conduct for not appearing when duly announced, I beg you kindly to give space in your valuable paper to these lines.

It is not enough I think that the public should read: "Mr. Barnby regrets to announce that Herr Stockhausen will not appear this morning;" the public is entitled to know why.

I wish to state by this letter that, without giving me any information before the beginning of the rehearsal on Thursday last, March 21, Mr. Barnby made a cut in the bass part of the John Passion, by J. S. Bach, which I had to my sincere belief been engaged to sing as it is written. When I noticed that Christ's words "Put thy sword into the sheath," had been passed (page fifteen of Novello's edition), I asked what was going on? "It is a cut," said Mr. Barnby. I remarked he ought to have told me of it before the rehearsal, and that I objected positively to any cut of Christ's recitatives; in fact I said I would not do it, I would not sing. He answered: "Well, then we must find somebody who will do it." Now considering how important Jesus' words are in the drama of the Passion, it is a great mistake to curtail these recitatives, to which Bach has written most admirable music, and, considering I had been engaged for the whole bass part, which any conductor in Germany never before curtailed, Mr. Barnby had no right to make a cut in it without giving me due warning. However, I would not have been so particular, so angry about the matter, if last year, at the general rehearsal of the Matthew Passion, Mr. Barnby had not left out the recitatives, "Put off thy sword," and "Are ye come out," with which we had agreed to begin the second part, in order to give the words of our Saviour in their whole integrity. He did not say a single word about the decision he had taken since our interview at my rooms in Hanover Street, but, as I have just stated, passed on rapidly, leaving me no time for the shortest remark. My surprise will easily be imagined: had it not been for the admirable work of J. S. Bach, I would have left the platform instantly. This happened on the very day of the performance. I had, happily, control enough over myself not to utter even a word.

On Thursday, the matter stood else. Experience taught me the lesson to be on my guard. Mr. Barnby, however, seemed to have forgotten all about it; for, when I asked him if he did not think it worth while to speak to me about the changes before the rehearsal, he said it had been materially impossible to do so, as I had arrived only the day before from Liverpool, that the copies were just out (I had mine two days before the rehearsal took place), that my copy was but a proof-copy, and so on. And when I asked Mr. Barnby why he did not write to me about the matter, he answered, he had other business to do than to write about that. The same gentleman who professed to have great veneration for the Passion, and wanted to have lessons from his baritone singer on the great German vocal works (this is not a joke), mentioning expressly the St. John's Passion, some of Bach's cantatas, and of Brahms's works, could not find time to write to him about the cuts he thought proper to make in the bass part of the St. John Passion. Of course, this reply settled the question. I left the concert-room at once.

To-day, at Westminster Abbey, a new cut is to be performed in the Matthew Passion. The recitative, "Put up thy sword," and the concluding chorus in E, "O man, thy heavy sin lament," have been, at my earnest request, included in the book of words; (in fact I had made a condition "sine qua non" of it, if Mr. Barnby wanted my co-operation, which I had offered gratuitously for the Special Service that day); but now I miss Christ's words, "My Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me" (First time, page 56 of Novello's edition). Does not the Evangelist say "And went away again and prayed the third time"? How will he make up for this omission? What on earth can induce Mr. Barnby to cut those seven bars? They would surely not take much time, neither is there any difficulty to modulate to the chord of B flat. When consulted about it, Mr. Barnby replies that he does not know the reason by heart, that the book of words has been carefully worked out since ten days, that there must be a good reason for it.

I maintain that there is no good reason whatever for such a cut. Never, to my knowledge, has a single word of Christ's recitatives been cut in Germany, and musicians know how often the Passion is performed there. Almost every Gesangverein does it in Passion or Holy Week. Surely the English public, so well initiated to sacred music, would not have found it too much, had I been allowed to sing the Recitatives in their totality.

All this shows to evidence that Mr. Barnby has not got into the spirit of the Passion. The recitatives of the Saviour, the very nucleus of the drama, he trifles with. The chorales which represent the whole congregation are, contrary to Bach's score, executed like sweet little part-songs without accompaniment, the basso continuo is played by the cembalo alone, whereas it should be assisted all the time by one or two violoncellos and a double bass; and the first part of the Matthew Passion is ended up to this day with a dashing chorus in order to procure an encore. As to the cuts, Mr. Barnby tells us that Mendelssohn himself (whom by the way he considers to have been

"not much of a conductor," he was "too excitable" (he says) did more of them than the book of words will show to night. This I cannot control, not having at hand Mendelssohn's score, but this I know: never would Mendelssohn have cut one word of Christ's recitatives. But how will he account for the other mistakes? With the fine and powerful chorus of the 'Oratorio Concerts,' with the eminent singers of this country, the Passion would have been worked out to a masterly performance if the conductor was imbued with the right spirit. "Dear, excitable" Mendelssohn! Why did you leave us so soon, why had we not the good luck to sing Bach's Passion under your conductorship in England! I am, dear Sir, yours respectfully,

J. STOCKHAUSEN.

1, Walton Street, S. W.,
March 26th, 1872.

Setting the parties to this dispute on one side, we see in the dispute itself matter for timely comment. The question involved is hardly one enough understood;—one which demands whether any reverence, and, if so, how much, should be paid to the expressed will of a composer when his work has to be performed. The loose ideas entertained on this point, and, not only entertained, but carried into practice, would astound those who do not know that in music the integrity of a work of art is, generally speaking, less valued than temporary convenience or whim. Conductors, as a rule, wholly mistake their position. At the most, they are but chief interpreters—mere links between the speaker and those spoken to; their highest and complete duty being reverently to discover the meaning of the former, and faithfully to convey it to the ears of the latter. As a matter of fact, however, they put themselves above the composer and his work, ignoring the one and wielding a blue-pencil sceptre over the other with all the assurance of conscious superiority. There is nothing analogous to this in other arts. "What is written remains," says the proverb, but Mr. Tupper should change the old saw in the next edition of his favorite "Philosophy"—What is painted, and what is sculptured, remains;—what is written, in a composer's score, at any rate, depends on the fancy of whoever chooses to wield the mischievous implement to which we have referred. Prima facie we hold that the productions of musical art should be shown in their integrity; but we admit that meddling with them involves many degrees of culpability. When Smith colors a sixpenny print with plenty of yellow and vermilion his offence is venial, but what if Jones lays his hand upon a "Turner" or a "Reynolds!" We say then—let the classics of music alone, if they cannot be presented as intended by the master mind of the composer. Applying this general rule to a particular case, there appears to us no excuse for meddling with the divine Passion of J. S. Bach. Indeed, we go so far as to assert that when the chorales are turned into the means of showing off "pretty" singing, and sensational pianissimos with no meaning in them, the whole work is degraded from its lofty tone and purport.

Robert Schumann on William Sterndale Bennett, (1837).*

After thinking for a long time how I could offer the reader at the commencement of the year 1837, something that might add a fresh impetus to his kindly feelings toward us, among a host of wishes for his prosperity, I could hit on nothing but the idea of forthwith introducing to him a certain most happily constituted individuality. This individuality is no Beethoven, engaged in a combat of years; no Berlioz, preaching revolt with a hero's voice, and spreading dismay and destruction around; but rather a tranquil, fine spirit, which, whatever the tumult raging beneath, works on alone above, like an astronomer observing the course of phenomena, and watching for an opportunity to dive into the secrets of nature.

The native country of Sterndale Bennett is that of Shakespeare, and his Christian name, too, is the Christian name of the poet. And, after all, is it so wonderful?—are the arts of music and poetry so foreign to each other, that the greatly celebrated country which produced Shakespeare and Byron should also produce a musician? If through the names of Field, Onslow, Potter, Bishop, and others, an old prejudice has been shaken, how much more has this been so in the case of the subject of our notice, at whose very cradle a kind Providence watched? If it is true that great fathers have seldom had children who, in their turn, have been great in the same art or the same science, those are indeed to be accounted fortunate, who even at their birth have been bound down to their talent, and directed to the vocation of their life; who have thus been fortunate, like Mozart, Haydn, and Beethoven, whose fathers were simple musicians. These men imbibed music with the milk from their mother's breast, and learned it in their dreams of childhood. On first awakening to consciousness, they felt themselves members of that great family of artists, into which others have frequently to purchase admission with sacrifices.

Fortunate, therefore, was the artist of whom we are speaking, and who, no doubt, has many and many a time sat, listening in wonder and ecstasy, under the great organ, while his father, the organist of Sheffield, in Yorkshire, was playing. No nation in the world is, probably, so well acquainted with Handel as the English nation, and there is nothing of his which does not please them except his German name. They listen to him with reverence in their churches, and sing his compositions with enthusiasm at their festive entertainments; nay, more, Lipinski used to say that he heard a postilion perform airs of Handel on his horn. Even a less happily constituted disposition must, necessarily, under such favorable circumstances, have developed itself purely, and in conformity with nature. What a careful education in the Royal Academy of Music in London, teachers like Cipriani Potter and Dr. Crotch, and unwearied private study may have done, I know not; I only know that from the scholastic web so beautiful a soul arose, that we feel inclined to follow it with yearning arms in its flight, while it is bathing in ether, and gathering and distributing flowers.

But as the soil on which Bennett was born could not forever satisfy such a winged spirit, he no doubt often yearned for the land where the first among musicians saw the light of day; and, therefore, for some little time past, the favorite of the London public, aye, the musical pride of all England, has been living in our immediate neighborhood.

Were I now to say anything of the character of his compositions, it would be, that their speaking and brotherly similarity with those of Mendelssohn must immediately strike every one. The two men possess the same beauty of form, poetic depth and clearness, ideal purity, and the same enrapturing expression outwardly, and yet there is a distinction between them. The characteristics thus distinguishing them from each other are more evident in their performance than in their mode of composition. The playing of the Englishman is perhaps the softer (greater in the working out of the details), because that of Mendelssohn is more energetic (displaying more execution on a grand scale). The former shades as delicately in the most subdued passages as the latter really first overflows with fresh strength in the most magnificent and forcible ones; if, in the first instance, the refulgent expression of one form alone overpowers us, in the other, hundreds of joyous angels' heads burst forth as from one of Raphael's skies. Something similar is true, likewise, of their compositions. If Mendelssohn presents to us, in phantastic outlines, all the wild bustle of a Midsummer Night's Dream, Bennett is more willingly excited to music by the figures of the Merry Wives of Windsor;* if one, in his overtures, spreads before us the profoundly slumbering surface of the sea, the other carries by the side of the softly breathing lake, with the moon reflected in it.

This last reflection leads me directly to three of Bennett's most charming pictures, which, with two other works of his, have been published in Germany, as well as elsewhere; they bear the respective inscriptions of The Lake, The Mill stream, and The Fountain, and, for coloring, truth to nature, and poetical conception, are real Claude Lorraines in music; living landscapes of tone, and, especially the last, in the hands of the poet, full of truly magical effect.

I could say much more—how these are but small poems compared to Bennett's greater works, such, for instance, as six symphonies, three pianoforte concertos, orchestral overtures to Parisina, the Natades, &c.—how he knows Handel by heart—how he plays all Mozart's operas on the piano, in such a manner as to make us fancy we see them bodily before us; but I cannot keep him off any longer—he has been looking over my shoulder for a long time past, and has now asked for the second time—"What are you writing?" "My dear friend, all I will add is—"if you but knew!"

EUSEBIUS.

*He has written an overture to this play of Shakespeare.

Music Abroad.

LONDON.—Old Bach is gaining ground in England. The St. Matthew Passion Music was performed in Exeter Hall a few weeks since under Mr. Barnby's direction. The Athenæum thinks "the time may come when some master-mind will add additional accompaniments to the 'Passion' music. We shall then get rid of the absurdity of the pianoforte accompaniment to some solos, and the restricted number of strings to the other voices." "May come?" Has come: Has Mr. Bull, with characteristic fortitude, made up his mind that he will never know of Robert Franz, no! never!—Of the performance the same paper says:

The choir was full of energy last Tuesday; but the fortes were much too predominant, and much more light and shade will be required to develop Bach's innermost imagery. Silence will be the best course for the critic in referring to the vocalization of the soprano and contralto, the two ladies not having the most remote notion of the words. The absence of right accent, indeed, was the predominant defect of the execution, which was too spasmodically staccato, or too chopping. The tenor, Mr. Edward Lloyd, was heard with unalloyed gratification: his readings of the recitatives were intelligent and feeling. Equally good, as regards accuracy and devotional feeling, was Herr Stockhausen, only he dragged the tempi too much. Dr. Stalner's forbearance in keeping the pianoforte accompaniments under, and using Bach's harmonies, was worthy of special commendation. Mr. Docker, the organist, was not quite so discreet at times, but on the whole got through his duty artistically. Mr. Pollinger's playing of the violin obbligato to the contralto air, "Have mercy upon me," was effective. The Passion Music will be given at the next Worcester Musical Festival in the autumn; and it will be a rare treat to hear the work in the Cathedral. If, as in Germany, the congregation would join in the chorales, the power of the composition would be more sensibly felt.

"And now" (as the newspaper paragraphists say) we read that the other published Passion of Bach, the "St. John Passion," was to be done in London on the 22nd ult.

The Philharmonic Concerts began March 20, with two Symphonies (Potter, No. 2, in D) and Mendelssohn's "Scotch"; Spohr's Duo Concertante, by Herr Joachim and Herr Bargheer; Overtures to Leonore, No. 1, and Freyshütz. Vocalists: Mme. Peschka-Leutner (first time in England) and Mme. Patey.

A new overture, "Ajax," by Sir W. Sterndale Bennett, and a new concerto for violin, by Mr. G. A. Macfarren, are to be performed at the forthcoming concerts. Among other unknown works which will be given this season, we note, Cipriani Potter's second symphony in D; a hautboy concerto of Handel's; Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's symphony in G minor; a new orchestral serenade in D by Brahms; a pianoforte concerto by W. G. Cousins; and a concerto for strings by old Bach.

The Third of Mr. Gans's series of Saturday Evening Concerts again brought forward the admirable artistic capacity of Mme. Camilla Urso, who has approved herself a violinist of rare order. Nothing better could be imagined than the sustenance of her part of the first of Beethoven's Rasoumowski set of quartets—that in F, which she led with a breadth, freedom, and accuracy which stamp her among the first artists of her school. Mr. Richard Blagrove took the viola and M. Paque the violoncello in this quartet as well as in that of Schumann in E flat, with all efficiency, the pianoforte in the latter being held by M. Edouard Paris to general satisfaction. Hummel's pianoforte trio in E flat was also supported by him in effective fashion. The vocalism was all of a favorable order—particularly three canzoni of Rossini composed for Mme. Connan, and charmingly sung by her. The "Gangio d'aspetto" of Handel, and Schubert's song "On every tree" were given by Miss Alice Fairman, and elicited warm approval. These concerts maintain their uniform excellence.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS. The Telegraph, March 23, writes of Mme. Arabella Goddard's annual benefit concert as follows:

She has demonstrated that there is nothing she cannot play—an adequate execution of the "106" (Beethoven) implying mastery over every conceivable difficulty; and she has established beyond cavil her willingness to play anything which deserves a hearing. In these things lie her claim to the honorable but much-abused title of artist—a title rightly worn but by a select band; and it is these facts which make her "benefit" an event of special importance. On the occasion we now notice Mme. Goddard once more indulged a fondness for acting as champion of those dii minores, who, but for her, would want fame, altar, and worshippers. One, at least, of the lesser Olympians is under special vindication at her hands on Monday night by a performance of the Sonata in E flat (Op. 75). There is good reason to believe that this work had never before been played in England; though why music so beautiful should endure such neglect is not easy to understand, without assuming ignorance or want of appreciation on the part of those who are responsible. Certain it is that the Sonata takes rank among the very best of Dussek's creations; and that, as regards symmetry, imaginative power, and melody to beauty, it has few superiors in the particular school to which it belongs. Amateurs who heard the Sonata on Monday for the first time must have been struck by the revelation made of Dussek's elegant art. The exquisite grace of the opening Allegro, with its masterly "free fantasia;" the loveliness of an Andante as pure as though written by Mozart, without suggesting Mozart in any degree; and piquancy of a Finale exhibiting the ars celare artem to perfection—these are features upon which every admirer of good music must dwell with loving appreciation; and, because making these known, Mme. Goddard's latest achievement was by no means her least. It is almost superfluous to tell how the Sonata was played. Indeed, to do so at any length would be to repeat observations already made a thousand times with regard to the faultless precision and unflinching clearness of reading which characterize Mme. Goddard's performances. Let it suffice to state that a most poetic interpretation, or one more marked by a delicate sense of every beauty to be exhibited, the most exigent taste could hardly desire. At the close of the Sonata, Mme. Goddard was recalled with enthusiasm, and justly applauded. The bénéficiaire subsequently joined Signor Platti in Mendelssohn's ingenious and interesting "Tema con variazioni" (Op. 17), for piano and violin; and played, with Herr Joachim, the "Kreutzer" Sonata of Beethoven. Such a combination of talent in each case ensured a magnificent performance. We should add that Mozart's Quartet in G (Op. 10) opened this most interesting concert, and that Miss. Dredell sang two songs with acceptance.

*From Robert Schumann's Gesammelte Schriften über Musik und Musiker. Translated for the London Musical World, by John V. Bridgman.

Bach's St. Matthew Passion Music, first performed a year ago as part of the service in Westminster Abbey, was repeated there on Tuesday of Holy Week this year. The Daily Standard thus describes it:

The service began at seven o'clock, the doors having been opened as early as a quarter past six, when in a few minutes every seat in the nave was filled, and only in the aisles were any remaining chairs to be found. Even these were filled up by a quarter to seven, and then the nave certainly looked at its very best. The gas standards usually employed during the special services threw a soft and yet sufficient light upon the unequalled proportions of England's finest example of Pointed architecture, and the groining of the roof appeared to fade in the dim distance. The choir was apparently in complete darkness, and on the top of the choir screen, in the loft of the organ, at which Mr. Jekyll presided, was a large mirror, placed at such an angle that the organist, sitting at his manuals, could command a view of all that was taking place in the stalls, occupied by the clergy and choir, who were ranged east and west as far as the third bay of the nave arcade. In front of the pulpit were reserved three rows of chairs for a party specially invited by the Dean and Lady Augusta Stanley. At five minutes to seven the instrumentalists took their places on temporary orchestras, which sloped upward on either side of the gates of the choir, facing which, and looking eastward, was the great brazen eagle, on the extended wings whereof lay a book of the music. Very many persons in the congregation had Sir Sterndale Bennett's edition of the music, which was of necessity somewhat abbreviated in performance.

Precisely at seven o'clock the organ commenced the voluntary, and now that the choir gates were thrown open it was seen that the choir also was filled, and lighted with candles which barely served to make darkness visible. More than five minutes now elapsed before the choir and clergy in their usual order entered the nave, and when they had taken their places, the abbreviated even song began with "When the wicked man." Very properly, Barnby's choir, supported by the boys of the Norwich Cathedral, had been chosen to interpret the choral music, and right well they looked in their clean surplices as they rose tier above tier in the next bay to the instrumentalists. Far overhead "the monks' walk," or passage under the clerestory, was filled with faces peering over to the procession below—indeed, every nook and cranny of the Abbey was crammed except the chapels east of the altar. Mr. Barnby took his place at the eagle to conduct, and the minor canons and canons being duly placed, the precentor, the Rev. S. Flood Jones, commenced the service, in which "Dearly beloved" followed "the wicked man." The General Confession and the Lord's Prayer were rolled out with a spontaneity that said not a little for the devotion of the congregation, and when the versicles that usually precede the psalms were said, Mr. Barnby rose, baton in hand, and the overture to the oratorio began. In the double chorus "Come ye daughters," the antiphonal effect was very finely given by the decani side. Mr. Cummings now gave the tenor, and Mr. Beale, of St. Andrew's, Wells-street, the bass part of the recitative, "When Jesus had finished." The chorale "O Blessed Jesus" was interpreted with due regard to the solemn and sad character of the music, and Mr. Cummings's rendering of the recitative "Then assembled together" was excellent, as, indeed, is all that this artist attempts; and Mr. Beale accredited himself exceedingly well in "Why trouble ye the woman?" They were both notably good in "Then went one of the Twelve," and the chorus came in with great effect in "Where wilt Thou that we prepare," and again, after the recitative for tenor and bass, the chorus burst into the question, repeated in every tone of surprise and indignation, "Lord, is it I?" The chorale "My sin it was that bound Thee," was delicious, and the recitative "He answered and said," was also very good. The boy who gave the soprano aria, "Although mine eyes," was very much more at home than he had been in the previous aria, "Thou, blessed Saviour." The chorale, "O Lord, Thy love is unbounded," was one of the most satisfactory parts of the performance by the choir; nor was a whit inferior the tenor solo and chorus "O grief, now pants," in which Mr. Cummings gave the touching cries of the penitent with marked power, while in the recitative "And he came and found them asleep" it is difficult to say whether the honors lay with the tenor or the basso. In the soprano and contralto duet "My Saviour" the boys' voices were here and there hardly together, but the chorus always came in crisply, while the stringed accompaniment was subdued and effective. The passage "Have lightnings and thunders in clouds disappeared" was one of the most satisfactory evidences of careful study that we have for a long time heard. To the long final chorale of this part, "O, man, thy heavy sin lament," full justice was done, and while it was being sung the Dean, who wore the Ribbon of the Bath, was conducted to the pulpit, and after reading the Palm Sunday Collect commenced his sermon, taking for his text, 26th St. Matthew, "My soul is exceedingly sorrowful, even unto death."

Then the second part of the Passion Music began with the contralto solo and chorus, "Alas, now is my Saviour gone!" the boy again, probably from nervousness, failing in clearness and accuracy, though his upper notes were all that could be desired. In the following recitatives Mr. Cummings and Mr. Beale sang several bars, the words of which were not printed in the books, and consequently flattered the unmusical part of the congregation. The short double chorus, "He is guilty of death," was a gem of execution; and the similar tumultuous movement, "Oh, tell us, Thou Christ," followed by the well-contrasted chorale "O, Lord, who dares to smite Thee," were quite as worthy of commendation. In "He went out and wept bitterly," Mr. Cummings created quite a sensation—none the less sensible because only a long drawn breath, as he ceased, signalized it, instead of a round of applause and cries of "Bravo." The leading boy was much better than before in the contralto air with violin obligato, "Have mercy"—indeed, he proved in it that all he needs in confidence to bring out powers far above the common. After this several pieces were cut out, and the recitative was taken up at "Now, at that feast," which was followed by the startling shout "Barabbas!" which came out like a rattle of musketry. The chorals "O Thou whose head," to the tune which in "Hymns Ancient and Modern" accompanies the hymn "O sacred head," was also a great success, and was partially taken up by the congregation. The boy before mentioned did his work very well indeed in the next number, a solo with chorus, "See the Saviour's outstretched arm." The passage in which is contained the expiring cry of the Saviour was given with great dramatic power by Messrs. Cummings and Beale, while the words that describe the supreme moment were admirably intoned by the former gentleman. The concluding chorus, with tenor and bass soli and double chorus, were all that could be desired or expected from Mr. Barnby's choir; and the dean having pronounced the benediction from the pulpit—although the Bishop of London was present—the vast congregation, which had been well taken care of by a number of gentlemen who gave their services as stewards, dispersed, the majority of them no doubt much pleased with a service of song which will find fewer to cavil at it among upholders of subjective, than among advocates of objective worship.

HATFIELD. In a recent soirée of Hassler's Gesangverein a masterly performance of several important works (heard here for the first time) is reported: among them Handel's "Acis and Galatea," the solos by Frl. Kiehl of Leipzig, Mr. William Shakespeare (!) of London, and Herr Krause of Berlin;—also scenes from Beethoven's "Prometheus" ballet music; his Trio: "Tremate, empit," and his chorus:

"Meeresstille," &c. The namesake of the great dramatist is complimented on his musical and well trained tenor voice and good delivery.—Bach's St. John Passion was given by the Singakademie on the 4th day of March.

LEIPZIG. The Gewandhaus Concert (Feb. 22), in aid of the Orchestra Pension Fund, had for its main feature a new Orchestral Suite (No. 6, in C) by Franz Lachner, of which the critics write with unwonted enthusiasm. Of the other novelties,—a Piano Concerto by Edward Grieg, and "Don Quixote," a humorous musical "character picture," by Anton Rubinstein, they have little to say in praise. The pianist, Frl. Erika Lie, both in her thankless task with the Concerto, and in a Nocturne and a Ballade by Chopin, won general favor; as did also the singer Herr Gura in an aria from Spohr's Faust, Löwe's Ballad "Herr Olaf," and in "Stille Sicherheit" by Robert Franz.

The 9th Enterpe Concert (Feb. 27) presented Schumann's D-minor Symphony, two Entr'actes from Schubert's Rosamunde and Wagner's Faust Overture. The Russian pianist, Frl. Annette Essipoff, played the Concerto in E minor by Chopin, and Schumann's "Vogel als Prophet," and Waltzes by Leschetitzky, all with great acceptance.

March 7. Eighteenth Gewandhaus Concert. Beethoven's Leonore Overture, No. 2; Spohr's 7th Violin Concerto, (E minor), played by H. Schradieck of Hamburg; Aria from Mozart's Tito: "Ecco il punto," by Frl. Asmann of Barmen; Chaconne for violin, by Vitali, with piano accompaniment by David; Songs: "Nachtlied" by Mendelssohn, and "Schöne Wiege meiner Leiden," Schumann; Symphony, No. 8, in B minor (new), by Gade. The new Symphony does not seem to have impressed the audience as being one of the Danish composer's happiest works.

The programme of the nineteenth Gewandhaus Concert was made up exclusively of compositions by Mozart. Among them were the G minor Symphony; Serenade and Rondo for Soprano, with obligato pianoforte accompaniment (Mlle. Voas, from Berlin, and Herr Reinecke); Concerto for Violin (Herr David); "Ave, Verum;" Overture to Figaro; "Abendempfindung" (Herr Gura); Concerto in E flat major, for two pianos (Herrn Kuast and Maas); and Sextet from Don Juan.—Concert of the Musical Union; Overture in G minor, Jadasohn; Pianoforte Concerto in C major, Beethoven, (Herr Reinecke); Songs, Herr Gura; "Triumphal March," Reinecke; Sixth Suite, Lachner. Herr Lachner's opera, Catherina Cornaro, will shortly be presented for the first time to a Leipzig audience.

At a sacred performance given by the Singakademie, the compositions selected were Lobgesang, Mendelssohn; Requiem for male chorus, Cherubini; and the "Hallelujah" chorus from the Messiah, Handel.—Tenth concert of the Enterpe Society: Overture to Egmont, Beethoven; Overture to Genoëva, Schumann; and Symphony in C major, Schumann.

The service done by Robert Franz in making the vocal scores of Bach and Handel more available seem to have drawn attention lately (in his own Germany) to the rare beauty and originality of his own Songs. In three Leipzig programmes of the same date we find songs by Franz set down.

Thirteen operatic performances were given in Leipzig in the month of February: viz: Weber's Freyschütz and Euryanthe; Marschner's Hans Heiling; Dittersdorf's Doctor und Apotheker, twice; Gounod's Faust; Wagner's Meistersinger; Rossini's Barbiere; Holstein's Erbe von Morley (Heir of Morley); Mozart's Don Juan; Donizetti's Lucia; Verdi's Rigoletto; Bellini's Sonnambula. Euryanthe was newly studied, with Frl. Mahlknecht as Euryanthe, Herr Gross as Adelar, Frau Peschka-Leutner as Egilantia (a powerful impersonation), and Herr Gura as Lysiart.

COLOGNE.—Eighth Gürzenich Concert: Overture to Medea, Bargiel; Pianoforte Concerto, F minor, Chopin (Mlle. Erika Lie); Concerto Aria, Mendelssohn (Mlle. Mathilde Wekerlin); Lorelei, for Chorus, vocal Soloists, and Orchestra, Ferdinand Hiller; Prelude and Fugue, Bach (Mlle. Mathilde Wekerlin); Symphony, No. 1, D minor, Spohr.

Ninth Gürzenich Concert, "Fest-Marsch" for the Opening of the London International Exhibition. Ferdinand Hiller; Violin Concerto, Mendelssohn (Herr de Ahna, from Berlin); first set of Alceste, Gluck (Alceste, Mlle. Schneider); Overture, No. 2, to Leonore, Beethoven; Eighth Symphony, Gade [first time in Germany].

HANOVER.—The seventh Subscription Concert began with the first orchestral work Robert Schumann ever wrote, his Symphony in B flat major. Dr. Hans von Bülow played the Concerto in E flat major, Beethoven; Prelude and Fugue, J. S. Bach; a composition by Chopin, and one by Liszt. He was warmly applauded. The vocalist was Mlle. Gutjahr.

VIENNA.—The Der Freyschütz jubilee was celebrated, on the 7th, at the Imperial Opera-house, "festlich beleuchtet," as it is called here, or lighted up a giorno, as the Italians have it, in honor of the occasion. It was really the fifty-first, and not the fiftieth, anniversary of the production of the opera in the Austrian capital, but the state of political affairs last March prevented any celebration of jubilee then. The performance of the opera was preceded by that of a Hymn, words by Roch-lits, music by Weber, which had not been given for thirty-five years. After a few bars, the curtain rose and the entire company, ranged in a semi-circle, was perceived drawn up on the stage, the foremost places being occupied by Mmes. Wilt, Glindale, Herren Müller and Krauss, the artists who took the solos. At the conclusion of the Hymn, Herr Lewinski stepped forward and recited some verses written, in commemoration of the event, by Herr L. A. Frankl. In the opera, the very smallest parts were sustained by leading artists, anxious to show their veneration for the great composer. One of the principal features at the grand concert just given by the Academic Vocal Association was the Requiem, written by Herr Franz Lachner, who conducted it himself. The solos were sung by Mmes. Wilt, Glindale, Fillinger, Herren Pirk and Krauss. This last work of the veteran General-Musical-Director of Bavaria was much admired, especially an eight part "Sanctus."—The Schubert Monument, of which Herr Kundmann is the sculptor, will be unveiled in May. The Deutsche Zeitung, speaking of it, says: With the exception of the red granite plinth, the entire monument is of white marble. It will be placed fronting the Wilhelm Palace in the Stadt Park. The statue of the master is completely finished, and the last touches are being put to the bas-reliefs which will adorn the pedestal. Schubert, larger than life, is represented sitting upon a rock. In his lap lies his note-book. In his right hand, which rests upon the trunk of a tree, he holds a pencil, as though about to jot down the melody that has just sprung from his brain. The thick set figure, in the characteristic costume of the period, including an ample cloak, the broad collar of which is turned down, and the good-natured face, set off by a thick curly head of hair, presents us with a most faithful semblance of Schubert's personal appearance.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 20, 1872.

Concerts.

THEODORE THOMAS AND HIS ORCHESTRA. Another flying visit from this model band of instrumental artists drew large and musical, although by no means crowded audiences to the Music Hall on Saturday afternoon and evening, and Sunday evening, April 6 and 7. It is too late for crowds after such a protracted deluge of music as has resulted from the confluence of so many streams on Boston throughout the last five months. Three good houses in such quick succession showed that the appetite for orchestral music is still keen with many. The programme for Saturday afternoon was this:

Overture: "Magic Flute".....Mozart.
Adagio: "Prometheus".....Beethoven.
With Cello, Harp, Flute, Clarinet and Bassoon Obligato.
Mmes. Hemman, Rocco, Weiner, Wendelschafer and Elts.
Concerto Symphonique, No. 4, Op. 102.....Liszt.
Adagio Religioso and Scherzo.....Liszt.
Mlle Marie Krebs and Orchestra.
Theme, Variations and March. Suite, Op. 113.....Lachner.
Overture: "Carnaval Romain".....Berlioz.
Theme and Variations. Quartet in D minor.....Schubert.
String Orchestra.
Waltz. "Geschichten aus dem Wiener Wald".....Strauss.
Polonaise, Op. 89.....Beethoven.
Mlle Marie Krebs.
Paraphrase, "Loreley".....Nevadba.
March: "Tannhauser".....Wagner.

The orchestra showed some new faces, and had gained decidedly in the possession of a new leading violoncellist; but its identity of character and in the main of persons, and its proportions, were preserved. BERNHARD LISTEMANN, at the head of the violins, with characteristic fire, still led the attack; and another of the worthies of our own Harvard Orchestra in past years, Mr. ELTZ, the bassoonist, was there to remind us how much we had lost. The spirit and precision, and brilliant purity of tune, with which that perfect Overture to the Zauberflöte was played, was really refreshing. The "Prometheus" Adagio has now become a standard favorite with our audiences, and of course such a band could bring out all its beauty. The Concerto by Litoff is one of the least extravagant and more euphonious and graceful of the new things. The Adagio religioso has an easy flow, a symmetry and rounded fullness, without much inward fire or depth, reminding one of Thalberg; the Scherzo, in Tarantella rhythm, is happily conceived and quite exciting. Miss KREBS, who seems to gain continually in expression,—which was the one thing wanting to her unlimited power of execution and of memory—played it capably well; as she did also Beethoven's Polonaise (heard here only once before, at a Harvard Concert). The Theme and Variations by Lachner (Franz Lachner, we suppose), all in a very serious and sombre vein, except the brilliant March, were extremely interesting, and showed the master hand in the deep art of development and polyphonic interweaving of parts, as well as in instrumentation. Such composition is not too common in these days. —Of the second part, the Schubert Variations were of course the gem "of purest ray serene." The Strauss Waltz ("Legends of the Vienna forest") was one of the most romantic in its introduction and luscious when the dance sets in.

In the evening were offered these attractions (Thomas draws always from a full horn, with both hands):

Overture. Leonore, No. 8.....Beethoven.
Scherzo. Reformation-Symphony.....Mendelssohn.
Fantasie on Hungarian Air.....Liszt.
Mlle Marie Krebs, and Orchestra.
Trauermarsch.....Schumann.
Introduction, Chorus and March, 8d. act Lohengrin.
Wagner.
Overture. "William Tell".....Rossini.
Fantasie. Visions in a Dream.....Lambye.
(With Zither Solo.)
Waltz. On the beautiful Blue Danube.....Strauss.
Duet. For Flute and French Horn.....Till.
Mmes. Weiner and Schmits.
"Amerylla." Air from Louis XIII.....Gyhs.
Overture. Light Cavalry.....Suppe.

This was, particularly, a "popular" programme. All the well selected pieces in the first part have been under notice here before repeatedly, unless it were the Hungarian Fantasie, which of course was difficult, fantastical, Hungarian and wild enough, and brilliantly executed.—The little peasant instrument, the Cithern, which we had not heard employed in an orchestra before, added a certain novel charm to the dance composer's "Dreams." The Duet for Flute and Horn was exquisitely performed. The title is somewhat obscure to that "Air from Louis XIII." Is it an air attributed to the French monarch as author, and worked up with variations, as we heard it, by a Belgian violin virtuoso of half a century ago, Gyhs? At all events the air is a quaint, bright, pretty Gavotte, and proved quite captivating.

For Sunday evening was reserved a richer programme:

Overture: "Coriolan," Op. 62.....Beethoven.
Adagio. Scherzo. "Ocean" Symphony, Op. 42. (By request).....Rubinstein.
Polonaise Brillante, Op. 72.....Weber.
(Instrumentation by Liszt).
Mlle Marie Krebs and Orchestra.
Introduction and Finale: "Tristan und Isolde." Wagner.
Dirge. [First time].....Schubert.
Concerto. No. 1, E flat.....Paganini.
Adagio, Rondo.
Mr. Bernhard Listemann and Orchestra.
Allegretto. 8th Symphony.....Beethoven.
{ a. Nocturne: "Loreley".....Seeling.
{ b. Rondo. E flat, op. 82.....Weber.
Mlle Marie Krebs.
Marchen Overture: "Aladdin".....Hornemann.

It is needless to say that the Coriolan Overture was played well, and when played well, it never fails to be intensely interesting. The two additional movements which Rubinstein composed after his "Ocean" Symphony proved fully worthy of a repetition; they are among the most poetic and most musical of the recent orchestral productions which Mr. Thomas has dealt out to us with liberal hand. The Tristan und Isolde Introduction and Finale do not yet win upon us; still less that "Aladdin" Overture, which does not seem to show a very genial fancy. But the Trauer-Marsch (Dirge) by Schubert, in E-flat minor, —No. 5 of the "Marches Heroiques," op. 40, originally a four-hand piano piece,—wonderfully solemn and impressive in itself, and wonderfully enhanced in these respects by Liszt's arrangement for full orchestra, was indeed a novelty worth hearing. We know of no dirge so laden with the intensest agony of grief; and yet in this very freedom and fullness of expression, the heavy burden appears lifted off, and you feel the spiritual exaltation of great music. How tender and how simple, like refreshing tears, the Trio in the major of the key! Liszt has been very faithful to his original, only prefixing a few notes of preparation to secure attention, and appending at the end, where the strain dies away, a couple of isolated muffled drum beats. Liszt has orchestrated more of Schubert's four-hand Marches, which we hope to hear.—Mr. LISTEMANN's mastery virtuosity on the violin seems to us more remarkable every time we hear him. What he played could have come from no one short of Paganini; but what he gave for an encore must have been by the "Old Nick" himself, with whom the wierd musician was always thought to be quite intimate.—In the brilliant, rapid piano reverie of Weber Miss Krebs was perfectly at home.

CARL ZERRAHN'S ANNUAL BENEFIT CONCERT, on Wednesday evening, April 10, had not the large attendance which the regard naturally felt for the indefatigable and efficient Conductor of nearly all the great orchestra and oratorio music in our city (and surrounding cities) for so many years had led us to expect,—even if that were all. But the artistic feast presented was surely of too high and rare an order to be passed over with indifference. Beethoven's wonderfully beautiful, touching and suggestive music to Goethe's Egmont—all of it belonging to the master's finest inspirations,—played entire, and admirably played, by such an orchestra, is not a thing to be heard every day. A goodly number of true music-lovers realized the fact, and took care to be present both in body and in spirit, giving their best attention and feeling themselves richly rewarded, in spite of the great disappointment caused to many by the sudden illness of Miss Charlotte Cushman, who was to have been the reader of the connecting portions of the dramatic dialogue; but there should have been enough to crowd old Music Hall. We cannot, however, with some of the newspaper critics, rush to the conclusion that, after all, the apparent interest in Boston for classical music is thus proved to have been in great part a sham and matter of mere fashion.

To this we say: Non constat, and seek the explanation of the small attendance elsewhere; in a complication of accident causes, particularly in the surfeit of an unprecedented musical season; in the adroitly manufactured excitement about a coming Gilmore "jubilee," and in the way in which this, besides so much other truer musical activity, has been keeping our Conductor so continually before a public which is Athenian enough to be restless for "new things," if not for rest itself; and probably in the preference of many for music without reading. This latter task was respectably well performed, at such short notice, by Prof. EVANS, who combines intelligence with a good voice and presence. The reading was unequal, to be sure; Clärchen was made commonplace, and the Mother caricatured; but the heroic passages, the scenes between Egmont and Orange, between Egmont and Ferdinand particularly, and the prison soliloquy were given with good effect.

At all events, whoever followed well the reading could enjoy the music with a clearer understanding, and feel the purpose and the beauty of all those wonderful entr'actes, as well as of the Overture and melodramatic accompaniments in the last scene, as he could not fully have felt it otherwise. How vividly are all the elements of the tragedy, the gloomy, bodeful, stormy times of Alva in the Netherlands, the tender love of Egmont and Chärchen, the despair of the humbler lover, the heroic characters of Egmont and Orange, the Vision of Liberty in the prison, and the triumphal Symphony for the finale, portrayed in that music. Goethe and Beethoven meeting in a perfect work, and yet only half an audience! Mrs. WESTON, with her fresh, sweet voice, and in her modest, fervent manner, sang the two little songs of Chärchen — particularly "Freudvoll und leidvoll," which cannot be translated and ought to have been sung in German, very finely.

Mr. B. J. LANG's second series of Symphony Concerts began at Mechanics' Hall on Thursday Afternoon, April 11. The pleasant little hall, hitherto the haunt of Chamber Music and unaccustomed to the sound of an orchestra, was very nearly filled by a numerous and refined audience. The orchestra was composed of about thirty musicians, — the best in their several departments that our city affords; a force sufficient for the rendering of such Symphonies, Overtures, Concertos, &c., as do not require the "extra brass." The proportion was fair; 3 double basses, 2 'Celli (Fries and Hartdegen), a dozen violins and violas, the usual four pairs of wood wind instruments, two horns, &c. A good effective orchestra for such work as they had to do; for all the performers had had long schooling in the rendering of classical masterworks. The place, however, seemed too small for the loud tutti passages; there was a somewhat confused reverberation, — at least where we sat. This was the programme:

Overture to "Die Heimkehr aus der Fremde," Mendelssohn.
Symphony in F. No. 8. Beethoven.
Concerto for Piano-forte, in A minor. Op. 54. Schumann.
Mr. G. A. Adams.
Overture to "Preciosa," v. Weber.

The two fresh and charming little Overtures had been very seldom heard in Boston, — never in the seven series of Harvard Symphony Concerts, — and were very enjoyable. That to Mendelssohn's youthful operetta, "The Son and Stranger," has a buoyant Spring-like feeling, and always seemed to us an anticipation of the first movement of the "Italian" Symphony. The rendering was spirited and nice. Weber's "Preciosa" Overture, with its romance, its woodland exhilaration, its gypsy march, tingling with tambourine and triangle, was well brought out, and left no sense of dull satiety at breaking up. Beethoven's shortest Symphony, — the sunniest and brightest, ripest, and the best in keeping with such programme, — did not in some parts go so evenly and smoothly as the Overtures; yet the impression of its beauty was not seriously blurred.

Schumann's Concerto was indeed an arduous task for so young an artist (almost a beginner) as Mr. ADAMS. It could not be expected that his rendering would have all the intensity, the poetic realizing sense, which we have felt in the interpretation of the same work by experienced masters, and that so recently; but it was a perfectly clear, unflinching, elegant reading of the work from beginning to end; carefully studied, regardful of light and shade, in good taste, and as a sign of technical proficiency remarkable. Life and experience alone can give the qualities it lacked.

Of Mr. Lang's second and third concerts (this week and next) we shall speak next time.

Mr. JOSEPH HEINE, the blind violinist, who made so favorable an impression in the Music Hall some months ago, but who, amid the rush and competition of so many concert-givers, has hardly had fair opportunity to take here the position as an artist which he really deserves, had a Complimentary Concert tendered to him by friends and admirers, which took place on Thursday evening, April 11, at Mechanics' Hall. There was a good audience, though not so large as we had hoped to see. Mr. and Mrs. HEINE played together the Adagio and Rondo from a Sonata for Violin and Piano, in B flat, by Dussek, one of those works by a too much neglected composer of Mozart's time, which are not held unworthy of the powers of Mme. Arabella Goddard and Joachim in the "Monday Popular Concerts" of London. The music proved interesting, and the violin playing was in a broad, sound, classical and earnest style, showing an artist at home in good music, not less than in the ad captandum feats of concert virtuosity. The piano part, albeit a little over-loud at times, was rendered with much ease and brilliancy of technique and good style by Mme. HEINE, whose claim to the character of an accomplished pianist was still more clearly established by her solo performance of Weber's Rondo Brillante in E flat, as doubtless also in De Meyer's Fantasia on Lucrezia Borgia, which we could not stay to hear.

Mr. Heine's principal solo was "I Palpiti" by Paganini, in which he seemed almost to surpass himself, executing all its difficulties with an easy grace, a certainty and power, which entitled him to a high place among the prominent violinists we have heard here; though it would be extravagant to bring him into comparison with a Vieuxtemps. There is a genuine musical fervor in his playing, and a vein of rather fine and individual humor when he indulges in extravaganzas. His "Carnival" is quite as droll and fresh as anybody's.

The "Temple Quartette" contributed some of their sweetly modulated male part-songs, and songs were sung by Miss H. A. HUNT, Mr. FESSENDEN and Mr. RYDER; that by the last named was from Mozart's "Magic Flute," — Sarastro's noble bass air.

Miss ANNA MEHLIG's last two (7th and 8th) Piano Recitals were at Brackett Hall, March 21st and 23d. They were fully attended and the programmes interesting. In the first, Miss PERIS BELL, a young pupil of Julius Eichberg, won marked approbation by her pure intonation, her precise and facile execution and her good sound style, as a violinist. She played the Andante from Mendelssohn's Concerto, and the brilliant Fantasia-Caprice by Vieuxtemps wonderfully well, though she has much of course to learn. Miss Mehlig played the great Chopin Polonaise in A flat, three little Fantasia-Stücke by Schumann, and a prodigious effect piece by Liszt made out of Gounod's Faust waltz. In the second recital she gave the clearest and most powerful rendering we ever heard of the Beethoven Sonata, op. 53; a Prelude and Fugue in E minor by Mendelssohn; three or four of the greatest Etudes by Chopin; smaller things by Seeling, Henselt, &c., and Liszt's "Rhapsodie Hongroise."

Other Concert notes must wait for room. — Our New York letter also comes too late.

The Chickering Piano.

OPENING OF THE NEW WAREHOUSES.

(From the Daily Advertiser, April 15.)

Forty-nine years ago yesterday, Jonas Chickering first entered into the business of piano-making, and his sons celebrated the day by turning out of their factory their forty-thousandth piano and moving into the finest piano ware-rooms in the world. A small company of friends and gentlemen connected with the press were last evening invited to examine the new rooms, and the elegant finish of the spacious rooms called out the heartiest admiration from all present. The building, which has just been altered over for the firm, is the large granite block on Washington and Hayward place, one of the finest sites in the city. It is six stories in height, and before its occupancy by the Messrs. Chickering comprised Nos. 343, 350, 353 and 354 Washington street, on which it has a frontage of fifty-seven feet, and extending back so as to give an area of about thirty thousand square feet in the six stories.

One might well be excused for delaying on the sidewalk for a few moments to notice what is beyond question the finest entrance to any store in this city. The grand arched doorway occupies the first and second stories, and is of original design and elaborate workmanship. The outer arch is ornamented with a carved moulding and series of gilded pateras, and is supported by pilasters, the capitals of which are of an original design, representing the lyre. From the outer arch the sides and ceiling converge to the inner arch, thus forming an octagonal recess, the ceiling of which is decorated with a series of radiating flutes, with gilded reeds. In the centre of this inner arch is suspended the insignia of the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honor, which was awarded to this house by the judges of the Paris Exposition of 1867. On either side of the outer arch are placed the business signs, extending across the whole front, with enlarged and gilded copies of some of the most highly-prized medals at each extremity. The floor of the entrance under the arch is paved with encaustic tiles, brought from Mauberge, and the doors are of walnut, with plate-glass panels.

The principal sales-room is on the grand floor, and we step directly into it from the sidewalk. The floor is of elaborate marqueterie work, being arranged in large panels corresponding with the ceiling, after the designs prepared by the architect, by Mr. Joseph Dill, according to his patent process, by which the wood is wrought in fanciful designs and dovetailed together into one piece as it were. The columns and entablatures which support the ceiling are elaborately decorated, the cornices being carried across the room from column to column, dividing it into panels, in the centre of which are ornamental designs in stucco, from some of which the candelabra depend. The coloring is a combination of blue grays and warm browns, with gilding, the various parts of the elaborate stucco work being colored or gilded in such a manner as to intensify its effect. The hall terminates with a screen of pilasters and plate glass, which separates it from the offices in the rear. At the extreme right is the business office or counting room, connected with which and still further in the rear is one of Morris & Ireland's largest safes, costing $1500. Next to the counting room is the private office of the proprietors, and at the extreme left is the receiving room, where pianos are landed from Hayward place. The offices are in keeping with the outer room, and are fitted up with every convenience for the despatch of business. In the principal one is a fine life-size photograph of the late Col. Thomas Chickering by Rockwood of New York. The whole effect of these rooms is really gorgeous, but in perfect taste. The work has been done from designs and under direction of Messrs. Small & Gregerson, architects.

The grand staircase, which faces the broad entrance, and is in the centre of the room, is of black walnut with moulded balusters, the pedestal newels supporting bronze candelabra of elegant design, ornamented with carved griffins. Ascending we enter one of the three ware-rooms in the second story, the first prominent object at the head of the staircase being a marble bust of Mr. Jonas Chickering, placed on a pedestal of the same material. This room is now used for pianos of all classes. On the left is the apartment formerly occupied as a business office, but now used for the exhibition of upright pianos, in which this firm has made many great improvements. The front room, formerly the principal salesroom, is now given up to the exhibition of the famous grand pianos. This room, with its rows of beautiful pillars and its general elaborate adornment, forms a harmonious contrast to the room below. Here, also, the founder of the house is again remembered, for, occupying a prominent position, is a life-size oil painting of the senior Chickering. Near this is a large frame containing electrotype copies of the eighty medals which have been awarded to this house for pianos of their manufacture, at the various industrial exhibitions where they have been placed in competition; and in this room, as well as throughout the whole building, the walls are adorned with portraits of various musical celebrities.

In the third story is another ware-room, where are kept nearly 100 instruments, and in the fourth story is another room of the same size and used for the same purpose, also for storing the pianos of patrons who desire it. In the fifth story will be found during working hours fifty workmen, whom it has been found necessary to locate here on account of the crowded condition of the seven acres of workshop at the factory. There are two rooms here, one used as the repairing department, and in the other the carvers are busily employed fashioning the legs and pedals of pianos in various fanciful designs. The sixth story is used entirely for the purpose of storage.

Musical Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, APRIL 13. On Saturday evening, March 30, Mr. JARVIS gave his Fifth Soirée at Chickering Hall. He was assisted by Messrs Kopta and Hennig. Mr. Jarvis played a Gigue by Raff, full of intricate contrasts, thus giving Mr. J. a full opportunity to display his wonderful skill. The Mozart Trio in A, for violin, 'cello, and Piano was fairly given, the absence of power being the main fault. Mr. Hennig in the Lubeck 'cello solo was very successful. Mr. Kopta's solo appeared to be a mite too difficult to him. It was by Bazzini. The difficult cadenza lacked crispness.

On Easter Sunday good music was rendered at all of our churches. At the cathedral, Haydn's mass No. 6, was given; also Mozart's 3rd motet. At the Assumption, Haydn's mass No. 16, in B flat; at St. Vincent's Cherubini's "messe solennelle;" at Trinity, Haydn's No. 1; and at St. Mary's, Haydn's No. 2. In the remainder of the Roman Catholic churches, either Mozart's No. 12, or Haydn's No. 3, was sung. So you see Father Haydn was well represented. At St. Mark's Episcopal church, the Easter Part of Handel's Messiah, and Sir J. Benedict's communion service were given. At St. Stephen's, Hopkins's "Te Deum" in A, and Handel's "Hallelujah." At St. Clement's, Handel's "Worthy is the Lamb," and Gounod's "Benedictus qui venit." As a general thing the music was fairly given, great attention and care having been expended. The great fault was that in but one or two cases the choirs were not large enough.

On Friday evening, April 5, the "Abt" male singing society gave one of the most thoroughly delightful choral concerts I ever attended. The chorus numbers about forty, every man a sight-reader and vocally proficient. The leader is Mr. M. H. Cross. The glees sung were by Hatton, Sullivan, Spofforth, &c. Sullivan's "Long Day Closes" was exquisitely sung; the shading was graceful, and the fortes crisp and ringing. The great merit in the "Abt's" singing is that all the marks of expression are carefully observed. Hatton's "Tar" song pleased every one; for it was given with a hearty snap that enlivened every one of the vast audience. This is the last of the "Abt's" concerts this year.

On the same evening the "Beethoven Society" (mixed voices) gave a concert at the Academy. There were about one hundred in the chorus, and about fifty in the Orchestra, the whole under the direction of Mr. Carl Wolfsohn. Mr. Richard Hoffman, of New York, appeared for the first time in Philadelphia to play the piano part of Mozart's D-minor concerto. I was charmed with him; he exhibited rare ability and such unassuming manners that he soon won the hearts of his audience. The orchestra were not prompt enough in their parts in the Romanza, but the Piano was everything that I could desire. Mr. Hoffman also played his "Solitude" and "Introduction and Tarentelle." The choruses as a general thing were well sung; the bass part, however, was too light. The choruses were: No. 1 and No. 6 from Mozart's "King Thamos," Gade's "Spring Message," Female chorus from the "Flying Dutchman," Beethoven's "Hallelujah," and the quartet in Fidelio arranged for a chorus, (very questionable taste). The "Hallelujah" was rendered in excellent style and the others, generally, were fair enough. The "Fidelio" piece was almost ruined by the basses singing too flat. It was a great pity that these two societies ("Abt" and "Beethoven") should have selected the same evening for their concerts—the "Abt" however did not lose, for the hall was crowded, while at the Academy only a fair audience was present.

The third concert of Miss JACKSON's delightful series of chamber concerts took place at the Natatorium Hall. The programme was as follows:

String Quartet, op. 77, No. 2.....Haydn.
Philadelphia String Quartet Club.
Piano Concerto, F sharp minor.....Heller.
[The orchestral part arranged for a second Piano].
Mr. Gublemann and Mr. Wolfsohn.
Pieces Characteristiques. Violoncello.....Lachner.
Mr. Hennig.
String Quartet, Op. 96, F minor.....Beethoven.

The opening number was played with delicate and accurate refinement, but I should prefer hearing the Trio in D flat in the menuetto rendered a shade faster. The "Andante" was played a little too fast, not too fast for an ordinary modern time Andante; but artists seem to forget that Andante now and Andante in Haydn's time are not precisely the same movement. The Piano Concerto was thoroughly enjoyable; there seemed to be a perfect unity of sentiment between the two performers, which enhanced the effect of the piece to a high degree. Mr. Hennig's performance of his violoncello solo was entirely characteristic of him. It was a masterly effort; such delicacy, so much close attention to light and shade, combined with such accurate execution, is a refreshing rarity. The closing number to me is one of the finest, if not the finest of the whole of the seventeen string quartets of the Master, having been written after hard philosophical studies and experience had strengthened his mind, and hence better fitted it to restrain his lofty genius; it seems to be a completely logical work; every movement carefully follows the theme and develops the whole of it alone, thoroughly, to the end. With all these qualities it necessarily presents more difficulties than perhaps any of his others; but the quartet evidently did not agree with me, for their performance clearly evinced a very superficial rehearsal; while this was apparent throughout the whole piece, it was chiefly discernable in the Allegro assai vivace ma serioso, where each man seemed to need all his energies to keep himself straight, and consequently unity and expression went a begging.

On Wednesday, Friday and Saturday (matinée), 10th, 12th and 13th, we were favored by three performances of THOMAS'S ORCHESTRA. The thanks of the music loving public are due to the energy and sensible arrangement of Mr. Alfred Stimmel, a courteous and experienced attaché of our Academy of Music, who brought the Orchestra here under his single management. The programme of the first concert was particularly rich in gems. In the heavenly Adagio from Prometheus, the performance of which was as faultless as any I have ever heard, the harp of Signor Rocco was refreshing to hear. The pièce de resistance was Mendelssohn's G-minor Concerto, played by Miss Krebs and Orchestra. Miss Krebs's performance in this exceeded anything I have previously heard by her; it was sure, firm and forcible, yet eloquently poetic. The "Magic Flute" overture was given with the characteristic accuracy and care of the Orchestra. The String Orchestra gave a most charming interpretation of Schubert's D-minor quartet [Theme, Variations]. I was particularly struck with the clear and perfect manner in which the pp passages were rendered. This arrangement is one of Thomas's specialties, for which to him all honor. Weber's Oberon Overture was not up to the usual high standard of the Orchestra's performance. It was given entirely too fast to suit my taste, at least. Liszt's "Preludes," with all the beauties of its ingenious instrumentation, did not call forth any enthusiasm on the part of the audience. Miss Krebs played a Nocturne of Seeling's and Weber's delightful E-flat Rondo (from memory, mirabile dictu) with ease and finish. She won for herself hearty applause. Strauss's "Geschichten aus dem Wiener Wald" Waltz, and Suppé's "Poet and Peasant" Overture were the two "popular" pieces, and were thoroughly appreciated and heartily applauded by their admirers.

The second Thomas Concert took place on Friday evening, April 12. This one being announced as Mr. Stimmel's benefit, the house was much fuller than on Wednesday. The Larghetto and Scherzo from Schumann's B flat Symphony, op. 38, were given. The latter was particularly enjoyable. Weber's Polonaise Brillante, op. 72, [instrumentation by Liszt] was received with great delight. I think it was one of the most perfectly finished performances I have ever heard. The Introduction and Finale of Tristan und Isolde, by Wagner, is an extraordinary combination of utterly incompatible effects. It is thoroughly Wagnerian in its every part, noisy and full of contrasts, and by no means the most attractive of Wagner's compositions.

Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" is one of the pieces which are thoroughly identified with the Thomas Concerts. It was superbly played. Bazzini's "Emeralda" Fantasia received a most agreeable and intelligent interpretation at the hands of Mr. Listemann. In response to the encore he gave a little Rondo of Paganini's. Miss Krebs was very successful in Liszt's "Faust" Fantasia, and on being loudly encored, she played the "Spinning Chorus" air from Wagner's "Die fliegende Holländer." Gybs's arrangement of the air accredited to Louis XIII. has been played at one concert at least of every one of Mr. Thomas's series. Schubert's Hungarian March closed the programme; its effect was greatly marred by the thoroughly Philadelphia audience characteristic of starting to go about the middle of the last piece. This great nuisance [for it is nothing else] is utterly without remedy, as an Act of Legislature forbids locking the doors of any public place while it contains an audience.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Sunny Memories. 3. Bb to f. Mrs. Lancaster. 30
"Sunny Memories, ye are winging
To my heart your silent way."
Beautiful song, every way.
- I am watching for thee, darling. 3. D to c. Fuller. 30
"I am watching for thee, darling,
I am watching at the door."
One of the good home-songs. The more there are the better.
- We'll vote for Grant again. 2. G to e. Percy. 40
"Come gather round the fire,
Lay on another rail."
Spirited enough for any one. Inscribed with the motto "Let us have Peace."—Well, let us all have this piece and sing it. Vignette Title.
- Ah! tell me why. (Si vous n'avez rien). 4. Mme. Rothschild. 35
D♭ to f. "Ah! wherefore smile on me?"
"Pourquoi me faîtes vous sourire."
A favorite French song, with French and English words.
- Think not I can e'er forget thee. Song and Cho. 3. Bb to e. Parkhurst. 30
"Think not I can e'er forget thee, Tho' we part to meet no more."
Words by Mrs. Kidder, and with the music are put together in good shape, by experienced hands.
- Twilight in the Park. 3. C to f. Brockway. 40
"Cupid lingers there,
No one near to mark."
Very pretty lithograph title. Half funny and half serious, and a little more refined than the average comic songs.
- O, fair Dove! 4. E to f. Sullivan. 60
"O last Love! O first Love!
My Love with the true heart!"
Jean Ingelow's poem has been recently noticed, but this time it is set to different music. Very effective, and in concert style.

Instrumental.

- Nocturne in C, No. 1, Op. 277. 4. C. Jungman. 75 Exceedingly sweet. Just the melody one would like to hear in a dream.
- New Hawthorn Schottisch Dansante. 3. C. Quigg. 30
Rightly named a "Schottisch Dansante," for if you play it with any spirit, and occasionally glance at the feet of persons in the room, you will notice that they are all twisting or tapping time, and "all ready for a dance."
- Silvery Charming. Polka de Salon. 4. Eb. Grass. 65 Begins with a lively polka movement, on which the middle and finale of the piece furnish variations.
- Mandolinata Waltz. 4. F. Cheney. 40
Notice that there is also a vocal piece and a Capriccio called "Mandolinata." The included melody is a "success" and is naturally worked up in various ways. This is a fine waltz.
- Wine, Women and Song. Waltzes. Abridged. 3. Strauss. 40
One is not tired of the length of the longer piece; but as its brilliant features are preserved in the shorter one, some may prefer it. The price of the complete waltzes is 75 cts.

Books.

- SIX SONGS FOR MALE VOICES.
By Dudley Buck. Voice parts, ea. 50
Score, 75
Complete, 2.50
Notice that "complete" includes 28 pieces, that is the separate part for each of the 6 songs, and the score for the player or conductor.
The Songs are:
1 Huza! (Wine Song). Allegro con fuoco.
Come, brothers, fill the jovial glass.
2 In Absence. Andante con moto.
Watch her kindly, stars!
3 Come in the Stilly Night. Tempo di Valse.
Dearest, why thus delay?
4 At Midnight. Moderato.
At midnight dark, with solemn chiming.
5 On Tree Top High. Allegretto.
'Twas a peaceful, lovely night in May.
6 She is mine.
Spring is near, fraught with gladness.
It will be noticed that there is great variety. Words are from the German of Eichendorf and Reinecke, and the music approaches in character the best German 4 part songs. Dedicated to the Apollo Club.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 811.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 4, 1872.

VOL. XXXII. No. 3.

The Grand Orchestra.

BY HENRY AMES BLOOD.

O, listen to that solemn symphony!
These are the notes which to the heart interpret
The majesty of sorrow; and it is
By these the heavy progress of the dead—
The dead who died immortal—should be followed.

And this should be upon an afternoon
In rich October; and the grand cortege
Move down a mellow vista, where there hung
Floating aloft as if upon the air,
As far as eye could see, most gorgeous boughs
Of leaves, and leaves should lie upon the ground
Quite thickly; and it would be strange, indeed,
If here and there, all trembling to the strains
Of this great score, still others did not fall.
Slow sailing their first journey to the earth.
And strange if now and then might not be seen
Some happy squirrel, or wee thoughtless bird,
Scarcely knowing any sorrow, even in death.

For it should be the month of yellow leaves,
And faint voluptuous odors in the grass
And in the golden haze; the only time
When to be happy is but to be sad,
And to be sad is to be like the leaves
When all the woods wear melancholy plumes.
Too early or too late the poet dies
Who dies not in the season of ripe leaves.
O, list the yearning of these cadences,
For they but breathe again what I now said!
I wonder if beyond the ancient stars,
Beyond this immaterial dome, this blue
Eternity of silence overarched,
Beneath the mighty rushing of the waves,
A hundred foamy leagues from any man,
Within those palaces where all for beauty
Mermaids live, and mermen die for love,
Such melody is not heard!

Soft! soft! O, hark!
Do you not hear them now? Do you not hear
The music of those deep sea-corridors,
Whose crystal pillars tremble with all hail
To the majestic entrance of the gray,
Surf-bearded Ocean? These must be, indeed,
Almost as beautiful as were the strains
Which followed, in the dim background of Time,
Upon the windy track of Æolus,
When mermaids have besought the mariner.
And those to hear again, who would not go
Sea-faring now? Who would not brave black night,
The creeping, treacherous fog, the roaring breakers,
The crased winds, the insatiable fire,
The unlashd waves, that spring upon the decks
As swift as tigers, and remorselessly
Blunder and slant alike sweep, God knows where?
Only to hear such ravishing notes once more
How gladly would we sail the infested seas,
Above the dull-eyed monsters! Oh! how quickly
Welcome the rushing and tumultuous bergs,
The thundering, league-long battlements of ice
Which were the outposts of the Arctic night.
But listen, now! Is it not passing strange,
These seeming ordinary whiskered men,
Who look no more than common entities,
Are really purveyors to the stars,
And lug us by the ears up into Heaven?
How worse than useless, now, are our good eyes;
I would not open them, if I might see
The unimagined form of Beauty rise.
How softly unto dulcet sounds like these
The current of our lives should glide away
Into an old age of sweet memories.
Now is the time to die and feel no pang;
The dreadful potion would be so disguised
In the bright sparkle of sweet music's wine.

Who knows not that beyond the amber air
The voices of music never will be hushed,
And silence would be sorrow. Oh! believe,
When we have laid this mortal burden down
Which gives us gravity, and the green earth
Spins off beneath us, we shall rise at once
Where spring immortal thunders, and where roll
Great globes of most celestial harmonies.

—New York Independent, Jan. 10, 1873.

Translated for this Journal.

The Wizard of the G-String.

FROM THE GERMAN.

On the 25th of March, 1828, there appeared in the Vienna Musical Journal the following announcement: "A very interesting piece of news to the musical public, is the arrival of the renowned Genoese violinist, NICOLÒ PAGANINI, who has set out from Italy on a musical tour, and has determined to dedicate his first performance to the patrons of music in Vienna."

Renowned? Perhaps—in Italy. We Germans looked down on the Italian masters; their works, though certainly held in high esteem by the whole musical world beside, were notwithstanding mere trifles in the eyes of the German critics. Instrumental music, Symphonies for example, they certainly could not compose; and as to their excellence as performers, it had not even been spoken of for a long time; Germany and France had other matadores in this arena. At the head of these on the violin stood Spohr—a giant both in stature and skill—Lipinski, Kiesewetter, Mayseder; and in France, Rode, Ballot, and some others. Of this Genoese virtuoso very few had heard, the public knew nothing of him. Add to this that he came to us an elderly (?) and sickly man, already 44 years age; in the best aspect a ruin, good enough however for German barbarians. It was not to be wondered at, then, that the concert given on the 29th of March found no great encouragement. But the day after! All business seemed at once to have gone music-mad. The succeeding concerts found the house surrounded from early morning by a vast crowd, and in spite of the price being first doubled, then trebled, many carried away instead of a ticket, only bruises, bumps, and torn clothes. According to the articles which appeared in the Vienna journals either all the reporters must have greatly exaggerated, or the Genoese fiddler was in truth the most extraordinary artistic phenomenon that the world had ever heard.

For example: "He who has not heard Paganini can form no idea of what he is. To describe his playing is simply impossible, and even frequent listeners have but little advantage in this respect." The calm, reasonable Castelli wrote: "Never has any artist created so great a sensation within our walls as this god of the violin. His execution is the highest, the most extraordinary and astonishing possible in the whole range of musical art. He begins where others end; he performs impossibilities, yes—since even the means by which he produces them are unknown to us,—what for us are impossibilities."

From all the cities that he visited, Breslau, Berlin, Frankfort-on-the-Main, from everywhere indeed, was echoed the same incredible report.

Were we not right enough to be curious? Would he come to Weimar? That was a question as important to me as poor Hamlet's "To be or not to be" to him. The little royal residence with its slender resources, said I to myself, certainly cannot attract him, when one reads of the enormous sums lavished upon him by large cities; yet great names belong to this little town: Goethe, Hummel, Maria Pawlowna, still live, the latter a pianist of the first rank. If Paganini is a real artist he cannot pass by Weimar. So I persuaded myself, so—but I am an old man and age is garrulous. I turn over therefore several pages of my manuscript, on which I have portrayed my expectant feelings, and come at last to that evening,—the 29th of October, 1829,—on which our orchestra boy entered my room with the announcement, "Stage rehearsal to-morrow morning at 9 o'clock for Maestro Paganini's concert."

Again I pass over the rehearsal and come at once to the concert. From the city itself and all the region around everybody flocked on that evening, who could afford the double entrance fee. The house presented a magnificent spectacle, the audience was so closely packed, so wedged together that without exaggeration a falling apple could not have reached the floor while the concert continued. A solemn stillness rested on the vast concourse, all eyes were fixed on the stage, every ear was strained to catch the first notes of the famous master. The overture came to an end, the poor thing had banged itself out in vain,—no one listened to it. Finally after a tolerably long pause (Paganini, like other great men, enjoyed making people wait for him) he appeared. His violin in his left hand, his bow in his right, he glided with a light, quick step through our ranks to the front of the stage; there was no music stand, for he played entirely without notes. He bowed several times slightly and rather awkwardly, in doing which he rested his bow on the floor, as a general on parade sinks his sword in the presence of his sovereign.

Never in my life have I seen a man whose appearance awakened within me such emotions of pity. A lank figure, dressed in an old-fashioned black frock coat, and black trousers down to his heels, which hung loose on his shrunken limbs as on a skeleton. Forth from loose hanging locks, and a thick, close, curled beard, looked a thin, cadaverous visage, with a long aquiline nose. From his shoulders hung baboon-like arms, terminating in very long, withered, but snow-white hands. Involuntarily I was reminded of Callot Hoffmann's organist, Kreisler. And again, his apathetic, blank, desolate gaze at the assembly, brought before me the weird and despairing face of the wandering Jew.

He began the performance with his great Concerto in E-flat major. The ritornello opened. His shoulders were high, and in playing he drew them together so that his head seemed to stand on a post. Contrary to the principles of all other violinists, he held his bow close to his body, and while the orchestra played the "Tutti," the brilliant and sparkling tones of his violin flashed through the accompaniment like gleams of light.

And how shall I describe his playing? It was justly said that to get any idea of him he must be heard, because no adequate conception of him can be obtained from description. Meyerbeer said later to Castil-Blaze: "Imagine the most surprising effects that can be produced on the violin, recall the miracles of the bow and the melody, still Paganini will surpass your expectations."

A notorious miser once found himself in a company assembled for a benevolent purpose. The collector presented himself a second time, intentionally, before him. "I have already given my contribution," said the miser. "Pardon me," rejoined the collector, "I did not see it, but of course I believe it." A witty neighbor of the Harpagon, thereupon put in quickly: "I saw it, but I don't believe it. So it was with regard to Paganini. Those who have not heard it, would not believe it, said the audience as they left the concert room; a reporter wrote, 'I have heard it, yet I do not believe it.'"

Such was Paganini's playing, the most perfect that was ever listened to by human ear. But this magical performance was only the expression of his ardent soul. In his playing, earnest and jest, melancholy and humor, sorrow and mirth, alternated in the happiest manner. André, from whose Hesperus I quote the following passage, has expressed this eloquently. "Is Paganini a musical genius in the highest sense in his own art? I believe that putting wholly aside his incredible mechanical skill and dexterity, I must answer in the affirmative, because more than any other he puts a soul into his execution. It is this in-breathed soul which impresses sensitive natures so indescribably, which gives to every tone its peculiar individuality, and must remain inimitable because it is his own spirit that speaks, himself that is expressed. He in fact makes his violin speak the language of his innermost sensations, and of the peculiar condition of his mind. That which passes within him the instrument expresses with singular truth and fidelity. Judging from its language as to his emotions and feelings, we should say that in that heart, (perhaps only in retrospect) the stormiest passions struggle with the deepest, tenderest affections, but sorrows are mingled with entrancing joys, black misanthropy with child-like kindness. And to sum up all in a word, it is a heart broken, yet rejoicing."

It may be imagined what an excitement this magician aroused among us. The applause of our citizens, always before kept within decorous limits, stormed through the house like a rushing sea, and rapture carried away even the most phlegmatic. Paganini knew well that the performer must himself feel, in order to awaken feeling in others, and his motto was: "One must be an enthusiast himself if he would call forth enthusiasm." With regard to the impression made by his playing, Holtei wrote in his vigorous style, "Paganini has performed here in Weimar, and even here, squeaking on his four pitiful strings, he turns the hearts of men round in their bodies."

He had advanced to the footlights, a sickly-looking man of feeble frame, but no sooner had he taken up his violin, grasped his bow, and struck the first notes, than the giant strength that had slumbered in him awoke; nerves, muscles and limbs became strong, vigorous, intense; all was spirit, power and life, in and about him.

To discover how he became so great, so inimitable, we must look back at the history of his past life.

Paganini was born in Genoa on the 18th of February, 1784. His father was a tradesman in rather straitened circumstances, who passionately loved music, and practiced it "with little talent but much comfort." He soon discovered his son's natural gifts, and taught him the rudiments of the violin, and being a stern, severe man, he compelled the boy to practise the whole day, and when he was not industrious enough to satisfy him, drove him by hunger to double his exertions.

In his ninth year the young virtuoso appeared for the first time in public in his native city, Genoa, amid the incessant and enthusiastic plaudits of the delighted audience. After he had taken lessons at Parma, from Rolla, the renowned violinist, and in composition from Ghivetti, and then at Genoa had devoted himself in entire seclusion to the severest studies, he began to travel and give concerts alone at the age of fifteen, but only in Italy, and this he continued for twenty-two years, at the same time perfecting himself by increasing practice. For some time he was established at the court of Lucca. At this period passion awoke in the breast of the fiery young Italian. He fell into profligate courses and became devoted to love and play; the first destroyed his constitution, the latter brought him often into great poverty and distress; but at the time he appeared in Germany he had become a staid and very economical man. His world-wide renown dates from his appearance at Vienna, after which he travelled slowly through Germany, France, England, Spain and Poland, and finally, after an absence of ten years, he returned to Italy in the summer of 1834, loaded with wealth and honors, and took up his residence sometimes at Genoa, sometimes at Milan or Parma.

After a short visit to Paris, where on account of his failing health he could give no concerts, he hastened back by sea to Genoa, hoping there to regain his lost strength. It was a vain hope. Nice was to be his last resting place. His disease, consumption, there made rapid strides, his voice failed, his strength wholly left him. On the last evening of his life he appeared quieter than usual and slept a little; when he awoke he opened the bed-curtains that he might see the moon, which was rising in full splendor amid a cloudless sky. At this sight his failing senses revived, he feebly grasped his violin, the faithful companion of his journeyings, and breathed out to its faint tones his last sigh.

Thus died this great master on the 27th of May, 1840, in the 56th year of his age. But death itself could not end his troubles. He was an Italian and a Catholic; he believed in God, but not in the priests; he frequently visited churches and cathedrals to admire the masterpieces of architects, sculptors and painters, and to enjoy the religious music of the old Italian composers, and others; but with regard to the multitudinous ceremonies and incense-burnings, which blind and befog men, he had his own opinions, like the rest of the enlightened world. Some of these views had probably reached the ears of the priesthood, for the most Christian Bishop of Nice refused him a grave in consecrated ground, and only after many attempts of his son and his friends, whose petitions were for a long time futile, did he receive Christian burial by a special dispensation from Rome.

Paganini left behind him to a legitimized son, named Achilles, an estate worth two millions of francs, and to each of his two sisters a legacy of between fifty and sixty thousand francs; but to the mother of his son, the singer Antonia Bianchi, of Como, only a life annuity of twelve hundred francs. Besides this he left a collection of valuable violins, Guarneris, Amatis Stradivaris, and others; last, but not least, his own instrument which he had used in all his concerts, and which he bequeathed to his native city that no other artist might use it. Some assert however that he left it to Ernst.

Paganini, besides frequent sickness and almost unspeakable physical sufferings, was the victim of the most despicable calumnies, set afloat by the many enemies who envied his success. They went so far as to accuse him of actual crimes. It was said that in his youth he had associated with robbers; that out of raging jealousy he had murdered his wife, and when he proved never to have had a wife, that it was his mistress. Some asserted that on account of his crime he had spent many years in the galleys, which accounted for his unsteady and trembling gait. Others reported that he had suffered a long imprisonment, during which, the strings of his violin breaking one by one, at length only the fourth remained, and that his wonderful performances on that string were due to this circumstance. Paris, standing at the very head of the civilized world, showed itself especially active in the propagation of these scandals. Fétis says: "There is in this city a very respectable portion of the population, which lives by the evil it does and by the good which it hinders." In his native land itself, where bandits and priests flourish, many gravely declared that he had a compact with the devil, by which, in exchange for the magic powers bestowed on him in this world, he consented to forego his happiness in the next. All these fables have indeed, since Paganini's death, been proved to be slanders and stupid superstitions, but during his life they were fully believed by many;—dear humanity credits the evil so much more readily and willingly than the good, especially when it relates to the great, the renowned, or the special favorites of fortune.

[To be Continued.]

Distant Music.

BY HENRY C. LUNN.

[From the London Musical Times.]

The genial Elia, in his paper on "Distant Correspondents," speaks so many truths which we all have felt, that we cannot but turn to it with renewed pleasure when a letter or newspaper comes to hand at our breakfast-table which for months perhaps has been travelling thousands of miles over the ocean. "Indeed," he says, addressing a friend in Sidney, "it is no easy effort to set about a correspondence at our distance. The weary world of waters between us oppresses the imagination. It is difficult to conceive how a scrawl of mine should ever stretch across it. It is a sort of presumption to expect that one's thoughts should live so far. It is like writing for posterity; and reminds me of one of Mrs. Rowe's superscriptions: 'Alcander to Strephon in the shades.'" If these ideas will steal upon us in writing or receiving a friendly letter from a distance, how much more are we open to their influence when such communication merely contains news. Elia speaks amusingly of the "now" when the word is written, and the "now" when it is read, as so widely separated in time that he can have no security that what a person states as a truth shall not before the letter reaches his friend turn into a falsehood; "and not only," he continues, "does truth, in these long intervals, un-essence herself, but (what is harder) one cannot venture a crude fiction, for the fear that it may ripen into a truth upon the voyage." The electric telegraph has of course done much for us in conveying from many distant parts of the world mere records of important events in a space of time which would astonish Charles Lamb, could he once more visit the earth; but news that will keep is still wrapped up in letters and newspapers, and sent across the sea to reach us so long after the occurrences narrated have taken place that it is often difficult to share the enthusiasm of a writer who, very probably, at the time we read his remarks has almost forgotten that he ever penned them.

Perhaps on no subject is this feeling more called forth than in that of music. A newspaper, let us say, comes to us from New Zealand, with a passage carefully marked for extract; "Last night," we are told, "an interesting performance of the 'Messiah' was given. The inclemency of the weather deterred many from coming, but those who were present were amply rewarded." Where is this "last night," when we print this; the weather has been fine and wet a dozen times since this concert; and Handel's strains, which the next morning lingered in the ears of the many who composed the audience on the occasion, have now become a thing of the past. Only a short time ago we received an account of a concert in Sidney, which was duly inserted in our journal. By the next mail came a letter, written "in great haste," correcting the name of a singer who had appeared in the performance. The "haste" with which this correction was made and despatched contrasted strangely with the cold and methodical manner in which it was packed up with hundreds of other letters in the mail-bag, conveyed over what Charles Lamb calls "the world of waters," and after being duly sorted by the post-office officials, dropped quietly into our letter-box long after any of our readers could have remembered that the concert to which the communication referred had ever been noticed. How strange, too, does it appear to read in a newspaper sent from the antipodes, that an opera troupe is about to commence a short season; to have the whole of the arrangements detailed in a prospectus, and to be perfectly aware that when this meets our eye, the season has long been over, and some other musical event is the real "news" of the place, the record of which will probably come here when it has become history there. It is like suddenly lighting upon a letter in the handwriting of a deceased friend, the well-known characters in which seem to speak to us once more with all the warmth of life.

In spite, however, of the length of time which must necessarily elapse before distant musical events can become chronicled here, it is always a real pleasure to find that the works which are loved and honored in this country are slowly, but surely, enlisting the sympathies of those who, although separated from us by a wide expanse of ocean, are in reality a part of ourselves—sprung from the same stock, and speaking the same language. Since music has ceased to be a luxury, and the greatest compositions of the greatest masters have been placed within the reach of all, musical Societies have been formed in the remotest lands, the object being to foster a love for the highest works, the demand for which is so rapidly increasing that a statement of the amount of their sale in English-speaking countries, would astonish even the most sanguine enthusiast in the cause of artistic progress. "Distant Music," therefore, it will be seen, has now become of such importance that it is in reality as necessary to insert accounts of the performance of Oratorios, Cantatas, and Operas, which have taken place many thousands of miles from our shores as to record similar events in our own Island; and if New Zealand, Australia, and America progress as they have done within the last few years, our country correspondents must not be surprised if our "Brief Summary" should become still more remarkable for its brevity when noticing their musical doings, in order to make room for the new press of matter. Meanwhile it may be interesting to glance at what our distant friends have been doing in the art within the last few years. Turning to accounts from Otago, in New Zealand, we find that the Dunedin Philharmonic Society has been for many years giving Oratorios and other works with much success. On Christmas Eve, 1863, under the direction of Mr. George R. West, the founder of the Society, the first concert took place, when Handel's "Messiah" was performed, and in 1865 the same composer's "Samson," "the work being listened to," we are informed, "with the utmost interest by the audience." At Auckland, too, we hear of a Harmonic Society giving a highly creditable presentation of Haydn's "Creation," before it had been established a twelvemonth. In Australia high-class music is making rapid progress, the visit of Mr. C. E. Horsley having no doubt tended much to further the good cause. As early as 1863 the Melbourne Philharmonic Society produced Mr. Horsley's Oratorio, "David;" and we afterwards hear of the performance of "Judas Maccabæus," the "Messiah," and several other standard works. Some idea, too, may be formed of Colonial liberality in matters musical by the following paragraph from a Melbourne paper:—"It is intended to inaugurate the Music-hall now building with a grand Inter-Colonial Musical Festival, when a new Oratorio by Mr. Charles Edward Horsley will be produced. A commission has been sent to England for a grand organ for the above hall, the sum voted by the Corporation being £4,000." We do not know whether all these intentions have been carried out, as no record has reached us giving a detailed account of the opening of the hall; but we quote the passage to show the spirit by which these artistic enterprises are animated in Australia. As an earnest of the future, we may also mention that in the prospectus of the Melbourne Philharmonic Society for the present season the works promised are Mendelssohn's "Elijah" and "Hymn of Praise," Haydn's "Seasons," Spohr's "Last Judgment," and "Israel in Egypt." The Adelaide and Sydney Philharmonic Societies are likewise in a very flourishing condition; and we constantly read of miscellaneous concerts being given in the Colony at which good music receives a very fair share of attention. New works also appear to be produced here, for in addition to the one by Mr. Horsley, mentioned above, we hear of a composition by Mr. J. Summers, Mus. Bac., Oxon, written for the inauguration of the Music Hall; and our readers will remember that Mr. Tolhurst's Oratorio, "Ruth," was performed for the first time at Prahran, a suburb of Australia. The local papers were extravagant in their praise of this latter work; and although, on its production in this country, we took leave to differ from them as to its merits, we found that the few lines we wrote, based on the announcement of its success in the journals which were forwarded to us, and of course before we could have heard a note of the composition, were reprinted as an opinion of the Musical Times. All this may be forgiven, perhaps, when we consider how difficult it is for a man to become a prophet in his own country, and how natural it is, therefore, for him to endeavor to influence a new public by bringing certificates from an old one; but composers should be cautious of allowing themselves to be influenced by the adulations of local papers. The criticisms of the provincial press in our own country are rarely written by persons at all acquainted with the art, in proof of which we may mention that in a newspaper which lately reached us, after a panegyric upon all the performers, vocal and instrumental, who took part in a concert, the writer metaphorically pats Beethoven on the back by saying that his song "Adelaide" is a composition containing many pleasant surprises."

Pursuing our researches into the state of "Distant Music," we learn that at Adelaide, a Philharmonic Society is in a prosperous condition, and at Ballarat some of the best Oratorios have been given by the "Harmonic Society" with much success. In Tasmania we also hear of excellent concerts; and, incidentally it may be mentioned (although out of the scope of our present musical survey) that at Hankow, in China, on Easter Sunday, 1869, the "Hallelujah Chorus" was sung as an anthem by three sopranos, one alto, two tenors, and two basses, and that "it went exceedingly well. At Madras, a Philharmonic Society had been some time in existence in the year 1865, and Sir Hope Grant has given 100 rupees to the "Instrument Fund." Then we have satisfactory news of the progress of the art from Natal; and at Cape Town, the "Good Hope Choral Union" is constantly performing such works as the "Messiah," "St. Paul," the "Mount of Olives," &c., a concert of the "Intermediate Tonic Sol-fa Class," under the direction of Mr. J. H. Ashley, being also spoken of in terms of much favor by a Cape-Town paper. At Port Elizabeth, too, we get reports of several musical entertainments, a "Monster concert," given in the Town-hall by Mr. Edward Newbatt, having been very largely attended, and highly successful. In the West Indies we are also informed that music is zealously cultivated, as an earnest of which it may be mentioned that the Barbados Philharmonic Society has it in contemplation to found vocal and instrumental schools. From Quebec we also receive interesting musical news; and at Montreal a series of vocal and instrumental concerts was given at Nordheimer's Hall, in 1867, followed, no doubt, by many others of an equally interesting character.

The musical events at Boston are constantly before our readers; the "Handel and Haydn Society," organized in the year 1815, chiefly for the practice of psalm tunes during the summer months, having advanced to a point of perfection in the presentation of the most classical works which renders a record of the proceedings of the Association highly interesting. The "Thomas Concerts," too, as they are called, are of such a high character as almost to put us to shame in England, where the announcement of unfamiliar works by an enthusiastic concert-giver is quite sufficient to keep our so-called music-lovers from the room. The Boston papers speak of the compositions of Wagner, Liszt, and many other modern writers as if their readers were thoroughly conversant with their merits; and in "Dwight's Journal of Music" (one of the most able critical musical periodicals ever published), in mentioning the performance of the Introduction and Finale to Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde," the writer very wisely says that, not being able to comprehend it on a single hearing, he "suspends his judgment." In New York, although the love for good music is evidently steadily on the increase, it is obvious that inferior compositions have a very large sale. We are told, for instance, that the song "Don't be angry with me, darling," as "sung by the minstrels, played by the hands, and whistled by the boys," is the "great popular melody of the United States." Then we have constantly advertised a large collection of "Temperance Songs," the mere titles of which preach a whole sermon in aid of the cause. "Don't marry a man if he drinks," "I'll marry no man if he drinks," "Father's a drunkard, and Mother is dead," "Pure cold water," "Beautiful sparkling water," "Girls, wait for a Temperance man," "Brother, don't go out to-night," if sung with sufficient depth of feeling, would convert a man given to strong liquors, we should imagine, on the spot; but as "Mr. and Mrs. Brown" (comic duet) is included in the selection, it is obvious that our Temperance friends are not averse to having a little fun over their water. Another popular song in New York is called "Make me a jacket of Pa's old coat," and the "Aint I pretty" polka, with a "splendid lithographic title, printed in colors, of a young lady arranging her toilet before a looking-glass," is quite the rage, the whole first edition having been exhausted in a few days. Sensational dance music includes directions for its use; for after advertisements of the "Golden Robin Polka," "Swinging Polka," "New Anvil Polka," and "Partridge Polka," we have this sentence:—"The Robin Polkas have sweet bird calls in them, the Swinging Polka has a swinging movement, the Anvil Polka sounds best with hammer accompaniment, and the Partridge Polka brings in the whistle of the Quail." The lists of the "most popular" instrumental music contain a strange mixture of good, bad, and indifferent; and that there exists an extraordinary confusion of tongues in the titles of some of the modern compositions may be imagined when we say that one piece is advertised as the "Cascade de Dew-drops." Energetic endeavors are made in New York to create a love for the highest order of church music; but a review in our columns a short time ago upon a collection of Hymns and Tunes for public worship, recently published in that city, will sufficiently show that the compilers of the work have been more desirous of writing down to the taste of the multitude than of attempting to raise it. We must also remark that a book called "Zion's refreshing showers," which we find extensively advertised, can scarcely appeal to people in search of healthy sacred music; and that a slight want of classification in publishers' catalogues may be too frequently seen, can be proved by the following quotation of the titles of three pieces, which occur precisely in this suc-

sion: "Cling to the crucified," "Cock-a-doodle-doo," "Cod liver oil."

There can be no question, however, that high-class music is rapidly making its way in New York, and little doubt can exist of its ultimate triumph. The success of the "Parepa-Rosa Opera Company" has, we believe, done very much towards popularizing the best lyrical works; for Mr. Carl Rosa is an artist with a real love for the task he has undertaken, and not a mere speculative caterer for the multitude. Those excellent vocalists, Miss E. Wynne, Madame Patey, Messrs. Santley, Patey and Cummings—known as the "Dolby Company"—have also had much effect in deepening the love for Oratorio music; and Mr. Santley, who remains, we believe, for some time in America, will materially strengthen the cast of all the Operas produced by Carl Rosa. We have undoubted proof, too, that the standard sacred works are gradually obtaining a very large sale; and a knowledge of the good will speedily displace the bad. America has a magnificent musical future before it, if it can only learn to blot out the word "sensational" in those grand demonstrations which the people are so eminently suited to organize. It is well known that the "Boston Peace Musical Festival," which took place in 1869, was a mild affair compared with that announced for the present year; and yet, when we find that it took place in a building 500 feet long, and 300 feet wide, and constructed to hold between 40,000 and 50,000 persons, it is difficult indeed to conceive how all these figures can be materially multiplied without setting the laws of acoustics at defiance. In the account of the Festival furnished to us at the time by a correspondent, we have some curious information respecting various portions of the performances. Gounod's "Ave Maria," we are told (based upon Bach's Prelude in C major), was exquisitely sung by Madame Parepa, but it was scarcely a desirable solo to select for a début in so colossal a building. The same vocalist also gave the solo part of the "Inflammatus," from Rossini's "Stabat Mater," but when the composition was repeated on the fourth day, the Festival had set in with all its fury, and the "solo was sung by about ten young ladies, with the utmost correctness of intonation and precision." Then the Overture to "Fra Diavolo" was given, the principal trumpet part being performed by fifty trumpeters; and also Meyerbeer's "Coronation March," with an orchestra of 1,000 musicians, although it is said of the latter work that it was "not perfect, and indeed proved nearly a failure." But the grand triumph of the Festival was reserved, as might have been expected, for the pieces especially suited to the "colossal" nature of the building. "The Star-Spangled Banner," we are informed, "proved a genuine success, and displayed to the greatest advantage the gigantic power of the grand orchestra, military bands, organs, drum corps, organ, artillery, and chiming of bells. The firing of cannons, by electricity from the conductor's stand, had really a fine effect, as the instantaneous discharge upon the first beat of each measure in the chorus, may well be compared to the striking of a large drum. The 'Anvil chorus,' from 'Il Trovatore,' by chorus, full orchestra, and artillery (outside) accompaniment, the anvil part performed upon 100 anvils by the Boston Fire Brigade, was excellent, and it was re-demanded with acclamations." (!)

Here, then, we have undoubted proof that where the building is not adapted to the music, the music must be adapted to the building; and that if we are to have an almost unlimited number of listeners, we must have an almost unlimited number of performers. Not only, therefore, must solos for a soprano voice be sung by "about ten young ladies," but every part, vocal and instrumental, must be multiplied in proportion; and anvils, sledge-hammers, and artillery, will be the "additional instruments," with which the feeble scores of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and other modern composers must be enriched for Festival use. We hope and believe that America will see how destructive is this idea to the furtherance of pure art, and that a healthy reaction will take place when renewed experiments clearly demonstrate that the real enjoyment of music is dependent upon the power of hearing the minutest details of the compositions performed. If good and healthy music is to have the prominent place in their artistic gatherings, we sincerely wish the Americans every success; but if it is to be mixed up with bells, guns, and anvils, we fervently pray that it may forever remain "distant music," and heartily bless the "world of waters" that lies between us.

The Musical Education of the Blind.

(From the London Mirror, April 6.)

It is with feelings of intense satisfaction, and in the full hopefulness of a bright and prosperous career, that we have to announce the establishment, under most influential auspices, of a Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind, which will afford blind children throughout the country, who have the requisite talents, a thorough education, especially in music, so as to qualify them to earn a living as organists, teachers, and pianoforte tuners. With all deference and respect to the benevolent who so nobly support institutions for the blind, and day by day create new ones to meet an ever-increasing want, we think we have been going too long in the old grooves, and regarding the blind as if the loss of one sense disqualified them from anything higher than mere manual labor. We have too much ignored the intellectual in our attempts to impart to them the means of earning a livelihood; and though reliance must ever be placed to a large extent on mat-making, basket-making, and such like industries, there are among this afflicted race others of far higher intellectual capacity, which only needs culture that the very best and most encouraging results may accrue. Music is ever a source of delight to the blind, and we have rare examples of their musical taste and powers, even amongst those who have had little or no opportunities of obtaining instruction in the art; nevertheless, out of the thirty thousand blind in the United Kingdom, who, as a class, are wholly or partly dependent on public or private charity, and a considerable number of whom are inmates of various institutions, not more than one per cent. of the educated blind throughout the country have ever been qualified to earn their living by the profession of music. Such was formerly the case in other countries, but the special regard paid to the higher education of the blind, and the improved systems of musical instruction adopted by various institutions abroad, have produced most gratifying results, and wherever the musical education of the blind, based on a thorough intellectual training, has been properly carried out, this art, in its various branches, has been found, after long experience, to afford by far the most remunerative occupation of which the blind are capable. Thus, in Paris, about 60 per cent. of the pupils follow the profession of music, and of these about one-half are such successful pianoforte-tuners that incomes varying from £80 to £150 are by no means unusual amongst tuners who graduate at the Paris institutions. The chief American institutions, and notably the PERKINS Institute at Boston, have also achieved great success. Both the male and female graduates earn excellent incomes as teachers, tuners, and organists, and some of the most successful of the pupils are children of poor emigrants from the United Kingdom.

Now there can be no doubt that what has been done for the blind in France and America can be accomplished in this country, and it is to achieve this object that the Normal College and Academy of Music has been founded. It will consist of three departments—namely, general education, the science and practice of music, and pianoforte-tuning, and "in every department the whole of the instruction will be directed to the practical end of preparing the blind for self-maintenance." In addition to the tuning-school in the College, other tuning-schools will be established at convenient points of London to accommodate scholars who can live at their own homes; and besides, the pupils in the Institution, day-pupils, who may reside with their parents or board with private families in the neighborhood, will be received there. But none of them will be received who have not sufficient talent to justify the expectation that they may be rendered capable of self-support—therefore a much higher percentage of successful graduates may be anticipated than in the institutions abroad, in all of which the children are admitted without reference to their ability. The college will be essentially a national institution; and in addition to generous efforts by friends of the blind in London, arrangements are being made in various large towns, including Liverpool, Manchester, Leeds, and Glasgow, to select and send a number of talented poor children to the Institution. Suitable premises have been secured within two minutes' walk of the Crystal Palace, where, by the courtesy of the directors, special facilities will be afforded the pupils for attending the instructive rehearsals and the admirable musical entertainments frequently given there. The whole practical management of the College has been placed in the hands of Mr. F. J. CAMPBELL, late musical director and resident superintendent of the PERKINS Institution, at Boston, U. S., and who, with the assistance of teachers of improved capacity and under the general supervision of the committee, will carry out the system which has been so successful in America, and which, to a considerable extent, is the result of his own experience. It is a good augury that the committee are assured of the cordial support of very many influential friends of the blind throughout the country, as well as that of several musicians. The leading pianoforte manufacturers, Messrs. BROAD-

WOOD and SONS, Messrs. COLLARD and COLLARD, and Messrs. ERARD, have also promised their co-operation in promoting the success of the musical department, and have already offered some pianos for the use of the school.

Such is the state of facts on which the committee solicit the active co-operation of the benevolent in every part of the kingdom, in order that all blind children, possessing the requisite talents, may be sought out and qualified by a suitable education to become self-supporting and useful members of society." There are, as we have said, names connected with this new movement which place it far above that suspicion which unhappily seems to attach to so many philanthropic enterprises in these days. Identified with it are the Earl of Shaftesbury, Lord Ebury, the Marquis of Westminster, the Earl of Litchfield, Lord Elliot, and Mr. W. H. Smith, M. P., as vice-presidents and trustees—it has a general council composed of gentlemen of the highest social standing, and an executive committee, with the Hon. Wm. Ashley as chairman, and the Hon. Edward P. Theiger as vice-chairman, and on which are also Dr. Armitage, Miss Gilbert, Dr. Hawkey, and other good friends of the blind—the musical committee being headed by Sir W. Sterndale Bennett. Certainly no institution was ever ushered in under more promising auspices, and there is none which ought to meet with a larger amount of practical sympathy from the benevolent people of this country. We earnestly wish it overflowing coffers, for it is, we believe, destined to supply a great want. Subscriptions and donations may be sent to the Hon. Secretary, Charles Harcourt Chambers, Esq., 2, Chesham-place, S. W.; to the Treasurer, T. R. Armitage, Esq., M. D., 33, Cambridge-square, Hyde-park; and to the bankers, Messrs. Ransom, Bouverie, and Co., 1, Pall Mall, East.

THE FETIS LIBRARY. An interesting report, presented by M. Gevaert to the Belgian Minister of the Interior, gives the following particulars with regard to this valuable collection of books and manuscripts:

"M. Féis left behind him an admirable catalogue in four divisions:—Musical History; Musical Theory; Practical Music; Literature, History and Science; these being divided and sub-divided for the purpose of classification in minute detail. The first portion of the library is very complete, especially in its biographical department: which, says Mr. Gevaert, is probably the finest ever gathered together in one and the same collection. The second division comprises most of the works on the technicalities of music which have been published since the invention of printing, together with some rare and curious manuscripts. The collection of instruction books for the library is most rich in the department of Practical Music. The missals comprise some as old as the 10th century; and among them is the famous Missal of Wurzburg (1484). Church music of the fifteenth and two following centuries is well represented, among the examples being the Patricinium Musices (7 vols.) of Orlando de Lassus. In the department of secular music is a unique collection of old madrigals, printed on separate sheets, and gathered from all parts of Europe with infinite pains. It comprises, also, a hundred manuscript scores of seventeenth and eighteenth century Italian operas; a hundred and fifty scores of French operas, from Lully to Meyerbeer; and a complete collection of music for pianoforte and organ. We envy the Belgian nation the possession of this rare treasure, and consider that 150,000 francs were never better spent than in its purchase.

CORRESPONDENCE. The following letters arrived too late for publication in our last.

PHILADELPHIA, APRIL 15.—At THEODORE THOMAS's Matinée, on Saturday, the programme was far richer than that of either of the preceding Concerts. Mozart's glorious D-major Symphony headed the list of choice selections. The heavenly Adagio received a thoroughly artistic interpretation; the Andante was also most charmingly given.

Mr. Listemann gave the Adagio and Rondo of Paganini's Concerto for violin in E-flat, with a truly artistic finish. It was a delightful performance. Wagner's "Trübsal" Overture, which has been given at every one of the seasons of Thomas's concerts, was crisply and forcibly rendered. Miss Kröbe played Beethoven's "Polonaise," op. 89, without her notes, as usual; and it was admirable. How she can retain in her mind upwards of two-hundred and fifty pieces, such as Mendelssohn's G-minor Concerto, Chopin's, Weber's, &c., all so marvellously difficult, is a mystery to most of us. The everlasting "Trübsal," Nerval's grandiloquent Lorelei paraphrase, and a Strauss Waltz closed the programme, and with it the season ended. On May 12th the Orchestra open at Central Park Garden, N. Y., for the summer concert season there, and next fall we shall have them again.

In the evening Miss JACKSON's fourth concert was given at Natatorium Hall. Here is the programme:

String Quartet, No. 8.Mozart.
Allegro vivace Minuetto. Adagio. Allegro assai.
Concerto (Serenade), Violoncello.Lindner.
Mr. Hennig.
Andante and Variations. 2 Pianos.Schumann.
Mr. Wolfsohn and Mr. Gubelmann.
String Quartet, Op. 29.Schubert.

The opening quartet was generally well given, but the common fault of the club was painfully obtrusive,—I mean lack of unity. The Adagio, however, was entirely free from this flaw, and was a smooth and skilful performance. Mr. Hennig's playing in the 'cello solo was truly beautiful; his touch was firm, and the spirit of the melody he carefully expressed. The Schumann Andante received an accurate but somewhat cold interpretation.

NEW YORK, APRIL 13.—Mr. Richard Hoffman gave the last of his Pianoforte Soirées at Chickering's Hall, March 23d, with the following programme:

Trio. Op. 97.Beethoven.
Mr. J. Burke, Mr. F. Bergner, and Mr. Hoffman.
Fantasia. "Lucerna Borgia." Op. 60.Thalberg.
Mr. Hoffman.
Three Melodies, for Violin and Piano.Molique.
Mr. Burke and Mr. Hoffman.
Air D'Église. Solo.Stradella.
Mr. Bergner.
"By the sad sea waves," and Cuban Dance. Mr. Hoffman.
R. Hoffman.
Duo Concertant on Themes from "Oberon."Benedict and David.
Mr. Burke and Mr. Hoffman.
Nocturne, le Départ and Marche D'Ély.L. de Meyer.
Mr. Hoffman.

The Beethoven Trio was given with good effect, the Andante being particularly well rendered. We have no better interpreter of Beethoven than Mr. Hoffman, and Mr. Bergner is an artist always to be relied upon. Mr. Burke plays the violin on amore, and with considerable skill, but is not always correct in his intonation. In the second part Mr. Hoffman's "Cuban Dance" was encored, and he responded with a fantasia on airs from Mignon, introducing "Non conosci il bel suol," "L'égliade rondinelle," and the Polonaise.

Messrs. Mills and Saravate gave their fourth and last matinée at Steinway Hall, March 14th. The programme was excellent, including a trio by Leffebure Wely, a Duo by Mendelssohn (Andante and Variations for Piano and 'Cello) superbly rendered by Mills and Bergner, and Chopin's Impromptu played by Mr. Mills. The vocal selections were numerous, and included songs by Beethoven, Franz, Schumann and Schubert. The vocalists were Miss Antoinette Sterling, Miss Clementine Lasser, and Mr. Geo. Simpson. The success of these matinees has been such as to demonstrate the fact that instrumental music of a high order is beginning to be appreciated here, and I trust that the number of such concerts will multiply to meet the demand.

The elegant salle Chickering was well filled last Monday evening, the occasion being the last "soirée classique" of the Onslow Quintet, an organization which has given us many pleasant concerts during the winter. This time they played Mendelssohn's Quintet in B flat [op. 87] and Mozart's Quartet in G [op. 80]. Besides this there was a very poor Sonata for piano and violin by G. Onslow, and some singing by a Quartet who seemed to imagine themselves in some large hall or cathedral which could be filled only by the greatest vocal exertion.

The Parepa-Ross-Phillips-Wachtel-Santley Opera season began on Monday, April 1st, with "Trovatore." The other representations have been "Rigoletto," "Don Giovanni," and "Les Huguenots." Of these I will give a full account in my next letter, and can only say now that the season has thus far been completely successful, the demand for tickets being greater than ever before, and the enthusiasm of the audience amounting almost to a furor.

At the fifth Philharmonic Concert, April 6th, the orchestral selections were The Eroica Symphony; Mendelssohn's Overture "Fingal's Cave," and Bargiel's "Prometheus." Mr. Bergner played a Concerto for Violoncello by Goltzman, and the Liederkreis sang a song by Frey, "Wie Kam die Liebe."

A. A. C.

Music Abroad.

London.

OPERA. The Prospectus of the Royal Italian Opera for the present season (which commenced on the 26th ult.) has an interest apart from the promises of well-known works, to be supported by well known artists; for Wagner's "Lohengrin" is the opera placed first in the list, as if indeed it were anticipated by the spirited lessee that the trial of this remarkable composer by an English jury would prove the most important event of the season. Lovers of musical progress will unite in thanking Mr. Gye for thus boldly challenging the opinion of his subscribers and the public on the "music of the future;" and although, as a mere commercial speculation, it may be a question whether it would not have been more politic to produce "Tannhäuser" first, it is certain that at least an intellectual minority will prefer to sit in judgment upon the latter development of the composer's style. The principal characters in this work will be entrusted to Madlle. Marianne Brandt, Herr Koehler, and Madlle. Emmy Zimmermann, all fresh comers to this country. An entirely new opera, called "Gelmina," composed by the Prince Giuseppe Poniatowski, in which Madame Adelina Patti will sustain the principal part, and "Il Guarany," an opera by Carlo Gomes, a young and comparatively unknown musician, produced with much success the year before last at Milan, are also promised. Amongst the works to be given during the season, one of the most attractive will undoubtedly be Auber's "Les Diamants de la Couronne," the part of Catarina by Madame Adelina Patti, and we are also glad to find that Cimarosa's sparkling little opera, "Le Astuzie Femminili," which was so well received last year, is included in the list. In addition to the names already mentioned the vocalists who will make their first appearance in England are Madlle. Albani (from the Pergola Theatre, Florence), Madame Saar (from La Scala, Milan), Signor Casari (also from La Scala), Signor Dodoni (from the Imperial Opera, St. Petersburg), and Herr Veronrath from Copenhagen). The services of Madame Pauline Lucca, Madlle. Mathilde Sessi, Madame Milolan-Carvalho, Madlle. Scaldi, Madame Monbelli, Signori Nicolini, Graziani, Naudin, Baggiolo, Cologni, and Monsieur Faure have also been secured; and the stage management will be, as usual, under the experienced direction of Mr. A. Harris. Signor Vianesi and Signor Bevigiani divide the post of conductor; and so, unfortunately, this department will be the weak point in one of the strongest programmes of arrangements yet issued from this establishment.

The Prospectus of Her Majesty's Opera, Drury Lane, promises us two works which will certainly be welcome to the subscribers, although we cannot agree with Mr. Mapleson in calling them "novelties." Cherubini's "Les Deux Journées" (which is to be produced under the title of "I Due Giornati") has never before been heard in this country; but Auber's "Les Diamants de la Couronne" is well-known here, although the libretto has not yet been forced into the Italian language; and we much regret that at both Opera houses (where the work is announced for this season) such a desecration of the composer's intention should be compulsory. The new comers at Drury Lane are Madlle. Carlotta Grossi (from Berlin), Madlle. Marie Roze (from the Opéra-comique, Paris), Signor Rota (from the Imperial Opera, St. Petersburg) and Signor Meo (from the Imperial Opera, Moscow). The company also includes Meadles, Christine Nilsson, Marie Marimon, Titiens, Colombo, and Baumeister, Madame Trebelli Bottini, Signor Fancelli, Viziani, Rinaldini, Sinigaglia, Mendioroz and M. Capoul, Signori Agnesi, Borella, Zoboli, Casaboni and Poli. Sir Michael Costa retains his post of conductor and director of the music, the principal violin being in the able hands of M. Sainton. The season is announced to commence on Saturday the 6th inst. * * * Second editions of Prospectuses, with additions, are novelties, but this year we have had one from each house. In these we are informed that Mr. Mapleson has engaged the great tenor, Signor Italo Campanini, Miss Kellogg (who is already well known here) and Madlle. Victoria Bundsen (from Stockholm); and that Mr. Gye has added Madlle. Alvine Ohm and Madlle. Caroline Smeroschi to the list of singers mentioned in his former announcement.—Mus. Times, April 1.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS. The following programme attracted a large number of the daily increasing class of lovers of good music to Sydenham on Saturday last, March 16th.

Overture, "Le Nozze di Figaro".....	Mozart.
Recit. and Air.....	Barby.
Mr. Edward Lloyd.
Recit. and Aria, "Non mi dir" (Don Giovanni).....	Mozart.
Mr. Anna Regan.
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, "In the Hungarian style".....	Joachim.
Herr Joachim.
Aria, "Und ob die Wolke" (Der Freischütz).....	Weber.
Mr. Anna Regan.
Song, "Once again".....	Sullivan.
Mr. Edward Lloyd.
Suite for Orchestra in D.....	J. S. Bach.
Songs.....	Schubert.
Mr. Anna Regan.
Overture, "Guglielmo Tell".....	Rossini.

The appearance of Herr Joachim, the emperor of violinists, was the signal for a perfect cyclone of applause, whereof the great Hungarian artist was the centre, receiving his just tribute of homage in a manner at once calm, dignified, and appreciative. Of the concerto, considered as a composition, we must speak in terms of warm praise. According to Mr. G. A.

Macfarren, some characteristic features of the Hungarian music are (1) a syncopated repetition of the tonic followed by the leading note (and the tonic again) in the "full-closes." (2) A frequent employment of figures founded on the lower notes of the harmonic series, this latter procedure being probably suggested by the horn used in pastoral districts. (3) "The scale which prevails from the Dannon to the Caucasus, and is in use in Persia, remarkable for two augmented seconds," between the 3d and 4th and 6th and 7th, both in ascending and descending. (4) The frequent use made of passages wherein the second note of each pair is three times the length of the first: e. g., a semiquaver followed by a dotted quaver. We should say that the above is taken in substance from a quotation in the "Analytical Remarks." The music as such is original, clever, and interesting, with a marked tendency towards the modern German school. The orchestration is throughout the work of a master hand. The horns play a very prominent part: to them are allotted several passages by no means easy to execute on that very uncertain instrument. The work was most heartily applauded. Bach's Suite was in striking contrast to the concerto: his music, so to speak, and that not irreverently, has been preserved in hermetically sealed canisters, such as are in use in Arctic expeditions, so wondrous fresh does it appear. It consists of five movements: Overture, Air, Gavotte, Bourrée, and Gigue. The orchestra employed in the original score consists entirely of the strings, oboes, three trumpets, and drums. The trumpet parts, now unplayable, have been simplified by Mendelssohn, and a clarinet has been introduced by him in the Gigue. With these comparatively slender materials, and without much modulation, the grand old Cantor, by his matchless contrapuntal skill and consummate genius, has succeeded in producing effect, and that, too, by no means devoid of variety. Mr. Lloyd was very successful in Mr. Barnby's somewhat honeyed, but ingeniously treated effusion, and in Sullivan's song. Miss Regan, a German we surmise, was quite refreshing after the miserable failures of one or two ladies who have appeared at the Palace during the 19th century. When will singers learn that an easy song, within their compass, well rendered, is infinitely preferable to, and a hundredfold more effective than one which unduly taxes their powers, in other words which they cannot sing? Miss Regan is more commendable in this respect than many vocalists: moreover, she sings with refinement. Her voice, however, is hardly strong enough for such a room. For the next concert we are promised a MS. Symphony, by T. Wingham. Bennett's Pianoforte Concerto, in E flat, and other "delicacies of the season."—Choir, March 23.

The 24th Concert, April 6, presented the following scheme.

Overture, "Fidello".....	Beethoven.
Song, "Deh! non voler costringere" (Anna Bolena).....	Donizetti.
Mme. Bentham-Fernandes.
Symphony in C, No. 9.....	Schubert.
Song, "Oh! cara Immagine" (Plauto Magico).....	Mozart.
Mr. Bentham
Scene, "Infelice".....	Mendelssohn.
Miss Abbie Whinery (her first appearance).
Pianoforte Concerto in D (Coronation).....	Mozart.
Herr Carl Reinecke.
Duet, "Ah morir potessi adesso" (Ernani).....	Verdi.
Mme. Bentham-Fernandes and Mr. Bentham.
Festival Overture, "Friedensfeier" (introducing "See the Conquering Hero Comes," and "Nun danket alle Gott.").....	Reinecke.

[Conducted by the Composer.]

Herr Reinecke, Kapellmeister of Leipzig, is known to the musical world of Europe as a fine artiste and gifted musician. He has written some 100 works; his pianoforte quartet in E flat (with andante in C sharp minor) was produced for the first time last May at the "Musical Union" concerts, where Herr Reinecke, on Tuesday next, will play his pianoforte trio in D. His easy, polished style, neat manipulation, and delicate touch, could hardly have found a more fitting medium for exposition than in Mozart's "Coronation" Concerto in D, so called, because it was played by Mozart himself, at Frankfurt, in October 1790, when Leopold II. acceded to the imperial throne of Germany.

Herr Reinecke introduced two elaborate cadenzas, at the close of the first and third movements, based on themes of the text and elaborately worked out. We note the Kapellmeister's predilection for sequences of thirds and sixths; nor does he forget the fine discord of the diminished seventh. Of Herr Reinecke's own Fest-Overture in G (conducted by himself), we cannot speak in glowing language. The overture must be pronounced pompous and pretentious. We may not speak of plagiarism, seeing the work is avowedly based on the well-known German hymn-tune or chorale, "Nun danket alle Gott," and Handel's "See the Conquering Hero Comes," the latter strain being introduced by the horn, not in G (the original key of the chorus), but in A flat. The trumpets of course are not spared. The two themes are afterwards ingeniously worked together, and interwoven. Herr Reinecke can do better by far.—Mus. Standard.

ORATORIO. Elijah was the work selected for interpretation at the Oratorio Concert on Wednesday evening at Exeter Hall. The principals, who showed in force, were Mr. Sims Reeves and Mr. Nordblom; Mme. Rudersdorff and Miss Emily Spiller; Mme. Bentham-Fernandes and Miss Dines; and Mr. Whitney, (of Boston, U. S. A.) who has rapidly made his way with the English public, and who on this occasion replaced, without disadvantage, Herr Stockhausen, incapacitated by a severe cold. The familiar music was rendered by these ladies and gentlemen with adequate efficiency, and the customary points were made. The double quartets were well taken, and the choral effects generally were sustained with due steadiness. Mr. Barnby conducted as usual.—Orch. April 12.

BACH'S ST. JOHN PASSION. The Athenæum, March 30, under the head of "Lenten Concerts," says:

The name of John Sebastian Bach has been so associated with his 'Grosse Passionmusik nach dem Evangelium Matthæi,' for two orchestras and two choirs, that his more simple, but not less subtle, setting of the Passion according to St. John has been overlooked. The palm of superiority has been awarded to the St. Matthew version, and Mendelssohn greatly strengthened this opinion by his successful revival of the work, in 1829, at Berlin. Sir Sterndale Bennett and Mr. Hullah took much the same view as Mendelssohn, and the successive performances of the St. Matthew Passion in Exeter Hall and St. James's Hall, in Westminster Abbey, and last autumn at the Gloucester Musical Festival, seemed to confirm previous impressions; but we shall be much mistaken if Bach's 'Johannes-Passion,' executed for the first time in this country at the Hanover Square Rooms on the 22d inst., does not eventually take the higher place in public estimation. We are indebted to Mr. Barnby, who conducted the composition, for being the pioneer of art on this memorable occasion. The revival of Bach's work will tend to remove those scruples which exist against the presentation of the personality of Christ in music, as if there could be profanation in the Saviour singing instead of speaking: the Gospel can be said or sung with equal devotional feeling; there is no more blasphemy in notation than in the pencil of the painter, who paints Christ, apostles and angels. No congregation in church or cathedral ever listened with greater solemnity and devoutness than the audience assembled in the Hanover Square Rooms at the morning concert of yesterday week (Friday.) The execution of the music was not very uniform, for Miss Julia Elton, the contralto, and Herr Stockhausen, the basso, had to be replaced at the shortest notice by Miss Dones and Mr. Thurlly Beale. Then Mr. Arthur Wade, the amateur tenor, charged with the important part of the Evangelist, was timid, hesitating, and subdued, instead of being dramatically emphatic, dignified and impressive, as the narrator of the awful events of the Crucifixion. Mr. Wade sang carefully and conscientiously; but it will require the highest declamatory powers to do full justice to the music of St. John. Miss Banks was the soprano, and the Rev. Mr. Harvey, an amateur, had the music of Pilate and Peter. In the St. John Passion a single choir alone is required, the music is for four voices, the organ is used chiefly for the recitatives, but the orchestra has its duty in the accompaniments. The Gospel narrative begins with the betrayal of Jesus by Judas Iscariot, follows the incidents of the denial by Peter, the scene with Pilate, the cries of the Jews for the Crucifixion, the division of the garments, the agony on the cross, and the final requiem, "Rest here in peace." The graphic power of the composer throughout this series is most remarkable; the incidental choruses of the populace depicting their savage intent, such as the marvellously exciting "Crucify" and "Let us not divide," contrast with the tenderness and pathos of the choral tunes; the latter so fresh, so varied, so touching, and often so sublime. The solos are of greater force, prominence, and interest than in the St. Matthew. There were necessarily curtailments on the 22d, but the leading soprano, contralto, tenor and basso, have each in turn airs of surpassing beauty. The tenor has florid passages of bravura to execute, requiring almost a violin to do full justice to them. It is difficult to listen to some of the strains without emotion: the turns in the words "wept bitterly" and the intensity of the pathos in "It is finished," indicate the genius of Bach: he must have felt deeply what he noted, for the elements of expression are often overwhelming in their influence. The 'Johannes Passion' is not crowded with such complexities as the St. Matthew; there is nothing in the concerted pieces to dismay choral societies. It, as well as the St. Matthew, ought to be scored by a master-hand, to adapt the two services for execution on a large scale by our oratorio associations and by the forces gathered at festivals; for the day is arriving when the repertory of sacred music must be extended, and the gems of the old writers, be they German, be they Italian, which have been so long lying dormant in libraries, will be welcomed by the fast-increasing body of intelligent and cultivated amateurs.

Last Tuesday the St. Matthew Passion was again performed in Westminster Abbey, with full band and chorus, thanks to the tolerant and liberal spirit evinced by Dean Stanley.

This Passion Week has been signalized by performances in Exeter Hall of Handel's 'Messiah' on Wednesday and Thursday, The Sacred Harmonic Society's fortieth annual performance of the work took place on the 27th, conducted by Sir Michael Costa, with Mesdames E. Wynne and Patey, and Messrs. Vernon Rigby and Whitney as principal vocalists. The National Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. G. W. Martin, on the 28th, had as solo singers Mesdames M. Scott and Palmer, Messrs. Vernon Rigby and Lander.

The programme of the Good Friday Sacred Concert at the Crystal Palace was composed of the customary pieces, the great feature being the singing by the vast auditory of the Evening Hymn. The leading singers announced were Mesdames Sherrington, Rudersdorff, Peschka-Lentner, and Patey, Signor Foli, Mr. Whitney, and Mr. Sims Reeves.

CHAMBER CONCERTS. The Director's benefit night (Mr. A. Chappell) closed the season of the Monday Popular Concerts, on the 25th inst. The artists were Mesdames Schumann, Norman-Neruda, MM. Joachim, Ries, Straus, Piatti; Sir Julius Benedict accompanist, and Madame Sherrington vocalist. Master Le Jeune also performed on the organ.

At the fifth of the Saturday Evening Concerts, on the 23d inst., Herr Hugo Heermann, from Frankfurt, led in Haydn's string Quartet in D major, Op. 64, No. 1, with Messrs. June, R. Blagrove, and Paque as his colleagues. He also ably took the violin part in Beethoven's Trio in E flat, Op. 1, No. 1, with Mr. W. Ganz pianist, and M. Paque violoncellist. Mozart's pianoforte and string Quartet in G minor was included in the scheme. Mesdames Liebhardt and Demeric Labache were the singers, and Signor Randerger accompanist.

PESTE. A correspondent of the London Musical Standard, April 13, writes:

Great was the stir created in musical circles, both here and in Vienna, when the Abbé Liszt was prevailed upon to announce his intention of once more appearing in public, and such was the demand for tickets, that notwithstanding the price of them was trebled and quadrupled, the lists had to be closed before even a fourth of the applicants had received their allotments. The "prima of pianistes," as the celebrated Abbé is wont to be called by his admiring countrymen, the fiery Hungarians, had been so long living a life of retirement, that many could hardly believe the news when they were told that Franz Liszt, the great composer, the distinguished pianoforte virtuoso, and the favored guest of royalty, was again going to be heard in public. True it was, however, and his concert came off with unparalleled success, the evening being nothing but a series of enthusiastic ovations in his honor. Not only were the Emperor of Austria and several other members of the Imperial family present, but the flower of the Hungarian nobility were there to welcome the compatriot of whom they are all so proud.

The Abbé was most ably supported by two other performers, namely Madame Pauli Markories as vocalist, and by Herr E. von Mikalorich as assistant pianist. The Abbé appeared in his usual sedate garb, namely, the cassock of a Catholic priest, and with a magnificent gold chain hanging around his neck, no doubt the insignia of an Austrian order. Two pianofortes were placed upon the elevation which replaced the ordinary stage of the locale, the so-called "Redouten Saal," which was tastefully decorated for the occasion. The instrument intended for the use of the Abbé was adorned with flowers and laurel wreaths, and magnificently ornamented. The programme comprised the following selection:—

Beethoven's Sonata, for pianoforte, C-sharp minor. Liszt.
Nos. 1, 3, and 6 of "Fruenlebe und Lust".....Schumann.
Mme. Pauli Markories.
Prelude, Nocturne and Polonaise of Chopin's.....Liszt.
"Es mus ein Wunderbares sein" and "Wieder mocht ich dir begegnen".....Liszt.
Mme. Pauli Markories.
Nocturne dans le style Hongrois.....Abranyi.
Franz Liszt.

Grand Fantasia for two pianofortes.....Schubert.
Franz Liszt, and second piano, Herr E. von Mikalorich.

The critic of the "Hungarian Lloyd's" asks who can play like the "prince of pianistes?" As long as he was still in the flowing stream of active public life no one could aspire to a comparison with him. Men like Thalberg, Döhler, and Dreyschock, were obliged to give way to his superior powers.

And now, at the concert in question, he seemed to draw with magnetic influence his audience into a charmed circle in which they lay entranced, such was the power of his rendering of Beethoven's Sonata. The same may be said of Chopin's three pieces, and out of Abranyi's nocturne he created quite an imposing work. It was the same Liszt of former days, and however finely his three pupils Rubinstein, Bülow, and Tausig may play, or have played, their master is still their master.

Of the improvisation his performances created, it can only be said, that never has the "Redouten Saal" held such a crowded audience, and never have its walls resounded with such applause as fell to the lot of the dignified old Abbé, as he bowed his venerable head in silent acknowledgment of the tribute paid to him from every nook and corner of the building.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 4, 1872.

Concerts.

MR. B. J. LANG'S SYMPHONY CONCERTS. The second and third of these attractive "Thursday Afternoons,"—supplementing in some sense, in a smaller hall, the larger Symphony Concert season at the Music Hall—have shown improvement in the orchestral performance and increase of interest. The second (April 18), enlisting twofold personal sympathies by the appearance as solo pianists of two of the concert-giver's young disciples, offered the following programme:

Symphony in A No. 7.....Beethoven.
Toco sostenuto; vivace—Allegretto—Scherzo, presto,
—Allegro con brio.
Concertstueck in G minor, Op. 33.....Carl Reinecke.
Allegro—Lento ma non troppo—Allegro.
Mr. R. C. Dixey.
Aria and Gavotte from the Suite in D minor.....J. S. Bach.
Bourrée from Concerto in F minor, No. 4 Op. 19.
Wm. Sterndale Bennett.
Mr. William F. Apthorp.
Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn.

Beethoven's Seventh was rather a large Symphony for an orchestra of thirty; yet for the most part it was remarkably well rendered and appreciated. Indeed in positive, clear outline, in accuracy of detail, in the distinct and palpable contribution of each instrument, in fine vitality of accent, in free and buoyant onward movement to the end, it brought the glorious creation nearer than ever to us. That wonderful "opening of the heavens" in the midst of the Scherzo's revelry, that sublime episode, the Trio, was made uncommonly impressive by the marked sfirz ando and diminuendo imparted always to the leading phrase. What was most wanting was a greater mass of strings to subdue the individualities of wood and brass so craint in the little room. By sitting further back we found the general effect considerably less blurred by reverberation, except in the loud tutti passages. Mendelssohn's fairy Overture was capitally played, sending us out into the garish, actual light of day from such a beautiful ideal world, that the sudden contrast was a little cruel.—But, after all, the most ideal thing, the moment of the purest, most harmonious life, with sense of perfect health in it, was found in the Aria and Gavotte of Bach. That was the special gem of the performance,—suited to the place, as being at once Orchestral and Chamber music. It was especially enjoyable in this way.

Mr. DIXEY was received with warm signs of favor, and in the rendering of the principal (pianoforte) part of the Concert-Piece by Reinecke evinced no lack either of force or delicacy, of good sound technique or expression. The composition itself, however, in spite of some fine passages, was not very edifying. Some of its themes are common-place and trivial,—one of them inviting into every mind a haunting polka tune, such as we seek refuge from in concerts of good character. We cannot doubt that the Leipzig Kapellmeister has done far better things than this.—Mr. APTHORP's selection was of a less pretentious and altogether graceful, pleasing character; one of the happiest characteristic moments of the young days of Sterndale Bennett. Not demanding any high degree of execution,—except that it grows a little tacking toward the end,—it showed the taste and musical intelligence and feeling of the ardent young interpreter to good advantage. And it is always pleasant when music as music, however simple, frees us from all distracting reference to personal triumph over outward difficulties. From this point of view we may be allowed to suggest whether Mozart's pianoforte Concertos would not be particularly appropriate and in every best sense rewarding in just such half Symphony, half Chamber Concerts as those of Mr. Lang.

The third programme (April 25) was indeed a lovely one:

Overture to "Fingal's Cave,".....Mendelssohn.
Symphony in G minor.....Mozart.
Allegro Molto—Andante—Minuetto—Finale.
Concerto for Pianoforte in E♭, No. 6.....Beethoven.
Allegro.—Adagio un poco mosso.—Rondo allegro.
Mr. H. G. Tucker.
Overture to "The Naiads,".....Wm. Sterndale Bennett.

Mendelssohn's romantic Overture was fresh and rich and deep as ever, full of the vague seashore feeling of the infinite. The reed instruments said pungently and clearly each just what it had to say; and the wild mysterious trumpet tone, over and anon resounding loudly through the mingled harmonies, was very effective. A more perfect type of the true symphony, in form and genius, than Mozart's in G minor, is not to be found;—a fact so often recognized as to have become a truism. And this was a symphony better suited than the most for the small room and orchestra. It all came out smoothly and clearly, furnishing as genial a half hour of pure, ideal musical experience as one could wish. This is "pure" music, in which you are not asked to know or think of aught outside of music.

And now for something more exciting, great, heroic, "himmelhoch juchzend," heaven-storming in the best sense, not of upstart audacity, not of brazen-faced, fierce, physical onslaught, as with the modern "effect" mongers, who would fain bally the world into the belief that they have gone beyond Beethoven, but in the sense of real lofty inspiration from within! Now for the "emperor" Concerto, as the English call the last and greatest of the five by Beethoven! It had been kept from public hearing for about a year, and so was doubly welcome. As the robust, tall youth sat down at the piano, a picture of health and strength, handsome withal and looking innocently happy in his task, we thought of the strong runner in some old Olympian foot race,—only this was to be a hand race! As soon as seen he had his room, full of warmly predisposed abettors; and never did young knight enter the lists amid a fairer crowd or more inspiring eyes. Mr. TUCKER, we are told, is very young. For the completest technical mastery of the piano he seems to possess every gift of organization, as he soon showed by his firm, even, clear, and well-nigh faultless rendering of this difficult Concerto. Nor could he have achieved a tithe of his success in it, had he not also had both musical enthusiasm and strong intelligence. We have heard finer, subtler renderings of the work, more steeped in poetry, more reproduced out of the interpreter's own deep experience, more intense, but seldom a more honest one. There were no affectations, no sentimental overdoing of the ritardando, no attempt to seem to feel more than one need to feel at this point or at that; but it went evenly and firmly through, without faltering, without false effect, and with good light and shade. If you call it a lesson, it was at least well learned. What further special practice and, still more, experience of art and life may yet develop out of such frank and wholesome energies, must surely be worth looking forward to. —Bennett's "Naiad's" Overture, perhaps the happiest creation from his graceful pen in his fresh period, made a good pendant to Mendelssohn's "Hebrides,"—sufficiently in contrast too with that, and an enjoyable conclusion to the Concert, for which the pleasant Mechanics' Hall was more than ever thronged with listeners.

Mr. Lang's fourth and last Concert (this week)—of which we shall speak next time—passes fairly over into the domain of Chamber Music, dispensing with full orchestra and offering the following selections: Hummel's Pianoforte-Septet (played by Mr. G. W. Sumner); Beethoven's Septet; Concerto for three pianofortes in C, Bach, (played by Mr. G. A. Adams, Mr. G. W. Sumner, and Mr. H. G. Tucker.)

CHAMBER CONCERTS.—Here is the programme of a Soirée given at Wesleyan Hall, April 10, by the Boston Conservatory of Music, JULIUS EICHBERG director:

Fantasia, Hummel.
Miss E. M. Shumway.
"Al desio di chi t'adora," Mozart.
("Norma di Figaro.")
Mrs. Chas. Lewis.
Violin Solo, Souvenir de Bellini, Artot.
Master A. van Raalte.
Fantasia-Stück, Aufschwung, Schumann.
Miss Martha Graham.
"Rose Softly Blooming," Spohr.
Mrs. Charles Lewis.
Marche Triomphale, for two Pianos, Gorla.
Mrs. Waagatt and Miss Gertrude Miller.

With the exception of the vocalist, the performers were pupils of the institution and acquitted themselves in a way that showed ability and sound instruction. Master VAN RAALTE, younger even than Miss Persis Bell, seems almost as remarkable for the ease and freedom with which he handles his violin in music of difficulty, and for true intonation, phrasing and expression. Mrs. CHARLES LEWIS is an English lady who has been for several years a pupil of Garcia, and has lately made her residence in Boston. She has a musical, clear voice, of good power, evenly developed, and sings with refined style and expression. Her songs called forth warm marks of approbation.

A private Matinée in aid of the great Homeopathic Hospital Fair last week, but which we were unable to attend, claims recognition for its choice programme, as well as by the good accounts we hear of the performance, which was all by amateurs,—mostly musically gifted and devoted ladies,—with the exception of the aid of two of the brothers SUOK for violin and cello. There were the selections:

Sonata, for Violin and Piano, Op. 30, No. 3, Beethoven.
Allegro assai.—Allegretto moderato. Allegro vivace.
Song, Blumenthal.
Ninth Violin Concerto, (first movement), Spohr.
Piano Solo, { Scherzo, Op. 20. } Chopin.
{ Nocturne, Op. 15, No. 2. }
Song, Wallace.
Trio, for Piano, Violin and Violoncello. Op. 99, Schubert.
Allegro moderato—Andante.—Scherzo.—Rondo.

"LOHENGRIN." A novel and interesting entertainment was that given by Mr. R. C. DIXEY, in a semi-private way, with the aid of amateur performers, last Saturday evening at Mechanic's Hall. It consisted of well connected specimens from every act of Wagner's second opera, counting Tannhäuser as the first after the promulgation of his new doctrine of the Opera as the Art-work of the Future. Of course, the most musical pieces had to be selected, those in which Wagner is not altogether unlike more familiar composers. For the Opera itself is such a great spectacular, dramatic whole, full of stage pomp and splendor, that as we try to recall our impression of it at the Berlin Royal Opera eleven years ago, we can hardly think of the music as a separable and independent entity; it seemed for the most part like mere background and accompaniment, an element on which the drama floated. A uniform nobility and purity of tone pervaded it; together with a mysticism which made it seem only half real and abstract, as if you were rather dreaming it than actually hearing and beholding. What we recall most vividly is the perpetual ringing, shivering clang of herald's trumpets making proclamation. Pre-eminently Wagner's is the music of splendid pomp and ceremonial,—the music of ambition; this, and that abstract, shadowy element of romance, seem to make up its individuality. Wonderful skill in instrumentation, startling and beautiful effects, stupendous climax, he has always at command.

But the long stretches of recitative, with the bits of instrumentation during and between them, give it all a certain slow and drowsy character, despite the splendor; speaking of the opera as a whole (and we have found it the same with other operas of Wagner), there is a lack of "go" to it, it does not move; you are continually delayed by indefinite and hesitating bits of symphony or interlude; and though each fragment may have beauty in detail, it does not seem to bear you on. As a general thing, we should say that there is a great lack of heart in Wagner's music. It is ingenious and artificial in the extreme; its inspiration is ambition. With all its splendor and its power it somehow lacks vitality.

But there are some numbers in Lohengrin which are beautiful as music. The orchestral introduction is one; the wedding procession, the little chorus of attendants to the bridal chamber; the introduction to the third act, and the mustering of the knightly forces in the finale,—which the Thomas orchestra gave us,—are all fine in their way. Best thing of all in it, perhaps, is the long scene between Elsa and Lohengrin in the bridal chamber. The instrumental parts are sketched as well as might be on a piano by Mr. DIXEY, aided by Mr. TUCKER. The three principal solo rôles (Elsa, Lohengrin and the King) were sung quite admirably by amateurs with excellent voices; (the evil characters, Ortrud and Telramund, being omitted altogether). And for the choruses, some of which were charming, and all finely sung, in German, there was a select choir of four ladies and eight gentlemen. The evening will be remembered with much pleasure.

NEXT WEEK. We ask particular attention to the concert of Mr. KUTZLER, the excellent oboist of the Harvard Concerts and of the Globe Theatre, at Mechanics' Hall next Thursday afternoon, at 3 o'clock. For the sake of a good orchestra, we ought to offer all inducement to such artists to remain in Boston; a good oboe is hard to get and harder still to keep. Mr. LEONHARD, Mr. EICHBERG and Mr. HARTDGEN will assist, and the concert will be a very choice one.

Miss ANNIE LOUISE CARY, the popular and excellent Contralto of the Nilsson troupe, gives a farewell Concert at the Music Hall next Wednesday evening, which will no doubt be thronged. Miss Cary will sing from Semiramide, Mignon, &c., and will have the aid of Miss BEEBE, soprano, Miss PERSIS BELL, the remarkable young violinist, Mr. S. B. MILLS, the distinguished pianist, and the Temple Quartette. All our music lovers will feel an interest in the concert of one of the most charming and accomplished of our own native singers, who stands so high among true artists on the lyric stage.

NEW YORK, APRIL 29. The season of Italian Opera, which began at the Academy on Monday April 1st, and ended last Saturday, was in many respects the most remarkable which has ever been known in New York. Formerly, a manager, having secured a "star" Prima Donna whose name was sufficient to "draw" the too easily deluded public, was wont to repair the financial breach resulting from this outlay by engaging, for her (so called) support, some weakly sentimental tenor, a broken down bass and a badly selected and untrained chorus.

The American public is proverbial for its good-natured endurance of certain forms of imposition—hence its meek endurance of performances in which the tragedy was mirth-provoking and the comedy dismal enough to shroud the listeners in profound gloom; performances so untrue, both to art and to nature, that the hearers might well have joined with those who consider Opera as a nondescript production, the very existence of which is to be regretted. The fact that under such management Opera remained a weakling is not surprising.

But last winter we experienced an operatic revival, which began as soon as it became known that the greatest of lyric artists was to appear at the Academy with the support of singers whose merit was generally known and acknowledged. Mr. Strakosch undertook to give his patrons an adequate return for their money. The idea was original and novel and it "took," despite the failure of the management to fulfill, in all respects, that which is promised. It remained for Messrs. ROSA and NEWENDORFF to complete the reform, so well begun, by securing, not only first class artists for all the principal rôles,—but, also a well trained and efficient chorus,—and by banishing from the stage a part, at least, of that time-worn scenery which, by reason of its antiquity, we had come to regard with feelings akin to awe. Of course all this involved increased outlay, which was met by fixing the price of seats at Five dollars; by far the highest rate ever known here, or any where else, to the best of my belief.

The Opera, for the opening night, was Il Trovatore, with the following cast: Mme. Parepa Rosa as Leonera, Miss Adelaide Philipps as Azucena, Wachtel as Manrico, and Santley as Count de Luna. Need it be said that even this worn and worthless Opera was galvanized into life and so superbly rendered that it was listened to with pleasure by all? Mme. Rosa had not quite recovered from an affection of the throat, from which she had been suffering, and showed signs of fatigue, particularly in the "tower scene;" but so popular has she become, that her best efforts were accepted by the audience, with every token of admiration and, even in those parts where she was less successful, she was encouraged by applause and floral offerings. Miss Philipps made one of the best Azucenas I have ever heard; and Wachtel electrified the audience with his high C in "Di quella pira." I have not space enough to speak critically of his merits, which are well known to most of your readers, but his singing seems to be phenomenal rather than artistic. With Santley it is different, for he joins to a deep, rich voice, every tone of which is full, rounded and complete, a culture only to be attained by long years of hard study and patient practice. It is plain, too, that his first thought is always for the music he is singing, and not for his audience, nor for himself. In every sense he is a true artist and he seems to be thoroughly appreciated here.

The Trovatore was followed by Rigoletto, Don Giovanni, Martha, and Lucrezia Borgia: representations which I have not space to describe, but can say that they were thoroughly successful and drew crowded houses. Two Operas were produced which deserve special mention. They are Les Huguenots and William Tell. In the former the principal parts were distributed as follows: Valentine, Mme. Parepa-Rosa; Urbain, Miss Philipps; Marguerite de Valois, Miss Graziella Ridgeway; Raoul, Mr. Theodore Wachtel; Count St. Bris, Mr. Charles Santley; Marcello, Mr. Ryse; Duc de Nevers, Mr. Cook.

It is to be regretted that this really grand Opera is so little known here, for it is one which can be heard many times to advantage. The first performance, which took place on Friday evening, was, in certain respects, unsatisfactory. Mr. Ryse, who took the important rôle of Marcel, was utterly unable to fill it properly, and his bad singing was a great blemish in the performance. Miss Ridgeway was also unsatisfactory as Marguerite de Valois, her voice being weak and thin, and her style lacking dignity. The rôle needs a voice like that of Mlle. Leon Duval. The chorus and orchestra were fair;—the former might have been improved. Mme. Rosa sang with her usual earnestness and purity of style, and was positively grand in the great fourth act. Wachtel sang with his usual effect, and Santley was superb in the "Benediction des poignards," which was about the only opportunity he had for making himself heard.

There were two representations of Les Huguenots and two of William Tell, of which the cast was as follows: "Mathilde," Mme. Parepa-Rosa; "Jemmy," Miss Doria; "Arnold," Mr. Wachtel; "Tell," Mr. Santley; "Fisherman," Mr. Tom Karl; "Walter," Mr. Cook; "Gessler," Mr. Hall; "Melchthal," Mr. Ryse. The performance was one of the best I have ever heard; and even had it been otherwise, the music is so beautiful that we should forget to criticize the performance. The rôle of Tell gave Mr. Santley ample opportunity for the display of his splendid voice, and in the "apple" scene he showed a dramatic talent for which he does not usually get credit. The rôle of Mathilde was a small one for an artist like Parepa-Rosa, but the cast was strengthened and the performance greatly improved by her excellent singing and beautiful appearance.—She showed that no rôle is really insignificant when it is well filled.

This evening Miss NILSSON takes leave of New York by a benefit at the Academy. The programme consists of an Operatic Melange comprising the first act of Traviata, the second act of Lucia, the first scene of the second act of Trovatore, and the last act of Hamlet. Miss Nilsson has made herself thoroughly beloved to all who have any comprehension of music, and she is sure to be long and kindly remembered, even by those who do not wholly appreciate her great genius.

Tomorrow night the Academy will be the scene of another representation hardly less extraordinary, which will comprise the first act of the "Postilion of Longjumeau," including the "whip song" by Wachtel in German. Then English Opera: second act of the "Bohemian Girl," with Parepa-Rosa, (Santley, and Tom Karl; followed by Italian Opera: second act of Trovatore with Miss Phillips, Wachtel and Santley; and concluding with the fourth act of Les Huguenots, (Parepa-Rosa, Wachtel, Santley &c.) This terminates a season the success of which is unparalleled.

Notice of miscellaneous concerts must be brief. Mr. JOHANN HEINRICH BONAWITZ has given two classical matinees (piano) at Steinway's, (April 10 & 24), which are very highly spoken of. His forte is transcription. Sig. ALFREDO BARILI is giving a series of pianoforte matinees at Chickering Hall. Mr. BERGMAN's Annual Concert at Steinway's (Apr. 25.) and the exhibition of the "Engel Organ" at the Union League Theatre deserve extended mention, which I will try to give them in my next letter.

Nowadays, it is supposed that no singer will remain a baritone who can possibly become a tenor; but Mr. ARTHUR MATHISON is "going back on himself" in an extraordinary way; for he is cultivating his baritone, and, to judge from his rendering of an air from "Dinorah," at the reunion of the "Lotus Club" last Saturday night, he is amply justified in so doing. This, by the way, was the last of these pleasant reunions for the season; among the musical features of the evening was a violin solo by CHRISTIAN SUCKOW, the "Hardanger Violinist." A. A. C.

PHILADELPHIA, APRIL 26.—On Monday, the 15th, the Strakosch Troupe opened at the Academy of Music for a season of six performances. Mlle. Nilsson appeared in every opera but one. The opening opera was Donizetti's Lucia di Lammermoor. The huge building was densely crowded with a remarkably musical audience, for I never saw so much attention given to the stage and so little whispering at an Opera. Mlle. Nilsson, from beginning to end, was a thorough Lucia, and the different trials the poor girl suffered for her unhappy love were exquisitely depicted. The Arias: "Reguava" in D minor, and the "Ardon gli occhi," with the flute obligato, were rendered in a style that forbids criticism. Brignoli's Edgar was rather better than we have seen or heard from him for many years. In the death song: "Tu che a Dio," his singing was grand. In the duet "Verrano a te," he was also very good. "Chi mi Ferra" was very well rendered. The orchestra were a little hazy, however. M. Barré sang the Henry. On Wednesday Guonod's Faust. On this occasion M. Capoul made his first appearance. In the Aria "Salvati dimora," his singing was very fine; he is somewhat inclined to overact. The part of Marguerite found a most appropriate interpreter in the person of Miss Nilsson, and her singing and acting in the part far exceed any we have ever had here. In the church scene, after the death of Valentine, her acting was sublime. M. Jamet was a very fine Mephisto. Miss Cary did everything there was to be done in the ungracious part of Siebel. M. Barré as Valentine acted well, but his voice is too light, and he is given to singing out of tune. The orchestra was rather better, but the chorus needed close watching to keep them straight.

On Thursday evening "Mignon" was given here for the first time. Miss Canessa was substituted for Miss Duval in the part of Felina. The opera itself is not strikingly full of rich music, nor on the other hand is it full of objectionable music—its character is rather negative. The song "Kensst du das Land" is so subdued and so mild that Miss Nilsson's exquisite singing in it only saved it from being called poor stuff. The Aria of Guglielmo in the third act, and the duet for Lothario and Mignon are the best numbers of the Opera. Nilsson's acting was truly artistic; for every different emotion and sentiment she carefully and successfully presented. I think her agony of jealousy in the second act and her petulant envy in Filina's room are two specimens of histrionic talent difficult to equal. Capoul was capital as Guglielmo, and his singing in his solo in the third act was most excellent. Jamet as the old Harper was full of tenderness mingled with the dignity attendant upon his former high position. M. Capoul on Friday night made his farewell appearance in America. Aubert's Fra Diavolo was the opera. It is in a fair way to be worn out, this Fra Diavolo, for it cannot bear much repetition. In the serenade "L'Agnes," M. Capoul did not sing nearly so well as usual; he sang it half a tone higher than the score—and consequently had to use this falsetto voice. In the third act he was very good. His "Proudly and Wide" he sang with a fire and snap which seem to be distant from the idea Mr. Santley has of Fra Diavolo. The Opera was somewhat out, as M. Capoul had to leave here at midnight to sail on the following day. Of all the three characters I saw him impersonate, I think Guglielmo is the best; for in Faust he is too strong—too boisterous in his love; while in Guglielmo he seems to know thoroughly what is right. On Saturday Il Trovatore was given for the matinee. Nilsson sang the part of Leonora; Miss Cary, Azucena; Brignoli, Manrico; and M. Barré, the Count. Except in the Miserere, Nilsson's acting is not remarkable for the brilliancy which characterizes her other parts. But in this and in the finale she was grand. I never heard the part sung with such a thorough infusion of agony. She sank at the prison door in the act of eagerly attending to Manrico's last words, and she sang in gasps as from a breaking heart. Brignoli was rejuvenated apparently for the occasion—his "Deserto" was as of old, and the Miserere, he never sang better in his whole career. In the "Di quella Pira" and the F-minor air which precedes, his voice rang out with all its old silvery beauty. Barré as Count di Luna was only passable; he sings constantly out of tune; but his acting was excellent. Miss Cary acted and sang deliciously. Indeed excepting Gassaniga I never heard the part better performed. The chorus was poor and the orchestra timidly uncertain in the parts.

On Monday, 22nd, Nilsson took her farewell of us in Thomas's "Hamlet." It is as different from Mignon in the style of music as it is in libretto. Nilsson as Ophelia was wonderfully excellent. Her acting in the "mad scene" was superb—so simple in means—so grand in effect. The crazed glances, the frantic gesture, the hysterical laugh, combined with exquisite strains of "Negar tu puoi la luce" render this the most attractive and thrilling of all her impersonations. Miss Cary as the Queen was not successful in her acting; but in the vocal part, especially in the trio with Hamlet and Ophelia, she was exceedingly good. Mr. Barré as Hamlet was remarkably clever both in acting and singing; in the preposterous drinking song which he substitutes for advice to the players, (which they sadly needed), his singing was very agreeable. In the solo "Esse o non Esse" he was far more successful than in anything else I heard him sing during the whole season. Jamet as the King was most deserving of high praise as an artist. So closed one of the most brilliant, yet brief, operatic seasons Philadelphia has ever had. Nilsson has won for herself a far-sounding fame as a vocalist and as the greatest lyric artist we have ever seen here. The few grumblers are silenced by her brilliant success, and a few of them add their plaudits at the close of the delighted ones.

On the evening of the 19th Costa's "Eli" was given at Musical Fund Hall by the "West Philadelphia Choral Society," (a vigorous and thriving society composed of amateurs residing in the western part of the city). The solo parts were assumed by Miss Jarvis, Miss Poole, Dr. Thomas, Mr. Briscoe, Mr. Miller, and Mr. Cochran. Mr. Briscoe won the palm for the admirable way in which he sang the martial air: "Philistines!" The others were good in their respective parts. Miss Poole has a lovely voice and good method; but the lifeless style in which she sings renders her performance ineffective. Mr. Cochran who sang "Eli" muffled his voice in a disagreeable manner, but his singing was conscious and accurate. The chorus was well trained and intelligently conducted. "The Lord is Good" was the best performed. The lovely "Angel" chorus was sung with a delicacy and refinement not often met with in chorus singing. The orchestra was very much better than usual. Mr. Pierson, the leader of the Society, certainly deserves great credit and praise for the highly successful manner in which the work was induced.

The Handel and Haydn Society gave Handel's "Dettingen Te Deum" at Musical Fund Hall on the evening of the 18th. The chorus was large and very well trained, but the orchestra was not up to the mark. The chorus: "To thee, Cherubim and Seraphim" received the most accurate rendering, notwithstanding the exceedingly high part the basses had to sing. "Day by day we magnify Thee" was also very acceptably sung. The closing number: "O Lord in Thee," is the grandest of the whole work, but was not satisfactorily given; the objection being that it was taken too fast. Mr. Hamilton was very happy in his solos, particularly in "When thou tookest upon Thee;" his voice is particularly adapted to Handel's bass parts, as it is a rich and full Basso Cantante. The ladies The ladies who sang the alto and soprano solos were not equal to their tasks; but they sang without any marked or striking objections. Mr. Thunder, the leader, was marked assiduously with the society, and his labor has not been thrown away, as this performance was a vast improvement on their first concert, when the "Seasons" was presented.

Mr. JARVIS gave his sixth classical soirée at Chickering Hall on Saturday evening, April 20th. The programme consisted of Piano Solo. Sonate No. 1. C major (Op. 24). Weber.

Mr. Jarvis.

Cello solo. Lachner.

Rudolph Hennig.

Piano Solo. {Nocturne F sharp minor}. Chopin.

Soirée de Vienne. Liszt.

Violin. Gavotte and Rondo, Præmudum. Bach.

Piano Quatuor. (E flat, Op. 47). Schumann.

Meers, Jarvis, Kopter, Hahn, and Hennig.

Mr. Jarvis in the Weber Sonata played with masterly ability; indeed he excelled himself in his clever execution of the "Menuetto Allegro" and "Presto;" but he did not do so well in the Chopin Nocturne and Liszt's "Soirée de Vienne;" these he did not appear to attack with accustomed vigor. Mr. Hennig played his cello solo as he always does with finish and admirable savoir faire. Mr. Kopter in his solo did not equal some of his other performances. The Gavotte is extremely difficult, and his rendering lacked its usual evenness. Schumann's great "Piano Quartette," the concluding piece, was not perfectly given; a slight uncertainty characterized the performance, especially in the Andante Cantabile. The beautiful and vigorous Scherzo was most acceptably rendered. It is the gem of the whole composition. NAT.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Blighted. 3. E to c. Thomas. 50

"I met her in the evening,
When the moon shone bright and clear."
Nothing dismal about it, as one might possibly infer from the title, but is a very good song every way. Among Thomas's best.

Have Mercy. 4. F to a. Southard. 50

One of a set of Sacred Pieces called "Domenica," and is an exceedingly graceful Motet. "Have mercy on me" is contrasted with "Oh rest in the Lord," with good effect. For 4 voices and solo.

One Glance from Thee. 3. Ab to g. Geary. 30

"I know thee mine, nor vainly seek
The tokens other eyes may see."
Song and Chorus, and as such, can hardly fail to be a favorite. Fine workmanship.

Father of Mercy. (Maria Mater). Quartet. 4.

F to f. Boott. 35

Maria Mater, mater gratie.
Father of Mercy God of Love.
The Latin words belong to a hymn to the Virgin, the English, quite different, constitute a Hymn Prayer to the Deity. Music excellent.

Miss me Darling when I'm gone. Song and Cho.

-3. Bb to f. Seibert. 30

"With one last kiss caress me, dear,
And miss me when I'm gone."
Beautiful farewell song.

Thy Will be done! Solo and Quartette. 3. G to g. M. F. H. Smith. 30

"My God, my Father, while I stray Far from my home, on life's rough way."
Admirable. Peculiarly pretty arrangement of a melody by Batisse. One verse has a Soprano solo, the next, one for Tenor.

The Prayer of the Affianced One. (Preghiera della Fidanzata). 4. Db to g. Vannini. 50

Partito a per il campo.

Departed for the field.

The "parting for the field" of the true lover gives pathos to this beautiful prayer, which belongs among the easier Italian songs, but by no means among the less pleasing.

When you and I are old. Song and Cho. 3.

A to a. Percy. 30

"I'll love you still, be true to you,
When you and I are old."
Of the "John Andersen my Joe" style, and although different, resembles it in homely beauty.

O Charming Countess! (Le faccio un inchino).

Trio for Female voices from "Il Matrimonio Segreto." 5. F to g. Cimarosa. 75

"So very amusing, allow me to smile,
Ih, ih, ih! Ah, ah, ah, ah!"

The very amusing, laughing, scolding trio in "The Secret Marriage." The scolding slips off easier in Italian, but the English may also be sung smoothly and rapidly.

We live for those we love. Song and Cho. 3.

Eb to f. Towne. 30

"Yet do we live for them, that we May live with them eternally."
Noble sentiments and good melody.

Instrumental.

Grand Caprice Hongroise. 4 hands. 5. Eb.

Ketterer. 1.00

Valse des Fleurs. (Ketterer). 4 hands. 3.

Ab. Arr. by Rumel. 1.00

Two very effective duets. The last is easy, graceful, and sweet-toned as a silver bell. The first is a caprice indeed, and where played very rapidly would be one degree more difficult than is indicated above, but furnishes a grand display of musical fireworks. Requires a flexible wrist.

Lusitana Waltz. 3. A. Bellencourt.

Neat and sparkling.

Overture to Poet and Peasant. Duet. Violin and Piano. 4. D. Wichtl. 1.00

The mark 4 approximates to the degree of difficulty. Of course, in so long a piece there are more difficult and more easy passages. The Overture is one of our chief favorites, and this arrangement will no doubt afford great pleasure to the players.

Books.

THE WORLD'S PEACE JUBILEE CHORUS BOOK. 75

This is the book to be used in the great festival, and is now in the hands of the 20,000 singers. The demand for it by outsiders is already active, as it is one of the best of books for Musical Societies, and will be in great request for local Musical Festivals.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 812.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 18, 1872.

VOL. XXXII. No. 4.

Translated for this Journal.

The Wizard of the G-String.

FROM THE GERMAN.

(Concluded from page 226.)

Beyond this gossip little or nothing is known of Paganini's private life and character up to the time of his arrival in Germany. From that period, however, he selected from time to time companions, who accompanied him on his journeys and relieved him of the business arrangements. One of these, the Hanoverian scholar, George Harrys, kept for a long time an exact diary, from which we obtain interesting glimpses of Paganini's habits and character.

Artists, have, as a rule, great sympathy with nature; to this Paganini was a marked exception. His route might be through the fairest landscape, or pass the finest villas and castles, he took no notice of them—they had no charm for him. If he did not converse he meditated on his art, or his compositions, or fell into melancholy thought. He could not, indeed, well look about him, as he, always shivering, kept the carriage tightly closed. Like the minister, Kaunitz, who always anxiously protected himself against every breath of air, Paganini sat with the thermometer at 72° wrapped in his cloak, all the curtains down, cowering in a corner of the vehicle, and scarcely allowing his fellow traveller a breath of air on his own side. He always vilified the climate of Germany, and attributed to it a large share of those ailments which he had in reality brought from Italy. He often said to Harrys, as he enveloped himself in his cloak: "This is a most excellent travelling companion in Germany, and one without which it will never do to make journeys even in midsummer." Strange to say, however, he liked best when in his room to sit between an open door and window, which he called "taking an air-bath." The numerous colds which he thus took increased his difficulties of the chest greatly.

Like all delicate persons, Paganini loved sleep; in his travelling carriage he often slept two hours at a time, and this several times a day. Then he would awake, cheerful, full of talk, and inclined to jest. Upon arriving at a station he either remained in the carriage or walked about while the horses were fed and changed, but never entered an inn until he came to the end of his journey.

His baggage gave him but little trouble; his most precious possession, his instrument, a Guarnerius, lay in a very worn-out and shabby case, which also contained his strong box, a few small valuables, and some fine linen. A workman could easily have carried his whole wardrobe in his satchel. His collected papers, more important than those of many a commercial traveller, were enclosed in a little red book; these, consisting of only about twenty loose leaves, held the results of all his business since he had come to Germany, and were written in hieroglyphics which none but himself could decipher. There, mingled in the utmost confusion, were Vienna and Carlsruhe, Frankfurt and Leipzig, receipts and expenses, post-horses and concert-tickets; and yet he understood this labyrinth admirably, and seldom reckoned to his own disadvantage, although he was entirely inexperienced in business matters.

While on his journeys, Paganini was always satisfied with the accommodations which the inns afforded; it was all one to him whether the host gave him the attic or the first floor, a good or a bad bed, only he must have a room at the back of the house, as the noise of the streets was very annoying to him. "I have to hear noise enough in the great cities," said he, "on my journeys I will have quiet."

Coachmen, house-servants, all persons, indeed, of the lower class Paganini treated with contempt, and would scarcely deign to look at them. If, by chance, such a person spoke to him, he turned his back on him, and asked his companion: "What can this creature want of me? Who is the animal?" When assured that the country people in Germany were very good-hearted, he would answer: "Ah! yes, the canaille generally are so."

Arrived at the limit of his journey, no severely guarded state prisoner could lead a more monotonous or tedious life than did the great master in the seclusion of his apartment, which, nevertheless, he left rarely and unwillingly, as he seemed to find himself more comfortable in absolute retirement. Singers and performers usually maintain proficiency in their art by unremitting diligence, and by the practise of scales, solfeggios, and exercises on difficult passages; for some hours each day strive to keep voice or fingers smooth and supple. But even in this respect was this wonderful man an incredible exception. It is well known that on all his journeys no one ever heard the sound of a violin from his room, except, perhaps, the tuning of the instrument on concert days, for a few moments previous to rehearsal, or to the concert itself. He made no secret of it that he never touched his violin unless when obliged to. "I have practised enough in my life," said he, "and am glad when I can leave my instrument in its case."

As Paganini, when at home, was entirely at leisure, it might be supposed that he spent his time in composing, but this was not the case. The operas, concertos, and variations in which he appeared on his tours, he had prepared in Italy, and not a single new production saw the light during his travels.

Of general literature he was entirely ignorant; beside his native tongue he understood only a little French; all other languages were unknown to him, and he had no inclination for reading. He did not attempt to conceal, at least from his friends, this lack of literary acquirements; his excuse was,—“A man can learn only one thing thoroughly; my whole life has been devoted to the violin and to the theory of music, and this has left me no time for other pursuits.” We can well believe this when it is remembered that for many years he practised from ten to eleven hours daily. His interest in general matters was no greater; he took no part in politics; the most important events and changes in the world's history, the overthrow of the mightiest potentates, the fall of Napoleon, the uprising and heroic deeds of the Greeks, or the sight of his own torn and helpless country, made less impression on him than the breaking of a string while playing in public. This extreme one-sidedness of his character, however, this devotion to the one thing, made him the greatest musical phenomenon the world had ever seen.

In general, Paganini's temperament was a melancholy one, as is the case with many who are strangers to sound health. A feeble body is a troubled medium, through which the spirit sees only a clouded world. Yet even the misanthrope may have moments of pleasure and of humor. And Paganini, when in the society of his friends, could be one of the most talkative and amusing of companions. He liked to relate anecdotes of his own life, which he could tell in a very piquant manner. He was an avowed enemy to large assemblies and dinners, and it needed great powers of persuasion to induce him to accept such invitations. At table he talked very little, but ate a great deal, and seldom left a single dish untasted when dining out. His appetite was of the strongest; he could eat for hours together without suffering the least inconvenience, and was correspondingly fond of wine; he was, however, so absent-minded that he seldom knew what he had eaten, and whether it was good or otherwise. As soon as the cloth was removed he withdrew from table to take his siesta. In evening companies, where there was less formality, he was more affable; but if any one attempted to give the conversation a musical turn, or to compliment him by giving a musical soirée, it put him in a very bad humor.

He had a remarkable memory for persons, but none whatever for places. The names of cities in which he gave concerts escaped his memory almost before he left them. Nature had formed him in a remarkable manner for a violinist; his fingers were extraordinarily long and of unexampled suppleness; he could bend his thumbs back so far as to touch the back of his hand with the nails. The flexibility of his arms was equally great; without any difficulty he could make his elbows meet behind.

His demeanor on the way to the concert-room, at the rehearsal, and behind the coulisses, was especially noticeable; at these times he appeared most interesting, both as a man and an artist. His disposition and his whole bearing on the morning of a rehearsal was graver and more serious than usual; although secure in his own ability, he could not overcome a feeling of anxiety. On these mornings he did nothing, he sat still on the sofa. A few moments before the hour he would spring up, open his violin case to see that no string was broken, tune the instrument, and strike, perhaps, a couple of chords, and then put it up again and arrange the necessary pieces of music. During all this he took snuff incessantly, a sure sign with him of perturbation and uneasiness. If he found that listeners had crept in, as was not unfrequently the case, he merely marked his solos, indicating them only by a light pizzicato.

His ear was extremely exact; the slightest mistake did not escape him. Amid the loudest crash of the full orchestra he would call out: "The second clarinet is not playing!" "I do not hear the alto!" When they did not play to his liking he could be very violent, but if he were accompanied with precision he would cry out "Bravissimo!" in the middle of the piece. We had heard that he had showed his highest skill towards the close of a composition, and pricked up our ears when at the rehearsal he approached the end of the first piece; he disappointed us, however, completely, by putting down his violin with the words: "Go on, gentlemen," and go on we were obliged to, without him. Through fear lest some one of his compositions should be abstracted and copied, he always took away his music every time carefully, although it did not contain the principal part, as he always played from memory. After rehearsal he partook of some simple refreshments, and then gave himself up to repose.

It was wonderful how this man,—throughout the day of a concert grave, silent, melancholy—cast off all care in the interval between his arrival at the concert-hall and his appearance on the stage. During this interval he was full of jokes and jests, and kept them up until the leader announced to him that his time had come, when he would suddenly assume his accustomed gravity. As after every solo he would perspire so copiously that he was obliged to change his linen two or three times in the course of an evening, it was supposed that his strength must have been greatly exhausted by it; but this could not have been the case, as after a concert he often seemed to feel better than usual, and neither his sleep nor his appetite were at all affected by it.

Paganini was no exception to certain weaknesses which belong peculiarly to great men. As at a review, or a parade, the soldier must often stand for hours in the burning sun or the wintry cold, waiting for his General or Field-Marshal, so he never appeared punctually, but kept the audience waiting for him a longer or shorter time. In the intermission his dressing-room was thronged with music-lovers, and verses were sent in, chiefly from ladies, to whom he returned the most elegant compliments. Such are the triumphs of the virtuoso—if they are worthy of the name of triumphs.

Paganini delighted in church music; but cared little for the opera, that is, German opera, yet he thought highly of "Don Juan." Military music was not agreeable to him. "These people very seldom play in tune," said he; on the other hand, the chimes of church bells had a great charm for him.

A beautiful feature in his character was his uniformly obliging disposition. Young composers who often brought him their voluminous scores, ladies who wished to inquire of him whether their voices were powerful enough for the stage, artists whose talent he recognized, and who came to beg a recommendation of him—to all these he was friendly, and gave them a patient hearing and a candid answer. He liked praise, and read the journals in which it was lavished on him with eagerness and satisfaction. He carried on most of his correspondence in Italian; his French letters he was obliged to have corrected. His handwriting was almost illegible.

A show of splendor and luxury was offensive to him; even his orders he wore very seldom, except on the stage, and then usually the ribbon and buckle of the order. Often he said: "Of what use is all this? I am not proud."

The hardest of all tasks to this altered spendthrift was to part with money; a demand for what he deemed an extravagant pour boire would throw him into a rage. His habit even with regard to the commonest purchases was to beat down the seller, as he had been accustomed to do in Italy; in consequence of which he soon got the reputation of a miser, which opinion of him increased in proportion to the wealth that flowed in upon him from the enormous receipts of his concerts, the tickets to which were almost always double or treble the usual price. That he could be benevolent, however, when he thought it worth while, is shown by an instance of his generosity, a nobler than which it would not be easy to find. It is well known that Berlioz was for the greater part of his life in straitened circumstances—not his own fault, except as it was the result of clinging to his ideal, which did not suit the French, with iron obstinacy. His works, however, made a great impression on Paganini, who, after he had heard "Romeo and Juliet," and had learned the needy condition of the composer, wrote him the following letter:

"MY DEAR FRIEND,—Since Beethoven died, no hand but that of Berlioz has been to call him to life; and after the enjoyment which your divine compositions have given me I must beg you to accept as a token of my homage twenty-two thousand francs, which will be paid to your order by the Messrs. Rothschild.

At the period to which these reminiscences look back, the time of my ardent youth, Paganini seemed to me the greatest of geniuses, unequalled in the highest sense of the word; and to-day, when three score and fifteen years have chilled my blood, he still holds the same unapproachable place in my estimation. Whether any will ever rise who will compare with him as a violinist, I cannot foresee, but none has as yet done so. For although he aroused a great excitement among violinists, although they strove day and night with the greatest eagerness to plagiarize and imitate his arts whenever they took up a violin, even to the pauses in the rehearsals, (at the rehearsals in the Berlin Orchestra the leader was obliged distinctly to forbid the imitation of Paganini's peculiar style), although skilful performers certainly have appeared since his time, who have followed his manner with more or less of success, even his best imitators, whatever their names, are at most but parts of him. I myself, and all who have ever heard him, must admit that no mortal can ever surpass him. "Paganini is the prince of virtuosos," said Robert Schumann, and he was right. The next generation has given us but one musical phenomenon equal to him,—the pianist, Franz Liszt. He, too, has reached the culminating point on his instrument; he, too, has raised the standard of excellence greatly among his followers and pupils; it may even be thought that some have approached him very closely; none, however, have equalled him in the full vigor of his powers, and he can no more be surpassed than Paganini. And in a mental point of view, the Hungarian Liszt stands as a composer, an author, a poet, and in almost every department of literature immeasurably higher than the one-sided though wonderful Italian.

Bach's Passions-Musik at Westminster Abbey.

(From the Manchester Guardian.)

An archaic dialect must be mastered before the modern lover of music can appreciate Bach. This learnt, however, the beauties which develop themselves in reading the Passion Music are such as to suggest the reflection that if all lovers of music were accustomed to his idiom, the oratorio of the old Leipzig master could not fail to take as deep a root in English minds as that of his follower, the more intelligible Handel. In distribution of effects the work of Bach has features which many a subsequent writer of oratorio might have done well to imitate. The self-control involved in discarding from the score the entire class of noisy metallic instruments (though Bach was no stranger to the effect of trumpet and trombone), is alone a point which might raise a blush upon the cheek of many a modern musician at his own unbridled indulgence in brass and percussion. But while it constitutes, in this and other points, a noble exemplification of reticence in art, there are few works of art so truly full of dramatic power—if by this expression we may indicate the power of using art material in the most effective manner for operation upon the sense addressed—as this musical picture of the awful and sacred tragedy of the Redemption. We have first the duplication of the choir, out of which spring, by the pen of Bach, as of Carissimi, and later of Handel, effects of multitudinousness and of responsiveness not otherwise to be attained: then the enlistment of the popular religious sentiment by the permeation of the whole texture of the work by chorale, or, to speak plainly, Psalm tunes; the frequent silence—with a meaning—of the bow instruments; and the grateful occasional prominence—not for a phrase only, but for a whole number—of the cool tone of flutes, or the plaintive reediness of hautboys: all these are points which make it difficult to feel that musicians have learnt much in broad orchestral economy since the days—now a century and a half gone by—of John Sebastian Bach.

Passing over the description of the preliminary service, we quote Mr. Crowdy's thoughtful notice of the work, and of the effect produced by its performance:—

The entry of the choir, after the few bars of instrumentation which open the first reflective chorus, "Come ye daughters, weep with me," is quiet, as is the whole tone of this introductory meditative number, by which the mind is directed at the outset to contemplation of the figure of the Saviour "bearing the accursed tree." The antiphonal point in this chorus, where the second choir have the short ejaculations, "Whom?" "How?" "What?" "Look where?" interjected amid the plaintive and flowing passages of the first choir, has a prominence to the eye in the score which hardly comes out to the ear, unless the hearer be near the choral bodies: much of the beauty of such effects is always lost in a large space, since at any considerable distance it is not palpable to the ear whether a body of sound comes from the cantores or the decani side of the choir. Even in such performances as those at the Handel festivals, no one, it may be safely asserted, hears the antiphonal points like the choirs themselves, and at a certain distance the special effect disappears. Covered up by the streaming counterpoint of the two choirs in this opening chorus, appears as a ninth part the melody of a chorale, for a detached portion of the soprano voices; the composer thus declaring at once a feature of his work which is to characterize it throughout. By reason of its comparative steadiness and slowness, this chorale made itself felt among the interlaced work of the other eight voice-parts; but all the effect which Bach, in the year 1729, calculated upon in the introduction of these people's worship tunes, will never be felt by other than a German congregation, if, indeed, ever again by any congregation.

The form of diction in the Passion Music is, of course, narratory: the composer has, however, adopted—as was customary before him—a quasi-dramatic treatment of the text, by assigning uniformly the quoted words of each principal character to a particular voice. The introductory narrative phrases—the "Evangelist's part"—are assigned throughout to a tenor, and the actual quotation of the Saviour's words is made by a bass. To the two gentlemen who throughout this service rendered these respective portions of the music too much commendation could hardly be given for the masterful quietness of style which characterized their rendering. Nowhere was this reticence in execution more welcome on the part of the tenor reciter than at the narration of Peter's remorse, "he went out and wept bitterly," a point where the exquisite pathos of the musical phrases might have excused a straining after effect, though the slightest exhibition of such a straining must—such is the truly devotional tone of the recitative—inevitably result in destruction to the character of the passage.

The narrative or Evangelist's portion, by which chiefly the action is advanced, is undermarked by Bach with "figured bass" only, indicating organ, or perhaps harpsichord accompaniment; the use of the bow instruments being reserved, as already referred to, by a stroke at once artistic and reverent, to emphasize the actual words of the Saviour. To have used, therefore, for the accompaniment to the tenor recitative passages, as is the unpleasing habit in England, the violoncellos, would have obviously marred the distinctive effect of Bach's design. A pianoforte has been employed at these points in the recent performances which have been given of the Passion Music in London concert-rooms; and is suggested by Mr. Macfarren in his masterly commentary on the work. In the Abbey the harmonium is employed. The timbre of the free reed is not usually spoken of among musicians with respect; in the present case, however, the effect was not merely satisfactory, but strangely and peculiarly beautiful. With the most liberal views as to the admission of orchestral instruments into the church, one would scarcely—though it would be hard to define the reason—fail to feel a shock at hearing in Westminster Abbey the percussive pronunciation of the pianoforte; the harp, though an obvious alternative, would have over-enhanced the part of the tenor-reciter; in the harmonium is found a substitute at once unobtrusive in its enunciation, and distinctive in its tone-stamp. Etherealized by the stone-enclosed atmosphere, its tremulous speech had an effect both devotional and grateful.

But all effects of orchestral timbre, beautiful as they proved in the mellowing spaciousness, and happily subordinated as they are in this work by a master hand to sacred purposes, fade from the mind at the recollection of the one entrancing effect of this occasion—the singing, under the roof of Westminster Abbey, without accompaniment, of the chorale with which this musical recital of the Passion is interspersed. There was a hush of all vibrating string and quivering reed; and then, out upon the reposeful air, from the voices of surprised English choristers, men and boys, came keen and firm a burst of those manly harmonies which have made Bach's treatment of Church folk-song the unapproached ideal of all who have come after him. As these chorales from time to time recurred, one might have heard a pulse beat, so absolute was the silence, so intense the attention to every word-enforcing modulation. That a devout appreciation of these portions of the "special service" filled the minds of all present was palpable in the very atmosphere.

To these numbers of the work which are of the nature of recitative, it is possible that sympathetic attention was not so general. To enjoy Bach's recitative—and how beautiful it is when one learns how to enjoy it no musician will be at a loss to say—a certain strangeness of idiom which naturally characterizes its period must be conquered: this done, its earnestness and uniformly sustained meaning come out with a force which carries the attention on without flagging.

The numbers of another class are again equally beautiful, and even more unique; the airs, namely, for an alto voice, conveying reflective comment upon the narrated events—in the accompaniment to which the great composer, dispensing with an admirable economy the orchestral resources, gives pervading prominence to the wood tone of the orchestra. The voice of a boy alto, accompanied by flutes with a figure in thirds and sixths, moving over a bass part hinted, so to speak, in pizzicato, presents a combination as enhancing to the religious effect as it is refreshing to the jaded hearer of over-instrumented performances of oratorio at Exeter Hall. For carrying the lessons of the occasion to the heart of the worshipper, sensitive to, but not learned in, the language of music, such simple means must certainly be all-efficient.

To trace this interesting performance number by number would be a task welcome enough to the writer; in whose mind would be stirred, at every point, recollections of noble effects and deeply enjoyed sensations: it proceeded, with some excisions, with continuous firmness and delicacy of execution, divided by a sermon from the pulpit by the Dean. It must suffice to note briefly a few of the most marked effects.

The constant quiet presence of the harmonium as a support to the tenor recitative did not pall upon the ear; nor the dignity of string tone, as a mark of reverence at the quoted words of the Saviour, wear out its own significance: the bursting in of the chorus (the turba of ancient oratorio), either as representing the clamorous mob of bloodthirsty Jews, the disciples, or an imagined body of reflective spectators; the noble air (the epithet, in default of one conveying a more reverential sense, must serve) in which are set the words used by our Lord in instituting the Eucharist, the air for soprano, with accompaniment in imitation of the obsolete "love-oboe;" the fearfully vivid chorus, "Have lightnings and thunders in clouds disappeared," with its sequel, "Now open, O bottomless pit;" the air, "Have mercy," with a violin obligato part played with most religious effect; the tenor recitative telling how Peter "went out and wept bitterly," the rendering of which has been mentioned above: with the constantly recurring chorale, sung, as already described, without instruments, had each and all their effect in bringing before the mind of a meditating congregation, sensible to the language of music, a vivid picture of the events to the contemplation of which the Church devotes the week. More startling, though not less forcible, was the tremendous chorus of one word, "Barabbas!" Here we find concentrated in a single bar of sacred music all that music knows of dramatic effect; and when, at the proper point in the quiet narratory recitative, the one word "Barabbas" (with an accent—barbareus to English ears—on its first syllable) was thundered into the nave of the Abbey by the united double choir, on the poignant chord of "extreme sharp seventh," the congregation started visibly. In the whole range of known music there is not, probably, a bolder touch than this embodiment of the insensate passion of a Jewish mob, rejecting Jesus in favor of the seditious robber. Not a trace, nevertheless, of other than reverential effect results in performance.

The essentially religious character of Bach's mind did not permit him to forget reverence in sensation; no work of art illustrates better than this setting of the Passion the dignity of artistic reserve. Here we have no sudden close at a climax of orchestral and vocal activity, such as would have marked the end of a modern oratorio; but from the point where the action of the Divine tragedy reaches its culmination in the death of the Saviour, the music assumes gradually a cadential tone as gentle—to compare things sacred with secular—as that which characterizes the close of a Tennysonian canto; and the mind of the devout listener, lacerated by the poignant portrayal of death upon the cross, is soothed by a musical embodiment of Requiem at the tomb, in strains which foreshadow the tenderest of those peaceful choruses by which, a century after Bach, his great admirer and reviver, Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy, has betrayed the influence of the earlier master. No one of the congregation at this service whose mind answered to the sway of the music, could have left the Abbey in a frame less tranquilly meditative, less unexcited, than becomes a Christian man, fulfilling the duty in Holy Week of a contemplation of the Death and Passion of our Saviour Christ.

Music and Drawing in the Boston Public Schools.

We take the following extracts from the admirable Annual Report (1871) of the School Committee of the City of Boston, written, it is understood, by Mr. FRANCIS H. UNDERWOOD.

MUSIC.

This department appears to be in a satisfactory state of progress. Instruction in the art of reading music and in producing correct natural sounds is given to the pupils from their first entrance into the Primary Schools, and the efforts of the several supervisors are devoted to making the various steps of that musical instruction and practice combine in a philosophical system. It is certain that the standard of musical knowledge, and of ability and taste in performance, has very greatly increased within the last few years. If all the pupils competent to sing in parts correctly, in good choral style, were gathered into one body it would require a stage considerably larger than that of the much-vaunted Jubilee.

An experiment has been in progress during the summer and autumn of 1871 and the winter of 1872 that may lead to favorable results, although it appears to be a partial abandonment of the high ground taken the year previous, and a return to the old system of dividing the schools between the music teachers, leaving each one to teach in his own way. The supervisor of music in the Primary Schools, Mr. Mason, represented that he had not had the opportunity to develop his method of teaching, and desired to have a school assigned to him, that he might give instruction in all its various classes, and so exhibit his system by a connected series of examples. It was to no purpose that he was reminded that in his own proper sphere he was exerting a wider influence than would be possible under any "perpendicular" division of duties; the Music Committee reluctantly acceded to his wishes, and, with the consent of the District Committee and of the chief musical supervisor, he was allowed to give the entire musical instruction in a certain school. When this was done, it was impossible to deny similar requests made by Messrs. Sharland and Holt, the supervisors of music in the Grammar Schools, and accordingly each of these gentlemen has now a separate school in which he is sole instructor.

For a mere experiment this state of things might be tolerated; but it should not be allowed to continue long. If in the musical progress of any one of these schools there should appear to be any special excellences, they can be noted, and the improvement made available for all of them. The valuable traits of each system (if there are distinct systems) ought to be gathered together. The present competition must have two unpleasant results; it must foster a jealous rivalry between the supervisors, who ought not to be exposed to the feeling, but rather to work together for the general good; and it must result in giving to the three schools mentioned a great deal more than their fair share of musical drill, and perhaps in occupying more of the time of the pupils (under the forcing system that is sure to grow out of any strife for superiority) than a just regard for the claims of other studies should allow.

The annual exhibition in June last was one of the most successful of the long series. As the report of the Music Committee will probably give an account of it, the details may be omitted here. We cannot forbear to mention one thing, however, in regard to the exhibition in honor of the Grand Duke Alexis, which is, that the City Council assumed the entire control of its management, practically ignoring the Music Committee of this Board. They issued the letters of invitation over their official signatures, so that even the members of the Music Committee who were present entered as spectators of the festival which their own labors had made possible, by the favor of the Aldermen and Councilmen who represented the city on the occasion. The distribution of tickets was made with a similar want of consideration for the rights of this Board. We think it should be made certain that no concert or musical festival shall take place hereafter which shall not be entirely under the control of the proper committee.

While upon the subject of these annual concerts, we would observe that a great wrong is done to the feelings of parents by depriving them of the opportunity of hearing and seeing their children on these interesting occasions. We think they have the first right, and we would recommend that two performances shall be given, to one of which each member of the chorus shall have one or two tickets. If but one performance can be given, let the parents enjoy it, and let all the city officials exercise a wholesome self-denial.

We do not wonder at the eagerness with which our citizens press for tickets to these concerts. The city has nothing else so fair to show. And we add, with what we believe is a just pride, that no city in the civilized world can present such a splendid chorus of children, so officered and drilled, so competent to sing.

If we would show to a foreigner the spectacle that testifies most strongly to our culture as a people, that distinguishes ours from other merely great and prosperous cities, we could find nothing like this. Other cities have galleries, halls, statues, paintings, libraries, and other institutions which make our progress in the arts look poor and mean. But that glorious chorus, especially when considered as a representative of twelve thousand more that could be gathered if we had a colossal hall for them, is without a parallel. And the thoughtful mind begins to consider that each small atom of that grand mass of harmony is the light and beauty of some home, and that the humanizing influences of this loveliest of the arts are diffused like the common light and air.

We shall not be thought too enthusiastic, perhaps, if we urge that music, as a means of education, is more important than is generally considered. Few pupils come to be eminent mathematicians or linguists. The works of classic authors, and the aerial architecture of the geometer, are for the very few. We teach the higher things for the exercise they give to the faculties, and because we may develop some new Laplace, or Newton, or Bowditch. But we find practically, that, after school days are over, the mathematics are laid aside, and that Horace and Virgil become dusty.

For the average man and woman, the arts that refine nature and make life beautiful, such as music and drawing, are more beneficial than high mental cultivation. We would give the high cultivation if we can. We would enlarge the mental horizon of every pupil. We would show the greatness of God in the laws of the universe; in the nice equilibrium of the solar system; in the succession of geological strata, in glaciers, mountain chains and volcanic craters; in the growth of plants, and in the structure of animals; but when all is done, the influence of music will have much more to do with their daily happiness. It will make them more contented with their lot; will banish weariness, and lead their minds into that repose which it is the highest philosophy to gain.

DRAWING.

With regard to this important branch of public instruction, a new and lively interest has arisen during the last year. The first steps have been taken to bring the whole body of pupils under an intelligent system of instruction, by educating the teachers in normal classes. The report of the Drawing Committee will best show what has been done, and what remains to be undertaken. This is probably one of the most important movements made in our time, and its effects will be felt powerfully in many ways. Education is not altogether an interior process; other faculties besides the reason demand cultivation. Drawing, which educates the eye and the hand, gives facility to express the thoughts of the mechanic, as well as the plans of the engineer, the fancies of the designer in decoration, the recollections of the traveller, and the conceptions of the creative artist. By the power to draw, the value of any mechanic's labor is vastly increased, and in time we shall see greater elegance in furniture, in household utensils, in ornamental fabrics, and in domestic architecture. With increased knowledge of art in its higher forms, we shall see less of the wretched plaster-ornaments, and the tasteless pictures now cherished in so many houses. Books will be free from the coarse and ignorantly drawn plates with which so many are now "illustrated." Another generation, reared under these more favorable influences, will grow up with finer instincts of proportion, and we may hope that ART, in its true power and divine beauty, may not always be the meaningless word it has so long been.

Aside from these remote prospective benefits, the training of our teachers in the art is sure to bring immediate advantages. We have before called attention to the power which a teacher exerts in oral instruction. The art of making thought visible by illustrative figures on the blackboard is the natural complement of oral teaching. The intelligent teacher talks with chalk in hand, illustrating as she proceeds. She does in this way a two-fold work, arresting attention and making impressions that are indelible. What Agassiz is before a class of naturalists, the model teacher becomes in the estimation of her expectant pupils.

The public is to be congratulated upon the employment of Mr. Walter Smith as director of art instruction, since from his familiarity with the working of drawing schools in England, and from his great natural aptitude as an educator, much is to be hoped for in this department.

National Anthems.

(From the London Musical Standard.)

I.

It seems ordained that some sort of mystery should overshadow the origin of most national airs and national anthems. This is the case even with our own famous "God save the Queen," though all necessity for doubt or conjecture as to its parentage has, in fact, long ceased to exist. It is truly astonishing that so many among us should be unable to give a prompt and decided answer to the question "Who composed the National Anthem?" That strange, perverse, ludicrous predilection, so peculiar to the English, for ascribing as little merit as possible to their compatriots, and as much as possible (or impossible) to foreigners, still leads to the foolish replies, "Well, I really am not sure, but I believe it was Lulli, Rameau, or Handel." Answers indicating about as much real knowledge of music as would be shown by any one asking whether "Lucrezia Borgia" were not composed by Sebastian Bach.

Every musician is aware that the form, rhythmical construction, and entire character of our superb national anthem are exclusively British, and could not be the work of any but a British composer. This internal evidence alone would suffice to determine its origin.

It has been well said that "a national song composes itself;" that is to say, that a truly national and imperishable melody is rather the result of many minds and many years than the product of one brain. Of course there are exceptions; a sudden and harmonious national feeling will sometimes find an echo in immortal music or poetry. The tendency among all nations has been from time to time to alter and vary their popular songs. The changes which music continually undergoes is sufficient to account for this characteristic. Traces of "God save the King" are to be found in an Ayre by Dr. Bull written in 1590, in an old Christmas carol bearing the date 1611, in the ballad "Franklin is fled away," circa 1669, and in a theme by Purcell published in 1696. All these tunes have passages in common, and some of them bear a remarkable resemblance to our national hymn. "God save the King," in its present form, was first sung and played by Henry Carey in the year 1732 at a banquet given in honor of the birthday of George II. at the Freemasons' Tavern in London, where it was much admired, though it does not appear that its transcendent merits were fully appreciated, as the fame of it spread very slowly. Carey was a highly gifted man; a musician by profession, he was also a poet of some eminence. We are almost tempted to cull some passages from his "Satire on the luxury and effeminacy of the age." His strictures on the preference then shown to foreign over English musicians, significantly point to the commencement of what Mr. Macfarren has well termed our fashionable neglect of national music and composers in favor of foreign ideas.

Carey wrote the burlesque called "The Dragon of Wantley," also the well-known ballad "Sally in our Alley." Southey says of him, "his life was led without reproach, but it was unfortunate: he died by his own hand." Carey was born, 1696, in London; the exact date of his death is not settled, but it would seem to be 1744; Southey places it in 1748. He was a natural son of George Savile, Marquis of Halifax. His untimely and tragic end was not, as some have supposed, occasioned by poverty, but was rather the result of a hopeless passion he is said to have entertained for a lady of noble birth, who rejected him. Nevertheless, it is certain that Carey must figure, and that prominently, in the long and dark catalogue of British artists who have been treated with neglect and ingratitude:

"Lædibus inæontes vivos, laudamus eodem Defunctos."

It is true that many books and endless discussions have taken place as to the true authorship of "God save the King;" but the later researches of Mr. W. Chappell and Dr. Rimbault, together with those of the Germans, Carl Engel and the learned Dr. G. Fink, clearly point to Carey as the author of our present version. Conceive a Frenchman not knowing who composed "La Marseillaise," or "Le Chant du Départ!" And what are they in comparison with our National Anthem! We blush to think how many self-styled "Britons" are still in ignorance of these facts.

The music of "Rule Britannia," the ode in honor of Great Britain, which, according to Southey, "will be the political hymn of this country as long as she maintains her political power," was composed by Dr. Arne for his masque of "Alfred," and first performed at Cliefden House, near Maidenhead, on August 1, 1740. This place was then the residence of Frederick, Prince of Wales, and the occasion was to commemorate the accession of George II., and in honor of the birthday of the young Princess Augusta. Dr. Arne afterwards altered it into an opera, and it was performed at Drury Lane Theatre on March 20, 1745. The words of the masque were by James Thomson (author of the "Seasons,") and Mallet; the first named writer is generally credited with the stanza in question, although the authorship is by no means certain.

There is no need to dilate on the characteristics of our two great national themes. "God save the King" is chiefly remarkable for its grand rhythmical dignity, its majestic form and happy sequential phrases; while "Rule Britannia" is distinguished for its manly freedom, flowing periods, and especially, its immense vigor. The process of alteration we have before spoken of is still going on; neither Carey's song nor Arne's composition have remained in their original state; numerous arrangers have tried their hands on them, and variations in the melodies as well as in the harmonies are apparent on referring to the earliest printed copies.

The admiration for our national air is by no means confined to England. It has been adopted in Hanover, Brunswick, Prussia, Saxony, Weimar, Sweden, and Russia (at least till 1833, when the new Russian anthem was composed). It is the air of the federal cantons in Switzerland, and the Austrians pay it almost as much respect as they render to Haydn's "Emperor's Hymn." This adoption sufficiently affords a proof, were one required, that it aptly expresses the respect felt for the monarch, and the love we should bear our native land.

II.

The majestic and widely popular "God save the Queen" has at length found a rival in the country whence it might most naturally be expected to emanate, viz., Germany. That rival is the "Deutsches Reichslied," Song of the German Empire. It is remarkable that "the land of music" should have been forced by circumstances to borrow its national anthem from England; the explanation of this lies in the then disunited state of Germany. At the time when the song was adopted, Prussia would have repudiated any work of the sort coming from Bavaria, Saxony or Württemberg, and those states would have rejected one which had been derived from Prussia. Tempora mutantur: with the unification of Germany and the revival of her ancient empire has arisen, as might have been foreseen, a national anthem worthy of so great a realm. "God save the King" was borrowed from Hanover, when the latter was an appendage of the British crown; it gradually became the national hymn of all Germany, adapted to the (not very poetical words) "Heil dir im Siegeskranze," "Auf Hamburg's Wohlergehen," &c. This is a phenomenon which must appear strange indeed to those who are not aware of its causes, among which, be it remembered, was the culpable indifference of the English with respect to the composer, and their readiness to ignore him and attribute the song to Handel. The German Reichslied, lately published at Leipzig in the Musikalische Gartenlaube, vol. III., page 23, has no reason to shun comparison with our grand hymn, being equally large and noble in conception. It is somewhat less solemn, but quite as imposing; more secular, for there is a slight tinge of ecclesiastical gravity about "God save the Queen;" very nearly as simple and easy, and adorned with a greater amount of melodic charm. The two songs, though bearing no resemblance to each other, present many points of affinity; they possess the same loftiness of style, the same stately, imperial movement, without the least admixture of levity or of bombast. It is tantalizing to be kept in ignorance of both the composer's and poet's names; they have preferred to offer their joint production to the public anonymously; rather a needless piece of modesty, the grandeur and beauty of the music being undeniable, and the words (commencing "Segne der Himmel dich"), if not equal to those of "Rule Britannia," being immensely superior to those of "God save the Queen." "Heil dir," "Gott erhalte Frans den Kaiser," "Hail Columbia," &c. The valuable periodical in which this magnificent song appeared, informs the public in a foot note, that it was produced in the camp of the German army near Paris. It now remains to be seen whether old habit and custom will allow the Reichslied to take the place of "God save the King," which the Germans did us the honor of appropriating. But whether this new and noble strain be adopted or not, we may congratulate the German people upon its possession.

As regards the national anthems of various other countries, they are soon discussed, being all more or less inferior to the three on which we have here enlarged. That of Austria, "The Emperor's Hymn," (Gott erhalte), composed by Jos. Haydn, is a fine melody, but not remarkable for dignity: it is more graceful than grand. "The Watch by the Rhine," (Die Wacht am Rhein), cannot well be styled a national anthem; it is, like the "Marseillaise," occasional rather than universal. The late war gave it a profound significance, and it naturally rose to sudden and great popularity. But France, having received so tremendous a lesson from Germany, will probably be in no haste to attack the Rhine again; moreover, "the Watch by the Moselle" would now be a more suitable title than "the Watch by the Rhine." The song itself secured the public favor more by means of the words (especially the refrain) than of the music; which latter, by Wilhelm, a native of Prussia, is good but not first-rate. Reichardt's composition to Arndt's poem, "Was ist des Deutschen Vaterland?" (What is the German's fatherland?) is of much the same calibre, or a little below it, being less happy in form and rhythm, less melodious, and too diffuse. The words are now becoming irrelevant; Germans need no longer ask what their fatherland is, or complain of its boundaries being too narrow.

The French have no national anthem, properly so called: war-songs, like La Marseillaise, (written and composed by Rouget de Lisle, 1792), "Le Chant du départ," and "La Parisienne," cannot claim that title. The last named is the best of the three; it is yet more chivalrous and exciting than the "Marseillaise," and contains some more excellent phrases. The "Chant du départ" was written by M. J. Chénier and composed by Méhul, 1792; the music is rather uninteresting and span-out. "Mourir pour la patrie" is also, upon the whole, insipid and unattractive; the words are good. Louis Napoleon attempted to establish the pretty song, "Partant pour la Syrie," partly composed, it is said, by Queen Hortense, as the national anthem of France, but of course failed to do so: the air would suit a small state, like Belgium, well enough, but is too trivial for a great country like France.

The national anthem of Norway, composed by Blom, is bold and vigorous, superior to that of Denmark and even to that of Holland (by Van Bree), which last has considerable merit; that of Russia, by Alex. Lwoff, is mawkish; (?) it aims at a certain dignity which it does not attain. That of Belgium, "Le Chant du Belge," by Bouillon, is of no higher order, though one degree better, and less sentimental, than those of Portugal and Poland. The Spanish Hymn, "Viva el Rey," is not without power; the Roman hymn, in praise of Pio Nono, composed by Magazzari, is about on a level with that of Garibaldi, viz., not above mediocrity. The American hymns, "The Star-Spangled Banner" and "Hail Columbia," of which the former is the best, are animated strains, but tinged with a certain vulgarity of style; "The American Banner" is far superior to both, but is not as well known. Some of the English, Irish, Scottish, and Welsh popular airs are so fine that they might justly be termed national songs: among the foremost of these are "Scots, wha hae," "The young May morn," "Of noble race was Shenkin," "The march of the men of Harlech," "Charlie is my darling," "Hearts of oak," and "Home, sweet home." Several of the German Volkslieder are also very felicitous, such as the Blücher song, "Gaudemus igitur," "Am Rhein, am Rhein," "From high Olympus," Weber's songs from Körner, the Dessauer march, &c. The martial song, "Es zieht ein König hinaus" (A King goes forth to war), is an admirable specimen of the modern German popular ballad: simple yet effective, homely, yet artistic; the words are equally praiseworthy. Among the modern airs of a still more elevated patriotic character, which seem destined to become national, are Pierson's "Ye mariners of England," Brinley Richards's "God bless the Prince of Wales," Boncourt's "France, à toi mon cœur, mes vœux," and a song which lately appeared at Rome, "Bella Italia," by a young composer whose name has not reached us. It is to be regretted that the spirited and forcible old French air, "Vive Henri quatre," should have fallen into complete desuetude.

Our readers will gather from these observations that musical power of a peculiar and very high class must be possessed by the composer of a national anthem which deserves the epithet "first-rate;" the very limited number of such productions proves how rare is that power. Preeminent among them stands the triad "God save the Queen," "Segne der Himmel dich," and "Rule Britannia."

Music in English Schools.

THE BATTLE OF THE METHODS.

(From the Daily Telegraph.)

Under the system of Government patronage of Education which Mr. Forster's Act superseded, music, in common with other "non-essentials," found but scant encouragement. Indeed, no special arrangements whatever were made for its promotion; and such culture of the art as is possible in elementary schools went on without authoritative supervision—every man engaged in doing precisely that which was right in his own eyes. We are not going to waste words in condemnation of this system, or, rather, no-system. It is overland done with; all that we have left as witnesses to its existence being the backward state of musical knowledge among the people, and the fact that we are now seeking to establish, for the first time, a really national education in music. But it is important to observe that the old state of things allowed the rise and growth of various methods of teaching, and, by giving liberty of trial to all, afforded data which may prove of the utmost value. How fully this liberty has been used is shown in the remarkable development of what is called "Tonic Sol-fa," a plan of instruction to which we cannot refer without promptly acknowledging the energy and devotion of its advocates. Altogether apart from the merits or demerits of their system, Mr. Curwen and his zealous lieutenants must be credited with having shown an earnestness of purpose, a power of organization, and a resolution to stop at nothing short of complete success, which go far to explain the position their cause now holds. So rapidly has "Tonic Sol-fa" spread over the land, and so readily have other methods yielded ground to it in primary schools, that little discernment was required to foresee a sharp struggle if ever the question arose of adopting a national system. As yet that struggle has been evaded by the habit of compromise dear to English statesmen, and "Tonic Sol-fa" now enjoys equal rights with the "old notation;" that is to say, it is recognized and accepted by the Government as a means of instruction in the art. Compromise, however, generally involves difficulties, more or less serious, on points of detail; and in this case such a result was both certain and speedy. Government teaching necessitates Government supervision; but who should supervise so as to hold the balance equally between two opposing systems, each backed by zealous and, after the fashion of musical people, morbidly sensitive partisans? This was the question the Education Department had to answer; and, while the Department pondered over it, the Tonic Sol-faists indulged in ominous forebodings of the result—the more prominent among them even going so far as to memorialize Mr. Forster in advance against the nomination of any one "hostile to a system so evidently true," and in favor of "an inspector unpugged to the support or discouragement of any particular method."

On the face of it, their demand was fair enough; though, perhaps, it would have been more courteous to assume that responsible authority could not neglect considerations so obvious, and that any gentleman appointed to superintend musical education in our State schools would, whatever his personal sympathies, impartially discharge a public duty. But the Tonic Sol-faists have long had a déte noir in Mr. John Hullah, who is not only the chief promoter of a rival system, but also standing musical counsel at Whitehall. Mr. Hullah, it appears, has never made any secret of his very natural antipathy to "Tonic Sol-fa." On one occasion he declined to allow any music bearing his name to appear "in the so-called Tonic Sol-fa notation." In the capacity of Cantor Lecturer at the Society of Arts he referred to advocates of "new systems of musicography, the adoption of which would reduce all our musical heirlooms to the level of waste paper, and existing musical science and skill to the level of those advocates;" while, as an official reporter of the International Exhibition, he discovered one of the greatest advantages of the "Tonic Sol-fa" system in the fact that "objections to it are only appreciable by those who have cultivated the art and science somewhat closely." Human nature being what it is, we are not surprised that the Tonic Sol-faists anticipated with dismay the appointment of Mr. Hullah as Inspector of Vocal Music in Training Colleges and Schools. The prospect of seeing their arch-antagonist clothed with supreme authority was enough to excite the most oppressive among them, and the whole "Tonic Sol-fa" army grimly waited the decision which would summon it to arms. That decision came; Mr. Hullah was nominated to the post, and the fight began. Beyond all question, there is much to be said in favor of the new Inspector. Whatever the merits of his own system of teaching — happily, we are not called upon to discuss them here — Mr. Hullah has devoted his life to the cause of musical education; he has long held a distinguished place in the ranks of those who profess his art; and his official connection with the Education Office gave him a claim which could hardly be overlooked. It is difficult, therefore, for an impartial observer to question the action of the Government in this matter. A new post being created, Mr. Hullah was found to have that sort of prescriptive right to it which English procedure invariably recognizes; and he was inducted almost as a matter of course. Nevertheless, we can readily imagine a more happy conjunction of circumstances. It is unfortunate, for example, that Mr. Hullah is chiefly known as the promoter of a particular method of instruction; and it is yet more unfortunate that he has shown himself intolerant of rivals. These facts must, of necessity, awaken distrust, and, for a time at least, affect his usefulness by placing an obstacle in the way of hearty co-operation between himself and those who do the actual work of teaching.

But we are far from sharing the extreme alarm of the Tonic Sol-fa-ists, whose zeal for the cause has perturbed their judgment. In the first place, Mr. Curwen and his followers may rest assured that no Government Inspector, be he Mr. John Hullah or any one else, can retard a movement which has acquired the momentum of "Tonic Sol-fa." The results of the method are too obvious, and its hold upon the masses is too firm, for the opposition of a single individual, however highly placed, to have much effect. Whether Mr. Hullah likes it or not, the movement which, in a few years, has given the elements of sound musical knowledge to tens of thousands of our countrymen will go on; and we are surprised that its promoters have so little faith as their present flight indicates. In the next place, between Mr. Hullah the professor and teacher, and Mr. Hullah the Inspector, there is a wide difference. Office and its attendant responsibility have a sobering influence, often transforming even the rampant partisan into a calm and impartial balancer of conflicting opinions. Mr. Hullah, we doubt not, will rise to the level of duties which demand that he shall be no longer the advocate but the judge, prepared to act without "fear, favor, or affection."

Music Abroad.

LEIPZIG. The 20th and last Gewandhaus Concert had a purely Beethoven programme, namely: Overture to Coriolan; Fantasia for piano, chorus and orchestra (the piano part by capellmeister Reinecke); and the Ninth Symphony.

The programmes of the 20 concerts and the two benefits are thus summed up in the Signale:

Symphonies.—Beethoven: Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 8, 9; Mozart: in E flat and G minor; Schumann: Nos. 3 and 4; Gade: Nos. 4 and 8 (new); Mendelssohn: "Scotch;" Haydn, in E flat;" one by Abert; No. 1 by Jadassohn; Schubert: unfinished Symphony in B minor, and Andante from the "Tragic Symphony."

Overtures. — Mendelssohn : Midsummer Night's Dream, Melusine, Rußland; Beethoven : Coriolan, Leonore Nos. 2 and 3; Cherubini : Anacreon, Les Abencerrages; Weber : Jubilee Overture, Freyschutz; Mozart : Zauberflöte, Figaro; Méhul : Joseph; Rietz : in A major; Auber : Masaniello; Reinecke : King Manfred; Volkmann : Richard III; Bargiel : Medea; Gade : Ossian; Dietrich : Die Normannenfahrt.

Other Orchestral Pieces. By Joachim : 2 Marches ; J. S. Bach : Suite in D ; Franz Lachner : Suite No. 6 ; Goldmark : Scherzo ; Rubinstein : Don Quixote.

Violin Concertos, &c.—Spohr: Nos. 7 and 9: Mozart; Mendelssohn; David: No. 5; Schubert: Rondo brillant, op. 70, arr. by David.

Piano Concertos. &c.—Beethoven: No. 3 (in C minor), No. 4 (G), and choral Fantasia; Schumann: in A minor, and Concertstück in G; Reinecke; Grieg; Litolff: Concerto-Symphonique, No. 3; Chopin: in F minor; Mendelssohn: Rondo brillant in E flat.

Concertos for Violoncello.—By Haydn; Goltzmann; No. 3; Lindner.

Concertos for several Instruments—Mozart, for two pianos; Handel, for 2 obligato violins, obligato violoncello and string orchestra.

Smaller Solo pieces with and without accompaniment.
—1) For Pianoforte: Schumann: Andante in F (transcription), "In der Nacht" (from Fantasiestücke, op. 12), No. 4 of "Nachtstücken," op. 22, Scherzino from the "Faschingsschwank;"—Chopin: Notturmo in D flat (twice), Scherzo in B minor, Ballade in G minor;—Leshchetizki: L'Aveu (Romanza), Mazurka;—J. S. Bach: Prel. and Fugue in A minor (trans. by Liszt), Prel. and Fugue in E flat minor (from the "Well-tempered Clavichord");—Mozart: Fantasia and Fugue in C minor;—Tausig: Hungarian Gypsy dances;—Gluck: Gavotte (transcribed by Brahms);—Schubert: Impromptu in F minor, (op. 142).—2)

For Violin: Rietz: Allegro;—Leclair: Sarabande and Tambourin;—Vitali: Chaconne (with piano acc. by David);—Auer: Rêverie; Paganini: Caprice.—3) For Violoncello: Lübbeck: Serenade;—Vieuxtemps: Rêverie;—Piatti: Tarantella.—4) For Harp: Parish-Alvrs: Fantasia on Italian motives;—Aptommas: Fant. on Welsh melodies.

Choruses and Ensemble pieces.—Fr. Lachner: Requiem (twice);—Schumann: Manfred, and Faust music (3d part);—Gade: Comala;—Handel: ‘L’ Allegro, il Pensieroso ed il Moderato;—Mendelssohn: Loreley finale;—Mozart: Ave Verum, and Sextet from Don Juan;—Dietrich: Morning Hymn;—Max Bruch: Frithjof at his father’s tomb.

Arias with Orchestra.—Mozart: one from Figaro, Scene and Rondo with piano obligato, one from Titus, Concert Aria (Alcandro, lo confesso"); —Beethoven: from Fidelio, and "Ah perfido"; —Spöhr: two from Faust; —Rossini: from Semiramide, and Il Barbiere; —Weber: from Euryanthe; —Holstein: from the "Haideschacht"; —Méhul: from "Joseph"; —Rossi: from "Mitrame"; —Marschner: from "Hans Heiling"; —Boieldieu: from "John of Paris"; —Bach: from the Whitsuntide Cantata.

Songs with Piano: 10 by Schubert; 5 by Schumann; 3 by Mendelssohn; 2 by Mozart; 1 each by Weber, Wagner, Lassen, Brahms, Reinecke, J. S. Bach, Löwe and Robert Franz.

Of the works above named 14 were heard in Leipzig for the first time.

The Operas given in the Leipzig Stadttheater during the month of March were: Wagner's Meistersinger and Fliegender Holländer; Fidelio; Frey-schütz; Boieldien's Dame Blanche; Aubert's Le Mac-con, and Fra Diavolo; William Tell; and Fr. Lachner's Catharina Cornaro, composed 30 years ago.

DUESSELDORF. The programme of the approaching 49th Lower Rhine Musical Festival, which is to be held at Düsseldorf during Whitsuntide next, will comprise the following performances. Upon the first day: a cantata of J. S. Bach, in which all the principal soloists will take part, and of which the finale will consist of a grand Hallelujah chorus; Beethoven's No. 8 Symphony in F major, and Handel's Ode to St. Cecilia's Day. Upon the second day: Schumann's Symphony in D minor, Schubert's "Miriam's Song of Victory," soprano solo and chorus, with an orchestral accompaniment composed by F. Lachner; an overture of Weber's, and Rubinstein's sacred opera entitled the "Tower of Babel." Of eminent singers the following have already announced their intention of assisting, viz., Parepa Rosa, Herr Vogl (tenor), from Munich; Herr Grra (baritone), from Leipzig, and Herr Auer (solo violinist), from St. Petersburg. The joint conductors are Anton Rubinstein and Director Tausch. Rubinstein will play himself one of Beethoven's Concertos on the third day, for which the programme is not yet definitely agreed upon. The German press is of opinion that the festival will be very brilliant and interesting.

At the first concert given by the Evangelical Association of Singers under their new director, Herr Theodor Ratzenberger, the programme included, among other pieces, two sacred choruses by Hauptmann, and Historie des Leidens und Sterbens unseres Herrn Jesu Christi (History of the Passion and Death of our Lord Jesus Christ), recitative and choruses from the Four Passions, by Heinrich Schütz, who died in 1672. Between the works of the above two composers, Herr Ratzenberger played the Prelude, Fugue, and Capriccio from the D minor Suite, by Handel, and Sonata, Op. 97, No. 2, by Beethoven.

VIENNA. The Seasons was performed on Palm Sunday by the Haydn Academy. The solos were entrusted to Mr. Adams (American), Dr. Krücker, and a debutante, Mdlle. Meysenheim. The young lady appeared instead of Miss Minnie Hauck, (American), who was prevented from singing by indisposition.

After a lapse of some fourteen years, Anton Rubinstein's sacred opera, "Paradise Lost," has once more been presented to the notice of the musical public of Vienna. When last produced here, in 1859, it was given in an unpromising manner by the members of the old "Musikverein." This winter, however, the work was taken in hand by the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, a powerful and influential body, at whose concerts Rubinstein has officiated as conductor since November last; and at their extra concert on the 26th of March, the opera, in a more finished and attractive form, was given before a numerous and critical audience. With the exception of a few passages which remind the hearer of Schumann and Mendelssohn, the composition is quite original. The first part, especially, is very fine, and contains some exceedingly beautiful music, treating the defeat of Satan's army by the legions of heaven. The second part is also replete with good points; in fact the creation act, as it is called, may be considered by many to be the finest portion in the work. There is a very prettily arranged duet between Adam and Eve, and a splendid chorus in this part; these two numbers will in all probability be always very popular. The third part is devoted to the fall of our first parents and their ejection from the Garden of Eden, finishing with the promise of the delivery of mankind. The orchestral introduction to this part is finely arranged, and appeals strongly to the sympathy of the audience. The tenor, supposed to be the voice of the Almighty, is very difficult to sustain; and, with the exception of a lovely solo, has a somewhat uninteresting and unthankful part. Satan, on the other hand, is more favored, most of his solos being greatly applauded; in fact, he has a grateful task to perform.

The audience was unusually large, notwithstanding that it was an Italian opera evening, by which many, who otherwise would have attended, were prevented from being present, as they could not resist the attraction of Adelina Patti. Why the work should ever have been entitled a "sacred opera" is an enigma to most people, for it is nothing more nor less than an oratorio pur et simple; as such, however, it will always command the attention of choral societies, for new modern compositions of worth are in these days but too rare.

The winter musical season is now quite over, and open air concerts will soon be the rage again. In no other capital of Europe is such fine music to be had in public gardens as in Vienna. Besides the regular music performed at parade in the day-time, almost every public garden can boast of an evening concert al fresco, where, seated at a small table enjoying a glass of the famous beer of Vienna, or a cup of coffee, the music loving inhabitants can listen to the strains of a splendid orchestra. The celebrated conductor Herr Edward Strauss is, however, just at present carrying on a warfare against the proprietors of one of these gardens, where, year after year, he has performed with his world-renowned band. The bone of contention is this: Herr Strauss considers that the noise of cups and saucers, dominoes and ice plates, not to speak of the clatter of the tall beer glasses used, must of necessity interfere with the true enjoyment of his music by those who can sit and listen without taking refreshment; and he therefore requires that a circle of three rows of chairs be placed around the orchestral platform, which seats are to be devoted to the true lovers of music. Such an arrangement does not meet with the approval of the proprietors of the "Volks' Garten," who, of course, derive their profit from the sale of refreshments to the frequenters of the garden, to which a very trifling entrance fee is charged. If, therefore, connoisseurs were to be treated to music almost gratis, ruin might stare the proprietors in the face in a very short time. They have of course refused to agree to the proposal of Herr Strauss, who has, on the other hand, declined to allow his band to perform. Who will have to give in it is difficult to say, but at present the musician has the public in his favor; a natural sequence, for the public is the party who will gain by the arrangement.

At the Italian opera, Lucia, Rigoletto, and Traviata have already been given before crowded audiences. Not only has Patti been most enthusiastically received, but Graziani and the tenor Nicolini have also received a fair share of the public applause. Arditi conducts with his usual excellence, and, with the aid of a capital orchestra and chorus, gains one success after the other. A concert was given on Easter Monday for the benefit of "La diva," for which every seat was taken days and days before, and an enormous profit made.—Corr. Mus. Standard.

Another personal friend of Beethoven's has gone from among us. Herr Anton Halm died on the 6th inst., in his eighty-fourth year. He was particularly eminent as a teacher, and many leading German pianists were his pupils. He continued to perform his professional duties up to the time of his decease. Among the novelties at the third concert of the Sing-Academie may be mentioned an "Ave Maria" by Franz Liszt, and two Scotch National Melodies, arranged by Herr Weinwurm. The other pieces included an "Adoramus" by Palestrina, Mendelssohn's hymn, "Lass, o Herr, mich Hilfe finden," Op. 96: Mozart's Sonata for Piano and Violin, in A major, and a selection of the National Songs arranged by Beethoven for a Single Voice and Trio Accompaniment.

LONDON. The Pall Mall Gazette, judging by the number of representations at the London Opera Houses, considers Donizetti the most popular of all the Italian composers. Bellini is constantly represented at both establishments—above all, when a new prima donna undertakes to fascinate the public—by that ever fresh musical idyll the Sonnambula. A tragic prima donna, at very rare intervals (the taste for tragic prima donnas having gone out), favors us with Norma; and attempts are now and then made to interest the public in I Puritani, which, however, full as it is of beautiful music, is not a beautiful work considered as a whole; it cannot be said to keep the stage with any thing like a firm footing. Beatrice di Tenda, Il Pirata, &c., need not be mentioned; they are forgotten. Rossini's great representative work—perhaps the most characteristic, certainly the most popular—is his perpetually recurrent, always delightful Barbiere. It is to be feared that Guillaume Tell is more admired than it is liked; though, not to speak of more palpable beauties, its ballet music alone (the first and last that Rossini wrote) ought to endear it to all lovers of pure melody. To such, too, Semiramide must recommend itself. The three operas just named—each so different from the two others—are all that remains in still vigorous life of the long series of operas composed by Rossini. Donizetti, however, though he has produced no one work flowing with melody, as with milk and honey, like Semiramide, no musical comedy to be compared to Il Barbiere, no musical drama to approach Guillaume Tell, is always before the public with one or more of the seven or eight operas from his pen which are still found valid and fit for representation. Lucrezia, Linda, Lucia, Don Pasquale, La Figlia del Reggimento, are frequently presented, while La Favorita is one of the stock pieces of the Royal Italian Opera, where L'Elisir d'Amore may also be heard, though not so often as many would desire.

MILAN.—We lately attended the opera of "Der Frieschutz" at "La Scala," and all former performances paled in comparison. An orchestra of one hundred performers gave the overture as I never before heard it, and the artists engaged were all good. Francesca Saar as Agathe, Perotti as Max, Maini as Caspar, and an immense chorus; you should have heard the Huntsman's Chorus—recalled three times. A ballet was introduced and danced to the music of the "Invitation to the Waltz." The prima donna (a new one) has already been engaged for one of the two opera houses in London. The Incantation scene produced the desired weird effect, and not the ludicrous one so often presented. It was indeed diabolical! . . .

"Aida" is still on the boards at "La Scala," and will conclude the season, with the close of this month; there are, however, to be Spring seasons at the "Carcano," and a new theatre not yet finished. Have I told you what a swarm of artists there are here? There are one hundred and forty-four sopranos, three hundred and seven contraltos, seventy-one tenors, seventy baritons, and fifty-five basses; of these two hundred and seventy-seven, one hundred and forty-four have no engagements whatever; while those remaining are fulfilling Spring engagements in the innumerable theatres scattered over the world; wherever Italian Opera is given. . . .

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 18, 1872.

Hints on Musical Worship.

Have we determined in what sense Music may fitly intervene in a true act of worship? What kind and quality of service ought we to expect of this divine Art, to secure its best aid to the religious life?—We simply offer a few hints.

1. Music, whether in the church or out of the church, must be treated with the respect due to it. It must be dealt with as principal, and not as mere subordinate and "handmaid" to some other language, or some form or dogma; not as a mere vehicle for sacred words, but as a thing sacred in itself. We want to avail ourselves, in worship, of the religion which is in all real and high music; which is of its very essence; that interior religion, though it be untaught, unformulated, out of which all great, inspired, enduring music, of whatever form, originally sprang.

Words may go with it (sometimes such marriages are made in heaven, sometimes not); but good music has itself a meaning and a mission deep and true and high as any words. All words are more or less ambiguous, but true music is a direct, transparent medium of the living Word. If it be coupled with words, let them not be doctrinal, sectarian words; let them not be cold, conventional creed statements or professions, nor imposed formulas of ritual, which, even with the sweetest choirs to chant them, have such a fatal tendency to mere lip service, — lifeless routine. But let them be such words—sweet, simple poems gushing from the heart's pure springs—as lend themselves most unobtrusively and sympathetically, as by a foreordaining fate or kindred genius, to some true melody, conspiring with it to give expression to the emotions of a soul that yearns for God, for perfect life and love. There should not, therefore, be too many words. Those little snatches of word song which refresh us so in Shakespeare and in Goethe have proved the fittest of all poetry for music. It should be so with hymns and anthems.

Are our musical means limited to the simplest, to hymn-tunes and chorales of the people? Then it is better that each Tune remain coupled with its own Hymn, as if they had grown up together, and could not safely be dissociated,—as has been very much the practice with the German Chorals,—rather than it be used as a vehicle to wash down indefinite scores of stanzas of the given metre, or sugar-coat whatever pills may match in calibre. A moderate number, even a few genuine tunes, with the divine spark in them, (and none the worse for age), indissolubly wedded to a like few spontaneous, short, sweet poems, may answer the real needs of worship better than the thousands of new psalm tunes manufactured every year to sell. Is greater variety needed? Seek it in higher forms of Art; in those wondrous transformations or developments which the divine alchemy of Harmony and Counterpoint, as understood by Bach and Handel, or by Mendelssohn, can bring forth from the pregnant germs of the plain Choral.

2. Let it be considered that mere Melody, in unison, is but a flickering, faint foregleam of complete Music in full Harmony; just as the pretty warblings of the birds are only vague foregladowings and prophecies of real human music. Mere melody is personal and human; Harmony is divine. All tunes, as such, grow commonplace and stale by frequent repetition,—inevitably sinking into sing-song; but by the divine power of Art, developing what is implied in them, harmonizing them, "setting" them in polyphonic parts, they are rescued from decay and clothed with a perennial freshness. Because in Nature every vibrating column of air begets shorter vibrations of each subdivision of itself; every tone carries in itself a little faintly-heard aerial choir of harmonics, or accompanying overtones; and Art has learned to make this secret palpable to common hearing by weaving voice-parts into a web of harmony. The organ builder puts these overtones into his mixed or compound stops; and now it has been discovered that the power and brilliancy and rich tone-color of the individual human voice depends upon the presence of these overtones blended with the principal tone. A perfectly harmonized Choral, like those by Bach, is almost a miracle of art and beauty.

Unison, in great masses, sometimes seems to imply and suggest harmony. Unison of voices, with accompanying harmony of instruments, is next best to no harmony at all. Alternate unison and harmony—the congregation singing one verse of the hymn in unison, with organ accompaniment, and a trained choir, unaccompanied, taking up the next verse in harmony—suggests, as we have heard it in Berlin, celestial choirs echoing our coarser human strains transfigured.

3. The music of worship should be free from all distracting, alien, frivolous associations. Old sentimental songs or ballads made into psalm-tunes, opera choruses turned into anthems, snatches from Verdi and Donizetti used for organ voluntaries, so common nowadays in Italy, are above all to be avoided. Better silence than such mockery of music.

4. The more one deepens in his musical experience and feeling, the more he loves the music that is impersonal. "Pure music" (i. e. music without words) gains new charm and influence over him, the more he penetrates into the sphere of tone. Hence instrumental music of a high character—which is sometimes more available than satisfactory singing—is eminently in place in our ideal temple. The wholesome, profound, infinitely suggestive organ compositions of Sebastian Bach, the sublime orchestral symphonies of Beethoven:—why shall not these exert that inspiration in the holy place, which they so often do in concert rooms? How can our souls be stirred so deeply, as they often have been by the Andante of the Fifth Symphony, by the Funeral March in the Eroica or the heavenly Adagio in the Ninth, and not be, for the time being at least, religious, feeling nearer God, and nearer to all pure and noble souls?—It is only asked that Music should begin to be that quickening spirit in the church that she so often is, even amid incongruous surroundings, elsewhere. They that know the experience of being completely transported, raised above all fear, all meaner thoughts of earth and self, under a Beethoven Symphony, can well believe that Music has but very feebly yet fulfilled its mission as an element in public worship.

5. Again, quality before quantity. Good music, even the best and purest, and most potent, may be had on a small scale. True Art is modest, is not ambitious to do things it may boast of, so much as to achieve something perfect in its kind however small. All vain musical display and sounding advertisement, all bravura and mere music of effect, is false in Art and ministers to no religious feeling. And do not think vast numbers, monster proportions, a "bigger chorus than the world ever saw," essential, or even favorable, to true sublimity or grandeur. The whole world cannot be got together under one roof made with hands; compared with all mankind (who ought to be singing, or sung to, together, to carry out the theory of these gigantic efforts), the difference between "twenty thousand singers" and only a few hundred is inconsiderable; whereas a Handel "Hallelujah" or a Bach Chorus, or a "Rain" chorus in "Elijah," can impart all its meaning, all its inspiration, through a choir of half a thousand voices, with good orchestra and organ, in a good-sized music hall, or a cathedral. The miracle resides, after all, in the composition itself, and not in any magnifying glass of countless armies of executants. A pigmy seen through such a lens, of however high a power, will still look like a pigmy; whereas an artist of real genius will paint you a giant who will be a giant even on the smallest canvas. Let not our All Souls temple, therefore, be a vain glorious "Coliseum!" But could some reasonable, unambitious, sincerely religious, sincerely musical, artistic temple rear itself in the midst of every free, intelligent community, then indeed would all the people, all the nations be practically celebrating a Festival of Peace and Good-will.

6. But finally, and above all, if we would have true and quickening religious Music, we must believe in ART. Art is that form of human energy which most resembles the Divine. The true artist is a creator also in his feeble way. Art, if it be true, is always earnest, always seeks perfection; it aspires forever; and therein is it religious. To think of having true religious music by shutting Art out, in the idle interest of what we call "simple," "unsophisticated," "popular," is the sure way to run into all sorts of affectation and of shallow sentimentalism. Music has not done its great work in the churches, because great music has not been believed in. Can real vital piety afford such mean economy?

Concerts.

We suppose the really good music is all over now, and we must wait for more until the cool autumn months bring back the social summer. The few scattering concerts of the last two weeks, which we have now to mention, fairly wind up a season unprecedented for the number, the variety and average excellence of its musical entertainments. The coming winter doubtless will afford as many and as good; for there is solid culture, real progress going on in spite of the strange things which speculative "Rings" can conjure up here in poor Boston, which least of all our cities merits the infliction. Winter will show that we do still love Art, and are not lost to all sense of the modesty of Art. Meanwhile flaring advertisement will keep truth blushing out of sight; charlatanism usurp the name of "Boston," the whole country, nay all nations, to give show of character to a gigantic folly purely of its own invention for its own ends; and through the "heated term" the Gilmore dogstar rage, while real music lovers seek relief and "peace" by seashore and among the mountains, or in unprecedented numbers make the trip to Europe, happy to get far away from the doomed city to which "the world" is so grandiloquently bidden. If we could bid the world to see our average ordinary work in music, so far as it can be called Art or culture, if musical society abroad would only read the list of Oratorios and Operas, of Symphonies, and Chamber Music, which draw good audiences in Boston in any single winter, we should make upon the whole a favorable impression; but if our musical character abroad is to be measured by these exceptional demonstrations, if our land is to be looked upon in music chiefly as the peculiar home of these vain-glorious monster "Jubilees," the only land where such are possible, it is a bad reputation for us to have, and quite unjust, too, if not to our average civilization, at least to a city where education is esteemed as it is here in Boston. Depend upon it, these things prejudice the best, the real musical and moral opinion of the world against us. It is not the great musical names in Europe, not the Mendelssohns and Schumanns, nor those who may in any sense be called their followers, that countenance or flatter these "big" enterprises put upon us in the name of Music and of Peace.

But, to come back to Music—the concerts of the last two weeks.

Mr. Laro's fourth and last "Symphony Concert" was not a Symphony Concert at all. But for all that, though there was not an orchestra, it was a fine feast, and there were instruments enough for the small hall, so many and of such variety as to show the connecting link between an Orchestral and the usual Quartet or Quintet Chamber Concert. Three noble works, each rich in matter and of formidable length, were admirably rendered. The first was the well-known Beethoven Septet,—though not so well known as it should be in its proper form, for violin, viola, horn, clarinet, bassoon, 'cello and double bass. These instruments were all ably handled, and the whole work, in all its many movements, was keenly relished. Yet we think the effect much improved when all the strings of an orchestra are employed, as they were in the Thomas Concerts.

Hummel's masterpiece, the Septet, in which the pianoforte plays the principal part,—and in its rendering Mr. G. W. SUMNER proved himself already an accomplished artist, uniting fine technique with true expression,—was also given very satisfactorily, the wind instruments, particularly the oboe, being better than we were accustomed to in former years.—After such double length of Septuor, nothing could have proved more refreshing than the Bach Concerto in C, for three pianos, which were most evenly and distinctly played by Mr. SUMNER, Mr. ADAMS and Mr. TUCKER. It was a sweet and wholesome ending to a choice and enjoyable little after-series of concerts. With the accession of all these able young pianists Boston may feel rich indeed in that department.

Mr. KUTZKE's Matinée on Thursday, May 9, enlisted a good deal of interest among the lovers of good orchestral music, and the desire to retain so artistic an obol among us expressed itself in a good attendance. The concert itself was one of most beautiful of the many good chamber concerts of the season. It could not have been otherwise with such artists in such a programme:

Sonata, for Piano and Violoncello, Op. 69....Beethoven.
Messrs. Leonhard and Hartdegen.
Romanzen, for Oboe and Piano, Nos. 1 and 2, from Op. 94.....Schumann.
Messrs. Kutzke and Leonhard.
Piano Solos. { a. Nocturne, Op. 92, No. 1. } Chopin.
 { b. Mazurka, Op. 28, No. 3. }
 Mr. Hugo Leonhard.
{ Sonata, G minor, for Oboe.....Handel.
 { Siciliano, for Oboe.....Bach.
 Messrs. Kutzke and Leonhard.
Trio, for Piano, Violin, and Violoncello, Op. 68 D minor.....Schumann.
In four movements.
Messrs. Leonhard, Eichberg and Hartdegen.

All the compositions had been given during the winter in the concerts of Messrs. Leonhard and Eichberg, and were among the very best things of that series; particularly the Beethoven Duo, and that magnificent impassioned Trio by Schumann. And the interpreters entered fully into the spirit of each work. All went to a charm. Mr. Kutzke, by his rich, sweet tone, his artistic accent, clear phrasing, and true expression, established himself still more in favor as a superior master of one of the most difficult of instruments. The Pastoral Romanzas by Schumann, written in the very genius of the oboe, charmed especially.

That was a very interesting Matinée given last Tuesday in Wesleyan Hall by the Boston Conservatory, Mr. EICHBERG presiding. Between that beautiful and graceful first Sonata Duo, Op. 21, by Gade, and the exhilarating Trio, No. 7, in A, by Haydn (EICHBERG, LEONHARD and HARTDEGEN), Weber's Concertstück was played by a young pupil, Miss EMILY SPICER, with sure, clear, even execution throughout, and with such truly musical and vital accent, that no one could help listening to the end with interest.

Miss ANNE LOUISE CARY's Concert in the Music Hall, May 8, was a remarkably good one of its kind. Miss Cary herself, though suffering from a cold, gave most satisfactory proofs of her rich, evenly developed contralto voice, her polished ease of execution, and her musical expression in "Ah! quel giorno" from Semiramide; and besides some ballads, sang Milton's song: "Non conosci il suon" with real tenderness, if not like Nilsson. It is needless to say that she had the most cordial sympathy of her large audience. Miss BESSIE, of New York, a well trained, clear and flexible soprano, made an excellent impression in the Aria of Alice in Roberto: "Vanne, vanne," and in a ballad by Pease; but pleased still more by her charming rendering of the soprano solo in a vocal Quintet by Kücken: "Hilf thee Shallop," sung with the Temple Quartette of male voices. These four gentlemen sang several of their part-songs with their usual success. Mr. S. B. MILLS, the distinguished pianist from New York, added greatly to the interest by his masterly performance of Chopin's Impromptu, Op. 66, followed by his own graceful Etude Caprice: "Fairy Fingers," and of the "Soirées de Vienne" by Taubig, and Liszt's Fantasia on the "Midsummer Night's Dream." The youthful violinist, Miss PRANS EXEL, continues to fulfil the rare promise of her previous appearances in public. She played a Fantasia on themes by Bellini, and Bazzini's very taxing "Witches' Dance," keeping up the continual staccato of the latter with remarkable evenness and lightness.

PHILADELPHIA, MAY 10. Since my last we have had only two really interesting concerts. The first was Messrs. CROSS & JARVIS's third Symphony Concert, which was given at Musical Fund Hall on Saturday evening, April 27. This was the programme:

Symphony, No 1, B flat, Op. 38.....Schumann.
Concerto: Piano, Violin, and 'Cello, Op. 56....Beethoven.
Largo. Rondo alla Polacca.
Messrs. Jarvis, Kopta, and Hennig.
Concerto: Piano, E minor, Op. 11.....Chopin.
Mr. C. H. Jarvis.
Overture: "Leonora," No. 3.....Beethoven.

The Hall was comfortably filled with a rather appreciative audience. The playing of the orchestra in the Symphony showed careful rehearsing. In the first movement (Andante un poco maestoso) the execution lacked the energy which this and indeed all the movements of this Symphony require. This fault was more palpable in the latter part of the first movement (Allegro mollo vivace). The next two—the Larghetto and Scherzo—had been played by the Thomas Orchestra at one of their recent concerts here. These two Mr. Cross's orchestra played much more freely and intelligently than the other two numbers of this Symphony; but there was missing the delicate light and shade which abounds with Thomas. The wood instruments were a little out of tune in the cadenza sospesa cord which connects the two movements.

In the Beethoven Concerto all the artists acquitted themselves of their difficult task with great credit; the orchestra, too, was good.

The Chopin Concerto was admirably played by Mr. Jarvis. This concerto is marvellously difficult to interpret. Mr. Jarvis in the Romanza (Larghetto) did not appear fully possessed with the idea meant to be conveyed, but as to his execution he was perfect.

The Leonore Overture closed this most delightful series of concerts.

Miss ANNA JACKSON's Second Matinée of Chamber Music was given at the Foyer of Horticultural Hall on Friday afternoon, May 3. In addition to the quartet club, you will notice, by the annexed programme, that Mr. Gastel lent his valuable aid to the attractions of the concert.

String Quartet, No. 2. Mozart.
Air: "Liebe ist die erste Blüthe. Spohr.
Mr. Gastel.
Concerto: Violoncello. Lindner.
Mr. Henning.
Scherzo in B minor. Chopin.
Mr. Guhlmann.
Rheinisches Volklied. Mendelssohn.
Mr. Gastel.
String Quartet in A major. Schumann.

The opening quartet was excellently played, especially the Andante. It is a heavenly morceau, full of that delicate poetry which characterizes all Mozart's movements of this kind. The Minuetto, too, was very well given. Mr. Gastel in the Spohr Aria sang with much more spirit than usual; and the peculiar richness of his evenly-trained voice found very good opportunities to display itself in the exceedingly intricate ending of the air. Mr. Hennig in the third movement of the Lindner Concerto played in strict accordance to his reputation as an artist. Mr. Guhlmann was not strong in the Chopin Concerto; it requires of a performer great vivacity of energy and brilliant accuracy of execution; this latter Mr. Guhlmann certainly possesses, but not enough of æsthetical feeling.

The closing number was the noble A-major Quartet of Schumann. It was subject to the great fault of this club's performances; a lack of unity. The Assai Agitato and Allegro mollo vivace were very free from this fault, but the chief of all the movements—the Adagio—was greatly marred by its staring presence. N.

NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC. We take the following from the Tribune of May 6.

The concert of the Philharmonic Society on Saturday evening,—the last of the thirtieth season,—presented the following programme:

Symphony in C. Schubert.
"Schlummerlied," from the "Christmas Oratorio." J. S. Bach.
Miss Antoinette Sterling.
Concerto in A for the Piano. Mozart.
Mr. Richard Hoffman.
Andante from the Trio, opus 97. Beethoven.
Instrumented by Liszt.
Lieder. Schumann.
Miss Antoinette Sterling.
Symphonic Poem, "Mazeppa." Liszt.

This was one of the best concerts of the season. The orchestra was in capital trim, and gave an admirable interpretation of Schubert's great symphony of "heavenly length," albeit the pace in the accelerando of the third movement was a dangerous one. The execution was both spirited and graceful. So it was also in Liszt's arrangement of the well-known Beethoven Trio in B flat. Written for piano, violin, and violoncello, the composition seems to have undergone some curious change of spirit in the transcription for full orchestra; and effective as it is, the flavor of Beethoven is certainly missed. Liszt's "Mazeppa" is to our taste one of the least enjoyable of the series of "Symphonic Poems," so far as we have yet been made acquainted with them. The famous march, however, redeems it, and this was played on Saturday with true barbaric splendor of tone and well-measured vigor. Mr. Hoffman gave a delightfully intelligent and poetical interpretation of the Mozart Concerto, and Miss Sterling did justice to the very trying but beautiful Slumber Song from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio,"—a performance which the audience keenly appreciated. For her selections in the second part, this estimable artist took three songs from Schumann's Dichterliebe: "Ich grolle nicht" (No. 7), "Und wüsstest du die Blumen" (No. 8), and "Aus alten Märchen winkt es" (No. 15). Mr. Henry C. Timm, ex-President of the Philharmonic Society, played the accompaniments for her.

The season just closed has been a satisfactory but not a brilliant one. Only three novelties have been produced, namely, Mr. Ritter's fine symphony in E minor, Heinefetter's "Machbeth" overture, and a concerto of Reinecke's played by Mr. S. B. Mills. The symphonies have been Beethoven's "Pastoral" and "Heroic," Haydn's No. 13 in G, Raff's "Im Walde," Schumann's No. 4 in D, Schubert's No. 6 in C, and Ritter's No. 2. The overtures and other orchestral pieces have been Schumann's overture to "Julius Cæsar," Beethoven's "Coriolanus" and "Leonora" No. 3, Heinefetter's "Machbeth," Bargiel's "Prometheus," Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave," Wagner's Introduction to the "Meistersinger von Nürnberg," and Liszt's arrangement of the Beethoven Trio, "Les Preludes" and "Mazeppa." The instrumental solo performers were Mr. S. B. Mills, Miss Anna Mehlig, Mr. Richard Hoffman, Mr. Pruckner, Mr. Bergner, and Señor Sarasate, and the vocalists Mrs. Gulager, Miss Corradi, Miss Sterling, Mr. Remmert, and the Liederkrantz. It was in the vocal music that the concerts were notably deficient, though praise was certainly deserved by Miss Sterling and Mr. Remmert.

A Warning Unheeded.

In his lectures Upon German Composers, from S. Bach down to the present day, Emil Naumann cites some very remarkable observations made by a Frenchman concerning Der Freischütz. They are contained in a book, published at Paris more than twenty years ago, on Weber and his music, when Der Freischütz was first produced there, exciting by its peculiar and foreign character, an extraordinary sensation among the public and the press of the French capital. The patriotic author looked suspiciously at the opera with its huntsman casting magic bullets, and afraid of nothing and nobody, not even the devil himself; he fancied that behind these huntsmen he could perceive a whole nation of such young blades, and attempted to warn his countrymen by pointing out with what sort of a foe they would have to do, if they ever again felt inclined to attack a nation, whose courage, defying every danger, was so unmistakably demonstrated through the medium of its national composer. With a wonderfully correct presentiment of the fatal, though then distant, events hanging over his country, he remarks, in words doubly significant when uttered by a Frenchman: "Weber portrays in Der Freischütz the free life of the German huntsman in his woods, together with his love for home, and the maiden with the true blue eyes, to whom he has given his heart. To gain her he dreads neither death nor the devil. But such pictures of the German mind are not confined to Der Freischütz. The same fundamental national trait is to be found in the songs from Körner's Leyer und Schwert, as set to music by Weber. In Lützow's "Wilder Jagd," too, we find the same daring courage characterizing the German huntsmen. Only in the latter instance, the rifle is not directed against a stag with an attire of sixteen horns, but against the enemies of the German people, and German contempt for death here rises above devotion for one's bride to sacrifice for one's native land. "Let us, therefore, beware," he exclaims to his fellow-Frenchmen, "of again challenging these daring huntsmen, and this stubborn and heroic courage, for we are the foes at whom Weber and Körner aim. One would imagine that listening to the lightning-charged supernatural storm of Weber's 'wild hunt' in Der Freischütz, or the death-despising melodies of the male choruses: 'Du Schwert an meiner Linken,' and 'Was glänzt dort vom Walde im Sonnenschein,' would cure us of all eagerness again to compel the Germans to engage in a war of deliverance against us." The above observations would almost lead us to suppose that it was not the success of Prussian arms in 1866, but Der Freischütz, twenty years previously, which excited in the French the first patriotic misgivings, and first inflicted a painful wound on their self-confidence.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The Love of the Good and the True. Song and Chorus. 3. E♭ to e. Webster. 30
"And she whispered, O teacher, lead them To the love of the Good and the True." Get this, by all means, for Sabbath School Concert Singing. Very Sweet words and melody.

The Unfinished Prayer. Song and Chorus. 2. G to d. Webster. 35

And the dear voice softly whispered, "Mama, God knows all the rest!" A little gem of a song. One of the sweet "Mother and Child" melodies that always touch one's heart.

Evelyn. Song and Chorus. 3. G to d. Webster. 30

One morning in heaven the Angels Kept watch on the bright golden shore. Charming poem, and set to very pretty music.

O Loving Heart, Trust on! 4 B♭ to e. Gabriel. 30

It whispered low;—it whispered low "O loving heart, trust on!"

Varied accompaniment, with considerable expression. A song of delicate sentiments, and the kind that will please refined musical tastes.

Farewell, and May no Shadow Glide. Duet. 3. C to f. Seligson. 30

"As fades yon star, once bright, away Beneath the moon's supernal light." A smooth-going, melodious duet, with considerable originality.

Forget not the Loved Ones. Song and Chorus. 2. G to g. Christie. 35

"Oh, gentle and calm is the joy they have won These sleeping comrades of ours."

One of the Cooper-Christie songs that become so popular. Good for all the year, but especially appropriate to the coming Soldier's Memorial Day.

The Gleaning Song. 4. A to f. Pease. 35

"Whither away, thou little careless rover. Kind Roger's true!" Jean Ingelow wrote it. Full of neat poetic fancies, to which the composer has skillfully adapted both air and accompaniment.

Popular Comic Songs by Gus Williams, each 30

Two of the three (of this set) mentioned below are peculiar in not being comic songs exactly, but cheerful, popular ones, well calculated to "bring down the house." About the "Still I am not Happy," one will not doubt its comicality after hearing it once.

Pull Slow and Steady, Boys. 2. B♭ to e.

"If you wish to keep your bark afloat, And brave life's stormy weather, Never dip your oars too deep, But always pull together."

While there's Life there's Hope. 3. F to d.

But clinging to the rope, You hear the seamen whisper still, "While there's life there's hope."

Still I am not Happy. 3. C to e.

"I almost died of hunger, but, But still—I was not happy!"

Widow Mavrone. 3. E♭ to e. MacEvoy. 30

"Last night I lay slumbering awake and alone, I saw, at the foot of my bed, A terrible Ghost in blue blazes and red." He couldn't hump the widow. A genuine jolly Irish ballad, whose no-nonsense frisk merrily about like the feet of the dancers at Donnybrook.

The Bailiff's Daughter. 3. E♭ to e. Orenford. 30

"Give me a penny, thou prettiest good, Relieve a maid forlorn."

The tune is "from tradition." One of those sweet old English ballads that have almost passed from memory. It is a good work to revive them.

Instrumental.

Chici-Pipi-Nini. (Cuban Dance.) 5. A. Hoffman. 75

The quaint and peculiar guitar imitation occurs in this piece, but in new forms, and the ensemble is very pretty. A piece that will always secure a hearing.

Knickerbocker Galop Brillante. 3. f. Quigg 30

Very pretty Galop.

Arion Waltz. (by Vogel.) 4 hands. 3. D. Smith. 60

Almost easier than the 3d degree, and, as it is a fine waltz, will be an excellent duet for learners.

Ballade. Op. 19. 6. A♭. Leybach. 60

Rightly named a "Ballad," as the melody is simple and quiet, while the accompanying arpeggios, &c., are so graceful and smooth as not to distract attention from the theme. An enjoyable piece, and fine practice.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 813.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 1, 1872.

VOL. XXXII. No. 5.

The Charity Children at St. Paul's.

(From the London Choir. May 4.)

The public feeling in favor of anything which has, as people say, become "an institution," is proverbial, and it is a task of no slight difficulty to interfere with a society, a charity, or a practice, which has tradition and precedent in its favor. This it is, we imagine, which lies at the root of the maintenance of many of those charities which are obviously useless and out of date, while it is also accepted by the world as an apology for that most extraordinary of all proceedings, the charity dinner, when under the decent veil of philanthropy, men of education and refinement assist at what is by courtesy called a banquet, but would in reality be better designated by a far lower term. The same argument underlies a large number of our religious and social customs. Thus in the church, services which were never intended to be tacked on to each other have become so tightly joined together that it has been necessary to pass an Act of Parliament to enable bishops and clergy to reconcile it with their consciences to separate them. In the world the same rule holds good, and men and women still offer themselves up willingly as sacrifices on the altar of fashion, ruining their health, destroying their family comfort and, as a consequence, their family tempers, because society's laws are deemed inexorable, and rules which are so absurd that one wonders they were ever made, are held to be obligatory on all who come within the magic circle. This being the case, it is always a matter for satisfaction when some happy accident occurs to interfere with any practice which, though really undesirable, cannot be broken through because it has always been the rule; and it was thus with a decided feeling of relief that we recently read an announcement that the Annual Meeting of the charity children would not be held this year, at St. Paul's Cathedral, in consequence of the recent closing of the Church for the Thanksgiving Service, and the alterations and repairs now in progress. This we hail with satisfaction, not only because it will, for one year at least, interfere with what we have always regarded as a very undesirable proceeding, but because it must ultimately lead to the entire abolition of the service. The meeting has indeed one plea in its favor, inasmuch as it assists the cause of charity; but on the other hand, it has always seemed to us to furnish a singularly effective illustration of that very system of doing evil that good may come, which the highest authority has condemned. There are those, however, who bring forward several other arguments in favor of the great gathering, and we have for many years been regularly reminded of the touching effects produced by the singing of the juvenile choir, and the threadbare anecdotes of the remarks made by Berlioz, after listening to the unison of the young voices, have been repeated until people have at last begun to believe that they proved the case.

We regard the matter from another point of view altogether, and as we have sat—for duty has sometimes compelled us to "assist" in the proceedings—and watched the unfortunate children, we have felt that it was decidedly a case for the interference of one of the Humane Societies. To suppose for a moment that the meeting can be regarded by the children in the light of a religious service is palpably absurd. After having been marched in detachments in the early morning from various parts of the metropolis, the unfortunate scholars in their neat uniforms, which tell with such striking effect when massed in troops against the dark background of the dome, are, by a process easily to be imagined, seated on the narrow boards, where they remain in durance vile for many hours while the fashionable congregation in all the colors of the rainbow assembles. Then follows the service, in which the part taken by the children is very limited, and during the greater part of which they stand without Prayer Books, until the Bishop, or other dignitary, ascends the pulpit to preach about them to the congregation below. It is, in fact, a species of ecclesiastical baby-show, and is, as far as we can see, as little capable of defence as the exhibitions of this nature which have excited such just reprobation, on more than one occasion, across the Atlantic. Musically, there is little in the service to be proud of. The children take their part in a few easy chants and hymn tunes, proving most clearly that they are not as well taught as the young folks who assemble on the Handel Festival orchestra at the Crystal Palace under far happier auspices during the summer; and notwithstanding the effect which must always result from the combined voices of a number of young songsters, there is nothing of which the conductors have any cause to boast.

On all grounds, then, religious, musical, and social, we rejoice that a breach is at least to be made in this "time-honored custom," and that the "institution" is likely to be numbered with the things of the past. If the children are to be brought to church, let them, at least, be treated like Christians, and provided with books to use, and space to kneel, and above all let a sermon be preached to them, and not at them. Still more, let us no longer afford a spectacle which must make thoughtful men blush, by keeping up an exhibition which the public pay to see like any other sight and then go away flattering themselves that they have performed an act of charity by contributing the necessary sum to secure admission. Let all who have been in the habit of attending the Festival give their donations as before, and then instead of assembling the children at St. Paul's, let them enjoy a holiday at the Crystal Palace, and we shall have arrived much nearer to the true idea of charity.

The Opera at Naples.

(Correspondence of the London Telegraph.)

You will now guess what the only thing must be that can interest every class in this city of restless laziness and indolent activity. Will the opera remain open, or will the season be brought to a premature close? This is the burning question of the hour; this is the all-engrossing topic which, for the past fortnight, has absorbed the attention of savage and semi-civilized Naples. For weeks the pit of San Carlo has been like a bear garden; a few generous-minded individuals have endeavored to support the artists, but the great majority have spared none in their fierce desire to ruin the poor manager. Poor, did I call him? Why, in London he would be thought the luckiest of the lucky. He receives from the municipality a subvention of 350,000 francs (£14,000) for the first year of his contract, 250,000 francs (£10,000) for the remaining three years, and he has the handsomest theatre in the world—the largest but one—for nothing. He is compelled by his contract, a printed copy of which is now before me, to open the house at least eighty nights in the year; but he may also give performances every night of his life if he is inclined to do so. What would London managers, who pay £4,000 a year for the rent of a house, which, auditorium and stage, roof and cellars, might be put bodily into the pit of San Carlo, say to such conditions? But there is a reverse to the medal. A London manager may make a fortune, or ruin himself, at his own sweet will. The Neapolitan impresario is helpless in the hands of two governing bodies, who may, if they please, drive him to absolute ruin. He is bound in the minutest details by a contract, which, consisting of fifty-eight different articles, takes up twenty-nine folio pages of printed matter, and is actually furnished with an elaborate index of conditions and obligations. In this precious document every possible contingency is provided for as scrupulously as though the management of a theatre were the most important business which could be undertaken by a State. The exact constitution of the troupe is scrupulously laid down, and the artists are specified who are to be respectively di primo Cartello and di merito distinto. Moreover, the meaning of these terms is exactly defined. Thus an artist di primo Cartello must be in the full possession of his means and must not have been depreciated by singing or dancing in any second-class theatres; he must have sung or danced with complete success and with the rank conveyed by the epithet primo assoluto, in three theatres of the first rank. Similarly an artist di merito distinto must have fulfilled the same conditions which are here elaborately repeated, except that he need only have sung or danced with success in at least one first-class theatre in Italy or abroad. The impresario is also generously permitted to engage other artists, in addition to those forming the two specified companies, but only after the commission has verified the need of any such accession. The prospectus must be published a month and a half before the opening of the season, and if the impresario fails in this condition, he forfeits ipso facto the caution-money he has deposited. Methinks this clause would ill suit some London managers of whom I have heard. At every representation an entire opera and an entire ballet must be given, or a single opera ballo, provided this latter last not less than five hours! Of a truth, the Neapolitans are a thrifty race, and they insist on having their money's worth. The impresario is bound to give in each principal season two new operas; one must be new for Naples, but must have been performed elsewhere with success—the other must be a work written expressly by one of the three most famous living composers. Two new ballets must also be brought out, each consisting of not less than five acts. All novelties must have been produced at least twenty days before the close of the season. No comic nor serio-comic operas can be performed, unless they are by celebrated composers, and adapted to San Carlo: even if they fulfil these conditions, only two can be given in each season. Sundays, Thursdays, and high feast days must always be subscription nights. There must be in each season at least two "great illuminations" of the theatre—that is to say, the candles must be lighted in addition to the gas lamps. The "diapason normal" must be used "as in Paris and London and Milan"—a condition from which you will see, astute readers, that we English obtain credit for a virtue we do not possess. But surely the officials who drew up this elaborate document should have known that the English pitch is half a tone higher than the diapason normal. The firemen are to attend at the cost of the municipality, but any extra men employed by the manager must be paid by him at the exorbitant rate of twenty centimes an evening. He is, moreover, not to receive his subvention intact; there have to be deducted from it, according to the terms of this precious document, "sundry pensions to persons employed by the municipality, maintenance of machinery, and food for the cats." These expenses, including "food for the cats," are to be rated at rather more than seven thousand francs a month. Cats' meat must be an expensive article in Naples! It is not this, however, that is likely to ruin a manager, but the double government, for he cannot move a step without the consent of the municipal authorities and of the theatrical commission. Flagrant instances of the effect of this system we shall see anon.

The Neapolitan public has lately taken it into its multitudinous head that it does not get its full amount of justifiable enjoyment out of its great theatre. It has, therefore, hooted down every performance. I went one night to hear Anna Bolena. The first act was performed in silence. No sooner, however, had one unfortunate basso sung a false note, than the keenly appreciative and merciless public screamed with rage. This was the signal for the onslaught; and there arose such an uproar as in a tolerably long experience I have never heard within the walls of a theatre. All the evil blood of the people betrayed itself in an instant, and they hooted, and yelled, and gesticulated as though they had been possessed of devils; the place was like Pandemonium broken loose. Not a note could be heard, and at length the obnoxious basso walked off the stage. The concerted piece could not proceed without him; the other singers then wandered off, the prima donna, Mlle. Krause, being shrewd enough to make a low bow to the audience, for which she received a round of applause, and the curtain slowly fell. After a long delay, a paper was brought round to the boxes, stating that those who pleased might claim the return of their money, and that the evening would not count in the abbonement. Straightway there was a rush to the ticket-office; the "mean cusses" had heard half an opera for nothing; but the abonnés remained to enjoy the ballet on the same terms—the evening's amusement not being reckoned against them. "But why did the manager return the money?" you will ask. Simply because he was compelled by the authorities, some of whom are always present, to do so. The same thing happened with Beatrice di Tenda, and again with Lucrezia Borgia. The abonnés were tired of the operas they had heard all through the season, and they were determined not to have them any more until the promised new work had been brought out.

There was a truce in the hostilities for one night, when—it being the King's birthday, and not in the subscription—the theatre was lighted a giorno. The coup d'œil was superb, the two hundred private boxes all a-glow with the brilliant colors in which Italian dames luxuriate, the six hundred additional lights bringing out into strong relief all the admirably designed ornaments of this "golden house" of music, and the soft sheen of the tapers enhancing by contrast the fuller radiance of the sunlike globes round which they were clustered. Then the theatre was closed for many days after this event, and nothing was talked of but the forthcoming new opera. At last it was whispered about that the general rehearsal was fixed for Thursday. On such occasions the Municipality decides if the new work shall be given or no, and that august body alone has the privilege of inviting visitors. This time the authorities used their rights with a vengeance. When I looked down from a box on to the dimly-lighted house I could see hundreds of pale faces glimmering out of the gloom, like the ghostly spirits that look out of Gustave Doré's Dante designs. At least two thousand people must have been present. At first they were very quiet, but, as time wore on, from eight to nine, from nine to half past, and there were still no signs of beginning, the guests began to get impatient, and from the vast abyss of darkness which justified the name of pit, came up inarticulate yells. The musicians were all at their places, but lo! their desks were void of music. At last a gentleman stepped forward on the stage and explained that unforeseen circumstances would prevent the rehearsal from taking place that evening. The fact was that the publisher of the music would not deliver the orchestral parts until the price agreed upon had been paid. This was done the following morning, and the rehearsal announced for night; but when evening came the costumer was unpaid, and the trial had to be again postponed. Then the basso became importunate for money, but at last all financial difficulties were temporarily settled, the rehearsal took place, and was followed the next evening by the first performance. Much had been expected; for Petrella, although unknown in England, has for years been one of the most popular composers in the Peninsula. His best known work, Ione, founded on The Last Days of Pompeii, contains much attractive music, among which may be reckoned a spirited brindisi, for the tenor, a characteristic funeral march, and a love-duet, which, for delicacy and depth of feeling, may compare favorably with anything in modern opera. Petrella's Contessa d'Amalfi, based on the story of Octave Feuillet's Dalilah, is a still more successful work, and his Promessi Sposi, amid much that is rude and vulgar, contains one duet which is a true gem. His numerous productions can never satisfy the exacting musical connoisseur, for he has no power of development, but his well marked melodies, his keen feeling for dramatic effect, and his ad captandum contrast of forte and piano are certain to strike a musically illiterate audience. In Manfredo, his new work, he has flown at higher game, and has altogether missed his mark. The Italians blame him for imitating Wagner and the German school, but his new manner of writing is no more German than it is Chinese. His accompaniments are simply sledgey, incoherent, and unmeaning, while his themes are at least as trite as ever. He is too old, I imagine, to be able to modify his style to advantage, and I vastly prefer his early, unpretending productions to his last attempt at a higher school. He is also very unfortunate in his libretto. Manfredo has nothing to do with the Byronic tragedy, though it is quite as gloomy.

The prologue opens effectively; the curtain rises on the results of an orgie; groups of drunken cavaliers have fallen across the tables, which still groan under the weight of cups and flagons, and women, overcome with wine, are scattered about the floor of the banquet hall in all sorts of picturesque positions. Manfredo alone is awake; and, taking up one after another the senseless hand of some fair courtesan, he soliloquizes on the vanity of all earthly joys. His kätzchenjammer, as the Germans would call it, is interrupted by the entrance of a pilgrim from the Holy Land, who informs Manfredo that his mother was innocent—we had not heard that she was guilty—and that she was falsely denounced by the penitent. Manfredo naturally kills on the spot the self-accusing pilgrim, and is incontinently repudiated by his associates for breaking the laws of hospitality. Thus ends the prologue, which consists of a long recitative, unrelieved by a melodious phrase. The three acts of the play are taken up by the loves of Lina and Rannuccio, who, to be married, need the permission of their feudal Lord, the Duke of Scilla. Manfredo has a liaison with the Duchess, and a meeting is in danger of being discovered by the Duke, when, Lina sacrifices her own good fame in order to avoid the shedding of blood. On this ground the Duke refuses his permission to her marriage, whereupon Manfredo declares that he will marry her himself. Hence general tribulation, which is increased by an old innkeeper's declaration that Lina, his supposed daughter, is no other than Manfredo's sister. It generally happens, by-the-by, in Italian librettos, everybody knows everybody else's relationship much better than his own. However, all the characters at this point are as decided a standstill as in The Critic. Manfredo, to save trouble, kills himself; and, thank heaven! the curtain falls—of course to the accompaniment of a cantabile phrase for the violoncello and a tremolando figure on the high notes of the violins. What creatures of conventionality are these composers! Why must they make everybody die to the same tune? You may easily imagine that there is no interest in the story, nor is there much in the music. A duet for soprano and tenor, "Dal core trabocca," as original in melody as in idea, and a clever phrase expressive of the cavaliers' mockery of Manfredo, which, although repeated in perpetual unison, is nevertheless always effective, are the only bright spots in the dull level of four acts, nor did a second hearing reveal to me any new beauties. The performance was not above mediocrity; Mlle. Kraus, the prima donna, is a true artist, but neither in voice, face, nor figure is she suited to the character of a young and tender bride. Signor Aldighieri, the Manfredo, has a powerful bass voice, but the rest is, or ought to have been, silence. Luckily for the composer, the audience were not of my opinion, for they recalled him some three-and-twenty times. On the second night he was called out only twenty two times, and this diminuendo movement will probably go accelerando to a full close. The "poet" was also demanded, and a stout gentleman, Signor Cimino, who, I am assured, repeatedly wept sweet tears of gratitude, came on several times hand-in-hand with the composer. I myself observed him standing at the wing, and blowing appreciative kisses to a bald basso who had roared out "Figliuola mia" as softly as a sucking bull. Several other incidents of the evening were highly diverting to a stranger. The audience, glad to hear anything new, were as kind as they had been cruel some nights previous; every well-rendered phrase instantly evoked from these singularly-gifted people a murmur of sympathetic admiration, and even the execution of short solo passages in the orchestra, beyond comparison the best disciplined I have ever heard in any theatre, found immediate and never-failing appreciation. The opera has not been given since, owing to the illness of the prima donna, whose indisposition, I am told, may be traced to financial causes.

J. S. Bach's Music of the Passion according to the Gospel of St. John.

BY G. A. MACFARREN.

The interest of late excited by Bach's music of the Passion according to St. Matthew, promises for that great work an English acceptance, if not as general as it has in Germany, where all its Choral tunes, with their poems, are familiar to everybody, that is still commensurate with the importance of the subject and the sublimity of its treatment. The Matthew having established a hold on public esteem, attention naturally turns to another work of the same class by the same artist. Comparative criticism is a fallacious term of judgment, since no work is better or worse because of the less or greater merit of another; but, an examination of the as yet less known John Passion will be facilitated by reference to the other, not as a standard of excellence, but as a type of form. Such reference will then be made in the present remarks, and, in the absence of other data, the internal evidence of the two will be taken as an authority for guessing as to which may have been the earliest production.

No record has been brought forward of when the John Passion was composed, or when publicly produced; Herr W. Rust, the editor of the work as issued by the Bach Society, states indeed that four performances of the Oratorio are known to have been given during the life of the author, but he makes no mention of their time or place. Further, he asserts that there are three versions of the composition, the second differing from the first in the substitution of five pieces for as many others that are quite distinct from them in the original, and the third differing from the second in the refinement and elaboration of the details of the same matter. One of the substitutions of the second version is the opening Chorus, "Lord, our Redeemer," which displaces the contrapuntal treatment of the Chorus, "O Man, thy heavy sin," that now stands at the end of the first part of the Matthew Passion. Here is a seeming evidence of the earlier composition of the work upon St. John's text; and the change is otherwise remarkable, as the substituted piece, with all its merits, is less attractive than that which was rejected. Surmising from this, and from other indications to be adduced by and by, that the John Passion was written before the Matthew, one may date it prior to 1729, when the latter was performed; and one may suppose it to be subsequent to Bach's settlement in Leipzig in 1723, for it was there that he first had opportunity to write extensively for the Church.

The design of the present work is the same as of the other, and in this respect the Oratorio resembles also several preceding settings of the Passion for the Lutheran celebration of the event. The Gospel text is set as recitative, the words of the narration being reserved for a tenor voice, his part being named Evangelist, and the words of Jesus and the other persons who speak in the course of the story being assigned to a different singer for each character. The words spoken by the disciples, the Jewish people, the Roman soldiers, and even the High Priest, are given to the chorus. This text consists of the 18th and 19th chapters of St. John's Gospel, the first part containing the 18th chapter to the end of the 27th verse, and the second part proceeding from hence to the end of the 19th chapter; but, curiously, there are some insertions in this from St. Matthew's Gospel, which show that the composer's object was rather to make an impressive recital of the story, than to give a faithful rendering of either historian. The text is interpolated with Chorals, the words and inseparable scenes of which illustrate the points where they are introduced. It is further interpolated with Choruses and Airs, described by German writers as "reflective pieces," which form a commentary on the Biblical narrative.

The poetry, so to speak, of the "reflective pieces," is based on that of the John Passion of Handel, with which Bach must have been familiar, for a copy in his writing is extant of the entire work of Handel. This is the production of one Brockes, a member of the Town Council of Hamburg, and it abounds in coarseness of expression, such as at the time was not uncommon in the treatment of the sacred story, in which it was usual to exaggerate in some degree the personal, at the expense of the doctrinal aspect of the subject. These turns of phrase are materially modified in Bach's version, always to their literary improvement, and to the idealization of the theme; and internal evidence suggests that the alterations may be due to Bach himself, as there can be little doubt is the arrangement of the entire book, as to where the Gospel text should be broken by the insertion of Chorals and lengthened compositions, where by the insertion of scriptural passages from another source, and as to the choice of the Chorals.

The following speculations are offered as to the possible evidence within the two Oratorios of the later composition of that to St. Matthew's text. In the work under notice, the words of Jesus are not individualized from the rest of the recitative by the accompaniment of string instruments, a beautiful device by which, in the Matthew Passion, the sacred person is surrounded, as it were, by a glory that distinguishes his figure from every other in the story. This conception is too poetical, and its good effect is too apparent for it to have been discarded by the same composer in a subsequent work of the same class; but it may naturally have occurred to him when pondering a completed composition, and considering how further he might idealize the subject in an after setting of analogous text. Again: those passages in the Gospel which are assigned to the chorus are here so amplified by repetition as to form, in some cases, the groundwork of extensive compositions—for instance, those beginning "If this man were not an evil-doer," "It is not lawful," and "Let us not divide," in the second part; whereas, in the other work, if such passages are not set totally without repetition, as is the case with those for single speakers, they are repeated to such extent only as to give an idea of multitude, and so to increase, not to annul, the dramatic force of their setting. It would be matter indeed for regret, were any one of these noble pieces any shorter than it is; but the more one admires their musical beauty, the more one must feel their dramatic unfitness, and hence arises the surmise that he who had written the concise, terse, living ejaculations that animate the action of the Matthew Passion, could not afterwards set like passages in the comparatively cold, because diffuse and quite didactic, manner of those before us. And yet again: in the John Passion, after what would else be the final Chorus, "Rest here in peace," is a Choral, "Lord Jesus;" but in that according to St. Matthew, the Chorus "In tears of grief" concludes the work. Now, the purpose may have been good of assigning to the people, whose part throughout the Oratorio is eminently conspicuous, the task of closing it with one of the Hymns that served to enchain their attention to the performance, as much as to enlist their services therein; but it is not unlikely that, in Bach's own time, the people's hymn-singing may have been perhaps unsteady, and that such a termination to a work may consequently have been somewhat vague and undecided; if so, his experience of this would prompt him to finish a later work with a piece for his trained and controllable executants only, which would be more impressive, because more definite than the other.

From these indications, if they may be regarded as such, and from others that it would be tedious to particularize, it may be assumed that the John Passion was a kind of sketch or study for the other, having tested his powers upon which, and strengthened them by exercise, Bach devoted himself to the grander work, which was fitted by the more dramatic form of the Apostle's relation, and by its superior suggestiveness, to become so much greater as it is than its predecessor.

In a composition of this structure, the narrative recitative is the portion of primary importance; for, though the rhythmical portions be more musically attractive, they are designed to illustrate and to relieve this, and must therefore be esteemed as subsidiary to it. In speaking of the recitative in the present work, one technical speciality must not be unnoticed, but it may be briefly mentioned and dismissed. Nearly always, the vocal closes are followed by a second inversion of the tonic harmony preceding the penultimate dominant chord. This is so unlike the general use of composers, including Bach himself, as to be remarkable on that account; its effect is to prolong the vocal cadence in the accompaniment, and to connect it with the sequel, whether this be the continuation of the narrative or one of the reflective pieces. The course of the action and the reflections upon it seem thus to be linked in unbroken sequence, and the hearer's mind passes from event to commentary, as if the one sprang irresistibly from the other. It may appear superfluous to describe the ordinary and all-familiar practice of confirming or completing the vocal closes in recitative with two chords only, those of the dominant and tonic; the more definitely terminal character of this form of cadence will be acknowledged by every reader, and the distinction from it of the form here employed warrants the space spent on this remark.

It is impossible to extol too highly this portion of the Oratorio. The words are declaimed in the manner of the loftiest oratory, and in some places with pathos that seems to be in unison with the fervent feeling of the Evangelist in relating the scenes he witnessed, and the doctrines on which the faith and the teaching of his life were founded. The two passages interpolated from St. Matthew, to which reference has been made, are notable; first, because the same points are distinguished in the other Oratorio, and second, because of their very high but yet inferior beauty in the present setting; these are, when Peter, hearing the cock crow, is reminded of his Lord's words, and "went forth and wept bitterly," and the plaintive melody to these words is strengthened by a progression of harmony as fully beautiful as it is unprecedented, and as yet unimitated; and when the final agony is passed, and nature is convulsed as if in horror at human iniquity, the terrible disturbance of her laws is described. In both of these passages, as in their setting in the other Oratorio, the orchestral instruments are unemployed, and the accompaniment is restricted to the organ or the harpsichord—it is hard to determine which—preserving to the recitative throughout the work its marked separation in every respect from the rhythmical portions. One might wish that the extreme high notes of the tenor voice had been less freely used than they are in phrases where the declamation of a word seems not to demand such a strain as they must cause the singer; one must more regret that their difficulty of performance compels sometimes the substitution of others, which are practically better, but which must distort the climax of the passages wherein they occur, and so weaken the effect. The sentences belonging to Jesus are set with a tenderness that is quite holy, and with such an obvious sense of reverence, as makes one reverent the great master to whom we owe this interpretation of the divine character. The greatest qualities are needful in the singers who will undertake the parts of the Evangelist and of Jesus, the latter more particularly, because it is but by the manner of the executant that the composer's conception can be embodied, and that an audience can be made to feel the presence of the superior Being whose personality is represented in his words; the distinctive accompaniment of the other Oratorio materially aids the vocalist, nay, in itself separates this character from all the others; but here the grave responsibility rests with the performer alone to fulfil the sublime ideal of the composer.

The portion of next importance in the Oratorio is the treatment of the Chorals. This is to be esteemed with reference particularly to the situations of their occurrence, and to the unmistakable purpose of throwing light on those situations by the choice of appropriate verses from the hymns with the tunes that are dissociable from them, and by the expressive harmony wherewith the tunes are sustained. There can be no question that the master has here harmonized the tunes very differently from what he would have done, from what he did, in fitting them for ordinary congregational use—his purpose there was to give broad expression to the general purport of the poem, while here it was to strengthen the sentiment of certain words, so as to make it strengthen the impression of the incidents to which the selected verses apply. The harmonization of the Chorals is always remarkable from a merely technical point of view, and in many places it is particularly so on account of the extremely chromatic nature of the harmony; the comment that every piece seems to call forth would be unintelligible if not read side by side with the music; but one instance is so unlike any thing elsewhere to be met with, is so strikingly beautiful, and is so truthfully pertinent to the words, that it may be cited in the hope to induce the student to examine it separately, and to regard it as a valuable addition to his store of knowledge; it is in the Choral, "Thy hands, O Son of God most High," the setting of the last line, "We had been bound forevermore," where, the piece being in the key of E, the bass ascends semi-tonically from B to E, and the progression from an inverted chord of A minor to the dominant seventh in the key of F sharp minor is as beautiful as startling. The effect must have been very deep, and all but supernatural, upon singers accustomed from infancy to troll forth certain tunes which were familiar to them as is the Lord's Prayer to our grown up school children, of unwanted harmonies that give particular meaning to every word, changing almost the sound and certainly the character of the very notes they sang, as if men standing on the ground were unexpectedly lifted into a rarer atmosphere, and consequently breathed and felt, and even thought, otherwise than they used to do. In two respects, this portion of the Oratorio suffers from its transplantation into another people than that for whom it was written; the English people know not the tunes which are a part of the very being of the North Germans, or if they know accidentally some one or other of them, know it as being in "Common Metre" or "Peculiar Metre," and by the unsignifying name of some German city or province; and the English version, admirably as it fits the accents of the tunes, and as it accommodates itself to the mechanism of vocalization, fails, and could not but fail, to represent word by word the sense of the original, and thus hides the purpose of expressing with the harmony the sense of each. This is said in no disparagement of the translation of the entire work, which commands, on the contrary, high praise for its fulfilment of the severe exactions of the most arduous of all literary labors, the adaptation of syllables to music of which not a note is without its characteristic purport; the metrical hymns differ in structure from the other portions of the work, and in rendering them there are difficulties almost insuperable. Nothing can better show the illustrative design in the various treatment of these tunes, than a comparison of different arrangements of the same tune when it occurs in several situations of the present work, and occurs also perhaps more than once in the Matthew Passion; for example, "Oh wondrous love"—which is introduced where Jesus, yielding himself to the officers of the High Priest, craves leave for his disciples to depart—is the same tune as, "Oh mighty King," another verse seemingly of the same poem, which follows the Saviour's allusion to his heavenly renunciation of his earthly kingdom; and this is the same tune as, "Oh blessed Jesus," and also, "Mysterious act," both in the Matthew Passion, and having reference there respectively to Jesus's prescience of his betrayal, and the Jews' demand for his crucifixion. It would amply repay the student of harmony and of musical expression to compare these pieces, and the several others that are in like manner framed on one tune in the same and in the two works; he will learn from such a comparison how apparently boundless are the resources of harmony, and how far more strongly does their just application prove the inspiration of a poet than the mere skill of a scholar. This simple reference should be sufficient to instigate the search of those who are interested; to enumerate all the instances would here be futile as tedious.

The reflective pieces—namely, the Choruses and Airs—call lastly for consideration; lastly, because they are subordinate, in some sort, in the plan of the work; lastly, because they are each complete in itself, comprehend each a complete design, are each extractable, and have all interest of a kind that belongs not to the other portions of the work. These are, for the most part, of extreme difficulty; difficulty more of insight and comprehension than of a mere note singing, though in this respect some are by no means to be slighted. Of the songs, two are perhaps more attractive—it would be as false as daring to say more beautiful—than the others.

Firstly, the Soprano Air, "I follow Thee," which directly succeeds the statement that Peter and John followed the captive Jesus to the house of Caiaphas, has a melody of the tenderest sweetness and of charming continuity, one that will please all hearers, and repay whatever pains a singer may spend upon it; specially notable in it is the ascending phrase to the words "encompassed with sadness," where the chromatic passing note is a most rare exception from the practice, of the age and of the author, to employ diatonic passing notes only; and the accompaniment of this song, for organ with two flutes only, helps essentially to characterize it. Secondly, the contralto Air, "It is finished," which follows the last words of the Saviour, is such a piece of pathos as has rarely been equalled; in more than one respect this may be likened to Elijah's song, "It is enough," as in the similarity of its opening words, in its form of an Adagio, interrupted by an Allegro, and afterwards resumed, and its accompaniment for the viol da gamba, which is analogous in tone to the violoncello employed by Mendelssohn; the likeness goes not so far as the phrases, in which the two pieces are totally distinct, but it is too obvious to pass unnoticed. The exhortation to follow our Lord to Golgotha, "Haste, ye deeply wounded spirits," an Air for bass, is remarkable for the choral questions, "Come where?" "Fly where?" that intersperse it, and is on the pattern of several pieces in the other Oratorio. "Beloved Saviour" is another Air for the same voice which forms both the counterpoint and the interludes to the Choral, "Jesus, Thou who knowest death," and is an admirable specimen of a musical form that Bach often employed, and in which he was always successful. The Chorus, "Rest here in peace," that precedes the concluding Choral, refers to the entombment; it bears a strong resemblance to the final Chorus in the Matthew Passion, in having the same key of C minor, the same 3/4 measure, and even in its phraseology, one passage in the second part, indeed, where the bass descends in arpeggio, being almost identical with one in the other Chorus; its expression, too, is the same as that in the piece here cited; but admirable as is this Chorus, it certainly suffers from comparison with the other.

At the present day, and in this country, it is impossible to reproduce the John Passion with precisely the effect that it had in Bach's time. The subject is now differently regarded from what it was a century and a half ago, and the hearers are therefore otherwise impressible, and this must be taken into grave consideration in estimating the work. Several of the instruments are obsolete for which the parts are written; the substitutions, however, that are now imperative, are not more greatly at variance with the several versions of the Oratorio than are these from each other, for it seems that one inducement for recasting the work again and again, as has already been shown that the author did, must have been to adapt it to the means at command on the different occasions of its performance. To assign now a part for the viol da gamba to the violoncello, one for the lute to the harp, and to make some other similar adaptations is but to meet necessities in the manner that Bach would have done; and though he appears to have set great value on the delicate distinctions of different kinds of hautboys that are now extinct, and of instruments of the viol class that are now no longer in use, he bowed to compulsion when the one of his predilection was not at hand, and we do but as he did in choosing its nearest representative under the same circumstances. In our performance of the Chorals, a still more important deviation from the method of Bach's time is inevitable. The people here have not so generally the habit of hymn singing as is common in the Lutheran Church, even of the tunes they know, and the Choral tunes introduced in this Oratorio they, with few exceptions, know not; hence their taking part in the performance is here impracticable, and even in Germany it is at the present day unpractised. When all the congregation sang the tune, it was needful to enforce the harmony of the comparatively small choir with the accompaniment of organ or orchestra. The somewhat coarseness of tone of all these voices and instruments probably at their loudest, was greatly counterbalanced by the fact that everybody contributed to it, and no one stood apart to listen; general experience will attest to vastly different effect of music upon him who sings and him who hears, and some other means are requisite to excite us to the same extent when we are witnesses, than those by which we should be moved were we participants in the performance. It is, then, a most happy expedient to have the Chorals, sung by the unaccompanied chorus, and to give them the beautiful relief of light and shade expressed in music by the gradations of tone from piano to forte. There is no effect so universally and so irresistibly pleasing as that of unaccompanied voices; to offer this at its best before an audience, it is necessary to vary it by different degrees of loudness and softness; and to compensate for the people's inability to sing their part and to be thus moved from within by the words and the music, the most powerful external aid must be made to their feelings, and the means employed in London performances are to be commended as being the most powerful and as producing the desirable result. The Chorals were originally the most impressive portion of the Oratorio; so they are now; the end is analogous if not identical, and we must applaud the very different machinery whereby this end is effected.

This necessarily brief notice of a great work would be more than necessarily incomplete without an acknowledgment of how far its acceptance in England will be due to the Rev. J. Troutbeck, whose rendering of the text shows his comprehension and appreciation of the music as much as his knowledge of the German, and command of the English language. He has been singularly fortunate in the preservation of nearly all the words of the accepted Scripture text, for this would lose much of its hold on our interest were it represented in other than the familiar syllables.

The John Passion has here been spoken of as a study for the supposed latter work of the master, the Matthew Passion. Many a painter's study is treasured as highly as his matured work, and so indeed, if regarded in such a light, must this be. If we possessed not the latter Oratorio, this would be esteemed above all price a masterpiece; the only thing that can out-price it is the other Oratorio, and that can be only fully valued by those who have a thorough knowledge and a due appreciation of the great work we have now been considering.—London Mus. Times.

Improvement in Popular Song Writing.

(From the Atlantic Monthly, June, 1872.)

In considering the almost innumerable songs and ballads that are continually appearing in sheet form, we find that in one respect, at least, there is a marked improvement upon similar publications that were popular some fifteen or twenty years ago, namely, in the great attention that composers of this class of music now pay to the instrumental accompaniment. Passing over, as not worthy of note, the vast amount of music of the sentimental negro minstrel stamp, music which is about as faithful an exponent of the true negro musical spirit as our sensation dramas, like "Under the Gaslight" and "Across the Continent" are of the manners and customs of so-called fashionable American society, this feature in the vocal sheet music of to-day seems worthy of notice as indicative of an advance in musical taste and appreciation in our as yet not highly cultivated musical community. Before the songs of Franz Schubert, Robert Schumann, and Robert Franz, and the operas of Meyerbeer and Gounod, had become as generally known as they are now, the popular songs and ballads both of English and American composers were generally modelled upon the Dempster ballads,—songs which, if not of any great musical significance, were, at least, thoroughly respectable compositions,—or upon the Italian operatic music of Bellini and Donizetti. Old Scotch ballads like "Auld Robin Gray" were not without their imitators; and reflections of the national Scotch and Irish spirit might be found in many songs written both here and in England some years ago. As the star of Dempster's popularity began to wane, the songs of Franz Abt, a composer who has caught much of the Suabian and Tyrolean spirit, came into vogue, and at one time "When the Swallows homeward fly," and a few others of the same stamp, bade fair to banish even such standard favorites as "Auld Robin Gray" and "Comin' thro' the Rye" from the music-racks of our singing amateurs. Although the models after which these various songs were fashioned were naturally widely different in character, they had one great family resemblance. They were all more or less perfect representatives of the national folk-song of their respective countries, and their most striking feature was their purely melodic character. They were as simply harmonized as possible, and the accompaniment acted as little more than the barest support to the voice. The same three or four simple modulations from tonic to dominant or subdominant, with some few minor chords, were to be found in them all; and anything like an accompaniment in itself musically interesting, much less an instrumental obligato standing in contrapuntal relations to the principal theme, was not to be thought of. This simplicity of harmony was not in itself any thing derogatory to the musical spirit of the time. Neither the Scotch, Irish, or German folk-song demanded anything more than the simplest harmonic progressions, and the brilliant and finished vocal writing of the Italian operatic school would have been rather embarrassed than helped by any so-called learned harmonizing, or contrapuntal elaboration in the instrumental part. But as the old saw has it, "Quod licet Jovi non licet bovi." The many imitations of natural folk-songs and Italian opera came in time to be so much alike that at last their similarity amounted to the dreariest sameness. Sometimes a song-writer would imitate all the different schools at once, and not unfrequently Scotch, Irish, German, English and Italian characteristics would be huddled together in the same song in most artless confusion, and always with the same old tonic, dominant, subdominant,—subdominant, dominant, tonic, in the accompaniment. It soon became difficult to tell one song from another. One would begin Scotch, then pass through a phase of Suabian or Tyrolean lightheartedness, and off with a burst of Italian fire; while another, beginning in the depths of Italian sentimentality, would, by a consoling transition through Scotch or Irish quaintness, come to a happy ending with a reminiscence of the Tyrolean Jodel. The result of this curious mixing of styles was that, from being a conglomeration of the melodic characteristics of many countries, the popular ballad came to be a thoroughly characterless form of art which embodied the musical spirit of no country. The vigorous people's-song and the artistically finished Italian opera melody, which were the prime sources of the ballad of to-day, became so diluted and vulgarized that all artistic merit vanished with their distinctive national characteristics, and instead of having a genuine hold upon the popular taste, these feeble imitations of an imitation were forced to content themselves with a mere fashionable notoriety. Real popularity must have some firm foundation in the sincere sympathy and applause of the people, but anything may become fashionable if it only have the suffrage, either real or apparent, of some popular favorite. A practice that has always existed to a greater or less degree became unpleasantly prevalent some years ago, namely, the custom for composers and publishers to pay prominent singers to bring certain songs before the public. The éclat which a brilliant performer can give even to the flattest piece of music rarely fails to result in the happy publisher's pecuniary benefit; and people are never wanting who are incapable of distinguishing between a good composition and an effective performance, and when they have heard anything at a concert that particularly pleases them, forthwith rush to the nearest music-seller to buy a copy. Thus hosts of songs have successively become fashionable from no merit of their own, but because some popular singer has chanced to make a hit with them. Such a system cannot but have the worst effects upon general musical education, and we are daily feeling its evils to a most lamentable extent in the performances of the various miscellaneous concert-troops that wander about our country.

We have tried to show how the popular ballad of the day is the degenerate, mongrel offspring of the old Scotch and Irish ballad, the English ballad through the Dempster songs, the German Volkslied through Franz Abt and others, and finally, of the Italian opera melody. But even before Franz Abt's star appeared above our horizon, another influence was at work which was destined sooner or later to have its effect upon popular vocal music in this country. Two or three songs by Franz Schubert became not only widely known, but almost universally popular. The few Schubert songs that were first heard here were, as far as form is concerned, hardly different from the Abt songs that soon followed them; in fact, Abt may be said to have founded his style upon Schubert. But the older composer handled his musical materials with a firm, masterly grasp that was not so easy to imitate as the sentimental mannerisms of his weaker follower. Where Abt daintily appropriated certain naïve turns and peculiarities caught from the national Volkslied, and arranged them, not unskillfully, we must admit, to suit the public taste, much as a Parisian milliner copies forms from peasant costumes and catches hints among the mountains for those triumphs of her skill that show themselves on the boulevard, Schubert reproduced with all the added brilliancy with which his fertile genius could surround it the very people's song itself. To the vigorous, sincere melody, drawn from that purest spring of musical inspiration, the heart of the people, he added a richness of harmony and a variety in modulation that places many of his songs in the very first rank among compositions in that form. After we had become acquainted with a few, and by no means the greatest of Schubert's songs, it was some time before the public taste in vocal music made any further advance, and the popular ballad ran its gradual down-hill course unimpeded. But in a few years a new light began to dawn upon us; Robert Schumann, more introspective and moody than Schubert and at times more obscure, in a certain sense more romantic, full of the divine fire, and with such an unconquerable determination to give form to the musico-poetical idea that was strong with him that he was of necessity great, if only from the very violence of his victorious struggle after expression. Next came to us the Robert Franz songs, in which the artistic form of the German Lied has attained its highest perfection. These influences, all of them good, worked quietly, and if slowly all the more surely upon the popular taste. Another influence which we will only hint at in passing has been the public performance of the best orchestral works of the great masters, as well as of the oratorios of Handel, Mendelssohn, and others. But great and good as this influence has been upon the popular taste, it has only indirectly affected our song composers. The good seed sown by the Schubert, Schumann, and Franz songs is already beginning to bear fruit; fruit of rather questionable quality sometimes, for the soil has often been none too congenial, but fruit that shows that efforts are making in the right direction, however faulty they may as yet be. Instead of the old rum-ti-tum guitar chords, we now find songs written with something that deserves the name of an accompaniment. No doubt the passion for abstruse and unexpected modulation will have to run a little wild here as elsewhere, and all manner of violence will be done to musical grammar and form before a reaction sets in which shall bring matters into the proper channels. The great popularity of Gounod's Faust has probably given an additional impulse in the direction of a reckless modulation, and we doubt whether its influence has been entirely good in this respect. Young composers sometimes seem to think that keys were made to be modulated into, much as the school boy thought that door knobs were made to be wrenched off, and in the shortest song they will slip from C Major to F# Minor with an easy nonchalance quite wonderful to behold. But even this very extravagance has had one good effect. Fifteen or twenty years ago, it was next to impossible to go to a musical party without having one's ears scorched by hearing some sweet-voiced amateur, generally, we regret to say, of the female sex, sing a popular ditty while her fair fingers went through some mysterious evolutions upon the keyboard, producing a series of distressing sounds which she fondly imagined were the accompaniment to her song. Almost all singers have found out a certain simple series of chords in several keys, and in accompanying themselves are too prone to forget that the proper efficacy of a chord, like that of the decimal point, depends in a great measure upon its coming in the right place. But we doubt whether any singer would be adventurous enough to attempt to accompany "by ear" many of the songs that are written nowadays. Thank heaven, singers have at last begun to learn their accompaniments, or, still better, to let some competent pianist play for them. In spite of all the unnatural harmony, forced modulation, and bad counterpoint with which many of the modern attempts at song-writing abound, we hail these very blunders as indications of improvement, inasmuch as they prove that composers at least take pains. Musically considered, one of Bishop's old ballads with its beautifully finished simple harmony is worth scores of these modern vagaries, and can, as far as form is concerned, be placed beside many Schubert, Schumann, or Franz songs without suffering by the comparison. But we nevertheless hold that the German and even the modern French song-composers, such as Gounod and J. Massenet, unfold to us a wealth of harmony which will in the end better repay study and imitation than Bishop's simple perfection of style.

Musical Correspondence.

CHICAGO, MAY 18.—Ex nihilo nihil fit. So, I am told, remarked the ancient Romans. But in Chicago it has ceased to be true. During the winter building operations have gone on with remarkable vigor, so that one who now traverses the burnt district, especially on the south side, will find it hard to believe that the large number of buildings now occupying the ground were mere heaps of debris so recently as the 10th of October last.

Musically the city has been in the most quiet condition possible during the entire season. We did have Wachtel and a picked up troupe for German opera; but our Lake Michigan east winds proved too much for him, and the enterprise fell through after two nights.

The Oratorio Society had last year a chorus of nearly three hundred. The library included the "Messiah," "Creation," "Hymn of Praise," "Elijah," "Judas Maccabæus," "Eli," and I think one or two other works. These and the records were burned in Farwell Hall. Since the opening of Bryan Hall here twelve years ago, all symphony and chorus operations have been under the direction of Mr. Balatka. This gentleman is an admirable musician, a man of wide general cultivation, and a good conductor, open only to the charge of having always to bring out works with poor players in the orchestra and too few rehearsals. If he had a fault it was too much good nature. For ten long years the papers have criticized his performances in the carping spirit of writers entirely unable to judge of the real difficulties in the way of his doing anything, and utterly wanting in a sense of their duty in the matter of giving a right direction to the public taste. The fire burned Mr. Balatka's home and library, and he removed his family to Milwaukee, where there is a fine German musical society in a flourishing condition. In my opinion this honest and hard-working conductor has done more for musical taste in Chicago within ten years than all the newspapers together. From the members of the musical profession here I imagine Mr. Balatka experienced little sympathy or aid. It is here "every one for himself." The theory is that the supply of immortality and glory is a fixed quantity averaging one quart to each man, and if one man gets a bushel, somebody else gets a gill. This theory, however, is not well founded. The intention was for every man to become immortal and glorious, and if he fails to be so it is because he neglected the proper means.

The Oratorio Society, as I have said, were left orphans by Mr. Balatka's removal to Milwaukee, and penniless by the loss of their household gods. But after waiting a few weeks we found there were still some three hundred thousand people here, and the managers, Messrs. O. Blackman and A. R. Sabbin, began to look around for some practical way of recommencing operations. Your glorious old Handel and Haydn Society came nobly to our aid with a donation of sets of "Israel in Egypt," "The Messiah," "David," and some miscellaneous selections. Mr. J. A. Butterfield was chosen conductor, and W. S. B. Mathews organist, and work began on the "Messiah." I do not remember whether I have before introduced Mr. Butterfield to your readers. He is a young gentleman, something under forty years of age, an Englishman by birth, and of a musical stock. At an early age he sang the alto solos in the "Messiah" for the Philharmonic society in his native town. When under twelve he played first violin in the orchestra. With such a beginning he has, of course, a great comfort in Handel's music and a correct idea of its proper execution. He came to this country some twelve or fifteen years ago, and to Chicago about five years since, where he has been occupied in teaching singing and conducting musical societies, and the choir of the Centenary M. E. church. This choir numbers about fifty voices and does the best things in Buck's two books of Motets very nicely indeed. I believe it generally has the credit of giving the most finished performances of any choir in the city. Indeed I know of no other that attempts work of this class. As a composer Mr. Butterfield deserves to be well spoken of. His song "When you and I were young, Maggie," has reached a sale of about a hundred and fifty thousand copies. He has lately written a dramatic cantata, "Belshazzar," which is scored for small orchestra, and is, I am told, an exceedingly pleasing work.

Having a room to meet in, and a Conductor, one would think the society had plain sailing before them. Such, however, was not the case. The fire left us in a shape something like this: Suppose all the central part of Boston burned off, out as far as the Worcester R. R. track, and all of East Cambridge and Cambridgeport. The singers live many of them in Charlestown and many of them in Roxbury. The meetings are held in Roxbury, say about half a mile farther out than Hook's organ factory. The Charlestown singers take cars to the place where Scollay's building was and change off to Roxbury cars. In our case the distance some of our singers come is over six miles. Notwithstanding this disadvantage the "Messiah" was carefully prepared and given Thursday evening, May 16, in the Union Park Congregationalist church.

This church is a new one, built very much in the form of an amphitheatre, containing seats for about a thousand on the first floor, and over eight hundred in the gallery. The room is a very pleasant, bright looking one, and is, I judge, a good one for sound. The organ, standing behind the pulpit, in the gallery, is a noble instrument built by Messrs. Hook & Hastings. It has three manuals and about fifty stops, and adds another to their brilliant list of first-class organs erected in this city. I would suggest, however, that a mezzoforte pedal for the great organ would be a valuable addition to the piano and forte pedals already present. The pedal organ is very satisfactory, as it contains three 16 ft. flues, two 8 ft. flues, one of 4 ft. a mixture of five ranks, two reeds (16 ft. and 8 ft.) and a 32 ft. bourdon. Of the performance the Times remarks:

It is with the most sincere pleasure that we congratulate the Oratorio society on the superb effort of last evening, an effort which redounds most brilliantly to their credit, in view of the great difficulties which their energy has so ably overcome. Chicago in her palmiest days never heard a chorus so admirably trained, and evenly balanced in its parts. The soprano and tenors were all young, fresh voices, and the brilliant, resonant, unworn tones of these leading elements gave a character to the choral numbers, which has rarely been heard before in similar attempts in our city. It is to the oratorio chorus that we must look for those solid, massive effects which contribute to the dignified, solemn spirit of oratorio music, and furnish the sublime frame-work for the individual tone pictures, in which the enthusiasm of the composer finds its most rapturous and inspired flights. Perfection in choral ensemble wanting, the whole force of the oratorio is emasculated. The admirable performance of the society in rendering the choral numbers is deserving of the most unqualified and ardent praise, and Mr. Butterfield, the skillful and sympathetic conductor, has indeed reason to be proud of the masterly style in which his chorus singers have responded to his careful and judicious training. The chorus consisted of 150 voices, gathered from the best musical material in Chicago; and the long and severe training to which they have submitted themselves bears its legitimate fruit in perhaps the finest choral efforts that have ever been given in our midst. The orchestra was no less good, and its only fault perhaps was that it was not quite large enough, as there were not more than 40 pieces. The grand mass of vocal harmony might, perhaps, have been more fittingly sustained by a heavier orchestral accompaniment, yet none but the most carping critic would be disposed to find fault, particularly as the organ under the masterly manipulation of Mr. W. S. B. Mathews lent its swelling notes to augment the force of instrumental sound.

The fine performance of the delicious Pastoral symphony was one of the notable facts of the evening. The orchestra in some of the choral numbers showed itself not fully balanced through its lack of brass, but in the symphony, this want was not felt. The exquisite prelude reminding the hearer of cloudless oriental nights, balmy winds, and the Arcadian joys of happy shepherds leading their flocks beside green pastures and still waters, was given by the strings and reeds with a soothing, dreamy sweetness, whose sympathetic mastery over the feelings could not have been more effectively rendered by Thomas' orchestra, which, for Americans, stands as the highest type of instrumental perfection. The close of the symphony, where the reeds cease their cheerful human sounds, and the strings faint away in the softest pianissimo, was rendered in the most delicious manner under the accomplished baton of Mr. Butterfield, and had the occasion permitted there would have been an imperative demand for a repetition of the whole symphony. The perfect union of chorus, orchestra, and organ was a notable feature of the oratorio, which it has not always been the privilege of critics to remark favorably of on similar occasions.

The solo parts were taken by Mr. S. C. Campbell and Mr. Jas. Gill, basses, Mr. Alex. Bischoff tenor, Mrs. Clara Huck and Mrs. Carpenter, soprani, and Mrs. J. M. Davidson, contralto. Mr. Campbell showed himself wanting in experience in oratorio singing, but the air "Who may abide" was very well done indeed. The bass songs in the latter part were given by Mr. James Gill, a new comer here. Mr. Gill is a teacher of singing, brought here last year from Leipzig, with a great flourish of trumpets, carried, I think, to such an injudicious extent as to damage his ready acceptance by the general public. He is a Scotch gentleman, with a good but not heavy baritone voice, and an admirable method of singing. He certainly did the trumpet song and "Why do the nations" very excellently. Mrs. Davidson has a strong contralto voice, but not the artistic culture for such a part as fell to her the other evening. Her besetting sin is the tempo rubato, which, of course, plays "hob" with the figuration going on in the orchestra. To such an one Balatka used to say; "Why, madame, you might as well put a stovepipe hat on Julius Cæsar." Mrs. Carpenter did not prove equal to the occasion. Mrs. Huck is the wife of a wealthy citizen. She studied for the opera in Berlin. Lovely in person, attractive in deportment, and the possessor of a delicate yet powerful and exquisitely pure soprano voice, she is a prima donna of whom any city might be proud. She is new to oratorio, but I hope the warmth of her reception the other night will enable us to hear more from her.

All the papers agree that in point of precision in attack, steadiness of performance, and balance of ensemble the choruses were never done so well here before. One paper, indeed, advised the selection of a more brilliant organist. The solo stops were not shown enough for him! The truth is, you know, the organ part of the "Messiah" is really difficult, and that it was done with smoothness and steadiness and sufficient power, ought to satisfy the sapient critic. The Tribune says: "The success was chiefly due to the superior excellence of the chorus, which was, perhaps, the best in balance and training we have ever heard in oratorio. Each of the concerted numbers was given with superb precision and effect."

I greatly fear, Mr. Editor, I weary your patience, yet I cannot forbear to refer to the beauties of criticism as manifested by one paper which began its critique with the statement that the west side had enjoyed three important musical privileges this week: "The Jubilee Singers, The Oratorio of the Messiah, and Blind Tom" (!)

DER FREYSCHÜTZ.

NEW YORK, MAY 25.—An excellent concert was given at Steinway Hall, May 13, by Señor SARASATE with the following programme:

Duo for Piano and Violin.
On themes from "Don Giovanni!"	Vieuxtemps and Wolff.
	Miss Marie Krebs and Señor Sarasate.
Song. "If thou could'st know."	Balfe.
	Miss Gomien.
Fantasia for Violin.	Alard.
	Señor Sarasate.
Grand Aria. "Faust."	Duchauer.
	Mlle. Corradi.
Polonaise for Piano.	Chopin.
	Miss Marie Krebs.
Duo. From "Martha."	Flotow.
	Mlle. Corradi and Miss Gomien.
Violin Solo, "Melancholie."	Prume.
	Señor Sarasate.
Ballad.	—
	Miss Gomien.
Faust Waltz. From Gounod's Opera.	List.
	Miss Marie Krebs.
Polonaise. "Mignon."	Thomas.
	Mlle. Corradi.
Trio.	Mendelssohn.
	Miss Marie Krebs, Señor Sarasate, Mr. L. Duchauer.

With the exception of Vieuxtemps, I have heard no violinist in America whose playing equals that of Sarasate. His execution is perfect, and he draws from his instrument a tone which, for purity, leaves nothing to be desired, although not as broad and well sustained as that of Joachim. He is young and has undoubtedly a brilliant artistic career before him. It is, however, to be regretted that his selection of pieces is so seldom worthy of his splendid playing.—A fantasia on Der Freyschütz was substituted for that of Alard on Auber's La Muette. In the Mendelssohn Trio (D minor), which was not given entire, the harmonium made a poor substitute for a violoncello. Miss Krebs gave a brilliant and effective rendering of the Chopin Polonaise, but, as it seemed to me, did not play with quite her usual delicacy of touch. The piano on which she played the Faust waltz is the famous Twenty-five Thousandth Grand, recently made by the Steinways. It contains a new improvement in the treble scale, which gives a peculiar singing quality to the high notes. It is no exaggeration to say that Chickering and Steinway now lead, not only America, but the world in the manufacture of pianofortes.

The Steinways, in honor of the completion of the fine instrument above mentioned, gave a reception and collation to the artists and journalists of the city. New York is indebted to this house for one of the most elegant concert-halls in the world; and their experienced manager, Mr. Petri, who is himself a thorough musician and an excellent composer, has always a kind welcome and a timely word for every artist or friend of art.

The delightful "SUMMER-NIGHTS' CONCERTS" at Central Park Garden, re-opened on Monday evening May 13, and will be continued every night until autumn. Mr. Koch, the proprietor, has refitted the handsome salle with full-length mirrors and other decorations which add to its attractiveness; and here those of us who are denied the blessing of a summer in the country, can nightly listen to excellent music, by the best orchestra in America, under the direction of THEODORE THOMAS. This orchestra now numbers some fifty performers, whose playing, owing to skillful direction and constant practice, has reached a perfection which must be heard to be realized. The garden and hall were almost overcrowded on the opening night, and the attendance continues undiminished, although the warm season has not fairly begun. Most of the music is of a high order, and even that which is lightest has something to recommend it. Every Thursday evening the second part of the programme is devoted exclusively to classical music. The selections for the opening night included the ever popular overture to "Wm. Tell," the Bridal chorus and march from Lohengrin; Liszt's arrangement of the Beethoven Trio, op. 97; selections from Preciosa, full of wonderful beauty—the Magic Flute overture; Gounod's Saltarello; Overture to "The Desert Flower" by Wallace; two Strauss Waltzes, and a quaint air attributed to Louis XIII, which brings to mind at once the Gavotte in the second act of Mignon.

Where else can one listen to such music and at the same time enjoy the charming social freedom of a German beer garden?

On Saturday evening, May 18, the Liederkrantz gave a concert at Steinway Hall in honor of FRANZ ABT, who officiated as leader in two of the selections. Meyerbeer's Ninety-first Psalm was the chief feature of the entertainment. The MULDER-FABRI Opera Troupe, undaunted by repeated failures, have begun a short season of German Opera at the Academy of Music. Last night they gave Meyerbeer's "Prophet," and for next week they announce Tannhäuser, with Franz Abt as conductor.

Mr. Wm. Seguin announces a summer season of English Opera at Bryant's Opera House, beginning June 3, and consisting of twelve nights and two matinees.

A. A. C.

(Too late for last number.)

NEW YORK, MAY 11. Mr. F. BERGMANN'S Annual Concert, on the 25th of April, afforded the many friends of that excellent artist an opportunity of testifying their regard for him, which they did by coming out in force and filling Steinway's smaller hall to its fullest capacity. The programme was attractive, and Mr. Bergner was assisted by the following artists:—Miss Anna Simon, soprano; Mr. S. B. Mills, Piano; Dr. L. Damrosch, Violin; Mr. Schuessel, Violin; Mr. Matska, Viola; and Master F. Kammerer, (pupil of Mr. Bergner). I give programme:

Quartet, in D, Op. 64.....Haydn.
Recitative and aria, "Dove sono".....Mozart.
Miss Anna Simon.
Fantasie Russe, Solo Violoncello.....Kummer.
Piano Solos. a. Impromptu, Op. 66.....Chopin.
b. Etude Caprice.....Mills.
Mr. S. B. Mills.
Solo Violin. a. Nocturne, B minor, Op. 9 } Chopin.
b. Valse, D flat,
Transcription for Violin, with Accompaniment.
Dr. Damrosch.
Song: "Fruehlinglied,".....Mendelssohn.
Nocturne Elegiac, for two violoncellos and Piano,
Charles Schubert.
Master F. Kammerer and Fr. Bergner.

I need not say how well the difficult "Fantasie Russe" was played by Mr. Bergner, whose broad, noble phrasing and fine intonation were never more manifest. The Quartet was played with excellent effect, and Dr. Damrosch gave a skilful rendering of Chopin's Nocturne and Valse, transcribed for the violin, but he would do well to remember that Chopin is par excellence the poet of the piano, and that any attempt to improve upon his compositions by transcribing them for another instrument is not likely to be crowned with success.

Mr. Mills gave us a really fine rendering of Chopin's Impromptu; but, if he must place his own Etude in such juxtaposition, why not play that first and the Chopin Impromptu afterwards.

Mr. Lewis Engel has given three Matinees at the Union League Club Theatre, for the purpose of exhibiting the "Engel Organ," made by Naeham. This is distinguished by an "expression" stop operated by the foot, a patent percussion stop for pizzicato effects, and various other improvements on the ordinary reed organ. The programmes were somewhat classical, including the Andante from Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; Agnus Dei from Mozart's First Mass; Menuet from Mozart's Symphony in E flat; Nocturne by Chopin; Gavotte by Sebastian Bach; Song Without Words by Mendelssohn, &c., &c.

Mr. Engel also exhibited the "Piano-Organ,"—an ingenious combination of the Engel-Organ with an ordinary piano—on which he skilfully played the Serenade from Don Giovanni with accompaniment and pizzicato. Connected with the organ is a knee-pedal by which any note can be held down at the will of the player, thus producing effects impossible on the ordinary organ. But I imagine one would require a liberal education to manipulate the machine.

A. A. C.

PHILADELPHIA, MAY 25. Franz Abt is among us; at last he has fulfilled the oft-repeated promise of visiting us. He arrived in Philadelphia, on Wednesday, May 15, and was enthusiastically received by the German Singing Societies. He was the guest of Martin Landenberger, Esq., and at this gentleman's house on Wednesday evening he was tendered a serenade by the German Societies. Musically it was not a success; the "ruination" of everything was the decided and emphatic singing out of tune of almost every Society.

On Thursday evening Herr Abt attended a rehearsal of the programme for the concert to be given in his honor the next evening.

On Friday evening the Academy of Music was well filled with an enthusiastic audience. The concert was given by the Maennerchor, Saengerbund, Junger-Maennerchor, Harmonie, and the Vocal Union, this last being composed of American singers. Messrs. Gastel, Himmelsbach, Kopta and Hennig, and Miss Bertha Krause, also took part. I enclose the programme:—

Jubel Overture.....C. M. V. Weber.
Chorus—"Morgenlied" ("Morning Song").....F. Riets.
By the Combined Societies.
Chorus—"Wasserrose" ("Water Lily").....Franz Abt.
Vocal Union.
Trio D-moll.....Mendelssohn-Bartholdy.
Messrs. Himmelsbach, Kopta, and Hennig.
Chorus—"Oybin,".....Franz Abt.
Saengerbund.
Soprano Solo—"Verlegenheit,".....Franz Abt.
Miss Bertha Krause.
Chorus—"Ich muss nun einmal singen,".....Franz Abt.
Male and Female voices of Harmonie.
Overture—"Ruy Blas,".....Mendelssohn-Bartholdy.
Chorus—"Wehmuth,".....Schubert.
Junger Maennerchor.
Violin Solo—"Ballade und Polonaise,".....Vieuxtemps.
Mr. Wenzel Kopta.
Chorus—"Pflaegst,".....Franz Abt.
Saengerbund.
Baritone Solo—"Am Neckar am Rhein,".....Franz Abt.
Mr. Emil Gastel.
Chorus—"Vineta,".....Franz Abt.
Maennerchor.
Chorus—"Siegesgesang der Deutschen,".....Franz Abt.
Mr. Carl Sents led the orchestra; the "Jubel Overture" was clearly, though not strikingly, given.

The pieces rendered by the Combined Societies were conducted by Abt himself. When he appeared to conduct the "Morgenlied" he was royally received. He is a modest looking gentleman of medium height, rather stout, but of dignified carriage. His hair is sprinkled with gray, and he looks to be quite his alleged age. He is a capital leader. He seems to hold his choros in perfect control, so that he can infuse into it the spirit of the composition. The other choros by the Combined Societies was Abt's "Siegesgesang der Deutschen": it was given with a burly spirit, but sadly lacked refinement. The participating societies did well in allotted parts; but singing out of tune was chiefly the trouble. The Maennerchor in Abt's "Vineta" were very forcible. The Vocal Union carried the palm for delicate singing; it is feeble in force, but the way in which they rendered Abt's "Water Lily" was very agreeable. Mr. Kopta in his solo was particularly happy. The orchestra were conducted by Abt. Miss Krause did not by any means deserve the encore she received for singing "Verlegenheit": it was due chiefly to the fact of Abt accompanying her. Mr. Gastel sang his solo with much more fire than usual, and was loudly cheered; in response he sang Abt's "Schlaf wohl," and was very successful in it.

The Mendelssohn Trio was excellently played, Mr. Hennig especially deserving praise.

Herr Abt is much delighted with the reception which Philadelphia—not only German but natives—have extended him. He left for New York on Saturday, the 18th, but will return.

M. A. T.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., MAY 23. Although writing from this city, I will speak first of a New York matter. The proverb saith it is an ill wind that blows nobody good. In visiting the Central Park Garden and viewing the internal changes, especially the addition of those great mirrors which illuvisely double the size of the crowd of visitors, one may ask if the point of the proverb may not be predicated of that pistol shot, which, in the fulfillment of its fatal function, prevented the desecration of those consecrated precincts by the Ninth Regiment Band with its tawdry trappings and brazen flare.

Theo. Thomas (the entire sixty of him,) has a pre-emptive right there, which, not even the thief of a four-hundred mile railway ought successfully to dispute.

If that sea of glass adds to the resonant quality of the place, let all rejoice that the former geni of the locality are re-instated, undisturbed by those less worthy.

The name of Theo. Thomas, (multifariously meant as before) is now a musical household memory and anticipation in every city in the land. The make-up of a Thomas concert programme is known to be always one of predominating excellence.

I enclose a copy of that for last evening as illustration of the classic element promised for each Thursday evening.

NOTICE.—Every Thursday evening the second part of the Programme will consist of compositions of a higher order, as movements from Symphonies, Classical Overtures, &c.

1 Festival March, (New).....Krebs.
2 Overture—"Oberon,".....Weber.
3 Waltz—"Wine, Women and Song,".....Strauss.
4 Minuetto—Symphony E flat.....Mozart.
5 Ballet—"Faust,".....Gounod.
6 Overture—"Egmont,".....Beethoven.
7 Adagio, } "Ocean Symphony," Op. 42, Rubinstein.
8 Scherzo, }
8 Introduction, Chorus and March.....Wagner.
Third Act (Lohengrin)
9 Overture—"La Gizza Ladra,".....Rowinle.
10 Waltz—"On the beautiful blue Danube,".....Strauss.
11 Polka, "Gracioso,".....Hans.
12 March, "Tannhauser,".....Wagner.

The listening to such a programme, devoid, as it is, of the solo element, is like the view in a gallery of great paintings, in which if there be portraits of persons, (sols) they are but the adjuncts in a great design. The only solist here was the conductor, and his instrument, the baton. But his unobtrusiveness offers a marked contrast to the frantic air sawing frequently and fruitlessly indulged in by persons occupying the conductor's stand, and even to the fanciful baton gyrations with which the elder Jullien was wont to "conduct" the audience.

One other matter which will interest all "orthodox" Bostonians, because Mr. Hepworth's name is associated with it: As is well known, his new Society meets for worship in Steinway Hall. The singing is purely congregational, my good friend, Mr. Sigismund Laear, being the organist. On meeting him recently he said, "I can now adopt the language of old Simeon: Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace. I have long wished, but scarce dared hope to hear an American congregation sing Luther's 'Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott'; but on last Sunday morning it was sung in Steinway Hall. We are to use it six Sundays consecutively, to make it familiar."

A Brooklyn item of interest is the lately promulgated annual statement of the Philharmonic directors, from which it appears that after paying conductor, (Mr. Bergmann), orchestra, (80 picked men of the New York Philharmonic one hundred), soloists, &c., they have two thousand and eight dollars and odd cents in the treasury. Whereupon the Daily Eagle advises them to take a hint from Theodore Thomas, and use the surplus in providing the material to "lighten and freshen" their future programmes. The city will furnish music in Prospect Park on Saturdays during the summer, commencing June 1.

T. E. A.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JUNE 1, 1872.

The School Festival.

When we said the good music was all over, we did not realize that one of the most beautiful and most suggestive of our annual festivals was coming round so soon. The event of last week was the Fifth Musical Exhibition of the High and Grammar Schools of the city of Boston, under the direction of the Standing Committee on Music, of which Dr. UPHAM is still at the head. This was an occasion most delightful and inspiring, both to the participants, and to the few thousands who were favored with the card of in-vation. There has been much complaint in past years that the members of the city government monopolized the distribution of the tickets, and that not even the music committee were allowed much influence in it. This time a partial remedy was found in giving the performance twice, on the afternoons of Wednesday and Saturday, May 22 and 25th,—the latter opportunity being for the special benefit of the parents of the children who sang, and surely no class had a better right. But even then, the Music Hall twice filled contained but a small portion of the many who desire to witness such a manifestation of the most beautiful and most expressive phase of culture and refinement in our public schools.

There was no exhibition this year of the Primary and youngest scholars; and there were no specimens of the musical or the "vocal-gymnastic" drill, illustrating the mode of teaching, as on former occasions; the old wearisome practice of speech-making, eulogy and exhortation, had been wisely dropped some years ago;—so that now it was something rather higher than an exhibition; it was purely a musical, and we might almost say, an Artistic Festival. A programme of good music, choral and orchestral, well selected, well arranged, was carried through without interruption. One enjoyed the children of course, and these evidences of their wise training and great progress; one also enjoyed music.

With the first sounds of the Voluntary on the great Organ,—one of the effective French Offertory pieces, (would not strains more joyous and more tranquil, with less of the tragic opera intensity, have been more in the spirit of the hour?), brilliantly played by Mr. SHARLAND, one of the principal and most successful music teachers in the schools, that beautiful kaleidoscopic scene, which need not be again described, began to repeat itself, more beautiful than ever, of the long files of white-robed blooming girls, entering from all points and moving with mathematical, say musical precision to their several places on the great amphitheatrical platform, built up around the organ; then the boys of the Grammar Schools in many streams converging into the central space and background; closely packed in front of them was the orchestra of the Harvard Symphony concerts; finally, with quick military word and step, two battalions (tenor and bass), from the Latin and the English High Schools, forming to the right and left in front of all. This one scene was enough to show how unity of measured movement, the joy of harmony, the freedom of law, pervades the whole school discipline. As for the picturesque ensemble, with the contrasts of white and colors, it seemed to rival the apple blossom glory of the country in that very week, while the compact mass of "sober-suited" boys might well suggest the patches of ploughed land.

The conductor, Mr. JULIUS EICHBERG, general Supervisor of Musical Instruction in all the schools, and having the immediate charge of that in the Girls' High and Normal School, stood at his desk in the centre, and at the tap of his baton the whole 1400 singers rose like one, and sang in four-part harmony a grand old Choral, "Praise God, ye people, with accord," ascribed to Nicolaus Hermann, 1554. It was given with great precision both of time and tune, with a free, full delivery of tone,—perhaps somewhat too uniformly loud; but making fair allowance for the blatant quality of unsubdued boys' voices, it was good honest choral singing, grandly impressive. The tenors told well; but we confess our inability to palpably identify the bass sounds with the battalion on the left; whether the voices were too few in proportion, or too undeveloped, or whether the fault lay in our own sense of hearing, or our place, we know not; or whether the voices were covered up by the instruments; for, what with orchestra and organ, bass there was in plenty.—Next came a fine piece, solo and chorus, also in four parts, from Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion: "Sing of judgment, sing of mercies," &c., in which the solos were sung by the pupils of the Girls' High and Normal, Highland (Roxbury), and Dorchester High Schools. The solos were given with right musical and true expression, and in the responses the full chorus poured in like a broad uplifting floodtide. Here, as in all the singing, one could not help remarking the vast improvement within a few years, and from year to year, in the average quality of tone in these young voices; it shows that they have been developed, so far as it is possible in class teaching, upon sound principles; that the voice has not been forced beyond its natural and easy compass, but has acquired strength by daily exercise within the medium range of tones.

Next, the Orchestra of over fifty instruments gave an effective rendering of Weber's "Jubilee" Overture,—a fitting prelude to the jubilant choruses that followed. These were the Glee by Macfarren ("Light and laughing summer sky") a light, quick, buoyant melody, which rang out cheerily and sweetly, though the outline was not quite so perfect (at least on the first day) as that of the slower movements; a Trio: "The heaving Billow," by Verdi, not in his overstrained and morbid mood at all, but healthful, tranquillizing, and delightful; it was even delicately sung; lastly, a spirited and jovial "Sailor Chorus" by Wallace, with a liquid, graceful turn of melody, that went to a charm, so that there was loud call for a repetition.

Here came pause for a few minutes, filled with that peculiar, fascinating lawless music, the multitudinous hum and brook-like babble of all those young voices eagerly engaged in talk. The sumptuous Overture to Semiramide opened the second part of the Concert. A "Chorus of Angels," in four parts (soprano and alto), from Benedict's "Legend of St. Cecilia" was very evenly and purely sung by the pupils of the several Girls' High Schools. And then came the noblest selection in the programme, the Chorus with Soli (by pupils of the High Schools) from Mendelssohn's Athalie: "Heaven and earth display," &c. This was the highest effort, and, artistically, the crowning achievement of the concert; the chorus, twice returning after the subdued and sweet reflective solo passages, rang out with a sublime effect. The solo by the collective Contraltos was particularly rich. All that was needed to the full intention of the composition was these voices. But the excitement reached a climax in the "National Hymn," composed for the occasion by Mr. Eichberg. The words, which have been much admired, are understood to have been written by his daughter, and are as follows:

To thee, O country, great and free,
With trusting hearts we cling,
Our voices tuned by joyous love,
Thy power and praise we sing.
Upon thy mighty faithful heart
We lay our burdens down;
Thou art the only friend who feels
Their weight without a frown.

For thee we daily work and strive,
To thee we give our love,
For thee with fervor deep we pray,
To Him who dwells above,
O God, preserve our father's land,
Let Peace its ruler be,
And let her happy kingdom stretch
From north to south—most sea.

The flowing and spontaneous melody, conceived in a happy moment, full of fervor and of unfeigned exaltation, harmonized with a musician's skill, and set in good orchestral relief, was sung with a will, and wrought a marked sensation in the audience. Both times it had to be repeated, and with increased effect. A stranger in the balcony, a Southern clergyman, was so excited by it, that he claimed leave under the inspiration of the Hymn, "as an ex-Confederate South Carolinian," to call for three cheers for "Our Common Country," and they were given heartily and ringingly, and then came the repetition of the music. The new hymn "took" decidedly, nor can we wonder that it did. That the tune is really unique and in the best sense new, it might be hasty to assert at once; and whether it be simple, grand, inspired enough to gain a deep hold on the general heart and be the Nation's Hymn (for some predict that) is what time only can decide.

After a charming chorus by Hatton: "Who will to the greenwood hie?" between the two stanzas of which Mr. Eichberg had interpolated a graceful solo in Waltz measure, the singing of "Old Hundred," with the audience rising and joining in the last verse, brought these most interesting exercises to a close, and all went away edified and happy, and occupied with more thoughts on the whole matter of this musical school culture, than we have room to even hint of now. Among the sentiments awakened, gratitude to those who have been and are the wise, devoted leaders in this noble movement, was one of the readiest and strongest.

Conservatory Concerts.

The NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY gave its "224th Recital,"—an artists' chamber concert, or rather matinée, for the instruction of its pupils, in Wesleyan Hall, on Wednesday, May 22, with this interesting programme:

Quintet in E flat, Opus 16, for Piano, Oboe, Clarinet, Horn, and Bassoon Beethoven.
Allegro moderato.—Andante.—Allegro non troppo.
Mr. J. C. D. Parker, Messrs. Kutsleb, Weber, Schormann, and Beecher.
Song, "A lonely Arab maid," (from Obéron) Weber.
Miss Addie S. Ryan.
Piano Solo, "Songs Without Words," Mendelssohn.
Mr. J. C. D. Parker.
Song, "C'est l'espagne," Massini.
Miss Addie S. Ryan.

The Quintet, with the original wind instruments, (it is more commonly played as arranged for strings), was a rare treat. Mr. PARKER played the piano part most artistically, and every one of the other instruments was entirely satisfactory; the horn, especially, has very difficult passages which it performed with great ease and evenness. Miss RYAN sang the song from Obéron with good expression, and her voice seemed firmer than when we heard her last.

The BOSTON CONSERVATORY (Mr. EICHBERG's) had a quarterly exhibition of the Pupils in the Music Hall last Monday afternoon. The programme included organ, pianoforte, violin, and solo vocal pieces: and all of the eighteen numbers spoke well for the system of instruction and the promise of the pupils. The two most remarkable instances of talent and of progress, perhaps, were the playing of Weber's Concertstück by Miss EMILY SPICER, her teacher, Mr. LEONHARD, sketching in the orchestral accompaniment on a second piano, and the Violin Solo (Eichberg's Reminiscences from I. Puritani) by Miss PERSIS BELL. Master VAN RAALTE's performance of Vieuxtemps' Fantasia Caprice was also a very neat piece of violin playing for so young a lad. A little dot of a girl, too, only nine years old, Miss LILY CHANDLER, played some Violin Variations by no means badly. The organ playing of Miss ALICE SPICER (a Choral Vorspiel by Bach, and the Allegro from Mendelssohn's Second Sonata) is worthy of mention; so too the execution of Rink's Concerto for the flute stop on the organ, by a small boy bearing the great name of S. Bach! (William Shakespeare sang not long ago in a Leipzig Conservatory Concert.) The singing by pupils of Mme. JOHANNSEN and of Mr. GLOGGNER-CASTELLI did credit to their faithful and judicious training.

The sudden death of Mr. FRANCIS G. HILL, which occurred a week ago at his residence in Newtonville, was a painful blow to very many musical and other friends of the deceased, who, by his sweet and kindly disposition, his rare modesty, his sincere interest in Art and fellow artists, and his zeal for their success, more almost than for his own, had become attached to him. Mr. Hill was among the first of Boston young men who went to Germany to study music. He returned a really accomplished pianist, but his extreme modesty, ever inclined to underrate his own abilities, kept him from public performance. As a teacher he was faithful and successful, and as a friend all who have come within his quiet sphere have valued him.

Music Abroad.

VIENNA. A correspondent of the London Musical Standard writes:

Anton Rubinstein has taken a formal farewell of the public, and must feel himself highly flattered at the ovation his last appearance gave rise to. His engagement as artistic director of the "Society of the Friends of Music" was brought to a close at their last extra concert, upon the conclusion of which, in the presence of the committee and the assembled members, besides all the professionals and amateurs who had taken part in the concerts, a most elegant baton was handed to him.

On the 24th of April his newest opera was produced at the Hofoper, entitled "Teramora." The music is good, but set, most unfortunately, to a very weak libretto, a circumstance which will materially interfere with its success.

The Italian Opera performances, of which Mme. Patti was the star, have been brought to their conclusion; but not without one of those manifestations in her honor which greet her wherever she goes. The descent of bouquets and wreaths, which almost buried "la Diva," was copious and beyond comparison, in fact it was so extraordinarily heavy, that the fair recipient—quite moved to tears at the favor of the audience—had to solicit the assistance of six attendants in order to convey them to her dressing-room. Besides these marks of favor, the accomplished bénéficiaire received several costly presents, such as a silver table service, a bouquet-holder, most lavishly jewelled, and a splendid bracelet, ornamented with precious stones of great value.

Wagner is expected here very shortly, and will treat us to a very grand concert, at which compositions of his own will be interspersed with some of Beethoven's and Gluck's. The foundations of his Nibelungen Theatre at Baireuth are already being laid. It will cost 100,000 thalers alone to build it, and the expenses of the performances which will be given in order to illustrate his ideas of what an opera should be, will absorb another 150,000 thalers. When we add 50,000 thalers for defraying the expense of the costly machinery which is necessary to the success of the music, we arrive at a total of 300,000 thalers, a sum equal to about £45,000. This is a heavy expenditure for the production of a musical and dramatical composition; but what we must expect in future, if Wagner's ideas make rapid progress.

PARIS. Mr. Oakeley writes to the London Choir under date of May 8, about the 13th Concert of the Conservatoire (45th season), giving the programme, as follows:

Symphonie en ut.....Beethoven.
Ave Verum.....Mozart.
Chœur.
Concerto pour violon.....Mendelssohn.
Mr. J. White.
Chœur des Genies d'Oberon.....Weber.
Ouverture de Ruy Blas.....Mendelssohn.
Scène et Bénédiction des Drapeaux du Siège de Corinthe.....Rossini.
Le solo chanté par M. Galliard.

The orchestra, under the direction of George Hainl, played with its accustomed perfection of execution. In respect to elaborate finish, no orchestras within my recollection—at Berlin, Leipzig, Dresden, or even at Vienna—surpass that of the justly renowned band of the Paris Conservatoire, although the French reading of the music of the greatest composers falls short of that of the Germans in breadth and grandeur of conception. This was felt in some parts of Beethoven's first Symphony, and especially in the trio of its third movement—played, notwithstanding the exception about to be taken, with marvellous refinement, grace, and brilliancy—at a point when the first violins, hurrying back to the opening subject, introduced a sforzando so suddenly and emphatically as to produce an effect somewhat sensational. The passage elicited from the impulsive audience a burst of applause, and the whole movement was re-demanded and repeated after loud calls of "bis" from all parts of the hall. Scarcely less applause followed a magnificent performance of Mendelssohn's Ruy Blas, which glorious overture exhibits no trace of having been written against time by a composer whose popularity throughout musical Europe seems to be approaching that of Mozart. Mention of the latter great name shall not here occur without adding that his divine Ave Verum was sung by the chorus with more attention to light and shade, with more devotional feeling—in a word, better than in any country I had heard it given.

The operas Les Huguenots and Faust—always interesting to hear in this capital,—at the Theatre Français, and Trovatore and Norma at the Theatre Italien, are at present less remarkable from a musical than from a scenic point of view. The Lyrique Company have given an interesting revival of Weber's neglected "Sylvana," and at the Opera Comique Mozart's Figaro, and (by way of contrast in every respect) Ambroise Thomas's Mignon have been the most recent representations.

London.

A NEW ITALIAN TENOR.
(From the Times, May 6.)

Since the debut of the late Signor Giuglini at Her Majesty's Theatre, in 1856, when Mr. Lumley was manager, no new comer of the sterner sex has ever been received with such marked and continuous enthusiasm as Signor Italo Campanini, who made his debut before a London audience in Gennaro (Lucrezia Borgia), with Mlle. Tietjens (the Duchess of Ferrara), Signor Rota—another new comer—(Duke Alphonso), and Madame Trebelli-Bettini (Maffeo Orsini). Of Signor Rota we may say at once that he made a very favorable impression, that he has a powerful voice, a fine stage presence, and both as actor and singer gave evidence of qualifications far beyond the ordinary. But almost exclusive attention was bestowed upon the new tenor, who, after the ballad "Di Pescatore," in which Gennaro tells the brief history of his life to Lucrezia, was at once accepted. We cannot enter minutely into a judgment of his qualifications now; but we may say without hesitation that a more genuine and beautiful tenor voice, a more finished delivery, more thoroughly satisfactory phrasing, and more general musical intelligence, have not been known for very many years on the Italian stage. That Signor Campanini is already an accomplished artist there can be no doubt. That the whole audience—the most crowded of the season—thought so was shown by the enthusiastic applause which followed every one of his efforts. The conclusion of the Opera was like the beginning—a triumph for the young singer, who was three times called before the curtain, in company with Mlle. Tietjens and Signor Rota. We must not forget to state that Mme. Trebelli received the customary encore in "Il segreto per esser felice," which she sang as well as ever. If this Signor Campanini, as we believe to be the case, is the same who has been singing the chief part in Herr Wagner's Lohengrin so often at Bologna and Florence, he must be an Italian tenor altogether out of the way.

The operas this week have been:—Don Pasquale, with Mlle. Marimon (Monday); Faust, with Mlle. Marie Reze (Tuesday night); and Lucrezia Borgia, second appearance of Signor Campanini (Thursday). Linda di Chamouni is announced for to-night—first appearance of Mlle. Clara Louise Kellogg, after an absence of four years.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL. The first of the promised series of grand Choral Concerts, with M. Gounod as conductor, was given on Wednesday afternoon, by command of the Queen, who honored the performance with her presence.

The hall to all appearance was as full as it could easily be—area, amphitheatre, great gallery, picture gallery, and balconies on either side of the organ being seemingly crowded, while very few boxes in any one of the three tiers, so far as we could observe, were unoccupied. It is computed that some 7,000 people were present; and the spectacle was in the highest degree imposing. The chorus filled the orchestra to the roof. The lady singers were all placed in front—with their variegated costumes, a pretty sight, of course—the gentlemen behind them, crowding both sides of the organ. We are informed that the number of singers was 1,134—346 sopranos, 194 altos, 236 tenors, and 358 basses, in two equal choirs. It would be difficult to find places in the orchestra for another singer, although we believe that the Albert Hall Choral Society numbers in its ranks a good many more members.

M. Gounod, on taking his place as conductor, received a hearty welcome; and it to him is due the credit of having trained this large body of choristers, a hearty welcome was his right on this account alone, putting aside his other and more widely recognized claims. The choir is carefully balanced in its various sections, and sings for the most part well in tune, attacks with good accent, can sing piano as easily as forte, graduate, when necessary, from one to the other, and only wants a little more finish of detail, and of what is understood as "chiaroscuro," to become a choir of first-rate excellence. Such qualities as this large body of singers already exhibits are much to boast of. What was done sounded in the greater number of instances as effectively as could be desired, and warranted a belief that, in unaccompanied choral part-song especially, a vast deal may yet be achieved at Albert Hall. True, there were not many examples of elaborate part-writing in the selection; nevertheless, what there really was seemed in no way to puzzle the choir; and perhaps the two pieces to which the expletive "elaborate" most justly applies—one by Palestrina, the other by J. S. Bach—were among the most successful efforts of the day.

We append the programme entire:—

"Te Deum," composed by C. Gounod. "Adoro Te" (Catholic Hymn), harmonized by Ch. Gounod. "Kyrie" (Mass, "O regem Cœli," Palestrina), arranged by Ch. Gounod. "O Jesus, my Lord," J. S. Bach, arranged by Ch. Gounod. "Old Hundredth" (Psalm), harmonized by Ch. Gounod. ["I loved a Lass" (French Pavane, 16th century), harmonized and arranged by Ch. Gounod. "O! the sweet Continentment" (Pastorale, 1650), harmonized by Ch. Gounod. "Love me true, dear Lassie," Jacques Lefevre (Pastorale, 1613), harmonized by Ch. Gounod.] "Ave Verum," Mozart, arranged by Ch. Gounod. "Sicilian Mariner's Hymn," harmonized by Ch. Gounod. "O Filii et Filie," Leisring, arranged by Ch. Gounod. "Hallelujah Chorus" (from the Messiah), Handel.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Dolly Varden. Song. Hunt. 50
" " Brockway. 50

Two songs in popular style, bearing on the new fashion. Each has a Splendid Illustrated Title-page.

I'm just as happy, Darling. Song and Chorus. Harrington. 30
3. G to d.

"He's coming, coming, coming!
My darling's coming home."

Very pretty chorus.

Dream of the Better Land. Duet. 3. Eb Barker. 30 to c.

"I dream, I dream of pleasant lands,
And fair and elow .less shores."

A pleasant and easy duet. Carry it home for next Sunday evening.

Lilla Darling. Song and Chorus. 3. Eb to f. M'Neal. 30

"Come and sing your song to me, Lilla, Lilla darling!"

One of the "soft blue eyes and golden hair" style of ballads, and is very sweet and pleasing.

How 'shamed I was. 2. Eb to c. Bagnell. 30

"He kissed me thrice,
And said it was nice."

Very merry melody. Come, and with a "lady's," and "gentleman's" version.

I dreamed that I dwelt beside a Stream. Song and Chorus. 3. C to e. Keller. 30

"She seemed to me as a beautiful dream,
Too sweet for earth and woe."

A very beautiful Contralto, (or Bass or Barytone) song. Rich and tranquil music and words.

Instrumental.

Dolly Varden Galop. 50

" " Schottische. 50

" " Waltz. 50

Here comes Dolly, at last, the lady herself, in splendid colors, on every title page. As the picture is worth the price, the music is of course thrown in, but will pay well for the playing.

Adieu. Waltz. 3. C. Misud. 30

Varies to the key of G and of F. Is quite original, and therefore has the merit of giving you something pretty to hear that you have not heard before.

Faust. Fantasia Brillante. 5. S. Smith. 1.00

Sixteen pages of brilliant music. The airs comprise quite a number from the opera, and the composer has managed to invest them with considerable additional "brightness" without introducing anything of great difficulty. Good piece for exhibitions.

Thirty Sonatas by Domenico Scarlatti. Edited by C. Banck. No. 3. 4. F. 35

The appearance of these Sonatas will at once awaken the curiosity of players, as Scarlatti was, not an "old master," but a great-grandfather of those we usually style "old," and these Sonatas, now first published are, perhaps, the very first in that form ever composed. To Herr Carl Banck belongs the merit of bringing them to light, and of "editing" them by making such slight changes as were absolutely necessary to fit them for the Piano forte, an instrument not dreamed of at the time of their composition. No. 3 is really musical, and is not a bad piece either for Piano, Reed Organ or Pipe Organ.

Books.

SPARKLING RUBIES. A Collection of Sunday School Music. By Asa Hull and Harvey Sanders, Esq. 35

To produce a good S. S. Singing book, one must not only be a good composer, but a good teacher and a good Sunday School man, and have also a very fine tact. The last, certainly, will be conceded to the gentlemen who compiled the "Rubies." The text itself is very readable, as the titles it contains are novel and well chosen, and the tunes will be found to be as good as their names.

THE PILGRIM'S HARP. A choice Collection of Sacred Music. By Asa Hull. 60

One will exclaim, on seeing this, "just the thing for our Vestry!" and the good deacons and young men who go around to neighborhood prayer meetings, will echo, "the best pocket-singing book we have seen!" It is that. There are 224 pages, and each page has a great deal on it. But all is, somehow, very conveniently fitted in, and the print, although small, is very clear and distinct. The selection of tunes, new and old, is all that can be desired.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff; an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 814.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 15, 1872.

VOL. XXXII. No. 6.

Music in Italy.

(Translated for Dwight's Journal of Music, from "Bunte Blätter, by A. W. AMBROS.)

The spirited composer of "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Otto Nicolai, published among his earliest works a Duo for Soprano and Mezzo-Soprano, an excellent salon piece in its way. It attracted the attention of the King of Prussia to the young composer; and he received a stipend to enable him to go to Italy for his improvement. Otto Nicolai actually made the journey to Italy, wrote operas in the modern Italian style (the "Templario," the "Esule di Granada") and could be unspeakably mortified when asked whether he were the author of the book: "Italy as it really is." Not until he had thrown this musical Hesperides plunder behind him, did he create so fresh and fine a work as the "Merry Wives"—unfortunately his last.

Even to this day the winner of the prize for composition in the Paris Conservatoire is sent a pensioner to Rome for further education. Berlioz won this good fortune through his prize Cantata "Sardanapalus." In very piquant letters, at the time, (written for I know not what Parisian Journal), he gave expression to his dissatisfaction with the music of the land, which, as he said, "receives the stale kisses of the Scirocco and the Cavatina writers." Yet so strong and so lasting is the power of old traditions! It was all right that Gluck, after he had learned music in a sound and solid way as a handicraft in Prague, should serve his apprenticeship in Italy, there to learn also how to handle music as an Art. What Handel learned in Italy is shown by the peculiar aroma which floats over even his long-spun roulade arias (not to speak of the choruses); Sebastian Bach, with a general similarity of style, seems austere in comparison. To-day one can only send the musician to Italy to learn how not to make music; which certainly may be a proper object of study. With the painter, the sculptor, it is otherwise. For him no journey to Paris, no study in any Belgian atelier can take the place of what the treasures of centuries of the noblest artistic culture, the highest bloom of Art, in Italy, afford him. When Berlioz passed his pension year in Italy, there still lived traditions, at least, of the bel canto, and he, whose own vocal pieces are the complete antipodes of the bel canto, might have learned something under this head of the "Cavatina writers."

Older friends of music in Vienna still remember an almost ideally perfect company of Italian opera singers, who, about the year 1822, under Rossini's personal direction, in the Semiramide, the Cenerentola, the Zelmira (composed especially for Vienna), presented an ensemble such as was scarcely ever witnessed elsewhere, and even drew from the most sworn enemy of new Italian music,—from C. M. von Weber, who was present in Vienna for the bringing out of his Euryanthe,—the exclamation that: "he was getting angry with himself, because the stuff was beginning to please him against his will."

All this is passed away! In place of the fine, elegant man-of-the-world orchestration of Rossini, which often pearls and bubbles like an overflowing glass of Champagne, but which always respects the singer as the principal person, we have now an orchestra brass-clad, in true blacksmith fashion, with a view to "grandiose" effects, against whose coarse, rough blare the singer can no longer sit, but has to scream. Bellini, in Paris, with the help of two wonderful bass singers, Lablache and Tamburini, made the experiment of doubling the effect by letting those two bass Colossi sing in unison; the Duo: "Suoni la tromba" in I Puritani really had an unprecedented success, little as the melody could be called new, since essentially it is only Oroveso's air in Norma with a new turn. Such a device is well enough for once, and not again. In spite of that, unisono duets, unisono choruses, have since then come to form special category. Finally, in these latest times, Verdi's notion has been pushed aside by Richard Wagner, and the "endless melody" begins, like a boa constrictor, to crush to death whatever was still left of the bel canto of the good old times.

Contrasted with the present standpoint of Italian Opera (which even in its libretti, like the Trovatore, La Forza del Destino, &c., treats subjects which might excite the envy of the Porte St. Martin), the finely cultured, always extremely pure and elegant writer, Rossini, seems completely classical, and so indeed he is esteemed in Italy. They comfort themselves with the thought that they possess him; he is for Italy the divine composer par excellence, the finest perfection of Art, the master, in whose recognition connoisseurs and non-connoisseurs are all agreed, whose dramatic works keep ever coming up again, to give the operatic repertoire the dignity and the importance of the "Classic." From him dates the new era of music, so that all that was earlier has fallen into oblivion; his Stabat Mater passes for the model of perfection in the musical church style, through which Pergolese's Stabat has been put completely in the shade. An inscription over the homely door of the Liceo Filarmonico in Bologna informs us, that "here Rossini entered as a scholar, to come forth for the admiration of all ages."

Only very lately has a timid effort been made in Florence to reach back into the period before Rossini. The Rossini barrier once broken, possibly Paisiello and others may venture to show themselves again. Reluctantly I say it: the utter and complete degeneracy of music in Italy dates, after all, directly from the one-sided, blind idolatry toward Rossini. With that all earnestness in Art has ceased, and Art has been regarded only as a means of sensuous, unintellectual enjoyment. Rossini's brilliant geniality, his irresistible amiability helps us over all his musical levities, extravagancies and loosenesses; but when there come people after him without their model's geniality and amiability, of course nothing but the levities, &c., remained. Bellini tried to set things right again; he had cast glances into the scores of Sponcini and of Beethoven, perhaps even those of Gluck, and indeed he had remarked there more than perhaps was good for him. His powers did not suffice to give a new fall and direction to the stream. With the very talented Donizetti a suspicious coarseness is already often discernible, which in Verdi becomes the principal and foundation power of the whole. And Verdi is the gran maestro of the day, the legitimate successor of his predecessors; for what the graduates of the Milan Conservatory, &c., have since accomplished in the way of festival and wedding marches, hymns of "emancipated" Italy, and operas not utter failures, is not worth mentioning. Mercadante and Pacini, whom we know only as feeble imitators of Rossini, pass there for the representatives of a "learned," in some sense old-fashioned musical direction. From the operatic stage the corruption passed into the smaller art of the Romanza, the Canzone (in which field the "Canti popolari Toscani" of the Florentine Luigi Gordigiani form a solitary brilliant exception), and even into the church music, in which the most trivial Rossini-isms greet us from all church choirs. Why not? Rossini is a classic, the divino maestro assoluto. "The beautiful is everywhere beautiful, and why not also in the church?" is the rebuke I got in Florence, when I let the state of things annoy me. I could only take the observation quietly, but I advised that they should also let the Corps de Ballet dance about the altar. That they should put aside as "obsolete" the worldly music, the theatre music of the brilliant musical period of Italy, and whatever else had served for mere amusement, may be tolerated; but that a whole glorious literature of church music of the Roman, the Venetian and the Neapolitan school should be thrown overboard, ignored, its mere existence scarcely dreamed of, that does indeed exceed all bounds of patience.

In the singers' college of the papal chapel at Rome compositions in the Palestrina style have kept a place indeed; and on appointed days one may hear certain pieces by Palestrina, Morales, Allegri, Biondi, Pitoni, &c. The Improperia on Good Friday, the Miserere, are even now astonishing achievements in their way. But, incomprehensible contradiction, the same singers, who here in impurity of intonation, in the finest shading, in soulful expression left nothing to be wished, screamed out their Palestrina at the next "Cappella Papale" in the not spacious Sixtine Chapel, in such an incredibly coarse and soulless manner, that one could not trust his own ears and preferred to keep them shut. Crier comme un aveugle: say the French; instead of which we might say: Crier comme un chanteur de la chapelle du Pape. As late as under Baini's direction the performances of the Capella were famous for their excellence. Baini died on the 21st of May, 1844, at Rome; it has not taken a quarter of a century from that time to make the Chapel what we now hear. And already, too, the famous Holy Week music of the Sixtine has suffered a considerable rupture. On Ash Wednesday, 1866, Allegri's, and on Good Friday Bai's Miserere was sung; on Thursday a new Miserere by—the Abbate Mustapha, the old soprano of the Chapel. "Prophete rechts, Prophete links, Mustapha in der Mitte." More serious friends of Art shook their heads over this Mustapha-cation of the Sixtine; and it may be the fault of the name merely, if for my part a very well known refrain from the Italiani in Algeri hummed itself in my ears. On the 21st April, 1868, the Requiem was celebrated in the German Church Dell' Anima for King Louis of Bavaria. The Papal Chapel sang, and among other things the Dies ira of Pitoni. How coarsely and mechanically this fine composition was performed, cannot be told; the precious little three-part episodes of the Tuba mirum, Liber scriptus, &c., requiring the exactest rendering, went as slovenly as possible. The effect is incomparably more solemn when instead of figurative compositions the bare Cantus planus is sung, as was the case a few weeks later at the burial of Count Ludwig von Stainlein (a very talented composer by the way) in the church of St. Sabina on the Aventine. Here for the first time one understands a fact always told in history, but commonly misunderstood: how at the

* Prophete rechts, Prophete links, das Weltkind in der Mitte (Prophet on the right, prophet on the left, the world-child in the middle), said Goethe of himself walking between Lavater and Eschdow in the Rhine country in his young days.—TRANSL.

Council of Trent, in spite of the splendid compositions of a Morales, Goudimel, Animuccio, Costanzo Festa, &c., the question could arise of doing away with the artistic polyphonic song and introducing merely the ritual Gregorian intonations in its place;—for the first time one understands these complaints about the “confused shouting of the singers, in which not a single syllable of the text can be distinguished,” and the dry wit of Cardinal Capranica, who thought it sounded “like a sackful of sucking pigs shaken up.” The fault by no means lay in the compositions as they lie before us now in black and white; but it might well be in the execution, which certainly in many of the choirs was not the best. Truly celestial as the Palestrina style is in a good delivery, it becomes intolerable even in a mediocre rendering, just as a Rafael Madonna in a mediocre copy is the more intolerable, the more heavenly the original. I fear, the true Palestrina song will soon become an obsolete tradition in its own home. It makes a tragic-comical impression to see the long, glorious line of Palestrinists, a true triumphal procession of the spirit and of noblest beauty, closed by the figure of the fat old Mustapha waddling along after! But the church music of the modern era derives its phraseology from the opera theatre; the Italian wants to hear in church the same motives, roulades, impassioned accents and stresses, to which he has become accustomed in the (modern) opera. The soloists in the church, mostly naturalists, with splendid, but uncultivated voices, lay themselves out like the street singers before the coffee houses, of whom they remind you in a very questionable manner—caricatures of the more cultivated opera singer. The ennobling sound of female voices is excluded; harsh boy sopranos supply its place, if not, as Berlioz found, falsettists. The orchestral instruments (they were too “worldly” and too “frivolous!”) are replaced by the accompanying organ with registers which imitate oboes, clarinets, &c. At high Mass in S. Carlo de’ Catinari in Rome I actually heard, for once, the singers venture into the labyrinth of a fugued movement; it went well enough and there was no man missed when it was over.

The worst chapter in the Italian church music is the organ playing. Here all humor ceases, the thing is positively exasperating. The Organ fantasia, which introduces the Offertorium, is commonly a ragout of all possible hacknied phrases, turns and scraps of melody, which we have heard to satiety in Donizetti and Verdi, little runs, little trills, chords popping out in the wrong places, dance rhythms, with now and then the rolling thunder of the timpani register, or, in particularly brilliant passages, a lively chime of bells. The left hand of the organist (des Orglers) keeps going on in so-called Brillensbassen,* or in trichords struck in rapidly reiterated quarter notes. In S. Maria in Cosmedin in Rome I heard the organist at a church festival, on an organ frightfully out of tune, play off a march-like movement staccatissimo; it sounded like the bloaty of a flock of sheep! On Ascension day, 1868, I heard—I must say it, with a sort of inward rage—in the lower church of the Sacro Convento at Assisi, the organist (Orgler), close to the grave of St. Francis, immediately beneath those paintings by Giotto, so full of the sublimest spirit of Dante, thrash out (one could not very well say “play”) a Galoppade, which might have furnished the fit music for some drunken sailors’ orgy. These gentlemen organists avoid the Pedal, as they would the glowing ploughshares over which St. Kunigunde had to walk to give proof of her virtue. At the utmost they tread down at the end of their movements a couple of tones, Dominant and Tonic, with their ponderous boots. Such is the present aspect of the organ playing in the land, at whose great organs once sat masters like Andrea and Giovanni Gabrieli, like Claudio Merulo, like Ercole Pasquini,—like Frescobaldi, one of the greatest masters of all times! The profanation is incredible.

In the church of Santa Maria Novella at Florence I heard the Overture to Flotow’s “Martha” played during the military Mass by a military band planted wide in front of the high altar! At the altar the little bells were sounded at the moment of the Elevation, and at the same time rang out the merry motive of the march of the maids to Richmond! Had Mephistophiles stood by me at that moment, he would perhaps have said to me: “Are you reaching out after the thunder? Well that it is forbidden to you wretched mortals,” &c. Who knows what I would have done, if a small thunderbolt had been at my disposal! The singing of the nuns in Trinità de’ Monti may still be heard; there is something innocent about it; but the melodies themselves which you hear there, are flat and sweetish sing-song. In fact the church music in Italy has sunk to a degeneracy wholly without example in the history of music. For Catholics it is a grief and shame, for non-Catholics an object of contemptuous mockery. I actually can see no remedy;—in such utter depravity scarcely anything is left, but the heroic cure,—briefly and simply to restore the plain Gregorian Chant.

Nor have I found Opera in Italy particularly well done. A performance of Rossini’s Otello in the San Carlo at Naples was just respectable, and no more. The part of Emilia was taken by so wretched a singer, that the graceful Duet: “Vorrei che il tuo pensiero” had to be omitted; and Deademonia sang an air of Verdi in its place. The orchestra accompanied purely and with extreme precision, but without spirit, without soul, (something like an admirably made mechanical “Orchestration”). The musical glory of Italy, once radiant throughout the world, is a tradition of the past.

The Gillott Sale.

COLLECTORS OF MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

“Riches make to themselves wings and fly away.” And what strange and various wings they choose! The flapping of some that have recently taken flight might indeed assist in the music of the spheres. Let us, however, hope they may still hover near us, and, being at last released from a cruel bondage, enjoy a happier and more useful state of existence nearer home. There is something sad in the contemplation of the event which has suggested the above remarks. A certain rich man has died, and his death has been immediately followed by the complete undoing of that which had been the pleasure of his life to accomplish. A recent number of our journal contained an account of the principal musical instruments which formed the collection of the late J. Gillott, of steel pen fame, disposed of by Messrs. Christie and Mason on the 29th ult. A glance at the names of the purchasers will show how complete has been the dispersion.

The desire of possession does not often take a musical form. Bibliomania and picture gathering are very common diseases; the passion for collecting old crockery and furniture is also rife among many who have more money than they know what to do with, and believe that age is the sole test of excellence. When the disease seizes a musician, it generally assumes the library form in preference to the instrument fever. The complaint attacks persons in different ways: sometimes the desire is for full scores, sometimes for string quartets, and, occasionally glees are the coveted treasures; old operas, ancient English songs, works on harmony, and musical literature are also common forms to be met with. The wish to possess every scrap that one particular composer ever wrote is one of the mildest, as it is one of the most common forms of the complaint. We have known persons who were never easy until they obtained every edition of Mozart’s quartets that had ever been published; not, however, that they could play them, for possession is by no means synonymous with appreciation, and too often treasures lie on the dusty shelves and in the eupboards of those whose sole pleasure seems to be in the mere tenure. A certain conchologist once astonished the visitors in an auction room by crushing under his foot a precious shell for which he had just given an enormous sum of money; but the act was done with a definite object: “There, I have now left remaining in my collection the only specimen of this species.” We almost tremble to think of the fate of our inimitable Cremonas if the musical collecting mania took this virulent form. And yet, the shutting up of these gems in a museum, like so many mummies, or stuffed birds, or butterflies, is a crime differing only in degree from that of utterly destroying them. In both cases they are lost to the world; but in the collecting mania, time, which heals all diseases, comes in the ruthless form of the auctioneer’s hammer, and a new life dawns on the long hidden instruments.

The recent sale was not an isolated case. In 1857 a similar event took place, when about thirty violins, violoncellos, and several bows, the property of the late James Goding, a brewer, were disposed of, and realized upwards of £2,000. And now we may mention the curious, though to our mind perfectly natural and to be expected circumstance, that in neither of these cases was there the ability to use these choice instruments in any proportion to the inordinate desire of possession. So does the wealthy Moslem collect together, from all parts of the earth, all forms of female beauty; and to him is denied its true and worthy appreciation,—his treasures are also his prisoners.

Without committing ourselves to vouch for the authenticity of all offered for sale, it is unquestionable that the collection was the largest of its kind, and perhaps the finest ever gathered together by one man.

In fiddle dealing, as in several other trades, many tricks are played, and “Cremonas” can be manufactured, which in every respect, save in refinement of tone, are calculated to deceive the vast majority of self-constituted judges. The Gaspar di Salo Double Bass formerly belonging to Dragonetti, which was sold for £41, surely cannot be the instrument for which this celebrated player was once offered a thousand guineas. No doubt Mr. Gillott had some queer instruments in his collection, instruments whose labels were by no means to be relied on.

Viewed in a commercial light, Cremonas, like many other gems of art, pay well for investment. The prices obtained for Gillott’s instruments were in every case higher than those paid at the Goding sale fifteen years ago. This is not to be wondered at, for while the number of these masterpieces can never increase, the number of those desiring to obtain them is ever more and more. Sixty or seventy stringed instruments—golden prizes for ambitious artists—many of them being the finest specimens extant, are now in the hands of dealers, and will, we may be sure, command prices far beyond the large sums for which they were knocked down. But whatever may be the cost of their redemption, it is at least a gain to musical art that they are no longer shut up, and buried alive, in a “collection.” We hope that they may eventually become worthily associated with owners who, far beyond the desire of mere possession, will prize them for their beauty and real use in interpreting to us the thoughts of those great composers without whose writings the instruments would be comparatively valueless.—London Musical Standard, May 18.

[The succeeding number of the same journal publishes the following reply to the above.]

SIR,—With your permission I should like to say a few words in your columns on the subject of your leader of Saturday last, but chiefly to offer another view of Messrs. Gillott and Goding as collectors of musical instruments. You say it was a perfectly natural and to be expected circumstance, that neither of those gentlemen could use these “choice instruments in any proportion to the inordinate desire of possession.” This may be true, but there is another and very important service which they rendered to the cause of music, for they (but chiefly Goding, from his residence in London) made the extraordinary excellence of the Cremona violins so well known by their love of them and delight in hearing them played by the first artists of the day, as to imbue these artists with a conviction of their much greater adaptation for this purpose, and to induce them all to use such like whenever they could become possessors of them. Mr. Goding was noted for assembling together the most eminent violinists and giving his other friends the delight of hearing them execute the finest compositions on the best instruments, a rare combination not then easily accessible. Much to his credit, also, he made it a matter of conscience to pay well for his private parties, so that his munificence aided to obtain for these players, when the time came, a choice among those grand instruments.

* “Spectacle” or “eye-glass basses.” Italian, Occhiali. Meaning basses of this kind:

so common with Rossini and the modern Italian composers.—T.A.

A more recent instance than you have mentioned, and a much more striking one, taking the quality of the violins into consideration, is that of the late Mr. Plowden, whose eight choice specimens of Stradivarius and Guarnerius are now nearly all in the hands of professional players. These eight were purchased by a dealer for £2,000, a much larger price than a similar number in Gillott's sale. Mr. Plowden was also a munificent patron of the art. I consider the collections of such men as I have named, as well as of the kindred taste, that of pictures, have a great tendency to educate the people, and aid in the advancement of art.

For these reasons we ought not to be ungrateful to men like Goding, Plowden and Gillott, for they have been the men whose munificence has made England the richest country in the world, among other things, in pictures, in Cremona violins, and other works of art, all of which have produced an effect on public taste which cannot be over-rated.

I hope you will allow me to offer these suggestions as to the use of men who can neither paint pictures or play Cremonas, but who yet, in both instances, take great pleasure in accumulating them.

Yours respectfully,

J. PEARCE.

Author of "Violins and Violin Makers."
Sheffield, May 20, 1872.

P. S. In page 74 of my book, your readers will find an account of the real Gaspar di Salo double bass, made so celebrated by Dragonetti.

Organs and Organ Playing.

(From the London Orchestra.)

During the past week the curious and rare collection of ancient stringed instruments, for so many years the care and solicitude of the late Mr. Gillott to get together, has been disposed of by public auction, and the wit and penetration of the present day has been paying famously for the industry and learning of the past. Two hundred and fifty years ago the Italian could make a violin and violoncello that in these times will bring three hundred guineas and serve as a model for present work in its highest form. Why is this? Because the dead artist still speaks in the living instrument. The wise head, the facile hand, the loving heart, the tender tone of the almost mediæval workman has come down to us in his imperishable work. Never was made any instrument of any value but what revealed the tone, temper and habits of its maker. A grand violin in the hands of a spiteful player is certain to let us know how miserable and wretched it is in such hands: it bewails its unhappy fate, and beseeches your pardon and consolation in an unmistakable pathos. And in the old instruments we see the old player and the old composer. The strings of the ancient viol let us into the secret of the old methods of order and connection, development of idea, nature of passage, and power of combination. We see, better than any notes can show us, the way the old scholar learnt his gamut; what were his notions of song, and what his learning in thorough-bass and general counterpoint. The trouble viol kept him in his diatonic series and preserved him from the abstruse calculations of enharmonic reversions. The bass gave him a roadway of good tetrachords and unembarrassed hexachords, and taught him to write agreeably, unaffectedly, and with interest for ears and eyes not quite so learnedly corrupted as those of these days.

As it was with the violin, so it was with the organ. But a real, true representative organ of past centuries is an instrument of the utmost rarity, and the spirit of those times was almost dumb. We mend old organs when we had much better destroy them. An old organ will not take to the modern vernacular; it groans and weeps over its fate, and it is mercy to put its pipes into the melting pot. The modern organ is a thing of its own times, and will not associate with the manners and customs of its ancestors. It speaks the fashionable lingo of this hour, and disdains communion with the vernacular of its great grandfather. In organ building the Celt has deposed the Teuton, and put his wit and temper into the new instrument. The Gallican churches were without organists of the true breed, and the Gallican organ builder invented something for the hybrid to exhibit himself thereon.

There are seven descriptions of organ players, and as the number seven is the type of fulness, we may congratulate our readers in seeing the last species of the genus. They stand thus: 1. The extemporaneous poet and orator in sounds. 2. The elocutionist—the interpreter of the thoughts of great composers. 3. The conductor and orchestral performer, who can transpose orchestral music into orchestra organ music. 4. The dramatist and operatic composer, who can interpret operatic scenes and ensembles upon his organ. 5. The singer, who can convert his organ into a vocalist. 6. The sensationalist, who creates unpleasant perturbations of the viscera and nausea in nature's chemical furnace with undreamt of inversions, creeping chromatics, inaudible echoes, and ear-stunning crashes. 7. The man of notes and thorough bass, who plays what he sees how he heat can, and with such comprehension as kind nature has bestowed upon him, somewhat original and dulled by an imperfect education.

With regard to the first species—the ready man of head and hand, to talk in his own way on any theme such as the occasion may demand—it is almost extinct. As to extemporaneous preluding, is there a man living who can extemporize on the points of the tetrachord, after the fashion of old Bach, in his "Gravement in G major?" Like the slow 3 2 openings and middles of Corelli in his concertos and sonatas? England had the organists who could play in this way, Roseingrave, Bennett, Kelway, Battis-hill; but it died out with old Sam Wesley. Thomas Adams could do nothing in this school. He could staccato a subject, but not idealize a tetrachord. He occupied his early manhood in manipulating a fugue after the fashion of Reicha, and he beat his model and master. So much for his headwork. And he compelled his fingers to do what John Flight had made his long barrels do—articulate every sound without any severe regard to the emotion and meaning of the composer. He was one of the last great organ players, but could not extemporize a gravement in parts, or on any system of the old division of the octave.

Again, as to the free fantasia-prelude—after the model of Bach's chromatic fantasia and his organ preludes with pedal—this school is gone, dead, extinct. Thomas Adams could not do it, for he had neither the passage at command nor the slightest idea of the chain of its chords. Old Sam Wesley could not do it, for, as he naively confessed, England had no organ proper for this style. And yet Handel did it on English organs; and so Roseingrave. Mendelssohn could do it bravely, chastely, grandly; full of fire in the brilliant passages, and a right knock down when the massive chords broke in. Poor fellow, he died wrapping his mantle around him, and our organists have forgotten the model the sacrificial fire so ruthlessly destroyed. Whether he was the only organist in Germany possessed of the gift we know not; but none of the continental organists who performed on the Albert Hall organ gave any indication of familiarity with the form. So far our native organ-players are not peculiar in their neglect or abandonment of one strong mode of organ exhibition. Since the disappearance of Thomas Adams, strictly speaking there has been no extemporaneous fugue player. It is no easy thing to have at command even a mechanical harmonic guide to the fugue to carry in one's head and bring to bear at a moment's notice the rules of progression that affect consecutive chords, create suspensions and yet make no new chords, and apply the well-understood method to the instantly-conceived theme. Even the made-up fugue—unless it have a clearly developed feeling—something more than applied counterpoint and borrowed subjects—is of no high value. Imitation from analysis and clear exchange of parts is so much barren labor in a dry land. From all such there is nothing to store, nothing to glean.

The elocutionist on the organ is the executant who is the master of method and school, and can say with his fingers whatever his intellect and imagination teach him to draw out of the great compositions peculiarly belonging to the organ—genuine organ music. This comprises most if not all the requisites for fine pianoforte playing, subject to the differing modes of expression between the piano and organ. The more perfect the pianist the more perfect his organ performance, provided he is an organist. In this country there is no traditional mode of playing Bach's music. Bach died in 1750, long before any copies of his music came into this country, and John Christian Bach, his youngest son, who was at our Royal Opera in the last century, may be said not to have known his father, was certainly never taught by him, and knew little or nothing of his music. Even in Germany the tradition was lost, whatever it might be, and hence the variation of thought and feeling in the rendering his organ music. Again he wrote it to be played with five fingers, and it has been cunningly and carefully edited with numbers for four fingers and a thumb, making places difficult which the composer intended should be easy. Until the mechanism of the Bach school be overcome, it is in vain to look for revelations of the Bach feeling, and without the Bach feeling there is no Bach. The elocutionist is a rare specimen of the organ player, for the reason that there is no remuneration for the time spent in acquiring his power and reputation. The imitation does as well and saves half the labor, and all the pull at the heart-strings.

The organ orchestral player must be not only the perfect mechanic, skilled in method of execution, but something more. A violin player, or at least one who can perform on some instrument in the band, familiar with scores, familiar with orchestras, with orchestral playing, and himself capable of laying out a score and analyzing movement. Arranging orchestral music as more notes is an easy affair, but expressing orchestral thoughts on an orchestral instrument is by no means easy. Here the organ ceases to be an organ, and the remembrance of a pedal pipe, an open diapason, a resquialtera, &c., is sheer abomination. Under no situation must the audience be reminded of a church, or a church organ, of pedal-piped psalm tunes or twelfth and fifteenth anthem choruses. Cremona and vox humana, mixture and furniture of themselves, are each and all odious, and must be translated into something more real and tangible. Then the player must have the schooling and experience of the conductor of an orchestra—possessing the full apprehension of the life and expression of the composition, and its adaptability to the means of the new mechanism. He who can play the Pastorale of Beethoven on the organ, should be well able to conduct it with the orchestra, and teach its meaning to the fifty players before him. His organ stops are in fact so many bandmen, and need as much care and attention in their handling. When the transposition or translation of operatic composition is the case, the player assumes the functions of vocalist, orchestral player, conductor, and almost stage manager. No organist can be reasonably expected to translate the great operatic movements of the present day without intimate acquaintance with the music, the manner of its singing, the method of its construction, so as to be able to cut it here and there when necessary, to give it its proper color, and to recall the feeling created by its performance in the theatre.

Nothing is more difficult to give on an organ than any great soprano, tenor, or bass aria. Nothing is more easy than playing the notes, but notes are only signs of sounds, and something more than sounds is required—the idea, the sequence, and the "to and fro," the life and breath of the vocalist. Here the organist must feel himself a singer with an orchestra before or behind him. He has to sing the song on his organ, and direct the orchestra in the accompaniment. There is a stereotyped fashion of doing this: one row of keys for solo, another for orchestra, and pedal pipes for violoncellos and basses; but something infinitely more than this is requisite for the well-doing of vocal song transposition. The chief characteristic is the total oblivion of the organ as organ.

The sensationalist is the conjuror on his instrument, a clever and acute mechanic, one who knows every pipe in his organ, and its power singly and in combination; who rings bells, fires cannons, makes birds whistle, the cry of the cuckoo, the gurgle of the nightingale, the genuine thunder, the hail and the storm. He commands the entrance of things animate, things inanimate and exanimate. He executes solos on the contrabasso, and you fancy you can hear the rasp of the bow on the string; he flies to the harmonies of the violin, the harp woody and yet reedy one of the bassoon, compounds at oboe, and extemporizes a clarinet and cornet di bassetto. He plays dances and marches, and chorals, and ballads, gleees, and part-songs—all in sequence just as it suits him to show off his organ, and is a great favorite with the organ builder. Then oftentimes he has a fair sprinkling of learning, and is well up in the last specimen of the music of the future and the dismal chromatics of the modern continental organist. He can weep and wail all over his three keyboards, and mutter a "de profundis" from his pedal board. He is fully alive to the diminuendo—the almost inaudible echo—and to the ear-stirring crescendo. And for a crash—something to make the audience jump on their feet he has no rival. In the funeral march he is an adept—one may fancy the presence of undertaker, body-bearers, mutes, plumes, and the very coffin itself.

The thorough-bass player is nearly gone—he who was accustomed to give the congregation his version of the exercises in Burrow's Harmonic Primer—progressions of 6 5 up, and 6 4 2 down, a minor chord, and then a major, all stereotype and glue. Arne's "Water parted from the sea" was his favorite andante, and Handel's "Water music" his brilliant effort. He was glorious in the overture to the Occasional Oratorio and sublime in the Coronation Anthem. But he could play a psalm tune, and give him time, compose a chant, the two things he could not or would not teach, for oftentimes his successor fails in both.

The great change in organ construction has no doubt affected the tastes of our organ players, and something remains to be observed on this point.

Personal Recollections of Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy.

DR. FERDINAND RAHLES communicates the following to the London Musical World, May 18.

For several years I had not met Felix Mendelssohn, nor corresponded with him. I had been traveling a great deal, and it was not until 1836 that I became more settled, having accepted my first engagement as music director at Arnberg in Westphalia. The winter of 1829 was a very severe one, mountains and forests were covered with snow, and, in consequence, both travelling and postal arrangements were greatly interrupted; in those days no steam horses drove their way through all weathers, man was dependent upon the season and the state of the roads, and dragged along his miserable way, jolted in a diligence, or shivering in a private carriage. Arnberg, the principal town of the county of Arnberg, was one of those favored places where the diligence between Cologne and Berlin stopped for about two hours in order that its wearied occupants might refresh themselves. One day, not long after the arrival of the diligence, a messenger was sent from the principal hotel, to request me to be good enough to visit a gentleman there who was so unwell as to be unable to move out. I asked his name, but the man had entirely forgotten, and could only assure me that he must be a friend of mine from several observations that he had made. I hastened to the hotel, where I was shown into a private room, and duly announced, when, to my surprise, I found my friend, Felix Mendelssohn, stretched out upon a sofa. His first words were of gratitude for my promptitude in visiting him. I then told him of the messenger's forgetfulness; he laughingly replied that all his cards were in his portmanteau, and that he had been unable to move to obtain one, as the slightest movement caused him acute pain. "Be sure," said he, "that that stupid fellow is not musical." "What, then, is the matter with you?" said I, "have you met with some accident?" He explained that his feet had been frost-bitten and caused him excruciating agony, and begged of me to seek out a good medical man in order that he might obtain advice as to whether it would be safe to continue his journey on to Berlin, and, at the same time, some alleviation of his sufferings. I immediately started to find a doctor, and, in going out, entreated Felix not to make himself uneasy, but to be assured that a few days' rest and medical treatment would put him right, at the same time offering him the use of my house, if any stay in Arnberg should be necessary. "Thanks! thanks!" was all that he could say, so violent was his pain. I made all haste to find the doctor I was in search of, and quickly brought him to my sick friend. After he had inspected the injured parts, he informed us that no dangerous symptoms were present; and after using some medicaments, which he would send, the journey towards Berlin might safely be continued. "However," he said, "if, by the time you have reached the next stage (three hours and a half distant), the pain does not abate, I would advise you to remain there all night." I offered at once to accompany Felix, in order that he might not be alone should he become worse, and be obliged to stay at any place. Fortunately one place in the diligence was vacant and I secured it for myself. After a great deal of trouble to get my suffering friend into a comfortable position in the coach we started. He bore his pain with a great deal of firmness, and, in order to draw his mind from it, we entered into conversation about his visit to England. "My reception," he said, "was all that I could have wished, for I am sure in such a country my works will receive acknowledgment. I met there many accomplished artists and talented musicians" (here he mentioned about half a dozen or more, whose names, after such a lapse of time, I cannot recollect, but had I then known that England would become, after 1848, my second "Valerian," I should have had more interest in remembering them). "I met men there who loved their art, and whose whole aim was to elevate it." I enquired how he liked England, its people generally, and his answer was, "If you could see how they worship our Handel, and the care which they bestow upon the performance of his works, you would find your unfavorable prepossessions vanish. Only imagine that during the mighty Hallelujah Chorus in the Messiah, an English audience rises to its feet, and remains standing, in honor of its immortal composer; that is elevating, that is noble! I should not like, however, to live there constantly, so much of my time for work would be taken up, and time to an artist is irrevocable. The distances from one place to another in London I found very long and often very vexing." Other subjects upon which we conversed were Moscheles and Carl Maria von Weber. With regard to the first, Felix could scarcely find language to praise him sufficiently, both for his kindness in making his sojourn so agreeable, and for his upright and true-hearted advice. As an artist and composer he admired Moscheles highly, and remarked of him that by keeping persistently to the piano, and composing only for it, he had made himself famous; he had not scattered his talent broadcast, but had concentrated it upon that instrument upon which he stood unrivalled as an executant. Mendelssohn expressed his great delight at the enthusiasm which C. M. von Weber had created in England, and the deep impression which he had caused by his Der Freischütz; incidentally mentioning that Weber, with an eye to stage effect, had altered the opening scene in the opera, which the author of the libretto, Frederick Kind, had given to the Hermit, by substituting for it the effective scene of the prize shooting. Whilst on the subject of Weber, I added, that having been in company with Weber whilst he was in Hamburg, he mentioned he was composing an opera, but had not made up his mind as to whether he should call it Die Jägers Braut (The Huntsman's Bride), Die Freikugel, (The Free Bullet) or Der Freischütz, thinking, however, the last name the most striking. Mendelssohn having expressed his ignorance as to why Cherubini's beautiful opera, Der Wasserträger (The Water Carrier) was usually called in France Les deux Journées, I proceeded to acquaint him with the origin of the name, which is as follows. Before Cherubini brought out his opera, there was a dramatic and operatic law extant, which was always strictly adhered to, viz., that the action of any play or opera should not be supposed to occupy more than one day. Cherubini, with his masterpiece, was the first to break this ridiculous restriction, and give a freer scope to dramatic literature. The time of his opera was supposed to extend over two days, hence its name of Les deux Journées. Of many other subjects we discoursed, but the foregoing are all I remember. I was pleased to see that Felix gradually became more cheerful, and that his pains were alleviated, as he determined to continue the journey on to Berlin without stopping. We parted when we reached the next station, named Meschede, exchanging the best wishes, and I returned to Arnberg. Soon after his arrival in Berlin, I received from him a very affectionate letter, heartily thanking me, and prophesying an early meeting under circumstances more favorable to jollity, at the same time expressing his gratitude to Dr. Weber for his skilful attentions. We did not meet again until 1833, at the Rhenish Festival, at Düsseldorf, which he conducted, and for which he expressly composed a Festival Overture, playing, on the third day, the Concertstück of C. M. von Weber. He accepted, at that time, the appointment of Music-Director at Düsseldorf, and I being Organist and Music-Director at Solingen, about two hours ride distant, our intercourse was for several years almost uninterrupted.

Music Abroad.

LEIPZIG. Our last musical exchanges are full of the annual examinations of the Conservatory pupils. The correspondent of the Standard (London) writes:

Spring always brings to the musical critic a pleasing duty to perform, and that is to encourage through well earned praise, and aid by good advice, the budding talent he may perceive displayed by those pupils of the Conservatoire who are permitted to give proof of their skill at the public examinations held in the concert hall of that establishment. These examinations—or "trials," as they are termed here—always unite a highly critical and interested audience, composed, of course, principally of friends of the pupils, but leavened with the presence of several of those cognoscenti in musical matters, whose dictum at the Gewandhaus Concerts is looked forward to by débutants and débutantes, yes, even by veteran performers, with a certain amount of trepidation. Woe to the élèves who allow nervousness to paralyze their powers, for no allowance is made in their favor by the stern critics, who, in the interest of art, distribute with the strictest impartiality praise or censure as it may seem due.

At the three examinations held at the Conservatoire on the 17th, 20th, and 24th of April, some highly-gifted young musicians were brought before the notice of the public. As usual, the performers upon the violin were more successful in the impression they created than the performers upon the piano-forte, whose studies seem to have been less abstruse than those of the future Paganinis. Of these, perhaps, the most promising is a young Austrian, Richard Sahla by name, whose interpretation of a concerto allegro by the immortal Paganini was so masterly in character as to merit the prediction of a brilliant future being in store for him in the realms of art. A pupil of the Conservatoire already for some length of time, Herr Sahla has, at a previous examination, attracted the attention of the public here; and the progress he has made within the last few months is strong evidence of talent and of the power of intense application to the study of his instrument which he possesses. A formidable rival for him was to be found in the person of a young American—of German parentage, no doubt, to judge from his name—who has come right from the other side of the world to pursue his musical studies. Herr Louis Schmidt, who calls San Francisco his native town, played Beethoven's concerto for the violin (1st part) with much taste and precision, earning the well-merited applause of the delighted audience.

Of the pianists, a young musician from Leicester created a very favorable impression by the clearness of touch, correctness of taste, and powerful execution he displayed in rendering Dr. Hiller's concerto for the pianoforte in F sharp minor. Mr. George Löhr—a name more German than English—will no doubt prove to be a valuable acquisition to the musical community in the land of his adoption or birth, whichever it may be, and will carry back to England a sound knowledge of the theory of the art to which he has devoted himself, joined to a delicate appreciation of its beauties. Scotland was ably represented by Mr. William Townsend, from Edinburgh, who proved to be a clever exponent of Chopin, whose concerto for the pianoforte in E minor (1st part) he played with delightful brilliancy and precision. The ladies were not so well represented as they usually are; and, with the exception of a young vocalist from the Hague, who sang "Ah perfido" with much sweetness, were infinitely inferior to their male rivals.

The representations given at the Opera by the Italian troupe, of which Signor Pollini is the director, have afforded a certain amount of distraction to those who delight in Italian stagione. Mme. Desirée Arlot is the star of this company, which numbers amongst its members the tenor Marini, and the bass-buffo Bossi, names all more or less well known to the London opera habitués. "Don Pasquale" and the "Barber" have been about the most successful of their productions; and Mme. Arlot has met with a most favorable reception upon all occasions. When "Rigoletto" was given, Mme. Peschka-Leutner undertook the part of Gilda, and sang with much success this part in the Italian tongue. The buffo Bossi has also greatly pleased the public by his inimitable acting and really splendid, although somewhat powerful voice, over which he has, however, such an unquestionable command. Signor Pollini has also been very successful in the choice of a conductor, having succeeded in securing the services of Herr Ernst Schuch, a musician who will probably be seated next winter either at the conductor's desk of the opera in Berlin or in Darmstadt.

An opera, entitled "Diana of Solange," in five acts, composed by the Duke Ernest of Saxe Coburg Gotha, brother to the departed Prince Consort, is now in rehearsal at the Stadt Theatre here, and will shortly be produced. The princely composer, who greatly distinguished himself, it may be remembered, by his military talents during the late war, has already published several very able compositions; and one or two of his operas have already been produced in Germany with success.

MAY FESTIVALS. A foreign journal, May 18, remarks:

In Germany and in Austria the present month will be unusually prolific in grand concerts. Of those already announced, the following appear to be the most important: namely, in Düsseldorf, on the Rhine, on the 19th, 20th, and 21st inst., the three concerts of the Lower Rhine Musical Festival, conductor, Anton Rabinstein. At Königsberg, in Prussia, another triplet is fixed for the 22nd, 23rd, and 24th inst., which will constitute the proceedings of the Provincial Musical Festival, which is to be held there, under the leadership of Dr. Ferdinand Hiller. In Vienna, on the 12th inst., Wagner gives a concert, at which he will assume the functions of conductor; and on the 15th, the unveiling of the Schubert statue, which has lately been erected there, takes place with great pomp and ceremony, followed by a Schubert concert, at which compositions by this great master only will be performed. The great event, however, will be the concert which Wagner intends giving at Baireuth, on the 22nd inst., in order to commemorate the laying of the foundation-stone of the theatre he is going to build there, for the performance of his Nibelungen music. The programme of this concert contains but one work, and that is Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which Wagner contemplates producing in a style which will astonish the world.

GENEVA, a city already celebrated as the centre of several international associations which have for their objects the best interests of humanity, is in August next to be the scene of an international musical festival, with competitions for bands and choral societies. An influential committee is now at work making the necessary arrangements, and from all we hear the scheme is far more likely to succeed than that which is being so freely "puffed" across the Atlantic under Mr. Gilmore's superintendence.—Lond. Choir.

BERLIN. A Society with a very useful object—the publication of musical works by ancient masters—is about to be formed at Berlin, on the principle adopted by the old Musical Antiquarian Society in London, of issuing the works annually to subscribers. Among the scores in preparation are:—a Collection of the Songs of Eglin (1512); of Peter Schœffer (1513); of Ott (1534 and 1544); of Finck (1536); and of Forster (1539 and 1556); the Flores Musice of Hugo de Reuilligen (1488); The Dodecachordon of Glarean (1547); the Porte d'Honneur of Mattheson (1740); the first book of the Choraes for Four Voices, by Johann Walter (1524); and some works by Ludwig Senfl, Johann Leo Hassler, and other composers. Herr Robert Eitner is the founder and manager of the Society.

BRUSSELS. In the last week of the present month (May) a gathering of unusual interest will take place at Brussels, when the Academy of Sciences, Literature and the Fine Arts, will celebrate the hundredth anniversary of its foundation. The musical arrangements, which will form one of the most important features in the scheme, will be entrusted to M. Gavaert, and among the performances by the orchestra of the Conservatoire will be a work of the sixteenth century, and another work of the period of the foundation of the Academy. Contemporary musical art will be represented by a work by a deceased member of the Fine Arts section of the Academy (probably Mr. Fétis), followed by a work by one of the present members, M. Gavaert or M. Limnarde. All the foreign associates of the Academy have been invited to assist in the solemnities, and judging from the admirable manner in which King Leopold presided at the recent dinner of our own Literary Fund, there can be little doubt that his Majesty will enter con amore into the proceedings.—Choir.

BAYREUTH. After three days' brilliant festivities, in which 250 male and female singers, 100 musicians, and 1000 guests have taken part, the foundation stone of the Festal Theatre has been successfully laid, though the ceremonies were marred by a drenching rain, disarranging the original programme. The projected theatre will stand on an elevation overlooking the city, and distant from it fifteen minutes' walk. It was arranged that the singers, after the ceremony and Herr Wagner's address, should join in a chorus, but the rain interfered, and the festive proceedings had to take place in the Opera-house. Nevertheless, thousands assembled on the spot, and Herr Wagner was greeted in proportion by many tongues and palms.

The Opera-house was crowded. The stage was filled with singers and musicians. Herr Wagner was enthusiastically received when he appeared, leading his wife, followed by five solicitors. When they had taken their seats, the Burgomaster welcomed the guests, and cheers were given for the King of Bavaria and the Emperor of Germany. Herr Wagner then addressed the assembly upon the subject of the projected theatre, and expressed his confidence in its success. He rejoiced at the presence of the singers, musicians, and friends, who had assembled in a true German spirit. The theatre they proposed to erect in his honor would, he hoped, be a gathering place for the best German talent, and a nursery of dramatic and musical art. As Herr Wagner concluded his remarks he raised his hands with expressive energy, and a chorus was immediately after given by 300 persons with marvellous effect. Herr Wagner, who appeared deeply moved, embraced his wife and children, and the friends near him, including many solicitors.

In the afternoon there was a grand concert, at which Beethoven's Ninth Symphony was given. Herr Wagner directed; and the vocalists were of the highest rank. The festivities were closed by a banquet, which Herr Wagner attended.

100,000 thalers have been subscribed, but 200,000 are needed. The festivities are declared to be a great success by all present, and the future of the Festal Theatre is considered to be assured. The day being Herr Wagner's birthday, the composer received congratulations from all parts of Germany.—Corr. Lond. Mus. World.

London.

MR. SANTLEY'S CONCERT. We find in the Musical World, May 25, what will interest American readers, to-wit:

One evening last autumn, St. James Hall was filled with a crowd eager to bid Mr. Santley "God speed," though, perhaps, wondering why an artist who is ever acceptable to English audiences should betake himself across the Atlantic. On Tuesday evening the same hall was filled with another crowd, eager to welcome him back, and bent upon showing that, for unstinted admiration, there is "no place like home." Mr. Santley could hardly have desired better evidence of his great popularity than the reception he met with. It is not so much that ladies waved their handkerchiefs, and men shouted a noisy greeting, as that the whole affair was marked by unmistakable genuineness. The people obviously put their hearts into the work of bidding Mr. Santley welcome, and the value of that sincerity exceeded the worth of any other possible demonstration. It is pleasant to see merit thus recognized—all the more pleasant when distinction has been gained by the honest and unaffected use of natural endowments without stooping in the least degree to artifice or trick. Such distinction is eminently that of our English baritone. Mr. Santley was wise to confine his share of Tuesday's concert to songs he has made familiar, because, if anything could enhance the pleasure of seeing him back, it was the hearing of music closely associated with his name. The selections made were, "O, ruddier than the cherry," "The Bell-ringer," and "Hearts of Oak," with "Pronto io son," and Mozart's "Sola," as concerted pieces. The audience encored all three songs, as a matter of course, especially as they were sung in the artist's grandest manner, and with a voice which seemed to have gained rather than lost by hard work in a strange climate. Mr. Santley granted each demand, substituting the "Yeoman's Wedding Song" for Handel's air, and "The Stirrup Cup" for Wallace's ballad, but repeating the last verse of Boyce's nautical ditty. In the duet from Don Pasquale, sung with Madame Florence Lancia, the audience were reminded of the loss sustained by the Anglo-Italian stage when Mr. Santley withdrew from a position rarely gained by an English artist.

Mlle. Carlotta Patti, Mdme. Néruda, Mdme. Rita, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Hallé, and others, assisted at the concert, but, as they presented nothing new, it is unnecessary to give details. Mr. Lindsay Sloper, who was associated with Mr. Santley's American tour, accompanied some of the songs. He might well have taken the more dignified place of soloist.

MR. CUMMINGS'S CANTATA. Our good friend, Mr. W. H. Cummings, the refined tenor singer, whom Boston remembers with so much pleasure, has composed and had performed at St. James's Hall, May 24, a Cantata, of which the next morning's Telegraph gives report as follows:

Mr. Cummings's "Fairy Ring" is neither more nor less than a story of the "good people" who, in the days of old, "gambolled on heaths, and danced on every green." The authoress of the libretto, Miss R. S. Hobbs, introduces us to one of their nightly merry-makings, just as the revel is at its height; or, rather, just as Fortunatus, a fairy with a bass voice, stops the dancing. "Let some one tell of goodly deed performed by magic spell:" this is his command, and to him responds Percival, a tenor fairy, who narrates how he had charmed a passionate and rebellious maiden back to home and duty. An approving chorus follows; after which Florina, a soprano fairy, is bidden speak. Florina has to say that she had restored a wandering boy to his dying mother, and left him asleep in her arms. The fairies at once sing a lullaby, and Fortunatus next takes up his parable, telling how he met with a love-lorn blacksmith, who, in the intervals of toil, lamented the cruelty of woman-kind. Happily, the blacksmith's hard, scornful hearted one arrived on the scene in the nick of time, and a touch of the fairy wand brought happiness where there had been sorrow. Hearing this, the assembled elves moralize on the nature of love; and Gentilla (contralto), after generally approving the occasion, bids the revels recommence. But Florina and Percival, moved by mortal example, get up a little love-scene, for themselves, in which the gentler fairy plays the woman with much success. The dawn then breaks, and the entire throng, after dancing an elfish "Sir Roger de Coverley," betake themselves to rest. Such is the story of "The Fairy Ring," and, being what it is, the composer found ample opportunities for contrasted effect, as well as characteristic treatment. We cannot dismiss the libretto without praising its authoress, not only on this account, but because of verses which are above the average of their kind.

Mr. Cummings had written no work of such importance before, but any one acquainted with his music, both sacred and secular, must have been prepared for a composition of merit, animated by a true artistic feeling, and framed upon the best models of its class. These are precisely the salient features of "The Fairy Ring," to hear which is impossible without recognizing that the composer has devoted to it his best ability, and wrought out the whole thing with immense pains and care. Mr. Cummings makes no pretence of striking out fresh paths in his art, though the modern custom is to struggle sorely at a "new departure." Accepting the generally accepted, he has given us music at hearing which, if no one cries out "Oh, the depth!" most will be conscious of gratification. Once on a time gratification, not bewilderment, was the highest good of musical art. "Nous changerons tour cela," doubtless; but Mr. Cummings is one of those who yet prefer the ancient lines. The work contains thirteen numbers, beginning with an orchestral introduction (E flat) chiefly made up of themes afterwards given to voices, and marked by some tasteful scoring with a view to distinctive character. This leads to a chorus, "Round about the fairy ring" (E flat), in which reliance is placed upon carefully-wrought harmonies, set off by lightsome orchestral themes and varied orchestral color. Percival's air, "By the fair river" (A flat), is melodious and well-contrasted in its various parts. Occasionally a trite phrase presents itself; but the general effect is good. The themes of a vigorous chorus, "Our Queen is quite content" (C major), are relieved and set off by an independent orchestral subject, elaborately scored; after which comes Florina's air, "In a rosebud I was lying," charmingly sung by Miss Edith Wynne, and encored. The melody is one of those incorporated with the orchestral introduction. A quartet, "Peace to the dreamer" (E flat), is another striking feature of the work; and this, too, was encored, amid the liveliest signs of approval. Its harp accompaniment could not have been better played than by Mr. John Thomas. Between the quartet and the song of Fortunatus, "I heard the anvil clang and fall" (G major), the widest possible contrast exists, the latter being written with extreme vigor, and heavily, not to say noisily, scored. Mr. Lewis Thomas gave it the full benefit of his sonorous voice, and won for it the third encore of the evening. As "The Forge," this song is likely to be used apart from the rest of the work. A six-voice madrigal, "Love is a sweet, yet a cruel thing" (G major), pleases by its studied simplicity; and the song of Gentilla, "Happy days and fairies all" (F major), gratifies in an equal degree by pleasant tune and tasteful instrumentation. Mdme. Patey gave this air after her very best manner, and could not refuse the encore it elicited. The duet for Florina and Percival, "Why should I squander my pity on trifles?" (A flat) though somewhat elaborate, is less effective than the other movements; but atonement comes with the finale, "Away, away" (E flat), wherein Mr. Cummings has adopted the style as well as the key of his opening movement, and given consistency and unity to the work. The chorus is, beyond question, one of the finest portions of the Cantata, which it ends in an effective manner. Like the other concerted pieces, the finale was well sung by the members of Mr. Barnby's Choir; and the whole of the instrumental music had justice done to it by a capital orchestra, with Herr Straus at their head. The success of the Cantata could hardly have been greater if applause be a criterion; and Mr. Cummings, who himself took the tenor solos, was lustily cheered at its close, and recalled to be cheered again. The performance was well conducted by Mr. F. Stanislaus.

A miscellaneous second part followed "The Fairy Ring," comprising Beethoven's Choral Fantasia, the pianoforte solo in which was played to perfection by Mme. Arabella Goddard; and the scena, "Ah! quelle nuit," from "Le Domino Noir," sung with characteristic piquancy by Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington. Mr. Cummings contributed David's "O ma maitresse" in graceful fashion; and the overture to "Le Nozze di Figaro" ended the concert. The hall was full.

PAULINE LUCCA's first appearance this season as Selika in Meyerbeer's "Africaine" had the natural effect of filling the theatre. A finer performance as regards the principal part could not have been heard. But all was as nothing compared to the merit and effect of Mme. Lucca's impersonation, than, which nothing more admirable, from every point of view, can be seen on the operatic stage. A Berlin paper, reckoning the other day the number of different impersonations in which Mme. Lucca had distinguished herself, arrived at a total of forty-eight. That is a high figure; but it seemed nothing to the Berlin journalist, who went on to complain that Mme. Lucca had not yet undertaken the part of Elsa in Wagner's "Lohengrin." One can believe anything of the versatility of an artist who appears with equal success as Zerlina and as Selika, as Cherubino in the "Marriage of Figaro," and as Leonora in "La Favorita." — Pall Mall Gazette.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JUNE 15, 1872.

In Honor of Franz Schubert.

A reporter of the Wiener Neue Freie Presse writes as follows of the unveiling of the Schubert Monument lately erected in Vienna, (May 15):

If our Franz Schubert could only have guessed, could only have dared to hope,—above thy grave, poor heart, there shall one day burst and blossom so delicious a spring morning, full of sunshine and flower-scents, and Schubert songs, and Schubert love, as we to-day enjoyed in our City Park! But the richest minstrel of the spring, the most dearly beloved minstrel of the young,—the minstrel "by the grace of God," with the lips gushing over with song, and the heart of a child, could not guess, not dare to hope this. His contemporaries made it too difficult for him. They did not believe in him. They did not understand his singing, they did not sing his songs. A single concert did Schubert succeed in giving in Vienna, where his own works were performed. And when the second Schubert concert in Vienna laughed and wept in his tunes, and won for him fresh wreaths of love and admiration,—those wreaths formed only a new made grave, and the proceeds of the concert scarcely sufficed to defray the modest burial expenses. A few coats, several handkerchiefs, some old music,—and some old and new debts,—these were found to be the worldly possessions left by our richest Prince of Song! The artist's earthly pilgrimage! No, Franz Schubert could not have foreseen to-day. And if some one had told him in his happiest, merriest, most hopeful hour on earth, "Franz, by singing your songs the 'Wiener Männer-Gesang-Verein' shall some day make from twenty to thirty thousand florins, and in loving gratitude for your imperishable gifts, erect a marble monument to your memory, upon the most beautiful green spot of your native city, even before your revered masters, Beethoven, Mozart, and Haydn have such honors shown them,"—honest, modest Franz Schubert would certainly have laughed at them most heartily. And yet we have but just now been a witness to the unveiling of Schubert's Monument.

The grounds about the monument, as also the tent erected for the accommodation of invited guests, were richly decorated with flowers and flags. Because of the want of room, but a few hundred letters had been issued. Among the invited guests, the first places were occupied by Schubert's beloved sister "Lisi," since married, the two brothers, Andrew and Hermann, the poet Franz Schöber, whose verses Schubert has set to some of his sweetest tunes, and many other personal friends of the departed, as well as deputations from the Vienna Art Association, and personages distinguished in art and science.

The celebration was opened shortly after eleven o'clock, by the singing of the lovely choruses for male voices from Schubert's Sanctus, exquisitely rendered by the "Männer-Gesang Verein." How wonderful it sounded, in among the green trees, swelling up into the radiant spring sky! If Schubert could only have heard his Sanctus sung thus a single time, perhaps his earthly pilgrimage might not have seemed quite so hard. After this, the President of the Society, Herr N. Dumba, made an address, in which, after formally and solemnly handing over the monument to the charge of the representatives of the city, he said,—"They and the whole population of Vienna will treasure this monument erected to the memory of their fellow-citizen, the modest school teacher of Rossau, who was an honor to his native city, to our Austrian fatherland, whom German art counts among her worthiest, most illustrious representatives. The artist honors the people he belongs to, the country in which he lived and labored; art and the artist require the vivifying breath of encouragement from their surroundings; this is the warm sun which develops talent, matures the fruit. Thus to the people justly belongs a share of the artist's fame. And particularly is this true of our Schubert. His immortal strains breathe all the atmosphere of home. The Austrian with his full heart and rich mind, the son of Vienna with his happy disposition, and deeply tender soul, knew, richly gifted as he was, how to give utterance to every throb of our hearts, to every emotion of the human breast. He offered us truth, unvarnished truth, and that always makes its way to the heart. A worthy addition will this monument be to those already adorning the city, honoring the memory of the heroes and victors of Austria. He, too, is a victor, a conqueror; he has conquered the hearts of the whole cultivated world, and the conquered praise him with grateful hearts.

And thus I hereby pray our honored Mayor to proceed to the unveiling of the statue, that is to remain a proud monument to our beautiful city, rich in tunes and love of song, for all times!"

This speech was often interrupted by hearty applause.

After a few noble words by the Mayor, Dr. Felder, he gave the sign for the covering to be dropped,—and in the glimmering sunshine, the fine marble statue of Franz Schubert stood before our delighted eyes.

The artist has represented the tone-poet in a sitting posture, the right foot drawn back a little, the left moved slightly forward. On his knees rests an open book, which he holds with the left hand. The position represents a moment of inspiration. The gaze is turned upward, the pencil in his right hand, seems just about jotting down his ideas. Three bas-reliefs, in marble, on the pedestal, represent musical imagination, characteristically symbolized by a sphinx, instrumental and vocal music. In front are the words, "Franz Schubert—To his memory. The Wiener Männer Gesang-Verein, 1872." On the back the date of Schubert's birth and death.

Franz Schubert was not a handsome man in life, it was therefore impossible for the artist to show us an Apollo. But he has most nobly infused into these marble features the lovely, musical soul of the great dead, the soul which sang the sweetest dreams of love and spring, and the highest ideals of youth. From this countenance shines the fulfilment of Robert Schumann's appreciative words,—"Schubert will always remain the favorite of the young, he knows what they require—an everflowing heart, bold thought, rapid action; tells them what they love most,—romantic stories, fairy tales and adventures; wit and humor too he blends with them, but not so much that the softer emotions suffer under it." But also that which made the mortal Schubert so dear to his friends, his touching modesty, his childlike innocence and trustfulness, his heartfelt mirthfulness, and above all, his great beautiful heart,—beams from these marble features, eloquently and full of life.

The declamation of a poem written for the occasion by Joseph Weilen, which was received with tumultuous applause, and the singing of Schubert's Jubelchor, closed the splendid celebration.

Concert of the Apollo Club.

On Friday evening, May 31, the great Music Hall was crowded once more by invited friends of male part-singing, interested in the success, already very marked, of the "APOLLO CLUB," which hardly has been organized a twelvemonth. The Club is in a flourishing condition, having several hundred "passive" or subscribing members, including many gentlemen of high social character and culture, besides the actual singing nucleus, which is composed of over fifty singers,—the pick of the best tenors and basses in our city. In power and quality of voices never has so good an ensemble been brought together here before; and as much may be said, without risk of contradiction, of the average degree of skill and taste shown in the exercise of such fine organs, or the true musical expression, the unity and fervor of their singing. A high ideal seems to animate the union; something more than the mere wholesome social pleasure of giving out their voices in full ringing harmony; its members love good music and believe in music in the sense of Art, instead of in the vulgar and vain-glorious display sense of "Peace Jubilee." They have an artistic leader and instructor. Mr. B. J. LANG has proved himself one of the best of choral drill masters; so the members of the Club in their weekly rehearsals have found out to their delight and animating sense of progress; and so the thousands of delighted hearers, both at the monthly and the larger "private" concerts of the year, have witnessed with increasing satisfaction. More so than ever on this last occasion.

The voices, as we said, numbered about fourteen on each of the four parts. There was no full orchestra, and no overtures, as in the two great concerts given in the winter; but all the orchestral wind instruments (the "Harmonie-Musik," as the Germans call it) were present for the accompaniment of certain pieces. The only purely instrumental piece was at the end of the First Part,—the Andante with Variations from Hummel's Septet in D minor, for Piano-forte, &c., played by Mr. Lang. We could not be there in season to hear the First Part of the programme; but in the morning rehearsal we had heard the two pieces with accompaniment; namely, the opening chorus: "Warrior's Prayer," by Lachner, with introduction and accompaniment by all the reeds and brass;—a broad, full strain of sustained and solemn vocal harmony, not strikingly original, and not always ennobled by the instrumentation; but it was grandly sung. The other was the Foresters' Chorus from Schumann's "Pilgrimage of the Rose," that breezy and exhilarating strain, fitly accompanied by four horns, in which the tones of pure, sweet, strong male voices, perfectly blended, find free, life-some, thrilling play as much as in any chorus we remember; the selection was a happy one for the "Apollo." The unaccompanied part songs, which we had to lose, were: "The lake in dreamy slumber lies," by Schumann; "Hussars to the fray!" by Storch; "The Mountain Shadows" (sung by a triple quartet) by Abt; and Ave Maria: "The twilight fast is falling," with Tenor Solo, also by Abt.—We may state, that nearly if not all of the Part-Songs are from German sources, published in the "Chickering Club Collection," and the English translations of the words, which are poetical and well adapted to the music, are by Mr. C. J. SPRAGUE, a leading member both of the Apollo and the Chickering Club.

Part Second opened with the noblest thing of the evening, Mendelssohn's Fest-Gesang "To the Artists," after Schiller's Ode, from which are culled these words (we give a more literal version than the one here sung) as suited to the composer's purpose:

The dignity of Man
Into your hands is given;
O! guard it well!
With you it sinks, or lifts itself to heaven!
Of Arts the holy spell
Bereaveth a world's well-ordered plan;
Soft may it lead unto the sea
Of the great Harmony.

Let earnest Truth, if her own age reject her,
Seek rest in Song:—the Muses will protect her.
So shall she meet the unbelieving sneer
With glance, whence guilty spirits quail,
More terrible in Beauty's veil:
So rise in all the might of Song,
And, with avenging trumpet, shout her wrong
Into her persecutor's coward ear.

Of freest Mother free-born sons!
Wing yourselves upward with undaunted gaze,
To highest Beauty's throne of rays!
Ye need not woo for other crowns;

O'er all the thousand winding ways
Of manifold Variety
Meet ye at last in full embrace
Round the high throne of Unity!

The first passage is set to a majestic and inspiring movement (andante maestoso) in four-part chorus and four-part solo harmony, in 4-4 measure, accompanied—this and the whole—by horns, trumpets, &c., with an uplifting, grandiose effect. In the second passage, about "Truth rejected," the movement changes to 3-4, Allegro moderato, yet of a grave character. In the third part the 4-4 measure returns in swift Allegro (assai vivace). It was superbly sung, and with Mendelssohn's original accompaniment we thought it more effective than with the full orchestra arrangement we had once before.

Hatton's Sailor's Song: "Sweetly blows the western wind," Abt's "Sleep, thou Wild Rose" (triple quartet), and Mendelssohn's "Huntsmen's Farewell" (with four horns), were admirable specimens of male part-singing. Perfect purity of intonation; sweet yet strong and manly quality of tone; good balance of parts and blended euphony; nicely studied phrasing; light and shade, distinct in softest pianissimo; exactness, giving no sense of mechanical constraint, but plenty of free abandon; in short, refinement, without sentimental overdoing of expression, and a ringing, crisp vitality without rudeness,—all these qualities of true part-singing, unless to some ideally fastidious Fairy Fine-ear, were present in that singing.

A very bold, grand, thrilling piece of harmony was that Hymn to Odin, by Kunz, conjuring up appalling images of angry Ocean waves, and stormy skies and battle. Among the more modern efforts in the self-limited and well-nigh exhausted field of part-song composition for male voices, we have found hardly anything so strikingly effective, and in a true poetic sense. It brought out the strong side of the Club to great advantage.—"Now forward!" by Storch, a merry Marching Song, such as soldiers sing to cheer the weary way and keep their courage up, was spirited,—though farther than that we have no distinct remembrance of it. The closing piece: "He's the man to know," by Zöllner, is about the most ingenious specimen of the right jovial, sensuous, convivial song that we have heard for many a day; and the fitting of the music to the words in the several verses: "Who'll not drink when the foaming glasses chink," "Who'll not kiss, when a mouth is close to his," and "Who'll not sing, when a song can pleasure bring,"—sung so nicely as it was, is humorously close and delicate. A pretty trifle cunningly elaborated!

MR. CARLYLE PETERSILEA'S "BEETHOVEN RECITALS." Last Saturday afternoon, at Wesleyan Hall, Mr. Petersilea gave the ninth and last of his "Recitals," for the improvement of the taste of the pupils of his recently established and already flourishing Music School. In these nine concerts Mr. Petersilea has been himself the sole interpreter, and his programmes have consisted solely of the Piano-forte Sonatas of Beethoven, the whole thirty-two of which he has performed in the consecutive order of their opus numbers, three or four each time. This has been done before only, so far as we are aware, by Mr. Charles Halle in London, whom we had ourselves the pleasure of hearing through the last half of the series eleven years ago. Of course it was interesting to an American to hear such music by such an interpreter. But it is impossible, from any true æsthetic point of view, on the artistic principle of unity in variety, to justify a programme made up (even of the best materials, all works of highest genius) on such a plan. If Beethoven himself were to sit down to entertain a circle of his friends for an hour or two with music of his own creation, would he be likely to present things in the order of their publication? Promiscuity in good things is to be avoided, as well as in bad. But Halle relieved the Sonata monotony by choice songs from such singers as Sims Reeves, &c. However, the enterprise was creditable to the zeal and courage, and to the musical executive ability of Mr. Petersilea.

On this last occasion the subjects for his interpretation were: 1.) Sonata, No. 30, op. 109, in E, beginning with a few bars of light and airy Vivace, leading into and alternating with an Adagio espressivo in the style of free fantasia; then Prestissimo, 6-8; and then that beautiful, religious Andante Cantabile, with its wonderful variations. 2. Sonata No. 31, op. 110, in A flat, consisting of Moderato Cantabile, Allegro molto in F minor, a brief mournful Adagio (Arioso dolente) in E flat minor, and a Fugue finale in the original key, with episodic returns of the Adagio. 3. The last Sonata, op. 111, in C minor, so tremendous in the energy of its first movement, of such inventive subtlety and beauty in the rhythmical phrasing and fine subdivision of the Arietta marked Adagio molto semplice e cantabile. More difficult tasks a pianist could hardly have set himself. That he had caught the spirit, and succeeded in transmuting it, of these most mystical and strange confessions of the most deeply brooding and imaginative of modern tone-poets, is more than we can say. But so far as a clear, sure and unfaltering reading of the notes is concerned, he had made himself master of them, and that is saying a great deal.

Before the last Sonata, Mr. Petersilea repeated the "Moonlight" Sonata from a former programme, rendering the first movement particularly with a good deal of expression. This was of course much more appreciable to his audience, which consisted mostly of young pupils. The strangest thing, in fact, about the concert was the presence of so many children, little girls of eight or nine years! These of course did not listen (who could expect it of them) to the last three, the most abstruse Sonatas of Beethoven. Others we noticed not so young, doing their best to understand and to appreciate by keeping their eyes fixed on the music in their laps.

MUSICAL EDUCATION. The Mendelssohn Quintette, with Mr. B. J. LANG, and other good musicians and teachers, will open in September, here in Boston, a new "National College of Music." During the coming weeks, while the city is full of musical visitors, the Directors will be present at their rooms in Tremont Temple, every day, from 11 to 1 o'clock, to answer inquiries. See Advertisement.

JUBILEE begins on Monday! GILMORE'S Jubilee! "Peace" Jubilee ("My peace I give unto thee," quoth the "Great Projector" and Panjandrum!) Music by more instruments, more voices than were ever heard, or ever can be heard, together! "Peace" with anvils, cannons, bells in glorious harmonic turmoil! "Anvil Chorus" à la Gilmore every day for three midsummer weeks! Three programmes are proclaimed already: the first "American," the second "English," the third "German;" "French," we suppose, will follow, and so the line will stretch out possibly to "Patagonian" and the "crack of doom;" what less finale would be adequate to the occasion?

Surely the three programmes are masterpieces in the art of—advertising! And every newspaper has been magnetized and Gilmored until its critical and editorial columns have undergone a "sea change" and read precisely like the advertisements; so that every thing and every person, great or small, connected with the Jubilee is understood throughout the world to be sublime, magnificent and "pretty great," —particularly by our country cousins. Are they not great programmes? Why, here is something for every taste, and every form of no taste. Here are guns, bells, anvils ("played upon" by æsthetic red-shirted firemen,—through hose and pipes is it?); Lowell Mason psalm tunes; noisy "Rienzi" Overtures, preluded by "Old Hundred" from 20,000 voices, one verse whispered, one verse thundered; Strauss Waltzes magnified through a thousand instruments; Solos in unison by "bouquets" (!) of 150 artists, and even by 5000 voices all in—melody; "Star-spangled Banner" with guns and bells and all the noise that the Genius of Peace (which is P. S. G.), can devise; piano-forte solos, for those who like piano music at long range; Bands native and foreign;—all in glorious promiscuity each afternoon! And then to think of all the pomp and circumstance: the monster drum! the loudest Organ in the world! the distinguished personages, perhaps some of them titled! And the badges! worn by the "Projector," the sublime, the Only; by the Head Centre (innocent and modest little man) of all the chorus shouters of the whole United States; by the Conductors, the august Committees, clear of all suspicion of commercial aims; and even by the "Press"-gang, which has pressed us all into the service! Think, too, of the great "Bulletin-boards," announcing every hour the rates of gold and stocks, that thereon you may read how sensitive the pulse of the stock market throughout the world will be to the Anvil Chorus! During the second week, it is said there will be Oratorio—"Israel in Egypt," by a selected chorus, Classical Symphonies. These will be worth hearing, if they can be heard in so small a place.

Well, Vive la Gloire! That is the Gilmore motto. Glory! Glory! that is the ideal, that the motive and the animating passion of the thing. That was ever the ideal of the French nation, and brought them to the present pass. The Celtic Gilmore, like the French Celts, dreams ever of la Gloire. It is a heartless and a truth-despising sentiment, where it becomes paramount, sure to sink into vain-glory, and its contagion dangerous, even without Music pressed into its service. We fear it is one of the dangers that most threaten our own beloved Country!

WASHINGTON, D. C., JUNE 7. It may not be generally known that HERR FRANK ABT, the composer, received his first musical welcome in America at the hands of the Musical Societies of the Capital. He arrived in New York early in May, and proceeded directly to Washington, where a grand testimonial concert was given in his honor by the two German Societies and the Choral Society, (American) which it will be remembered took part in the 13th Saengerfest held in New York in June last, and which bore away the prize allotted to societies of their class. The concert took place at Lincoln's Hall, Wednesday evening, May 8, with the following programme:

Völkersaget. Nation's Prayer. Op. 300.....Abt.
Arlon, Choral Society, and Saengerbund.
Souvenir de Spa. Violoncello Solo.....Servais.
Mr. Jungnickel.
Amor als Spötter.....Abt.
Mrs. J. H. Roswald, of Baltimore.
(Dedicated to Mrs. R. by the composer, F. Abt.)
Boho in Spring. Op. 222.....Abt.
Saengerbund.
O, Ye Tears. Bass Solo.....Abt.
Mr. F. A. Chase.
Quintet. Instrumental.....Kuhla.
Messrs. Hoffman, Donoh, Finkel, Shutter, Jungnickel.
Spring Morning.....Abt.
Choral Society.
Piano Solo. Reverie au bord de la mer.....Willmers.
Prof. Geo. Felix Benkert.
Lively Rivulet. Soprano Solo and Male Quartet.....Abt.
Mrs. Morell and Messrs. Knapp, Daniel, Rockar, and Wells.
The Shades of Eve are closing.....Abt.
Beethoven Octet.
Serenade, (Trío). Instrumental.....Titl.
Messrs. Shutter, Jungnickel and Kley.
Siegesgewang Victory Song. Op. 267.....Abt.
Arlon, Choral Society, and Saengerbund.

Mr. Abt's personal description has already been given. He was enthusiastically received, and all were eager to hear the pieces set as "mass" to be led by himself as conductor. His manner is not as graceful as that of Theodore Thomas, yet very energetic and expressive. His praise of the pieces rendered by the combined voices, was all that could be wished for. He particularly complimented the English Society on its just and forcible conception of its selection "Frühlingmorgen" (Spring morning) and was agreeably surprised to hear such fine voices and such material as was collected from "American" talent. Mr. A.'s knowledge of the English language is very limited, so much so that he was most "at home" among those of his "own tongue."

As a substantial earnest of our reception he bore away a handsome gift in shape of "legal tenders." The "Beethoven Octet," mentioned upon the programme, are all members of the "Choral Society." Among them is Mr. Charles O. Ewer and A. Chase, both known among musicians in your city. The season, musically, is now over here, Congress about to adjourn, and those able to do so, making preparations for summer resorts.

As a fitting close to our successful season, the "Choral Society" gave a "complimentary" to its passive or contributing membership, at Lincoln's Hall, Wednesday evening, June 5. The Hall was filled to its utmost capacity by the elite of Washington, and all expressed themselves highly pleased with the entertainment. HARMONIS.

WAGNER'S SPEECH IN A THUNDER STORM. Here from Vienna (we translate from Le Ménestrel) comes a speech of Richard Wagner, during a storm, let loose by le Diable, if not by the good God, upon the last piece of his grand Philharmonic Concert. It was right in the midst of a thunder of applause, an avalanche of bouquets, thrown to Patti . . . the heavens suddenly grew black, a storm burst forth,—a veritable thunderstorm from the skies:—its groanings silenced the drums of the orchestra, and Wagner, quick to seize on this occasion to set up his little réclame in honor of the theatre which he proposes to build upon the hill of Bayreuth, expressed himself as follows amid new plaudits of the intoxicated, though somewhat terrified crowd:

"Once already I have had occasion to meet with numerous sympathies in this city. To-day, in these tokens of affection I see marks of adhesion to my project of erecting to our German country a temple, where Art shall find shelter from the pernicious influences of the present. And, as the Greeks in old time had a custom of invoking Jupiter, and praying him to manifest his assent by a flash of lightning, I see to-day a happy presage in the signs of heaven."

The same paper, after citing the programme of Wagner's "Ninth Symphony" concert at Bayreuth, adds:

"So we see, Germany distances America in the matter of charlatanism. Go, hang thyself, O Barnum!" (and O Gilmore!)

The above is from a French source; here we have the same view from a German paper, the Belletristisches Journal of New York:

"Great is the power of humbug, in Europe not less than in America. Gilmore's expedition to Europe and the Continent has proved thoroughly successful, and in Germany he even did a better business than in other countries. The first military bands have been granted him for his gigantic festival. The Chinese, Japanese, Terra-del-Fuegians, Caffers, &c., to whom he appealed, keep away; but from the land of musical art par excellence artists of the first rank consent to lend themselves to the lowest money speculation and to cooperate in the profanation of an Art which they considered holy above all. In America men turn from it, but Germany walks into the trap. The letter of recommendation from President Grant, who has to see music in order to enjoy it, has had its effect with the governments; and with the artists money proves its magic power. After this experience Germany has no longer any right to turn up her nose at American humbug, since in her own midst this finds now a more thankful soil than in America itself. It does not make the enterprise a whit more respectable, and whoever takes part in it compromises himself."

—The same opinion is quite common in America, especially in Boston,—with the exception of "the Press!"

Story's Bust of Beethoven.

(Extract from Miss Anne Brewster's Letter from Rome, May 7, to the Evening Bulletin, of Philadelphia.)

Story is now modeling a bust of Beethoven. He owns the mask of the great composer, which was taken during life [?] for Stryker. I went into Story's studio, on Saturday, to see the Electra at the tomb of Agamemnon, which is finished and was cast yesterday. I found Story as gay and chirrupy as a boy, at work on the Beethoven. He was rumbling over in his throat and chest the motive of the 7th Symphony—symphony in La—and imitated, playfully, the various instruments, especially the passage where the strings reply to the wind instruments, a sort of musical declamation. Story is not making an ideal, handsome portrait of Beethoven. He is copying the mask exactly in all its homely fidelity, giving it vitality through expression.

It is a grim, ugly face, with a decided mulatto type, especially in the nose. Thayer, the biographer of Beethoven, was in Rome this spring. I saw and talked a great deal with him. He says Beethoven looked like a little ugly mulatto, he was very short, had a yellow skin, broad spread-out nose, and projecting teeth, over which his heavy lips shut. The mask gives all this faithfully, with a slight Indian look about the cheek bone. Beethoven had also that concentrated expression in the eyes, brow and mouth of morbid discontent, which a face of mixed blood is apt to wear, when part of the blood is ignoble and the brains akin to divinity.

In Story's bust the scar on the chin is evident. The under-lip is placed firmly, viciously up against the upper, and this gives a sort of leonine muzzle, quite in keeping with the lion look of the head. Some human heads seem to have the rudiments of the ape; some of the bull-dog and horse; Beethoven's had the lion. In Story's conception, eyes and mouth make you think instantly of the composer's mind, delving away, deep down, for richer and fuller harmonies and rhythmical developments. No wonder Story's memory brought to him the allegretto of the seventh Symphony, as his imagination or "L'Autre within him," as De Maistre said, modeled in the clay that bold, grim, almost savage expression of the bust. When Beethoven composed the Symphony in La, he was standing on a bridge which led to a great realm that he afterwards explored, and brought from it what some of his contemporaries called Madness in Music. From that moment he labored in a sphere where mortal hearing was of no use—his guides were profound harmonic science and deep thought.

Goethe's Frederike.

It is said that this fair girl, who for one brief summer called Wolfgang Goethe her own, was also beloved by another great and glorious spirit, and that the sweetest song she ever warbled was given her by him! but that, girl-like, she sang it oftener to Goethe, whom she loved, than to the composer, who loved her. The writer of the pretty refrain was no other than the afterward famous André Grétry, whose name and operas were destined to ring throughout all Europe, and whose song—

Qu peut-on être mieux, Qu'au sein de sa famille?"

the old French guard chanted on the great Napoleon's retreat before the Russians. Light-hearted and gay, the young composer had undertaken a journey, and after the fashion of those days, on foot. His destination was Strasburg, but his way led through Switzerland, and, together with a companion student, he journeyed pleasantly and merrily along. But on reaching the fair village of Sessenheim, he became so intoxicated with the perfect scenery and lovely air that he decided to remain for some days at least in its charming vicinity; and here, amidst the beauties of nature's own begetting, Grétry met the gentle maiden whose memory was destined to dwell with him throughout his life. They sat together on the scented grass of early spring. She, too innocent and childlike to know her own heart; he, drinking in with the light of her eyes the one great love of his life. With her fresh young voice Frederike was singing one of his own songs. He had taught it to her, and as she finished the last note looked inquiringly into his eyes. "My skylark," he murmured, "you are perfect. But I would be paid for the song I have given you. With your own dear hand write me your name and the day of the month," and he gave her his tablets. She complied and added a gift of the violets she wore on her breast. "I shall always keep them," he said, and tears, he knew not why, filled his eyes, and a darting pain shot across his heart. They parted, Grétry going on to meet his great fame, and the maiden to her quiet home and her sad fate. Years after, when the silent clay of the once merry Grétry was laid in its last resting place, the tablets with Frederike's name in shadowy lines and a bunch of faded violets were laid on the quiet breast. And Goethe, who gazed on, loved and left the charming songstress of Grétry's melodies, gave her a place that was nearest his own soul—a leaf among his poems. Her heart history, with its griefs and pinings, are not traced in the music of its verses, but the song—

"U'm Bergil Bin i g'masse!"

holds the history of three persons, Grétry, Goethe, and the fair maiden of Sessenheim.—New York Evening Mail.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Greeting to Spring. Four-part song for Ladies' Voices. Arranged from the Beautiful Blue Danube Waltzes, by Strauss. 3. Wilson. 75
Away, away, away.
In the glad month of May.

It was a happy thought with Mr. G. D. Wilson, who, (like other teachers acquainted with the needs of Female Seminaries), has often found difficulty in getting good exhibition music, to arrange, vocally, this fine set of waltzes. It is not an easy affair to arrange four voices for ladies, and separate sufficiently the parts to make each one distinct. In fact the four parts are apt to sound like two. But in these waltzes every one is heard, and the lively dance measure keeps up one's interest to the last.

Awfully Clever. Comic Song. 3. D to e. Hunt. 35

Those fellows deserve all their gains,
As for brains—I can do without any.

Amusing.

Hark! The Convent Bells are ringing. Four-part Song. 3. Ab to f. Halton. 30

And the nuns are sweetly singing
Holy Virgin, hear our prayer!
Represents "the taking of the veil" by a novice, and has good and appropriate music.

Would You? 2. G to g. Tully. 30

Baby crowing on your knee,
Pulls your hair or thumps your e's.

Very neat little home song, comic, but prettier than it is funny.

Down in a Coal Mine. Song and Chorus. 2. D to d. Geoghegan. 30

Digging dusky diamonds, all the season round,
Down in a coal mine, underneath the ground.

Not a comic song, as one might suppose, but a very pretty one, with a good burthen or chorus in unison. "Manch Chunk" will please sing it, and Scranton and the rest echo it. It is not often they will have so good a thing made for them.

Dolly Varden. Song. Plain Title. 2. C to G. Brockway. 40

" " Colored " 50
There's pretty Dolly Varden,
A gay and charming flower.

The Dolly Vardens with colored titles, noticed in the last bulletin, are all "gorgeous in their attire," and brilliant things to have. But those who don't care for color can have plain titles at a less price. The above song is written by Dexter Smith, and is a very pretty comic song, and much more pretty than comic.

Barney O'Toole. 2. F to f. Lee. 30

O be still, Barney dear, with your jealous complaints,
For you know that your darling's as true as the saints.

Jolly! Very pretty melody.

The Three Ravens. 3. G minor to F. 30

Ah! Well-a-day, in yonder field,
Down a down, hey derry down.

A song of the sixteenth century, quaint and queer enough for any one. One of set called "A Selection of Old English Songs."

Instrumental.

Pluie de Corail. 5. Db. Grau. Op. 38. 75

Contains gentle, sweet, semi-staccato movements, alternately with rapid runs and arpeggios. More brilliant than most "Pluies." One of the collection called "Perles Musicales."

Fanchette. Quick March. 4. Eb. Pratt. 40

Quick March is a new name for a Quick Step, and this is a bright and powerful one. A great many octaves.

Sonata No. 1. 4. F. Scarlatti. 35

" " 2. 4. F. " 35

Of the set of 30 Sonatas previously described. Not quite so well fitted for the organ as No. 3, but are pretty piano studies. Edited by Carl Banck.

Little Golden Hair Quadrilles. Four hands. 2. Adam Arctic. 75

Pretty, pretty, pretty! Hurry up and get these for your little pupils before you forget it.

Souvenir de Kieff. Mazurka. 4. Ab. Schulhoff. 50

Might perhaps be termed a military mazurka, as it has very brilliant qualities.

Alaska March. 2. A. Waterman. 35

Easy and pleasing. Very good piece for players but little advanced.

Souvenir du Rhine. 5. B. Cramer. 40

Requires considerable facility in playing runs, and is excellent for practice.

The Little Wanderer. Lithograph Title. 3. F. G. D. Wilson. 50

Beau'iful. One of his sweetest pieces, and should be introduced everywhere.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. a small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 815.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 29, 1872.

VOL. XXXII. No. 7.

The Wagner Concert at Vienna.

[The distinguished musical critic, EDWARD HANSLICK, contributes the article, which we translate below, to the Leipsig Signale of May 21. His comments upon Wagner and his national Theatre scheme at Bayreuth are applicable also to the "World's Peace Jubilee" and its author, with the difference that Wagner is an intellectual musician and a master, whereas our Irish-American "Projector" is but a bandsman and a showman.]

On the 12th of May, at noon, the great "Wagner Concert," under Richard Wagner's personal direction, came off in the great hall of the Musikverein before a very numerous public filled with unexampled enthusiasm. The performance consisted entirely of familiar things; but its object was to turn the general attention toward something new in all respects: namely to the Bayreuth enterprise. In a few days, at Bayreuth, Wagner will lay the cornerstone to a new, colossal theatre, to be constructed altogether in accordance with his own ideas, and particularly for his newest musical drama. For this solemnity he has chosen his own birthday, May 22. Next year, at the same time, his stage festival play: "Der Ring des Nibelungen," consisting of four parts, will be performed on this new stage; on the first evening, "Das Rheingold;" on the second, "Die Walkyre;" on the third, "Siegfried;" and finally, on the fourth, "Siegfried's Tod" or "Die Götterdämmerung."

The astonishing energy and love of labor of the restless master excites our admiration and respect. How this man, interrupted by the most various undertakings, still keeps coming back to the "Nibelungen," which he began some twenty years ago, writing in the meantime pamphlets, books and operas; to-day dictating the plan of the building in Bayreuth, to-morrow directing a concert for it in Berlin or Vienna: all this presents an image of rare energy and activity.

We are less sympathetically moved by the pomp and circumstance, the colossal apparatus, which is set in motion for this "Nibelungen" performance. A musical Art-work, for which it is necessary to build a special theatre with the most adventurous arrangements, plainly has its centre of gravity no more in music. Where all the emphasis is laid upon hitherto unheard of externalities, one can scarcely rid himself of some misgiving about the strength and soundness of the artistic heart and kernel of the matter. We are involuntarily reminded of a letter which Goethe wrote in the year 1808 to Heinrich von Kleist, on the occasion of "Penthesilea," in which he says: "Allow me also to say, that it has always disturbed me when I have seen men of intellect and talent waiting for a theatre which is yet to come. A Jew, who waits for the Messiah, a Christian who waits for his Dom Sebastian, cause me no greater feeling of impatience. Before any sort of a board staging I would like to call out to the true theatrical genius: 'Hic Rhodus, hic salta!' At any village fair, on planks laid over barrels, I will trust myself to give delight to the whole mass of cultivated and uncultivated people with Calderon's pieces."—Operas with beautiful music make effect even in the smallest provincial theatres; nay, the more precious the music, the narrower may be the stage, the simpler the scenery. Our present opera stages, in their great compass, their variety of decorations, and in the ingenuity and boldness of their machinery, have unquestionably reached a perfection, which ought to satisfy the most excellent composers. These theatres are specially indebted to the Wagner operas for great enrichment and perfection of their stage technique; on the other hand, one would think that Wagner owed them not a little. Quite the contrary, it seems; so great is his contempt for them, that he has openly declared that, with his "Meistersinger" he has touched these theatres for the last time."

To Wagner it seems an abomination to work in theatres where operas by other masters, even such as Meyerbeer's, are sometimes given; he builds a new, a Wagner theatre, so that his gifts hereafter may be served in vessels never used before. At the same time he thinks, by his Bayreuth production, to revive that golden age of Greece, when the theatre formed not a daily entertainment, but a seldom recurring great popular festival, a supreme religious and artistic exaltation of the Nation.

Whether the classical Greek era, from which our time is separated by an impassable gulf, will be renewed by means of the Bayreuth Theatre, the future will inform us; one distinction must already have occurred to many. The Greek stage plays were in the strictest sense the people's festivals, and free to everybody without price; whereas, to see the Nibelungen at Bayreuth, one must pay three hundred thalers for a "Patronatschein" (certificate of stock). Of course only the very well-to-do friends of music can avail themselves in the regular way of this aristocratic theatrical enjoyment.* By joining a "Wagner Club" one has the possibility of winning such a Patronatschein in the lottery. But since Wagner would like to assemble others besides rich people in Bayreuth,—else it might wear to him the aspect of a Jewish colony!—he has devised the remedy of "Wagner Clubs" and "Wagner Concerts." The net proceeds of these concerts go toward the purchase of "Patronatscheine" for young artists without means.

There is something delightfully characteristic in this elevating of the hearing of the Wagner "Stage-Festival Play" to a formal matter of humanity, to a benevolent object, for which concerts are arranged, as hitherto they have been for Blind Asylums, or poor invalids. The undertakers proceed on the assumption, that the pilgrimage to Bayreuth is indispensable to the salvation of the souls of young musicians, and that therefore they must gather every such poor devil in all Germany, seeing that, as it is said in Tannhäuser, "for him too the Redeemer died." In spite of that, it will be impossible to gratify all the musicians who have not got three hundred thalers to spare; they will have to seek out "the most worthy," and without doubt the applicants will have preference according to their musical faith. So only the infallible-ists among them have a prospect of receiving gratis the means of grace from Bayreuth. In a word: this so-called German national festival belongs to the rich and to those poor Wagner enthusiasts for whom the rich pay. That does not harmonize with the alleged revival of the "Olympic Games," and quite as little with those democratic velleities, with which Richard Wagner is so fond of dallying. This end, of making the people happy, he might have reached much better in one of the great theatres already existing, where even the man of feeble means is welcome for a few groshen.

* So too, for the Boston "Jubilee,"—all "for the dear people"—a season ticket costs $50, and a seat for one performance, $5.

Meanwhile fortune smiles continually on the composer of the "Nibelungenring;" and even when the heavens for once are suddenly darkened, and an untimely storm thunders into the midst of his music, as was the case here in yesterday's concert, Wagner, like a skilful augur, knows how to interpret it to the audience as a propitious sign from "Jupiter." Yes, Wagner is lucky in all things. At first he raves against all monarchs: and a magnanimous king meets him with flattering love and prepares for him an existence free from care and even brilliant. Then he writes a pasquinade against the Jews: and all Jewry, both in music and outside of music, pays him all the more zealous homage through newspaper criticisms and purchase of Bayreuth promissory notes. He proves in his pamphlet "On Conducting," that all our Court Kapellmeisters and musical directors are mere mechanics, to whom he dares not entrust "a single tempo" of his operas: and lo! our Court Kapellmeisters and Directors organize "Wagner Clubs" and recruit troops for the battle of Bayreuth. Opera singers and Directors, whose performances Wagner has cut up most fearfully in his writings, follow his footprints wherever he goes and are made happy by his greeting. He brands our Conservatories (in the Report to King Ludwig) as the most loosely managed, injudicious institutions: and the pupils of the Vienna Conservatory draw up in line before Wagner, and assemble in the school for an honorary presentation to the master. If we take into account also the wall-shaking jubilation, the countless laurel wreaths, and all the other acts of homage, which Wagner received in the concert of yesterday,—such homage as Mozart and Beethoven, Goethe and Schiller, taken together, never in their lives experienced,—we shall have to admit, that there is only one step wanting to the actual Dalai-Lama worship, and that it is from no absolute lack of call for it, if this step is not taken.

We come back to the concert. It was in two parts, the first consisting of Beethoven's Eroica, the second of Wagner's own compositions. The Iphigenia Overture of Gluck, originally intended for the opening, was left off on account of the great length of the concert. As Beethoven's Heroic Symphony is one of the most often-played pieces of the Vienna concert repertoire, Wagner cannot have chosen it for its own sake, so much as for the sake of showing how it ought to be conducted,—that is, as a demonstrative illustration of his pamphlet "On Conducting." In this treatise, which contains very suggestive hints and witty observations, Wagner speaks repeatedly of Beethoven's Eroica, using it especially to prove his favorite assertion, that our kapellmeisters have no idea of tempo and that "Beethoven, as we have known him heretofore through public performances, is still with us a pure chimera." Dionysius Weber in Prague had declared the Eroica sheer nonsense; "but any one who heard such a performance of it (as that by the Prague Conservatory under D. Weber) would have said that Dionysius was quite right." "Nowhere," continues Wagner, "do they play it otherwise; and if this Symphony to-day, in spite of the fact that it is still played not otherwise, is everywhere received with acclamation, it is (unless we choose to joke upon the whole phenomenon) because, for several decades, this music has been studied more and more outside of concert performances, especially in pianoforte arrangements." Wagner is acknowledged to be a brilliant conductor: he has genial intentions, and, through his great authority over the players, he knows how to carry them out. And so his energetic, fine and nicely shaded reproduction of the Eroica gave us on the whole, a great enjoyment. Nevertheless it would be a very sad case, if we had only yesterday and purely by the grace of Wagner learned to understand this work, which Beethoven composed and conducted in person in Vienna. It would be unpardonable ingratitude, did we not avow that, from the same orchestra, under Herbeck's and Dessoff's direction, we have heard most excellent performances of the Eroica,—performances, which to-day, after Wagner's production, would still seem excellent. The one conductor takes a tempo a little faster, the other a little slower; one colors the contrast between forte and pianissimo more, the other less sharply. Such differences there will always be, so long as not machines, but living men direct, in whose physical and mental individuality these differences of conception are necessarily rooted. Among earnest directors of solid culture and of undisputed talent (we speak only of such) this differences will be for the most part only small; no one will take an Adagio fast or an Allegro slow, or make a piano of a forte. About such variations within narrow, artistically indubitable limits there may be dispute; one only in this contest could decide: the composer himself. So long as Beethoven does not declare in person, that Wagner's conception of the Eroica is the only correct one, and that what seems Wagnerish in it is peculiarly the genuine Beethoven element, so long we cannot grant even to the hero of the day the right to call every other director of the Eroica an ass.

What there is new in Wagner's reproduction of the Eroica consists, briefly expressed, in a frequent "modification of the tempo" of the same movement. With this phrase and the second: "right conception of the Melos," which is to furnish the key for the correct tempo, Wagner himself designates the reform demanded and attempted by him in the performance of Beethoven's Symphonies. There are movements where in fact the "dynamic monotony" so odious to Wagner can without injury be interrupted and enlivened. Such is the Finale of the Eroica, whose structure rests essentially upon the expanded Variation form, so that for every variation of the theme a characteristic "modification of the tempo" is undoubtedly admissible. A series of variations, played off in one even tempo, easily stiffens to a soulless formalism; hence in just this movement Wagner's alternating rate of time produces charming effects. In other passages Wagner seems to us to go too far with his "modifications;" for example, when, after a very quick beginning of the first movement, he immediately takes the second motive (dolce, 45th bar) strikingly slower, whereby the hearer, in the scarcely yet established ground mood, is bewildered, and the "heroic" character of the Symphony is turned aside into the sentimental. The Scherzo Wagner takes uncommonly fast, even presto,—a rash and dangerous undertaking even for a virtuoso orchestra. The funeral march sounded wonderfully beautiful, especially the gradual dying away of the principal theme. The whole performance was, as we have said, of the highest interest, full of fine, suggestive traits and of ingenious effects; yet scarcely anybody doubts, that these "modifications" are more of a Wagner than a Beethoven origin.

Many a bold deviation from the law on the part of a peculiar and gifted person may have such a convincing show of success, that only narrow souls can take exception to it. But there is nothing more dangerous than to generalize a clever aperçu, and to wish to expand a purely individual feeling into an absolute rule. Were Wagner's principles "of conducting" generally adopted, it would open the door to an intolerable arbitrariness in such perpetual change of tempo; and soon we should come to hear no Symphonies by Beethoven, but only freely after Beethoven, wearing a different aspect in every city, under every conductor.

The disagreeable tempo rubato, that musical seasickness, which spoils for us the performances of so many singers and virtuosos, and against which hitherto our orchestral performances have furnished a sufficient antidote, would soon seize possession of these also, and it would be all over with the last sound kernel of our public musical life. Wagner does the same thing with conducting as with composing: what suits his own individual peculiarity, what succeeds with his entirely exceptional talent, must become the universal law of Art, the only true and valid rule. From his own extremely personal poet-painter-musical endowment he abstracts for himself a new theory of opera which has led him to peculiar, brilliant achievements, to compositions which bear their title deed in their soulful subjectivity, and are effective because they are Wagnerish. Yet Wagner does not content himself with that, but rejects every other opera style as a "colossal error," not perceiving that his own opera style in the hands of anybody else will be merely caricature. So soon as all the opera composers compose in the style of "Tristan and Isolde," we listeners infallibly will all go the madhouse; and if Wagner's "tempo-modifications" acquire unlimited control in our orchestras, the Kapellmeisters, violinists and wind instrument players will soon follow us there.

The second part of the Concert gave us the Vorspiel to "Tristan and Isolde," the "Fire charm" from the Walküre, and the new Introduction to Tannhäuser (composed for the performance in Paris). The two first named pieces were well known here through Wagner's earlier concerts; the third is at least partly new. In its first half it is identical with the well known Tannhäuser Overture: a slow introduction (Pilgrim March) and Allegro; only the latter leads immediately into the Venus-Berg Bacchanalia (expanded into great dimensions) on the stage, whereas the older overture returns to the Pilgrim March with richer figuration. The new prelude shows in the most interesting manner the uncommon progress which the composer has made, since the Tannhäuser, in the thematic elaboration, in the extreme use and using up of the minutest motives: the whole great newly-added piece is woven entirely out of the old motives. In it the bacchanic passion is urged on to complete insanity, to a very Walpurgisnacht of instrumentation, in stunning noise unparalleled in Wagner's scores. In the theatre, characteristically interpreted, by a voluptuous ballet and a dazzling mise en scène, the effect of this music must be incomparably better than in the concert room; at any rate we prefer this new "Vorspiel," opening immediately and very happily into the Opera, to the old Tannhäuser Overture, whose conclusion, in its striving for effect, is, after all, only an ear-torturing transfer to the orchestra of Thalberg's "playings around" (Umspielungen) on the pianoforte.

ED. HANSLICK.

Speech by Wagner.

On the occasion of the laying of the corner-stone of the Nibelungen Theatre at Bayreuth, Herr Wagner delivered an address, in which he described the aims and hopes he entertained in regard to his new Fest-Theatre. It ran thus:

My Friends and Valued Patrons—Through you I am placed in a position such as was never before occupied by a composer. You believe my promise to establish for the Germans a theatre of their own, and give me the means to erect this theatre. First of all a temporary edifice will serve, of which we lay the foundation-stone to-day. When we see each other again at this spot you will be greeted by this edifice, in whose characteristics you will immediately read the history of the thought incorporated in it. You will find merely an external shell, built with the most stony material, which at most will call to your mind those hastily-erected festival halls that at times are erected in German cities, for the meetings of singing and other societies, and are immediately pulled down after the festival days are over. But that which in this edifice is calculated for a lasting existence will be evident to you on entering. Here, too, you will be met by an almost perfect lack of decoration; you will, perhaps, be surprised at not finding the ornamentation with which our ordinary festival halls are made pleasing. But, on the other hand, you will find expressed in the formation and arrangement of the stage, and the space for the audience, a thought through the comprehension of which you will be at once placed in a relation to the expected festival play, new and totally different from that which you have hitherto experienced on entering our theatres. If this effect be pure and complete, then further the mysterious sound of the music will prepare you for the revelation of scenic pictures, which will appear to you as from an ideal dream-world, and announce to you the whole reality of the most entrancing illusion that art is capable of. Here nothing may speak to you in mere outline, or temporarily. So far as the artistic means extend, you shall have the completest offered to you, in scenic as well as in dramatic play.

Such are my plans. If I entertain confidence in the full success of this undertaking, I gather courage from the hope which has sprung up in me out of despair itself. I confide in the German spirit, and hope for its revelations, even in those spheres of our life in which, as in the life of our public art, it languishes only in the most lamentable misrepresentation. I confide before all in the spirit of German music, because I know how willingly and clear it lights up in our musicians so soon as the German Meister invokes it to life. I confide in the dramatic players and singers, because I know that they can be elevated to a new life so soon as the German Meister leads them from the vanity of a degrading play for the mere purpose of pleasing, back to the true preservation of their high mission. I confide in our musicians, and dare to say this aloud to-day, when I see such a select company from various parts of our fatherland assembled about me, in response to my simple invitation. When these, in self-forgetting joy, send to you as festal greeting our great Beethoven's "Wunder-Symphonie," we can, indeed, well say to each other that the work which we are founding to-day will be no illusive castle in the air, though we musicians can only vouch to you for the truth of the idea to be embodied therein.

Our undertaking has been often characterized as the founding of the "National Theatre in Bayreuth." I am not justified in acknowledging this designation as valid. Where is the "nation" that erects this theatre? As recently the question of State support to the great Paris theatres was discussed in the National Assembly, the deputies spoke warmly for the further granting and even increase of the subvention, since the care of this theatre was a matter essential not only to France, but to Europe, which was accustomed to receive therefrom the law of its intellectual culture. Can we imagine, for a moment, the embarrassment and confusion that would arise in a German Parliament if a similar question were therein discussed? At best our theatre would be treated as a few years ago was our German Empire in our various landtags, namely, as a chimera.

Built up before my soul the design of the true "German Theatre," so must I at once perceive that I should remain neglected, from within and without, if I would come with this design before the nation. Many think, perhaps, that what from one cannot be believed would be believed of many. It might finally succeed in bringing together an immense joint stock company, which should commission an architect to erect, somewhere or other, a magnificent theatre, to which could be boldly given the name of a "German National Theatre," in the idea that within it a German national theatrical art would soon develop. . . . You can, indeed, permit me, to whom you give such honor to-day, to express my great joy that the peculiar touch of a single individual could be understood and promoted, even during his lifetime, by so many friends as your assembling here proves to be. . . . In my almost personal relation to you, patrons and friends, I can acknowledge the ground upon which will lie the foundation-stone that is to bear the whole edifice of our highest German hopes. If this edifice be at first only temporary, it will be so in the same sense in which for centuries the external form of the German nation was a temporary one. But it is the nature of the German spirit that it builds from within. The eternal God lives assuredly within it before it builds the temple to his honor. And this temple shows externally the spirit that built it. I will call this stone a stone of enchantment, whose power shall release to you the sealed secret of that spirit. It will bear for the present only the merest external, whose aid we need for that illusion, through which you will see into the truest reflex of life. But it is already firmly joined, and strong enough in future to bear the proudest edifice, whenever the German people demand, to their own honor, to enter into possession with you. Let it be consecrated, by your love, by your blessing, by the deep thanks I feel toward you—so you all who wished for me, granted, gave, and helped. Let it be consecrated by the spirit that induced you to follow my invitation; which fills you with the courage to defy every scorn, and to confide in me.

Sir Sterndale Bennett.

(From Punch.)

It is but partly true that "the world knows nothing of its greatest men." The world knows something of Sterndale Bennett, Knight, so deservedly created for being a composer of very considerable magnitude. No doubt the Queen, who understands music, created that Knight with a will. A testimonial on the strength of the honor thus conferred on him has been presented to Sir Bennett, as our neighbors will call him, in St. James's Hall. This testimonial was a scroll containing a record of subscriptions for a Sterndale Bennett Scholarship, and a Sterndale Bennett Prize, in the Royal Academy of Music.

Everybody in the world also who knows anything, knows that Sterndale Bennett is a composer of the higher kind of music. There is music and music; there are composers and composers. Some music is inarticulate poetry. Other music is inarticulate small talk and chatter. Much music, very popular for a time, is of a sort that would gratify a monkey having a musical ear. Other music, less popular with the million, but popular for all time, delights hearers whose mind and affections differentiate them from monkeys, and ally them with higher intelligences. In the matter of music, Sir Sterndale Bennett, like Mr. Disraeli in another way, is on the side, not of the Ape, but of the Angel. His music is such as the Divine Williams, and the Divine Johns (see Paradise Lost) mean by music when they extol it. It is akin to the music which Herr Breitmann wanted when he said:

"Derefore a Misere
Vilt dou, be-ghostet, spilt
Und vake be-raised yearnin,
Also a holy feel—"

Whereupon—

"De blay crates dings from Mozart,
Bethoven and Mchul.
Mit chorale of Sebastian Bach
Scopline and puerdiful.
Der Breitmann feels like holy saints,
De tears run down his fass;
Und he sopped out—"

The Breitmann sobbed out in very strong High Dutch his sense of true Art-enjoyment. But beside those "crate dings" which Breitmann mentions, he would certainly rank the works of Sterndale Bennett. Let those who have ears to hear, and souls to feel, but not, perhaps, schooling to understand scientifically, that nobler music, hear the Attorney-General. In his discourse on presenting the Testimonial to its recipient, Sir John Coleridge said:—

"Most of those who were listening to him were cultivated, intelligent, and critical musicians, who could appreciate the value of Sir Sterndale Bennett's compositions; but, not being a musician himself, he could only listen to them, feeling something of their grace and beauty of order—fancying, indeed, in some dim and distant way, that he could distinguish something of their scholarly character and finished structure; but, nevertheless, feeling rather as a child towards them than as being possessed of that full and intelligent knowledge which belonged to those whom he was addressing."

Still, they that occupy the room of the unlearned in music are in no worse position to be delighted with it, if they have music in their souls; than the analogous majority of the spectators who are now crowding the Exhibition rooms of the Royal Academy are to derive pleasure from pictures. If these can open their eyes, those can open their ears; and the technically unlearned, for the matter of that, are as much, and as little at a disadvantage with Sir Sterndale Bennett as they are with Sir Joshua Reynolds. An unlettered swain or bumpkin of natural parts, unable to read Shakespeare, may, nevertheless, seeing Shakespeare acted, be able to understand a considerable some of him, as they say in New England. And now Shakespeare has again been mentioned, it is observable that his name was introduced by the Attorney-General into his address on presenting the Bennett testimonial:—

"Until very lately, music in this country had not taken its proper place in the world of intellect. Chaucer, Shakespeare, Milton, Wordsworth, Bacon, Newton, Flaxman and Chantrey, were amongst the greatest men of all countries, and their fame was known to all the world. But the names of Purcell, Home, and Bishop, of Boyce and Croft, and of Field and Onslow, in their respective schools of composition, were but little known or appreciated beyond the limits of the English empire, and beyond the limits of English-speaking people. It had been the good fortune of Sir Sterndale Bennett to break through that kind of provincialism."

So that now, Sir John, albeit no scientific musician, perceives that English music has at last taken its proper place in the world of intellect, and taken it on a level with the works of the greatest men of all countries, whose fame is known to all the world. One of those men is Shakespeare, and music has taken its place along with Shakespeare's works by the good fortune of Sir Sterndale Bennett.

Handel's Organ Concerto.

(From the London Orchestra.)

Among the comparatively ancient musical instruments, not one is of greater interest than the real Handel organ—the organ upon which the great composer exhibited with felicitous execution the ingenious plan and melodious flow of his far famed organ concerto. This singular composition is naturally of solicitude to the organ player, and of much curiosity with the amateur and the virtuoso, when it is remembered that Handel twice reduced himself to bankruptcy by his operatic speculations, and yet recovered himself by his organ concerto. For the last eight years of his life, the son of his copyist was the conductor of his oratorio, whilst Handel sat by him every now and then performing his concerto, more than half extemporaneous, upon the organ; and from the public interest excited by these performances, he annually stored up sums of money which at his death proved to amount to more than £20,000. The opera made Handel a poor man, the oratorio made him, if possible, still poorer, but the organ concerto turned the tide; it was the stream of Ptolema to the septuagenarian, gave him, for an organist, a sort of oceanic wealth, and annually contributed to the rosy embellishment of his long familiar name. He was indisputably pre-eminent in concerto playing on his favorite instrument, and it forms an inquiry of much interest to ascertain what was his concerto organ, and what his mode of playing. There is no concerto organ of Handel's in the South Kensington Exhibition. There are the curious wind instruments that we meet with in the scores of his great contemporary, Sebastian Bach, but no Covent Garden, or Lincoln's Inn organ. And indeed it is not easy to unearth a curiosity of this kind. There was one—a perfect specimen—in the school-room of the well known Raine Charity at St. George's, Ratcliffe Highway; and also a small one in the Palace at Hampton Court. Both instruments have suffered from the hands of the renovators, and their peculiarities are no more. The peculiarly sharp, yet delicate, tone of the metal stop diapason has faded away, and the mounted cornet has no other echo than the charming stop invented by Dr. Gauntlett, for the great organ in St. Peter's, Cornhill, from an effect, not a register, heard in the organ in the Cathedral at Cologne. The small metal open diapason called the dulciana was not known in Handel's time, but there was a second sized open diapason and an octave (principal) to match it; but both these registers have given way to fanciful imitations of their Teutonic representatives. Whether in the halls of our nobility there may yet remain a Handel organ may be a question. Possibly something of the kind may be yet extant in some Chapel of one of the old Catholic families.

Whatever may have been this instrument as a fact, it fully satisfied the composer, and enabled him to realize his intention. Handel in his concerto never engaged to spiritualize the organ after the manner of Sebastian Bach, in the large forms of his church preludes and fugues. Handel could not play that way, even had he directed his thoughts that way. The Bach organ was a pedal organ, that of Handel a manual organ, and possibly of only one manual. On the great organ in St. Paul's Cathedral Handel unquestionably was in the habit of surprising his auditors by the breadth and solemnity of his diapason preludes—an exercise in sympathy with his early feelings, and which he left as a precious legacy to the metropolitan organists. No doubt Worgan and Battishill each formed their school from reminiscences of Handel's larger method on the cathedral organ. In the theatre and concert room, Handel aimed to make himself sympathetic with the amateur and the virtuoso, to reproduce the phrases and ideas of the orchestral concerto—the favorite passages of Corelli and the Italian organists, invented for the display of the oboe and the violin. Handel avoided any impulse from the Church—any train of thought suggestive directly of worship. What he sought for was artistic effect to please the fashionable audience. That which he did was neither poor nor monotonous, heavy nor long; but it had clear and definite form—bright and graceful, with a spirit all rosy and light. No old chant, no stiff, square antique choral—no Mixolydian or Phrygian Cantilena—no chain of consonant chords imitative of the doings of the first masters on the organ, are to be met with in his concertos. He condescended to play for the ladies, and the old church manipulator succumbed to the supple courtier. He was content to please, for in this way he replenished his exhausted exchequer, and drew his full house. True it is, his concerto is modelled on the favorite existing forms of the time; but, while imitating the school, he far transcends all his competitors. With all its elegance and charm, there is grandeur and dignity, and the all of fire and energy which the school would admit, he most liberally used up. The pathetic points, the massive, solemn illustrations so finely conceived and developed by Sebastian Bach, he could not touch upon, both instrument and place forbade their introduction. He, Handel, neither wastes nor misapplies his strength; the "concatenated" harmonies, and the chromatic surprises he reserved for the auditors under the great dome of St. Paul's. The marvel is that with such slight means he maintained such commanding superiority, such unflinching admiration, such universal sympathy. For a very long period after his demise, these compositions held their great popularity, and made their players celebrated. And the spirit of his day in these concertos is yet a living fact; the concerto of Handel has not passed into the catalogue of antique curiosities, nor into the lumber room of overlearned and scholastic subtleties. It is not a question of "enduring" the Handel concerto, but simply one of what is the best way of producing it? Shall it be in the heavy way of our modern heavy organs, in the sensational way of the Paris organ school, in the light and airy way of Handel's own time, or in some (at present hidden) manner which shall be a faithful interpreter of the venerated giant, noble yet gentle, full of all comfort and much joyfulness? Nothing short of a keen sense of the freedom and playfulness of the composition will give its real truth and beauty; it is not so much the music of the soul as the cunning of melody and modulation, largely and fully developed for the gratification of the external taste for music. And it can only be truthfully given with this intention. It is not mystic, spiritualistic, nationalistic, dramatic, nor does it attempt delineation of character or situation. But it is a close train of thought and conception, and a long way ahead of mere mechanism, or a senseless exhibition of so many organ stops. Its spirit demands an artist to interpret, and none but an artist can enter into its sphere, and translate the composition in all its integrity. Its artistic excellence is as certain and undeniable as in the days of Handel himself, for no new road has been opened to the organ concerto. No other pattern has been so long cherished. The inclination to be delighted with it is as strong as ever; the only questions are, can it be played again with interest in its original light manner, or can any other way be devised which may afford a higher perception of its charm and beauty? It is a great speciality, a criterion of a singular period, a remarkable relic of popular feeling, a carefully wrought-up exercise of a marvellous organ player in what we may term the school of agility in his time. It would be highly interesting to give it as Handel played it, and on some such organ as Handel himself performed on. We incline to imagine any modern substitute would prove inefficient, and that its true intrinsic power and character will be best realized on the instrument of his day, could such organ be discovered. If in existence, it should now be in the International Exhibition, and some one found to interpret the old Handel concerto in its real old form and fashion.

Gilmore's Guns, and Handel's Fireworks Music.

In Watson's Art Journal (New York) we find the following attempt to shelter a piece of modern Irish-American claptrap under the high authority of Handel:

Mr. Gilmore was not the first to make use of artillery in musical performances, as may be seen by the following extract from the Rev. H. R. Haweis's work (pages 184-185), "Music and Morals," recently published from the English addition, by the Harpers:

"Between the 11th of July and the 24th of August, toward the close of the same year, he prepared the firework music, which was played at night before the King's palace in the Green Park. Let us hope that his love of noise was for once fully gratified. The music ended with the explosion of a hundred and one brass cannons, seventy-one six pounders, twenty twelve pounders, and ten twenty-four pounders. There was no lack of hunting horns, hautboys, bassoons, kettle drums, and side drums, besides bass-voles innumerable. Every one seemed to have been delighted; and when the magnificent Doric temple, under the superintendence of that great pyrotechnist, the Chevalier Servandoni, went off with a terrific bang, it was thought success could go no farther, and the king's library was nearly burnt down."

And who was the "he" who set all this hubbub agoing? It was no less a personage than Mr. G. F. Handel, who has acquired some reputation as a composer of oratorios. We commend the above extract to those who have only seen matter for ridicule in Mr. Gilmore's notion of making the rude throats of cannon join in singing the praises of peace with emphasis equal to that displayed in the service of their maker and master, war.

But what ground is there for supposing that the guns were fired at the opening of King George's fireworks at the instigation of "Mr. Handel," or that they formed any part of Handel's Fireworks Music? There were fireworks; and there were cannons fired as signal for their commencement; and there was music composed by Handel, consisting of an Overture, preceding, and other pieces accompanying the pyrotechnical display. But what had the cannons to do with the music? Here is the history of the affair as given by Schoelcher in his Life of Handel:

But it seems as if the fatigues of old age were unknown to him. While he directed his performances during the Lent of 1748, during which he played every evening (as his custom was) one or two concertos upon the organ, he wrote the music for the royal fireworks, which were exhibited on Thursday, the 27th of April, 1749. "The machine," says the Gentleman's Magazine for this month, "was situated in the Green Park, 500 feet from his majesty's library, and represented a magnificent Doric temple, from which extended two wings, terminated by pavilions, 114 feet in height to the top of his majesty's arms; 410 feet long. Invented and designed by the Chevalier Servandoni. Disposition of the firework: after a grand overture of warlike instruments, composed by Mr. Handel, a signal was given for the commencement of the firework, which opened by a royal salute of 101 brass ordnance, viz., 71 six pounders, 20 twelve pounders, and 10 twenty-four pounders."

The construction caught fire, and his majesty's library narrowly escaped being burned. This display of fireworks was to celebrate the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, which was concluded on the 7th of October, 1748, and which put an end to a long war, by insuring to the throne of England the inheritance of the Hanoverian crown.

In addition to the overture, which was played by fifty six instruments, this music is divided into five movements—two Allegro, one Bourée, one Siciliana, and two Minuets, in which are violins, violas, violon cellos and double basses. Below the Siciliana the MS bears the words "La paix," and below the second Allegro, "La rejoissance." Doubtless this accompanied a transparency symbolical of Peace, and the Siciliana one bearing an allegorical representation of Peace. Handel always varied the effects of sonority with extreme care. The Allegro of "La rejoissance" has this direction:—"The first time with trumpets, 2nd time with French horns, the 3rd time all together." At the first minuet, originally set for "trombe, tympani, hautbois, viole, bassoons," (trumpets, kettle-drums, hautboys, viola, and bassoons), it is written—"la seconda volta colli corni di caccia, hautbois, bassoons e tympani; la terza volta tutti insieme and the side drums" (the second time with hunting horns, hautboys, bassoons, and kettle-drums; the third time all together, and the side drums).

People had doubtless been talking about the fifty-six wind instruments which were to lead this musical broadside. Curiosity was excited to the highest point. The General Advertiser of the 22nd of April, 1749, says:—"Yesterday there was the brightest and most numerous assembly ever known at the Spring Gardens, Vauxhall, on occasion of the rehearsal of Mr. Handel's music for the royal fireworks." The Gentleman's Magazine for April, 1749, says:—"Friday 21, was performed, at Vauxhall Gardens, the rehearsal of the music for the fireworks, by a band of 100 musicians, to an audience of above 12,000 persons (tickets 9s. 6d.). So great a resort occasioned such a stoppage on London Bridge, that no carriage could pass for three hours. The footmen were so numerous as to obstruct the passage, so that a scuffle ensued, in which some gentlemen were wounded." Twelve thousand persons at 9s. 6d. per ticket would give £3,700. Such a receipt appears incredible. Surely there is a printer's error here. The General Advertiser puts the tickets at 2s. 6d., which is far more reconcilable with an audience of 12,000 persons. Even that would bring £1,500; which is, after all, a good round sum.

Fireworks Music figured for a long time afterward in the programme of almost every concert; but it is not to be supposed that it was performed with all the horns and trumpets of the Green Park.

Musicians have not so high an opinion of Fireworks Music as of Water Music. Wallah published the two works for eight instruments, and for the harpsichord. Messrs. Longdale & Co. have lately put forward an edition of the first one for the piano, upon the occasion of the peace with Russia. Very often, on both sides of the quarrel, wars are finished with a display of fireworks. Sad mockery!

Handel himself caused Fireworks Music to be performed at the Foundling Hospital, a few days after the public rejoicings of the 27th of April. "On the 4th of May, 1749," says Mr. Brownlow, "he attended the committee at the hospital, and offered a performance of vocal and instrumental music; the money arising therefrom to be applied toward the finishing of the chapel." This performance is thus alluded to in the Gentleman's Magazine of that month: "Saturday, 27th.—The Prince and Princess of Wales, with a great number of persons of quality and distinction, were at the chapel of the Foundling Hospital to hear several pieces of vocal and instrumental music, composed by George Frederic Handel, Esq., for the benefit of the foundation. 1°. The music for the late fireworks, and the anthem on the peace; 2°. Select pieces from the oratorio of Solomon, relating to the dedication of the Temple; and 3°. Several pieces composed for the occasion, the words taken from Scripture, and applicable to the charity and its benefactors."

* Memoranda of the Foundling Hospital, 8vo, 1847.

The Stepchild among Mozart's Operas.

No other of Mozart's masterpieces, not even Così fan Tutte, despite its uninteresting libretto, is performed so seldom as Idomeneus. Were we to reckon up the number of times it has been represented in Germany, since its first production down to the present moment, we should be astounded at the lowness of the figures forming the gross total. It was, therefore, most satisfactory to learn that a royal order had been issued at Munich, directing the revival of the old opera in a manner worthy its composer. It is peculiarly appropriate in Munich, where it was first produced in 1781, and then disappeared for sixty-four long years. Its second production there, in January, 1845 appealed to an entirely new generation, and the present generation, also, is a completely new one. It was in compliance with a request from the Elector Karl Theodor, that Mozart composed Idomeneus for the Italian operatic company at Munich. The opera was produced by them, without any great success, on the 21st January, 1781.

Mozart was then twenty-four years old, with his soul full of art, love, and enthusiasm, and his ambition fixed upon fame and immortality—he was at that golden season of human life which never returns, and which makes even a prosaic youth a poet, if only for a few moments. Still it is only out of respect for a great master that writers have spoken of the work he then wrote, and their allusions to it teem with remarks upon the undramatic story, the accumulation of recitatives and airs, and wind up with the assertion that despite many beauties contained in it, this youthful effort is not sufficiently matured, and for that reason, could never keep possession of the boards, &c. Now let us consider the subject of the drama. Idomeneus is the sovereign of many cities in Crete, and is celebrated by Homer for his manliness and valor. As he is returning home from Troy, he is overtaken by a storm at sea, and is in danger of perishing. He makes a vow that if the gods will rescue him and his companions, he will offer up to them, as an expiatory sacrifice, the first being he meets. He is saved, and the first person on whom his glance falls, as he lands, is—his own son. What a grandly tragic subject! It is hardly inferior to that of Iphigenia in Aulis. And what a tonal edifice has the master raised upon the highly tragic foundation! His work is characterized by a degree of inspiration, earnestness, and sublime melody, reminding one of Handel and Gluck, and of instrumental animation towering high above both, and even surpassing Jos. Haydn. Such instrumental language, glowing with all the ardor of a youthful and happy heart, and characterized by such original ingenuity, that, among all his subsequent works, only Don Juan can be placed on a level with it—such language, as a matter of course, was above the comprehension of a period when, for instance, a Prati was the idol of the Italian and German musical public. Even Mozart's elder rival, the Abbé Vogler, owed the success of his grand opera, Castor and Pollux, solely to the fact that, being well acquainted with the orchestra, which was then the most celebrated in Germany, he adapted himself to its slightest caprices, and really, and truly, wrote for persons who understood him as little as they understood the immortal Mozart. Thus the great composer's first dramatic work disappeared, unappreciated, and to be speedily forgotten, from all the theatres of Germany. Mozart endured the pain of beholding a creation, which to the last moment of his life, he treasured up as his special favorite in his heart, past by unheeded by his own generation. But in the case of this work it seems as though Fate would realize the old and significant German legend, which represents the great Emperor, armed in mail, and buried in obscurity and sleep, reposing in the subterranean and crystal vaults of the mountains, until the time arrives, when once more aroused and summoned to the light of day, he shall come forward as the savior and deliverer of his people. In the interests of art it is to be hoped that the example set by the Theatre Royal, Munich, with respect to an opera so undeservedly neglected, will be followed by other leading theatres in Germany. When we do possess anything good, we ought not to consign it to unmerited oblivion.—German Paper.

What is becoming of our Tenors?

It has been said that modern scores ruin the voice, and are possibilities only for persons of a robust constitution. This is an irrefutable truth. Let anyone glance at the part of Robert the Devil, in the piece of that name, or at that of Raoul, in Les Huguenots; the first question that suggests itself to his mind cannot fail to be, whether a man can have the temerity to attempt such a part in public. It is written for a Roman of the palmiest days of Rome, and not for the weak citizen of a nation which experiences great difficulty in raising a handful of soldiers every year. Each bar appears to be written for an instrument. There are skips of fifths, sixths, octaves, and occasionally tenths; feats of vaulting from the bottom to the top of the scale, as on a violin; examples of impregnable intonation, rendered still more difficult by the unexpected character of the harmony; modulations calculated to turn any one's head, as in the phrase "Conquis par malheur" (third act of Robert le Diable); bits radically unsingable like the duet between Bertram and Robert (third act of Robert le Diable), phrases bearing the stamp of madness, like the phrase of the tenor in the admirable sextet of Les Huguenots, "Et bonne épee;" "lengths" fit to drive a man to despair; fearful break neck obstacles; "par moi conquir; par moi conquir" (third act of Robert); anathemas like that in the second act of La Juive; A's and B's flat, to be taken brutally on the rowel i, as in the phrases in La Reine de Chypre, "Sur le bord de l'abîme." What, too, shall we say of the couplets to France, sung by the Daphnin in Charles VI? We are compelled to stop before the many insurmountable or perilous places conjured up by our memory. The extravagance of modern scores is an established fact. To master them would require an amount of musical knowledge which singers do not possess, an amount of skill and of tact, which can be attained only by a long and intelligent study of the vocal art. Even when all this has been accomplished, there still remains a problem to be solved, the problem, namely, of physical strength. There is no means of shuffling with that. Where physical strength is wanting, abstract knowledge avails but little; consequently, dramatic singing is in an inextricable difficulty, and modern opera is the worker of its approaching ruin.

It will be objected that the operas of Gluck, Grétry, and of Méhul were not more easy to sing, and that our tenors are not found to be marvel when they sing in an old score. It is perfectly certain they are not. We even feel inclined to maintain, that an air like that in Zémire et Azor ("Da moment qu'on aime"), requires higher talent than many a number in La Reine de Chypre. But this is not exactly the question. A character is difficult according to the qualities of style, sentiment, and mimetic power which must be devoted to it. At any rate, in old operas, an artist is not stopped by any material impossibility, against which all human genius is utterly powerless. Serious study, great perseverance, and good sound taste, strengthened by the counsels of criticism, are sufficient to enable an artist to acquit himself honorably in a well-written part. But no study avails aught, if physical strength be wanting. No one in the world can endow a tenor with lungs if he has none; no human power can save him from the state of exhaustion into which he falls, after he has been only two hours vociferating, exerting himself, and tearing his larynx, as well as every other vocal organ.

The history of the modern stage is distinguished by a fact that has escaped no one's notice: nearly all composers work with a view to bring out the peculiar gifts of a certain singer, who, in his turn, makes the piece. But this is not all. They endeavor to turn to account, not only his good qualities, but also his defects and natural imperfections. The result is, that the poem and the music are really the very humble servants of any singer enjoying a certain reputation. We saw this sufficiently during the entire career of Meyerbeer. The care that great man displayed about his singers was something which defies description. He died without having found, for his Africaine, the rare bird he had been seeking with such desperate tenacity. The papers laughed enough at the distances he travelled, the treasures he found, and the disappointments he underwent. No one took more pains than he did to pave the way for the success of a work. He relied upon a singer as upon Providence. He forgot that a work of merit ought, above all things, to be strong in itself, and to triumph independently of machinery, scenery, tricks, and attacks of hoarseness.

This example of the great master proves only too plainly that singers substitute their individuality for the genius of the musician. The latter acts too liberally to them in his work. He reckons too much upon an exceptional voice. It is the story of the English authors writing for the comedian Foote—who had a wooden leg—pieces that could not be acted by those who were unlucky enough to be quite whole. In Italy, again, actors have been engaged expressly to play the parts of one-eyed or lame men. Our readers may brand our assertion as absurd, but we beg to tell them that people do not act otherwise in France.

When anyone says to a singer: "You will sing such and such a part, which goes up to C sharp, and you will make that C sharp vibrate through the house, because Tamberlick did so before you," he is certainly imposing on the artist an anomaly analogous to that of the wooden leg. Nay, more; the artist would be better able to undergo the amputation of a limb than to find in his larynx a C sharp that does not exist there.—Le Guide Musical.

What the Chorus thinks of itself

(As divulged by the Reporter of the Advertiser, June 21).

Just before the festival a well-known Boston organist remarked that this festival would be either the last attempt of the kind, or a beginning of a long series of great musical gatherings. On the stage of the Coliseum the opinion seems to prevail that this festival is not by any means the last of its race. Musical gatherings of every style and size are likely to be given through the country from time to time. If no one else starts them the choir will get them up for their own gratification and amusement. To sit with the harmonious throng, to see thousands of cultivated men and women around one rise and sing with enthusiasm and careful attention, is an experience as peculiar as it is delightful. A seat among the tenors and near the sopranos, where both sexes can be seen, gives some new aspects of American life. Nor is this all. A seat on the stage gives an inside view of the performance and explains many things not understood by the audience. The chorus even thinks that it has discovered some things which have escaped the attention of some of the most astute critics, and that these points are of great practical value. Whether or not these discoveries are of so much importance as the chorus thinks, we shall leave it for our readers to decide, having given the great chorus all the space it asks for in which to express its views. That they are entertaining we are sure; that we or any other critical journal should entirely coincide in its opinions we think the chorus too good-natured and reasonable to ask. If our estimate of it were not so high, we should certainly decline its request to be heard at such length.

First of the choir. Frankly, the chorus says, we think there are too many of us. This is not a new idea, but we wish it understood that the chorus know it only too well. We think the next Festival choir should not exceed ten thousand.* As we number twenty thousand we wish to come on separate days.

* Say three thousand.—Ed.

One-half on one day, the rest another time. We all intend to come, but we know our own weakness, and we will submit to any arrangement that will enable us to do ourselves justice. Twenty thousand can sing a slow psalm together, but one half of our seats are exceedingly poor, and so far from the conductor that in concerted music the parts are confused and we spoil our own efforts. To sit among the red-booked multitude and see their earnestness, pride and sweet-tempered good nature under trial, is as entertaining as it is instructive. Breezes of indignation, gusts of mild petulance, ripples of merriment and solemn calms of seriousness sweep over the excitable company quickly. A spirit of unrest sometimes appears, and at other moments the sopranos are almost tearful, and the tenors grim and dejected. It has never been our experience to witness so much emotion among so many people. They rise to heights of aspiring resolve and duty, and are provoked at trifles. Taken as a whole they seem what they are—a refined, serious, cultivated and enthusiastic set of people—a worthy assembly of representative Americans. It is plain they seem a trifle proud, and a little dissatisfied. Proud that they have done so well under their many discouragements, and vexed at the mismanagement of some of the leaders. They seem a trifle hurt at their treatment, and supremely happy that they have done so well at times. They know they have failed, and they know how and why it happened. With the most loyal feelings towards the projectors of the festival, and thankful to them for affording them so much pleasure, they still venture to hold a few opinions of their own on the matter.

To warn future festivals of the rocks and shoals we have stranded upon, we point out:—

First, the organ. We do not like it. It seldom helps us. It is too loud and distracting. We like its ponderous bass (wood, not reeds), as it gives us confidence. Beyond this we do not care for it. Its tone is too reedy and "mixture" like. Then, the organist has not always helped us. The organ does not give us our parts in every place as they are written, nor does it follow the light and shade as quickly or carefully as do the singers, and we are rapidly losing confidence in it. This is plainly shown in the ease with which the unaccompanied four-part song was performed. Once or twice, as in "Yet doth the Lord," the organ, instead of trying to assert itself, becomingly took its proper position of mere accompaniment, and at the close there was a sense of gratified satisfaction at the performance. On some occasions the choir have sat down in a most unhappy state of mortification and disgust, for which the organ has been often to blame.

Next, the rehearsals. Here the choir is no doubt at fault. We cannot help it, and respectfully urge that we have our daily bread to win, and cannot give our whole day to the festival. We have paid our own way, and rehearsed night after night for months, and we think if we are rightly handled we can do fairly well without the morning rehearsal.

This leads to another important matter. The performance of "God save the Queen" was a mortifying failure. We know it, and we know why and how it happened. Never was there a choir more dead in earnest to do its best than assembled that day. Each had a book containing printed directions for the performance of each line. The conductor rises and at once violates the rules. The printed rules say the organ is to give the signal to rise. Our leader beckons us, and we scramble up in mortified confusion, and the prelude starts. At the marked place the choir and organ come in with precision. At once we are treated like children, and bid be silent, and the New York critics laugh and sneer at the failure. Now we are utterly at sea, and the rest of the performance goes into history a wretched fiasco. Who's fault is it? Not ours, certainly. It may be urged that we should have attended the morning rehearsal. Perhaps so, but if every one from gray-haired basso to youngest alto had been in the rehearsal seats, it would have been a failure if the conductor had violated the printed directions in the books. If this had happened once we would say nothing. It happened several times, and each time the twenty thousand ladies and gentlemen were compelled to bear the blame of failures they did not bring about. In a choir of twenty hundred it is possible to change the style of performance; among twenty thousand, impossible.

Next we think it a great mistake to change the leader. Give us one conductor through every choral number. We learn to know his every sign, and learn to rely on him. Few people in the audience can understand the sense of uncertainty and positive alarm that spreads over the choir at sight of a new leader. We admire Mr. Paine, and we have rehearsed his splendid music with care and pleasure, yet hundreds of sopranos were ready to cry with vexation at their failure to attack the first line. They had been taught to watch for a certain sign to sing. The strange conductor was not understood, and the piece fell dead. Under Zerrahn it would have been a triumph for us and the talented composer. Mr. Tourjee, Mr. Keller, and Franz Abt command our respect and affection everywhere, except when on one six feet of boarding, and that is the conductor's platform. Great composers, fine musicians, no doubt, but they were new to us. Two of them we had never seen before. They did not know our ways, and we understood not theirs, and the result was very sad.

Finally, we think the incessant performance of the "Anvil Chorus" a blunder. The best of music becomes tiresome, and if it is poor—Heaven help us! The opera music we object to altogether. It may be very fine to have the chorus read it at sight, but we don't care to do it often. As for the bells, cannon, and big drum, we like them not. One of these fine musical days the long-suffering choir will rise in good-natured rebellion and put the dreadful things out of joint. Lastly, let us never be asked again to sing songs in mass. Choral and concerted sacred music is our only forte. In it we can succeed—in anything else we are very unhappy, and we know it. As for the hymn at the close of each day's performance, we do not care for it. We are too tired and anxious to get home to spend another moment in our huge, hot, and noisy hall.

This is not the last festival. We are coming again in smaller numbers, and we want to see these gatherings made a permanent success. Give the choir a chance, treat them with respect, print the music months beforehand, and make no changes or additions, and give us one leader,—and if Mr. Gilmore, or any one else, wants to gather a choir of fifty thousand he can easily do so.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, JUNE 22. THEODORE THOMAS gave his benefit concert at the Central Park Garden, on Thursday evening, June 20th. For the edification of your Boston readers I will state that he did not have a grand orchestra of "1,000 accomplished musicians," nor was he assisted by a trained chorus of 17,000 picked voices—neither was there any tent-shed specially constructed for the occasion: though I have no doubt that such a proceeding would have been eminently sensible and proper. He did have, however, an excellent orchestra of 60 performers, and the following programme:

March. Tannhäuser.....	Wagner.
Overture. Night in Granada.....	Kreutzer.
Waltz. Radolfs-Klänge.....	Strauss.
Fantasia, for Clarinet.....	Spadina.
Mr. L. Schneider.
Selections from "The Flying Dutchman," First time.
Overture. Coriolanus. Op. 62.....	Wagner.
Concerto No. 1. E flat, Adagio and Rondo.....	Beethoven.
Mr. Bernhard Listemann.
Symphonic Poem. Orpheus. First time.....	Liszt.
Selections from "William Tell." First time.....	Rossini.
Quadrille. Nuss-Knacker. First time.....	Kücken.
Waltz. Wiener Fräulein.....	Strauss.
Galop. Japanese. New.....	A. E. Pense.

Had Mr. Thomas held direct communication with the clerk of the weather he could not have selected a better evening—for, as the long scorching afternoon drew to a close, and a welcome breeze blew up from the bay, people seemed to gravitate naturally to the cool and pleasant gardens. The only difficulty seemed to be—to prevent the crowd from being too great—for Mr. Thomas's personal popularity is such that doubling the usual price of admission seemed to increase, rather than diminish, the attendance.

At 8.30 every table in the salle des concerts and in the garden outside was taken and every place occupied. Those who came later had to be content with a promenade in the garden path until some restless sitter left his chair—an event of almost constant occurrence, for here every one wanders at his own sweet will—or, what is the same of course, the will of a lady whom he escorts; for, do not imagine, O men of Athens, that this is merely a beer drinking place, frequented mainly by the sterner sex: at least half the audience was composed of ladies.

The conductor was evidently in the best of mood. In front of his desk hung a beautiful garland of lilies; above him the crystal chandeliers chimed gaily, swayed by the river breeze. From his cheerful demeanor one would not have guessed that three sonnets had recently been written to him; yet there they were, printed on the second leaf of the programme, for every one to read. He seems, somehow, to be en rapport with hearers, as well as with orchestra. Even when his audience relapses into barbarism on the subject of encores, he quietly but firmly controls them. I have seen him—under circumstances almost as trying as the famous charivari at the Cirque Napoleon, when Padeloup nearly broke his bâton in frantic rage—leave the stand and quietly take a seat in a corner of the orchestra, remaining there until he had carried his point.

The music was fine in every respect; each selection was perfectly rendered by the orchestra; and during the intermissions a military band stationed in the garden played some very good music:—an arrangement of Mendelssohn's "Spring Song," (Lieder ohne Worte), among other pieces. Mr. Listemann received an encore for his fine rendering of Paganini's difficult concerto.

The popularity of these garden concerts continues undiminished, and a season of somewhat similar entertainments has begun at Terrace Garden, with Ad. Neuendorff as conductor.

I notice an editorial query in your columns as to whether the "playing upon" the anvils by the firemen at the Jubilee is to be done "through hose-pipe." In that case I recommend that the anvils first be made red hot: the result would be an appropriate comment on the entire Jubilee. A. A. C.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JUNE 29, 1872.

The Lesson of the Former Jubilee.

We do not propose to enter upon any criticisms in detail of the present, the "World's Peace" Gilmore Jubilee, until it is all over. Of course there have been some very pleasant features about it. The "Coliseum" in itself is almost a miracle of skill and energy and beauty; the animated spectacle of nearly 20,000 performers at one end, and sometimes almost as many auditors or spectators facing them—though frequently the number has been hardly half that; the splendid playing of the French, the Prussian, and the Austrian Bands, with interchange of international courtesies in the shape of "Hail Columbia," and "Yankee Doodle," "God Save the Queen," the "Marseillaise," &c., day after day, amid wild enthusiasm and waving of white handkerchiefs,—for this is open-air music and could be heard, as nothing else could half as well; the grand or beautiful effects of some of the chorus singing, mostly limited to the plain Chorals in long, even notes, (and even this would have been better by a fifth part of the number, in a hall not seating more than 5,000 listeners); the telling power and sweetness, richness of Mme. Peschka Leutner's voice, and more or less of Mme. Raderdorff's (though both would have sung to more advantage in a common hall;—best of all, since it was infinitely the best programme and by far the best performed of all the vocal work, the production of "Israel and Egypt" by the selector choir of from twelve to fourteen hundred voices—although this was only for the few appreciative ones who were well seated; upon five sixths of the audience it was thrown away, the noise of restless feet all over the great board palace sadly interfering with any calm and fruitful attention on the part of the rest: these and some other features, not to speak of the beauty of the weather, the admirable ventilation of the great building, and the contagious exhilaration of a whole community on pleasure bent, made it worth one's while, since the Jubilee was in the midst of us, to put oneself within its influence once or twice, if not oftener.

Nor have we ever denied that some considerable good may incidentally result from it, vain glorious, uncalled for, forced upon us, and fallacious as the project in itself has always seemed and does still seem to us. An all-wise Providence, making us "build better than we knew," takes care that there shall be no great stir without some good resulting from it: does not the world owe something to the two Napoleons? Our readers will remember that we reviewed the Jubilee of 1869 in as generous and candid a spirit as was possible to one frankly an unbeliever from the first,—and to the last. We took all pains to note and give full credit for each trait, each instance of grand or beautiful effect, of excellence in musical selection or in rendering, for the inspiring influence of the scene and the vast presence of sympathetic numbers, for the wonderful example of good order, for organizing skill and energy, for the impulse imparted to the formation of choral societies throughout the country, and for the putting of such marked emphasis upon Music, the printing it as it were in such big characters, that thousands, most indifferent to the art before, began to feel a marvellous respect for it. But after frankly and fully (we fear too glowingly) making all these admissions, we none the less took care never to confess ourselves converted to the essential worthiness of the huge scheme in itself, or of the source, the spirit whence it sprang. We took care, after as before, to give it as our honest and deliberate conviction that the Jubilee was not a fit thing to be done,—at all events not a fit thing to repeat. And now, if we read the signs aright, now that this second Jubilee is half through (pronounced in its advertisements and by all the Press "the grandest series of musical successes which the world has ever known,"—for this is the heyday of exaggeration), now we make bold to predict, that the practical comment furnished by this second Jubilee upon the first, will prove that first conviction to have been mainly right. A short time will determine. Not a few days or weeks perhaps, but a few months or a season; we must allow some time for the intoxication to sleep itself off (when we shall find how largely it has been produced by noxious artificial stimulants, such as unscrupulous advertisement puffery, appeals to vanity or interest, &c.). Then the community will come to its senses, and survey the whole field calmly; then the real sober comments of the wise and thoughtful, unheard publicly amid so much newspaper clamor, but heard every hour and everywhere in private both before and during the whole festival, will have caught up with the lightning speed of the newspaper which gives its utterances power for the time being, and the great monster will be weighed in scales good for all time. It is impossible to judge the doings of the Coliseum in the Coliseum; who thinks of music under the Fourth of July excitement of "Hail Columbia" and the Marseillaise and hospitable enthusiasms towards Bands from England, Germany and France? A stronger love, for the time being, than the love of music, is the inspiring genius there. Reports made up in the Coliseum, and flashed over a thousand telegraphic wires from that central "Press Room," may make impressions for a day throughout the land; but they cannot create opinion, which is a plant of slower growth. Nay, we have got to wait for all this factitious excitement to subside—much of it ignorant and honest—before we can get at a true account of facts, on which to base opinions.

But we are wandering beyond our purpose, which was only, for the present, a brief apology for reproducing here, before we undertake to weigh the present jubilee, the actual last result and summing up of the criticism we published after the jubilee of 1869. This portion of our remarks seems to have been overlooked by many, who have not been slow to charge us with inconsistency, in that, having (as it seemed to them) been so much carried away and almost "converted" by the first jubilee, in spite of all our fears about it, we now revive the old fears and objections to the present repetition of it "with improvements." Mr. Gilmore, especially, in that wonderful "History" of his,—the huge book in which he abuses us and every one who did not sympathize with his strange project, and in which he complains to St. Cecilia of the great wrong done to her by anybody's not accepting him as her prime minister on earth, publishes his own secret prayer verbatim (!), rhapsodizes about "O Longfellow! Longfellow!", and indulges in more pages of personality, of maudlin, rancid sentimental rhetoric than his best admirer could hardly have the stomach to wade through.—Mr. Gilmore, in that phenomenal Book, which never flashed on our benighted eyes till yesterday, cites the sentences in which we dwelt upon the good side of the Jubilee as a complete refutation of our original objections to it, while he most disingenuously neglects to append what followed, and here follows:

The success of the Jubilee was unique; let it remain unique, exceptional. It were a foolish ambition that would attempt to reproduce it. To regard it as the initiation of a new order of things in music, to seek henceforth to bring such vast exceptional occasions into the regular order of the seasons with "the sweet return," &c., were a rash way to read the lesson of this singular experience. The truth is, the Peace Jubilee was entirely an anomalous occasion, ambiguous in its character and motive: not strictly musical, not strictly national and patriotic. Its success was as an occasion of an unexampled kind. The fact that it had been engineered and managed so as to interest so many in it, that such vast amount of energy had got employed in it,—that of itself made it inspiring. As for Music, the wonder was it went so well; but no really musical person undertakes to compare it as a musical experience, either for beauty or for grandeur, or for quickening appeal to heart and soul, with many a Festival or Concert on a smaller scale. Music, as such, is not helped by such vast multiplication of means and numbers. We know this now if we did not before. Exceptions, beautiful, peculiar efforts noticed now and then, only prove the rule. The success of the Festival was something sui generis; it was the realization of a remarkable and memorable event, in which music played a part, but hardly the chief part. Indeed so much of the music went unheard, that it might almost be left out of the account in trying to define the marvellous experience. Probably it will be some time before any one will arrive at a clear definition of the gigantic, brilliant, singular phenomenon.

We say this, because our attempt to do full justice to the Festival has been by many quite misconstrued; our generous allowance for all the good we could sincerely find in it, musically, and for the impulse which it gives to music as a popular pursuit and interest, has been held up in taunt and triumph as a confession of error, a reluctant conversion to the policy of musical performances upon a "monster" scale of numbers. We beg to say, that we are not at all converted to that notion; that the Jubilee has not at all reconciled us to the idea that musical effects, musical edification or enjoyment, may be enhanced by the assembling of a whole Nation of performers and listeners under one roof. (For, to carry out the ambitious aim consistently, it will not do to stop at 50,000; millions must come in, must meet and sing, and hear and shout, all in one place, as one.) A "National" musical Jubilee, to our mind, would be one that should extend throughout the Nation, and have its seat, here, there, everywhere, in all the towns and cities, in all the halls and temples. It is a small representation of thirty millions of people that can be concentrated in one "Coliseum," were it three as big as Mr. Gilmore's. Then again, musically, we are still convinced (and so we believe is every sane musical person), that twenty festivals in twenty places, each with 500 performers, would be a finer thing and give twenty times more pleasure than the congregation of 50,000 in one spot trying to listen to 11,000.

Obscurely admitting, then, that the Festival socially was an experience worth living for; that musically, even, the result was better than the plan intrinsically; and that it did much incidental good (as all great movements do in some way) by awakening enthusiasm among singers, calling new choral societies into being, and filling thousands of people with a new respect for music,—still we must maintain, the real lesson of it is: Be not ambitious to achieve the biggest thing in music: be content with doing well that which is more easily practised.

ble; quality before quantity, and of the latter only so much as is sufficient for the former, a limit felt for and discovered long ago. We read of threatened rival imitations, of plans in other cities to get up Jubilees on a still bigger scale, eclipsing Boston. But we presume these do not hail from serious sources. We should deprecate the fashion. Nor do we think it probable, with all the triumph, that the same thing will be tried again in the same way. Rather will it prompt to more moderate and rational experiments, to bona fide Musical Festivals, in which whole works, as Oratorios, can be performed, and no power wasted in attempts to magnify beyond the laws of nature, physical and human. The Philharmonic Society in New York, we hear, propose to have a festival. That is the right sort of body for a musical festival to proceed from; and the object which it is to serve is also musical, within the sphere of Art, namely, to build a music hall. We trust they will forego, as unworthy of a society of artists, all childish ambition to eclipse Mr. Gilmore's Jubilee; that they will enter into competition, if at all, with our last Handel and Haydn Festival, or even with the festivals of Birmingham and Düsseldorf and Frankfurt; artistic emulation, rather than sensational. We quite concur with our contemporary the N. Y. Weekly Review, in the hope that what they do will be "in strict accordance with the dictates of true musical art and modern civilization, which, in musical matters, are, not to expand, but to concentrate. Let us have an orchestra of about 200 picked men; a chorus of 750 members; only the best music, and plenty of rehearsals. This will do far more for the advancement of musical culture than large masses, insufficient rehearsals, and poor music."

The Musical Festival.

Here is one view of the Jubilee, evidently an honest one, and very natural for any unprejudiced and not particularly musical outsider. And from its standpoint,—happily not that of one so placed that he must, volens volens, know too much of the great scheme and its author and of the means by which it has been worked up,—we must admit it is a reasonable view. We wish it all the acceptance of which it is worthy, and therefore we make the following extracts from the Worcester Palladium of this week:

It is perfectly immaterial whether the Jubilee originated in the brain of Gilmore, was a scheme developed by —, — and others for mercenary purposes; or was an unselfish demonstration of the people jubilant over universal peace. It is sufficient if the great musical festival has been and now is developing a love for the sweetest of the sciences in the breast of every man, woman and child in our old New England homes, is teaching our musical people their defects by enabling them to witness the accomplishments of older and better artists than they are, and above all by inspiring us all with that brotherly love for all the nations of the earth and enabling us to exhibit to their representatives our kindest feelings and sympathy. Men never cast aside hostilities so quickly as when they sing together. Music is the companion of love and not of enmity. If the Jubilee has accomplished in any measure these results, it has done more than the diplomatists of our day have done, and has added a new bond of union to the sisterhood of the nations. The more common interests we have, the nearer do we come to each other; and so is it with nationalities. Frenchmen forget neither friends nor enemies. When the French band came forward through the great chorus to the platform, and cheer upon cheer told its members of its welcome, there was re-kindled in their breasts the fire which burned in the most glorious days of their native land, and as the great Marseillaise was sung the enthusiasm of both singers and audience rose to such a tumult of expression as has seldom if ever been witnessed on any occasion of our history. Every note of that hymn was wafted over the ocean to the land so lately covered with carnage and drenched with blood, telling our sympathy and cheering the down-hearted. England might have looked with more favor on our claims for damages had she first witnessed the joyous welcome of her representatives at the great Jubilee; and Prussia will learn and remember the welcome she has received with pleasure. It is the token of our desire for peace with all the world. Long after the Jubilee has ceased will the music there sung be echoed and re-echoed all over our land, and it will inspire a musical taste of a higher order than has been our wont to cultivate. Nearly every little village in New England has its band, which will be improved by the example of its superiors. Our brass bands are all brass, and productive of much noise and little music. The causes of this are the signal want of good instruments in their make up, and the lack of skill to play satisfactorily. Our promenade concerts in the parks will be made better by the examples recently furnished us, and our music will be everywhere greatly improved.

The great chorus, for the most part, has proved a failure; though it has sung some things splendidly and with spirit; but it has generally been weak, uneven, fitful, and at times sadly astray. Many of the chorus-singers make the organ responsible for their failings; and, annoying as the instrument with its brassy, blatant voice and falidity of tone has been to the audience, the apology can be easily accepted. Then the change of conductors has been a source of annoyance to them. With not sufficient rehearsal to make them acquainted with the peculiarities of each, and the immense distance, which deprives the majority of a close following of the baton, the wonder is that they are ever successful. The unevenness of the chorus has been attributed to the fact that many of the singers have given their tickets for a day's entrance, to friends who were unable to sing a note. The whole thing is too gigantic and unwieldy for good effects, and seem only calculated for band performances and patriotic selections. The sound is lost in the vastness of the building, and the combined force produces much less volume than was anticipated.

Musically the Jubilee is not an entire success, as could hardly have been expected; but the idea of drawing so many of the world's best musicians together for friendly and harmonious intercourse, is a grand one, and must work happy results in the organization of musical societies over the country, for the study of the best works. Then the idea that music is, for the time being, the uppermost [?] thought of both worlds, is a progressive one, and the broad, generous feeling towards all mankind which it inspires, is well worth kindling.

The concerts have thus far introduced the English, French, and German Bands, all of which sustained the splendid reputation they have always enjoyed; and each has received a perfect ovation on their appearance, the audience and chorus evincing the wildest enthusiasm. Strauss has fascinated every one with his admirable waltzes, and his own peculiar lead of the orchestra, and their music has been one of the most satisfactory performances of the Jubilee. Mrs. Leutner is one of the world's great singers, and unbounded enthusiasm has greeted her at every appearance. Her voice is a glorious one; clear, telling and resonant; wonderfully flute-like in its character, and of the purest quality; she reached G in alt with perfect ease, and sustains it with clearness. Her voice reaches with fullness, the remotest corner of the Coliseum, even in its softest tones; her execution is wonderful, and she sings with perfect freedom and ease. Great efforts ought to be made to secure her for performance in the Music Hall, before her return to Europe; as well as the pianists, who are otherwise going back to Europe, with their rare abilities comparatively unknown; for piano solos in the Coliseum are absurdities; and a pianist's efforts unappreciated. The ambitious desire to advertise a certain piano-forte should not compromise the reputation of such great artists, who could not with their limited knowledge of the extent of the Coliseum foresee the disadvantageous results.

THESE NAMES! In the London Orchestra, of June 7, we find the following:

It may not be amiss to recapitulate the chief features of the Boston Musical Festival, which opens on the 17th inst., and continues until the 4th July. Amongst the members of the acting committee are Henry W. Longfellow, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Oliver Wendell Holmes, and James Russell Lowell (!) and the chairman is William B. Washburn, Governor of Massachusetts. The orchestra and band will number 40,000 vocal and instrumental performers.

We beg leave to assure our London contemporary that the "Active Committee" of the Jubilee is composed of a very different sort of men from Emerson and Longfellow, and that these and many more distinguished gentlemen, whose names have been officially announced as "General Committee" of this huge affair, are innocent of all participation in it. Why was it not announced that Mr. Emerson, Mr. Longfellow, &c., would sing solos at the Festival, or play on the trombone? It would be quite as foreign to their nature, as to engage in the management of a musical occasion, especially a Gilmore Jubilee. The announcement of that Committee, comprising a couple of hundred of the most distinguished names in this community, of poets, statesmen, men of letters, &c., was a snare and a delusion. At least twenty of these gentlemen have personally assured us that their names were used in this way without their own knowledge or consent. On the "Musical Committee," also, figure the names of several of the leading musical characters of Boston, who from the first have had no feelings but of strong antipathy to the whole project. This publishing of long lists of Committees, without leave, is one of the shrewd advertising dodges in which the average jubilee brain is wonderfully fertile.

Swallows Homeward Flying.

Mme. CAMILLA UNSO, our admirable virtuosa of the violin, who has been making a decided mark in the best London concerts, writes us that she proposes to return to the United States in August. It is her intention to give a few classical concerts, in Boston, which our readers will look forward to with real interest.

The month of August will bring back also to the Eastern States the favorite pianist, ANNA MENHLE, who has been having a most successful concert season in California and Oregon.

Still earlier (in July) our grand basso, Mr. MYRON W. WHITNEY, who has risen to a place among the foremost Oratorio and Concert singers in England, will revisit these scenes, where he has been too long missed.

GEORGE L. OSGOOD. The Evening Post prints the following extract from a private letter from Berlin:

I went yesterday evening to Osgood's concert in the Sing-Akademie, and a very beautiful one it was. The applause was enthusiastic, and I must say that I think his singing is perfect. It is true his voice is not very powerful—but then I understand that neither was Mario's, nor is Sims Reeves's—and the tone of it so delicious, and his management of it is so beautiful, that the very delivery of it is an additional charm. His method is purity itself. Then he is all soul! What more can one ask? It is a most peculiar voice, and such a one as I never heard. There is a pathos and at the same time an unconscious innocence that goes right to the heart. Then there is such a touch of nature in it. He sings with the same spontaneity as the nightingales do that I hear in the dead of night in Prince Albrecht's garden over the way. He is full of poetry and passion. Every song was a pearl, and I hardly knew which I preferred, as they were all new to me. Osgood is going home for the summer, with his flower-like wife and little child, and will return in the autumn to fill his engagement in Germany. [not so]. If he sings in America I shall be very anxious to know what will be thought of him. I almost fear he will not be generally appreciated, on account of the very exquisiteness of his art. He is a matchless ballad-singer, and I trust that among his selections will be some with which our people are familiar, otherwise his audience will not be able to compare him with others, and to judge him fairly. Here, he is very apt to make up his programmes entirely from Gluck, Mozart, Handel, Mendelssohn, Franz Schubert, Schumann, Wagner, &c., composers some of whom are a little recon-dite even for Germany, and in America half of his audience are not likely to be artists! I only wish people could hear him with my ears (which you know of old I would back against anybody's), for if the whole world said the contrary, I would still maintain that Osgood's voice is the best tenor I ever heard.

Strauss Interviewed.

The correspondent of the New York World, in the course of a letter from Boston, says:

Johann Strauss, the waltz king, personally, is evidently a good fellow. He talks only German, but he smiles in all languages. Perhaps it is scarcely fair to him to say that he only talks German, for he avers that he has been for eleven years trying to speak French. Still, however, he admits that he speaks it badly. Languages are not his forte. He is small, wiry, and intensely nervous. One ignorant of both French and German would imagine from the rapidity of his speech and the superabundance of gestures that he was talking the former—indeed, that he was a Frenchman. He is full of courtesy, and a brief acquaintance with him will satisfy any one that his extravagance of gesture when conducting the performance is simply natural and quite inseparable from his personality.

Last night he attended a sort of informal reception given to himself, Bendel, and Abt, at the rooms of the Orpheus Club. During the evening he presided at the piano, while the club joined in chorus in singing his "Blue Danube Waltz." They sang superbly, and no one present where all were enthusiastic was seemingly more excited than he himself. His complexion is quite dark. His eyes and hair are as black as possible. It is related of him that when he was in St. Petersburg the fair Russian belles made a frightful series of demands upon him for locks of his hair. Strauss viewed the prospect with alarm. All these souvenirs would leave him bald. Then he had a brilliant idea.

His dog was a huge black Newfoundland. Its shaggy coat was of precisely the texture of his hair, and to-day many a Russian album is enriched by the possession of a cherished lock of hair from Strauss's dog. When he was coming to this country he could with difficulty be restrained, it is said, from bringing along the dog as a precautionary measure for a similar emergency.

In conversation Strauss is constantly smiling, showing his pearly teeth, pantomiming with hands, head and body, and is altogether as full of action as when upon the stage. When speaking upon the subject of his impressions of American energy and the Jubilee as an exemplification of it, he becomes almost wild with excitement.

They would not believe it in Germany, he says; they could not deem it possible that so enormous a chorus and orchestra of intelligent musicians could be gathered together and held for so long a time to perform such great works as are rendered at this Jubilee. In Germany, he explained to the writer, the people are more economical and infinitely less venturesome than the Americans. There a thousand dollars is a large sum, and the mere idea of a musical festival which would cost three quarters of a million would take away the breath of Deutschland. They might get up a crude gathering of musical societies from many different places, and for a single day have a gigantic festival, but even then it would not approximate this one.

Another thing which astonishes Strauss even more than the enterprise which has originated and rendered successful this peace jubilee, and the liberality of the public in sustaining it, is the fact that in America, where he has been led to believe there was little taste for or knowledge of music, so great a chorus should have been found of people capable of reading and correctly executing such compositions as have made up the vocal portion of the programmes. Thus far he is also full of compliment to the orchestra. In Germany, he says, before he would venture to perform one of his waltzes in public, even with a small orchestra, he would have nine or ten rehearsals; but here, even for a piece which must be strange to most if not all of the performers, a single rehearsal is made to suffice, and then it is brought out and not only merely done, but done well.

Without doubt more rehearsals might secure a greater degree of delicacy of expression, and approach more closely to absolute perfection. But in so vast a volume of sound as is here evoked, minor effects are lost sight of and the general effect seems all which can be desired. Before he left Germany, even when he had made his contract to come over, Strauss was more than half inclined, he admits, to believe the Jubilee a Yankee swindle.

This was the general belief in that country, and he says that it will need all the credit he and the other German artists now here possess in fatherland, and all the power of language at their command, to give any conception to their countrymen of what they have seen in this country. He will not wait until his return to make his representation, but will write from here a letter over his name to the Neue Freie Presse, the leading paper of Vienna, variously setting forth, as far as he can, the impression which America has made upon him.

Franz Abt.

Franz Abt, the favorite lyrical composer, is a native of the little factory town of Eilenburg, in the Prussian province of Saxony, where his father, himself a distinguished musician, resided as a minister of the Lutheran Church, and the future composer was born there on the 21st of September, 1819. The young Francis, who showed great musical talent at an early age, received his education at the celebrated Thomas School, in Leipzig, and was at first destined for the legal profession, and, in fact, studied law for about a year, but becoming tired of the legal drudgery, devoted himself in his nineteenth year entirely to his favorite study, music.

But on this field he was destined to meet at first with many disappointments, and long and weary was his search for publishers who would take his virgin compositions, mostly waltzes and other dances, in hand. At length, however, he found a man, who published some of them, and on the 14th of April, 1838, the publisher, Kuenzel, in Leipzig, advertised six new dances, by Franz Abt, the first work in which the young composer appeared before the public.

These were very favorably received, and the success he met with encouraged him to further efforts. He tried his strength in lyrical compositions, and there met with still greater applause, so that he soon decided on this particular field as the one adapted to his talents. Studying his art, and composing, meanwhile a great number of pretty pieces, which yielded him an economical income, Abt resided in Leipzig until the fall of 1841, when he got married, and obtained the position of a leader of the orchestra of the Zurich Theatre. The theatre, however, was closed in May, 1842, and Abt was in somewhat straitened circumstances, when he had the good fortune to meet an Englishman, at that time residing at Zurich, who engaged him as his music teacher at a salary which at once freed Abt from all pecuniary embarrassments. This position also gave him the time to devote himself to his compositions, and the sojourn of the lyrical composer, Kücken, in Zurich, acted as a spur to animate him in his efforts. Early in the morning he sat down to his work, and thus created seven new songs, the text of which was mostly taken from Herlossohn's Buch der Liebe (Book of Love), and one of these, which bore the simple name of "Agathe," was destined to carry his name to almost every household of the civilized world. This simple poem was destined to make the journey around the world under another name, which since then has become familiar to almost everybody: "When the Swallows Homeward Fly." But this great success was not attained right away. On the contrary, the song was rejected by one publisher after another, and "the swallows flew homeward" for many years, till at last they were included in the collection of songs published under the name of "Orphion," by Goepel, in Stuttgart. But even now the song was not noticed, and it took more than three years before it became generally known. Then, however, it made the triumphant tour around the world, and soon raised the author to fame. He received at once any amount of orders from musical publishers, and not long after obtained the position of Musical Director of the Court of Brunswick. His later compositions are all well-known, and his "Wanderer," "On the Neckar, on the Rhine," "From the eyes beams the heart," "Sleep well, my darling angel," "The silent water rose," and "Good-night, my lovely child," have become favorites in every house where music is cultivated. Particularly the latter has, of late, been brought into particular notice by Wachtel singing it in the "Postillon;" and is admired almost as much as the "swallow song." Wachtel has sung this song more than seven hundred times publicly.

The French Band.

The representatives of France who did their country so much honor by their performances yesterday were the first of the foreign bands to arrive upon our shores, having been compelled to hasten their departure from France, because of the difficulty of securing passage at this season of the year. The Garde Republicaine band numbers fifty-three men, under the leadership of M. George Paulus and M. Emil Maury. The organization dates from 1854, when the band was formed under its present chiefs. Every member must be able to read and write, and no one can be enlisted in the band without having served in one of the regiments of the army at least two years. The band was attached when first organized to the regiment entitled "Le Garde de Paris," which consists of 2,000 infantry and about 600 cavalry. This organization is somewhat similar to the "Household Brigade," in that it never leaves Paris. When the empire fell, the regiment's name was changed to "Le Garde Republicaine." The band was always composed of cultured musicians, and its concerts at the capital during Napoleon's reign gave it a very enviable reputation. It was at its best in 1867, when, at the grand international contest of military bands, it divided the honors with the illustrious Viennese, who boasted that they could vanquish the world. During the late war many of its members underwent the vicissitudes imposed upon the French, and some were prisoners in Germany for many months. Its concerts in London, while the commune was raging in Paris, gave it a very hearty introduction to the generosity of the English, who lavished praises and money upon it in boundless profusion. M. Paulus, the leader visited this country many years ago, with the Prince de Joinville. M. Paulus is an Alsatian, but needless to say, is devoted to France. M. Maury is a very skillful leader, and directed the London concert. The band wears white off duty a fatigue uniform similar to that of the French gendarmes, but yesterday donned its regular uniform accorded by the city of Paris, and decorated with the city's coat of arms—a galley on the waves, with the motto, Fluctuat nec mergitur, beneath it. The band has made many friends during its stay in Boston, by the quiet and gentlemanly conduct of its members, and the concert yesterday showed the musical talent and genius of its directors to be of the highest order.—Advertiser.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- A Dream. 4. Eb to f. Clara Gottschalk. 40
"All yesterday I was spinning,
Sitting alone in the sun."
Romantic, original, and when well sung, quite effective.
- Somebody's Darling. 4. C to e. Gabriel. 50
"Wounded by bayonets, shell and balls, Somebody's Darling —"
One of the sad, sweet songs called forth by the incidents of war.
- Lead Thou me on. For 4 voices. 4. Eb to f. G. S. G. 40
"Lead, kindly Light, amid th' incertile gloom."
Composed for the church of the Nativity, Huntsville, Ala.
- Cherished Hopes. 3. Eb to e. Barker. 30
"But we have a hope immortal,
One that will not, cannot die."
One of the Barker's popular concert songs.
- Waiting for my Ships. Song and Chorus. 3. B to f. Morris. 30
"Here on the shore I wander lonely, They'll come to me again, I know."
Words by Geo. Cooper. A good ballad.
- The Rose of Spain, (La Rosa Espanola). Lithograph Title. 4. Bb to f. Yradier. 50
"Sweetly smiling, hearts beguiling,
How thou charmest, Rosalie!"
One of the songs of the Prima Donna, Rosa d'Erina. Has French and English words, and a most piquant quality.
- Rest thee on this Mossy Pillow. Trio for Ladies' voices. 4. F to g. Smart. 40
"Every mortal grief forsake thee,
As our drowsy spells o'ertake thee.
Fine trio for Ladies' classes."
- Courting's very Charming. Lithograph Title. 3. D to d. Lady Dufferin. 50
"Lovers round me press Numbers quite alarming."
A very neat and pleasing comic song, as sung by Rosa d'Erina.
- Birdie's Reply. Lithograph Title. 4. C to g. Webster. 40
"We cannot keep the secret in."
Charming. For once the "reply" is better than the song it replies to, although that was good. Birdie can hardly speak for twittering and warbling.
- Out of the Frying Pan into the Fire. 2. G to d. Wellman. 30
"But such a temper had darling Maria
'Twas out of the frying pan into the fire."
Very good comic song.
- National Hymn. To thee, O Country. For male voices. 3. A to f. Eichberg. 35
"Upon thy mighty faithful heart,
We lay our burden down!"
This had a magnificent success when sung by the 1200 voices of the young singers at the Boston School Music Festival, and will have a national reputation. Nothing is better for a 4th of July festival.
- God shall charge his Angel Legions. 4. Bb to a. Lucantoni. 50
"Tho' thou walk thro' hostile regions,
Tho' in desert wilds thou sleep."
The fine words added to the good music render this a very desirable Duet and Quartet for singers of Sacred Music. The familiar hymns, however good, sometimes create a desire for a new one for a change.

Instrumental.

- Wanderer's Rest. Op. 100. 3. E. Spindler. 30
Quite easy and exceedingly graceful.
- Do not Stop. Polka. 3. F. Zahonyi. 30
Do not stop to pronounce the name, as you might fall, but pass on to the Polka, which is a very spirited, original, pleasing affair.
- Cackle, Cackle, Galop. 3. Eb. Pratt. 30
A slight barn-yard imitation in the music, which is full of life.
- La Plus Belle. (Impromptu Mazurka). 4. F. Egghard. 75
Very graceful, and has a smoothness and neat brilliancy which carries it somewhat away from the usual sentimentality of the common Mazurka.
- L'Adieu Nocturne. 5. Ab. Favarger. 40
In 12-8 time, and is an elegant piece for the parlor.
- Leichtes Blut Polka. 3. F. Strauss. 40
Now that we see Strauss, we understand him better. Now is the time to practice Strauss music, and this is a good piece for the next one.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. a small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 816.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 13, 1872.

VOL. XXXII. No. 8.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Shadows.

We walk mid shadows, clouds obscure our way
From morning's dawn to eve's pale, lingering light;
With every day we fear the coming night,
And in the night we dread the coming day.
We need more knowledge to dispel our fears,
We need more courage to confront our doom,
We need to see the light through deepest gloom,
We need to feel that joy is born of tears.—
O faint of heart, deaf, and bereft of sight
We will not listen to great Nature's voice,
We will not read her open book aright.
Does not all Nature call us to rejoice?
Since darkest clouds by brightest suns are made,
And only strongest light casts deepest shade.

X.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Shadows.

Shadows we seem to be of spirits high,
Reflections of ourselves whom we know not;
Each feels within himself, as half forgot,
And half remembered, a deep mystery;
Wondering we meet each other, eye to eye,
And ask of one another what is taught
By this strange dwelling in a world unsought
Where we have lost our immortality.
The stars shine faintly from the sea's still face,
While their great spheres roll through unmeasured space;
So we, who here ourselves can scarcely trace,
Caught in the gleam of Nature's varied play,
Have orbits circling through realms far away,
Where Love creates us an Eternal Day.

Soloists and their Perils.

(From "Music and Morals," by the Rev. H. B. HAWES, M.A.)

The life of a successful singer or an illustrious instrumentalist is full of peril—peril to virtue, peril to art, peril to society; and this is not owing at all to the exigencies of the executive gift in itself, but entirely owing to the conditions imposed upon the artist from without. There may be nothing in the life-work of a great Prima-donna to demoralize any more than in the life-work of any other gifted and industrious woman. There are great operas which are calculated to ennoble while they delight; there are songs which stir within us the finest impulses; there are characters to be impersonated on the operatic stage which not only do not shock decency, but tend to promote the highest and most generous sentiment. There are many others of an unmoral description, perfectly harmless, and calculated to produce the utmost enjoyment. Given a right selection of songs—given a course of operas dealing, if you will, with a certain amount of crime and a fair instalment of horrors, but so constructed as to be effective in result without being immoral in tendency (and the greatest works of Shakespeare and Beethoven satisfy both these conditions); given to the singer good remuneration, and, above all, sufficient repose; given some choice of congenial subjects; given a sphere of wholesome activity, and, lastly, given a recognized and an honorable social position, and all special peril to personal virtue immediately ceases. It is nonsense to say that a certain physical exhaustion which must accompany any highly-sustained effort of mind or body is especially deleterious in the case of a musician. Exertion need not produce disease. People were intended to exert themselves. Does the Parliamentary orator speak for four hours without fatigue? Does the medical man see one hundred patients in the course of the morning without severe mental tension? Does a judge deliver his charges without a similar effort? Does the author compose without highly-wrought and sustained attention, practiced advisedly, and without necessary injury to his brain, or stomach, or moral equilibrium? Let us settle it in our mind, there is nothing demoralizing in deliberately, and for a definite art purpose, putting one's self or others through the experience of a highly-strung series of emotions. It is even a good and healthy function of art to raise our feelings at times to their highest pitch of intensity. It is part of a right system of discipline, calculated to bring the emotions into high condition and healthy activity, and to keep them in a good state of repair. The body is intended and fitted to bear at times an extreme tension of its muscles. The professional athlete knows this, and when he is rubbed down and rolled up in his hot blanket after violent exercise, he is not alarmed at feeling himself going off into a profound sleep through sheer exhaustion, for he knows that such systematic exertion and exhaustion must be undergone in order to raise his physique to its highest state of health and power. Well, the laws which regulate the life and health of the emotions are exactly similar, and these laws prescribe steady exercise, rest, recreation, and sometimes extreme tension. In itself, we repeat, the habitual exercise and discipline of the emotions, as, for example, in music or acting, is not the ruin of, but the very condition of, moral health. It is the kind of strain imposed upon our musical artists, not by their art, but by the struggle for existence, and by the thoughtless, extravagant, indolent, and often immoral demands of a public that has little musical education, and that little had, which hurries nine-tenths of all our gifted exponents to a premature grave. The cantatrice should be allowed to unfold her aspirations in noble music; but she has the misfortune to have half an octave more than other singers, and so had and flimsy songs must be chosen, or noble songs must be spoiled, for the sake of an upper C, E, or G. The public go mad, not about the superb trio in William Tell (for example), but for the one bar in which the tenor has to come out with a high chest-note. Can anything be more sadly indicative of the low musical feeling of the British public than the way in which Mlle. Carlotta Patti was run after for her head-notes, and Herr Wachtel for his chest-notes? These excessive calisthenic and gymnastic explosions are the degradation of taste and the ruin of many an incomparable voice. Again: has a musician no private taste, no feeling, no love for good music? Possibly he may have; but what is he to do? Composers pay him to sing their trash; publishers bribe even good composers to write the kind of stuff the public have been fooled into applauding. That is one, and not the only, chronic complaint from which Music in England is suffering at present.

There are hundreds of magnificent songs of Schubert, of Beethoven, and Schumann; but these composers, who had but few bank-notes to spare during their lifetime, have unfortunately left no money to pay singers after their death. The public do not hear numbers of the best songs that exist. One or two perhaps emerge. "Adelaide" forever! and what other song by Beethoven does a certain Tenor habitually sing? And what songs does he generally sing, and why? There are a good many first-rate English ballads. Thanks to the enterprise of a few bold and conscientious singers, we occasionally hear some of them. But are the English ballads most commonly sung at concerts selected for their merit? Why are they sung? The truth had better be told; they are sung because they are paid for, and they are clapped and puffed by people who ought to know better; and who do know better, but who are paid to pocket their conscience, and applaud what they know to be meaningless trash. How are singers to fulfil the first simple duty they owe to their art, and sing good music, when there is a conspiracy to make them stoop to the humiliation of their noble gifts, or starve? Once more: there is the peril of overwrought powers. When the mind, through excessive artistic excitement, "like a jarred pendulum, retains only its motion, not its power," then absolute repose is wanted. All may have been within the bounds of healthful though intense excitation; it is not that we complain of—not the excitement of singing and playing, but the want of rest which follows it. After (let us say) an opera of M. Wagner, where the screeching has been intense, and the crisis almost constant for some hours, the Prima-donna must have rest; no stormy rehearsal next morning, no fatiguing opera the next night. One or two great sustained efforts during the week are sufficient. But let any one glance at the programme which a favorite singer is expected to carry out day and night, at opera and concert, during the season. No flesh and blood can stand such an ordeal. Chronic exhaustion begins to set in; and exhaustion is not met by rest, but by stimulants—it must be so; and then more exhaustion is met by more stimulants, and what becomes of healthy emotional activity and emotional discipline? Mind and body are unhinged. The artist's health suffers, the artist's voice suffers, and probably becomes extinct in a few years. Hence we cannot blame popular singers for asking enormous sums so long as they have a note left in their voices. It is the public that makes them abuse their priceless gifts for gold. It is the public who are content to demand the sacrifice of fresh, girlish constitutions, and the shattering of the young, manly frames, and the general wreck of mind, and sometimes of morals, through overfatigue and overexcitement, and unhealthy conditions of activity.

But, be it observed, the perils above alluded to, and others which cannot here be discussed in detail, are not inseparable from the vocation of a public singer or solo instrumentalist. The vocation is simply honorable; it might and ought to be always noble in its use and exercise. How many esteemed and high-minded musicians are there who resist the perils which I have mentioned? Thank God there are many, and we trust every year there will be more and more, as Music in England becomes more and more appreciated. Let music be recognized here as in Germany, as a thing of reason and a thing of morals as well as a thing of beauty and emotion, and the public will cease to look upon musicians as mere purveyors of pleasure. We should not encourage singers to wear themselves out; should not clamor for incessant encores, which utterly ruin the balance of a sustained work of art; and we should remember that the gifted persons who delight us are made of flesh and blood like ourselves; that they have human hearts, and passions, and trials, and are often exposed, when very young and at a great disadvantage, to temptations not easily resisted even under favorable circumstances. And those who love music should make allowance for those who devote themselves to music, and not tempt them to make money by the degradation of art to the ruin of their own moral sense and the destruction of the public taste.

I honor the musical profession; but I declare that musical taste in England is degraded and kept low by jealousy and time-serving, and that musical criticism is so gagged, and prejudiced, and corrupt, that those whose business it is to see that right principles prevail seem too often led by their interest rather than their duty. When it comes to judging a new composer, the truth is not told, or only half told; when a new player is allowed to appear, his success depends, not upon his merits, but upon his friends; and while it is, of course, impossible entirely to quell first-class merit, second-class merit is constantly ignored, and many sound English musicians are often compelled to stand aside and see their places taken by young quacks or foreigners inferior to themselves. No one wishes to deny the supreme merit of artists like M. Joachim or Mme. Schumann, and none but the interested or the envious can grudge them their distinguished popularity; but in England, when a foreigner and an English artist are of equal merit, the English artist ought to receive at least an equal share of support from the public and the press. But he never does; and why? Because the employers of musical talent in this country pander to the appetite for every thing that is foreign; because they keep down the development of English talent in order to gain an easy reputation in accordance with established prejudices by constantly bringing over players and singers from abroad, whose chief merits seem to consist in long hair and a very imperfect acquaintance with the English language. It is difficult for a musician, especially an English musician, in England, to be at once true to his own interests and to the interests of his art; it is difficult for him to be true to his conscience in the exercise of his profession; but he may receive some small comfort from the reflection that this last difficulty, at least, is one which he shares with every man in every profession, and that, at all events, it is not a difficulty inherent in his art, neither is it altogether insurmountable.

Ancient Musical Instruments.

BY CHARLES READE.

On the first of June the South Kensington Museum opened a special exhibition of ancient musical instruments. They have been obtained on loan from all quarters; money, powerful as it is, could not buy the greater part; and every man and woman, who loves music, or possesses a mind, should study them before the unique opportunity runs away, and this multitude of gems is dispersed forever.

Talk of the treasures of the deep! Give me the treasures of the country house; for there curiosities can always find a corner to live: in London, novelties jostle them into their graves through mere want of space. In a word, private contributors, English and foreign, have peopled one of the halls of this museum with the spoils of time. Here are Egyptian and Indian instruments, Turkish and Chinese, very curious; oriental banjos, etc.; and above all a most amazing specimen of round-about resonance—a long black wooden tube, over which the strings are stretched, and the tube rests on two hollow everlasting pumpkins. But the main feature is a number of mediæval instruments, exquisite in form and workmanship, and sometimes encrusted with gems, and inlaid with oriental lavishness and the skill of a Genoese jeweller. Here in stringed instruments alone are full a score of obsolete varieties, and many specimens of each kind, especially of the lute, the archlute, the mandolin, the sweet viola d'amore, with its sympathetic wires that lay and trembled in unison beneath the gut strings, and prolonged the vibration; the viola di Bardone, a larger and more complicated instrument, whose sympathetic wires, twenty-two in number, were placed so that they could be struck with the thumb, while the fingers played the gut strings; the viola da gamba, called by Sir Andrew Aguercheek the "viol de gamboys," and all the tribe of citterns and gitterns, that used to hang in every barber's shop for gentlemen to play, when England was famous as a musical nation, and that was before the monstrous idea of confining musical education to the less musical sex had entered the national head. Here, too, are all the instruments the translators of our Bible have bravely transplanted to Assyria and the night of ages—the sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer, etc.; and here are the children and grandchildren of the dulcimer—viz. the keyed dulcimer, the virginal, the clavichord, the spinet, harpsichord, pianoforte. There are nearly two hundred specimens of the old Cremonese and other Italian violins, violas, violons, and basses, and amongst them I see a violin that a friend of mine once gave four hundred and fifty pounds for, and a bass that was bought for eight hundred pounds in Paris.

But as this is the one branch I am well versed in, I postpone it for the time, my present object being merely to indicate the various character of the treasures, and the profit that may be reaped. The Marquis of Kildare lends an Irish harp with its one row of metal strings, the wooden frame black with age, exposure, and methinks a little peat smoke. To such a harp Carolan, the last great improvising Irish harper, sang his traditional melodies that lived by ear and now are dead, alas! One comfort: as the devil escaped being put in a pie by shunning Cornwall, so those divine melodies—some gay, some sad—have died and gone to Heaven, and so escaped the defilement and degradation of being hashed and smashed into quadrilles by Jullien and his followers, and played in false time and utter defiance of their dominant sentiment. There is an older harp, lent by Mr. Dalway, on which is inscribed "Ego sum Rex cithararum." "Pride goeth before destruction;" so this self-trumpeting harp is in pieces. The epithet of "King of Harps" is better merited by the noble instrument of Lady Llanover—a triple-stringed Welsh harp, made by the famous John Richards about 140 years ago. On such a harp, made by the same maker (Richards), blind Parry of Ruabon harped his "ravishing tunes a thousand years old" to the poet Gray, and so fired him with brave thoughts that he wrote "The Bard" while the music was fresh in his soul. Woe is me! who can play this harp nowadays? This one looks bursting with music. "I would give a few pounds to hear 'Sweet Richard' played on it." But I ransacked Wales five years ago, and not one public harper did I find could play the triple harp. Yet their greatest airs were all composed for it, and are half lost without it.

Then there are Italian spinets, one of which ought to interest the ladies; for it has nineteen hundred and twenty eight precious stones outside of it, and very little music inside. There is Handel's harpsichord. He had more harpsichords than Cromwell skulls. But this time there really is a tidy pedigree made out. There are two much finer double harpsichords with stops and swell, one of them made by Joseph Kirkman and lent by his descendants. I heard this harpsichord played by Mr. Sullivan and the learned Mr. Engel; and it is a great and beautiful instrument full of sweetness and tenderness, yet not deficient in grandeur; and sings to the heart. It ought never to have been allowed to die. There was room in the world for the pianoforte and the harpsichord too; each can do things the other cannot.

It seems at first sight strange and sad that so many stringed instruments should have been invented in modern Europe, and framed with so much skill and taste, only to die away, when so poor a thing as the guitar survives. They were not killed, as some people fancy, by our four stringed instruments, for they ran parallel with these for centuries. Some of them no doubt deserve to die; the mandoline, and little citterns, for not making noise enough in such a world as this, and the lute and viola di Bardone for being always out of tune. I read that a contemporary of Haudel said, "If a lutenist lives to eighty he must have been sixty years tuning; and another, writing to lutenists, gave them this warning, "You shall do well ever when you lay it by to put into a bed that is constantly used." So mankind rose against these invalid instruments and put them to bed once for all.

But I hope that true lovers of music, both male and female, will inspect the harpsichord, the viola d'amore, and the viola da gamba with candid eyes, and give them a trial. Put these two last at their lowest, they must be superior to the guitar, since they have more tone, and arpeggios can be played on them with the hand and suddenly the chords swept with the bow—a rare musical effect for any single instrument to produce. The larger viola of the two could also be fitted with the sympathetic wire strings; the finger-boards of both could be fretted and I apprehend the bridge of each could be arched a little. Ladies could play the viola d'amore gracefully. Indeed, a Mrs. Otley played the viola da gamba publicly in 1720, and a Miss Ford in 1761; touto viro doctissimo Carolo Engel. Meyerbeer thought well of the viola d'amore, for he wrote a part for it in "Les Huguenots." The late Prince Consort had music of the sixteenth century performed on various ancient instruments such as are now on show. On that occasion a viola da gamba—that figures in this very exhibition—was played by Mr. Hatton—who, I hope, is alive to play it again—and was much admired. The deceased Prince had many ideas before his age, and I think your readers will appreciate what he did for music in 1845, when in 1872 they have examined this noble collection with the attention it deserves.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Some Ancient Musical Instruments.

A special exhibition of ancient musical instruments has been collected at South Kensington, England, comprising about 600 instruments. The royal family are prominent contributors. The Queen has 44 curious instruments from Windsor Castle; a harpsichord from Kew palace; a small square piano-forte, a grand piano, a beautifully painted viola (one of Amati's best), a basso di camera, four of George the Third's silver state trumpets, a couple of German bangle horns, a German bell instrument (called the Halbmund), and some old drums from Hampton Court. The instruments from Windsor include several singular specimens. There are, for example, the war drum of the King of Ashanti with two human jaw bones suspended from the sides, and an instrument most accurately described on the catalogue as "very peculiar." It was made from the head of the Duke of Schomberg's horse, killed at the battle of the Boyne. The Duke of Edinburgh—who, at the Royal Society of Musicians' dinner, pleaded guilty of fiddling to his sailors—sends a number of valuable violins; and the Secretary of State for India sends an Indian collection. The dulcimer, sackbut and harp which summoned the subjects of Nebuchadnezzar to the plains of Dara, are here faithfully represented. The sweet cither, the spinnet of a bygone age, and venerable worm-eaten harps heard in the times of the Stuarts in Wales, or Ireland, carry the mind away on a long backward flight.

Some of the specimens are extremely quaint. An emblematic order is very emblematic indeed. It is a life size representation of an English officer groaning under the claws of a tiger, was invented for the amusement of the Tipoo Sultan, and was taken at the siege of Seringapatam. The handle which grinds out the music sticks out of the beast's fore quarter. The officer groans out of a brass pipe, which decidedly detracts from the beauty of his mouth. In several other cases, the uncouth instruments which make melody for the savage are displayed. There are the rude violin of the Nubian, the quaint stringed instruments of Japan and China, and drums and horns from all parts of the world. A neatly polished skull is made into the but end of a West African harp. There are a nose flute from sunny Otaheite, and a really handsome nose trumpet from New Zealand, and a tiny flute made of the fibia of a monkey by the Xeharoc Indians, tomtoms and reed instruments of the most primitive kind. An exhibition of this kind is naturally rich in rare instruments, among which is a virginal, once owned by Queen Elizabeth. There are several of the maiden queen's virginals preserved in England. One is to be found at Helmingham Hall, Suffolk, and Lord Lytton has another, and the Rev. Mr. Sperling, of Kensington, has a third. The specimen in the exhibition was purchased at Lord Spencer Chichester's sale, twelve years ago. The great strength of the show is its stringed instruments, beginning with a giant double bass, to play which you must stand on a table, and including the various forms through which the violin passed until it attained perfection in the matchless products of Cremona. The king of the Cremona school was Stradivarius, and there are several of his incomparable instruments exhibited. The Duke of Cambridge exhibits one, purchased by the late Duke from Count Platen, who bought it from the maker himself. The Duke of Edinburgh has a violin by Guarnerius, a present from the late Baron Goldschmidt, a small violin by Jacobus Stainer, and a viola said to have belonged to Handel. The queen's Amati was reduced from a viol. Lord Warwick lends an English box wood violin, dated 1578. It is carved with woodland scenes, and is said to have been given by Queen Elizabeth to her favorite Leicester. There are several antique organs and harpsichords in the exhibition; also many of the old fashioned instruments like the serpent, which to this day do tremendous service in remote village choirs. The bag pipe family are numerous enough to make a bag-pipe hater shudder at the sight. There is no more singular curiosity in the exhibition than a porcelain flute, formerly in possession of Charles II.

(From the New York Times.)

A Musical Prince.

The production in London of the new opera, "Gelmina" has drawn much attention to its celebrated composer, Prince Poniatowski. The fall of the Empire exiled the Prince from France, and he, the grand nephew and representative of Stanislaus, the last King of Poland, has been forced to seek a livelihood through the exercise of his musical talents in London. It was reported a short time back that one of the ladies of the Bonaparte family was about to open a milliner's shop in Bond street, in that capital. So flagrant a reproach to the pride of the Imperial house has somehow been prevented; but no one seems to have intervened to prevent the last scion of an older royal dynasty from disgracefully working for a living in the same city. Perhaps, however, the distinction between professional toil and trade is properly borne in mind, and hence making operas for bread by a Prince is regarded as less heinous than making bonnets for bread by a Princess. It is said, nevertheless, that Prince Poniatowski makes bad opera; and that Mme. Bonaparte makes good bonnets—which, if true, ought surely to modify our estimate of the comparative turpitude of their respective manufactures.

We ought not, meanwhile, to do injustice to the Prince's lyrical performances, and so hasten to say that "Gelmina," while pronounced mediocre as tested by the highest standards, has yet done so well as to command frequent repetitions, and, buoyed up no doubt by the genius of Adelina Patti, to take its place regularly in the Covent Garden repertory. This is not the first opera from the same distinguished hand. In fact, Prince Poniatowski brought out at Florence, as early as 1838, his "Giovanni di Procida"—the theme being the same as that of Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers"—and sang the first tenor part in it himself. His career both before and after was extraordinary, both for variety and romantic vicissitude. Born in Rome in 1812, he took high honors in mathematics, but not in classics, at the early age of seventeen. Before he was of age he came out as a tenor singer at Lucca. Mario, as is well known, is a Marquis, but we believe this was the first instance of an operatic Prince. In 1839, Poniatowski anticipated Offenbach by producing "Don Desiderio," an opera bouffe of decided merit, which went the round of the European opera houses, and is said to have been praised by Rossini and Carafa. The Prince afterward wrote an opera, "Sposa d'Abido," on the romantic subject of Lord Byron's poem, tried his hand in the same way on Victor Hugo's "Ruy Blas," and knocked off no fewer than four other works, all of which were sung, before bringing out his "Esmeralda" at Leghorn, in 1847.

The era of revolution changed the Prince's destiny. He turned at this juncture from opera to diplomacy. Presently he appeared as Minister Plenipotentiary to Paris, London and Brussels from the Court of Tuscany. Subsequently he took up his abode in Paris, and was made a Senator by the Emperor Napoleon. During his Parisian residence he wrote works for the Grand Opera, the Lyrique and the Opéra Comique—Pierre de Medicis, L'Aventurier, and A Travers le Mur, respectively. Besides these he had composed a Mass in F, and other lesser works. Whatever musical rank is assigned to him, Prince Poniatowski has been highly industrious, no doubt has done good service in various ways to the interest of art, and either in his diplomatic or lyrical relations is one of the most interesting figures of our time. That he should be reduced, on the threshold of old age, to toil daily for his bread, is a striking example of the mutability of affairs, and the uncertain tenure that even the most prosperous retain on worldly position. Both the author of the Life of Caesar and of Gelmina illustrate in their own persons a truth that few of us are likely to think of too often or too deeply.

The Jubilee.

(From the Springfield Republican, June 29)

The Boston "pow-wow," as some of the acidulous New York critics contemptuously call Mr. Gilmore's jubilee, closes its second week to-day, with a great flourish of trumpets, five military bands participating. In spite of a bad beginning and the expenditure of a quarter of a million of dollars up to the end of the first week, the great undertaking seems likely to pay expenses and something more. It was an interesting question at first where all the money was coming from. The chorus, in an enthusiastic spirit of self-sacrifice, and in spite of rather ungenerous treatment by the managers, spent their breath without hope of reward; but everybody else who contributed in any way to the performances had to be paid, and the bills accumulated very fast. At first the masses were conspicuously absent, but the prices of admission were lowered, and since then the attendance and the bank account has improved. Then the orchestra, a large source of expense, was cut down more than one half after the first week, and with this and other economic reductions, the balance at the close is likely to be on the right side of the ledger.

But has the jubilee been a musical success? In special features, very decidedly. Yes. As a whole, and so far as its monster character is concerned, No. It is very grand to hear 20,000 voices sing "Old Hundred," and the other familiar tunes which have been performed there; but this jubilee chorus had a higher aim. The book in which they were drilled for weeks and months contained many selections of special merit and some degree of difficulty. The chorus learned them, and went to Boston, expecting to sing them, but not a fifth part of them has been heard at all. Why? Because Mr. Gilmore found at the start that his chorus, although actually better trained than that of the first jubilee, was too large to be manageable, except in slow movements, and he has been afraid to trust it with much else. The range of the music performed has therefore been very limited; a few selections have been sung and sung, and the part of the chorus, which was to be, and should be, the great feature of the festival, has been for several days absolutely insignificant. The orchestra was also too large at the start for any finished, clean cut performance, although it did excellent work in spite of the disadvantages of place and numbers; and the organ, a miracle of noise, was, in every musical sense, a failure. Could Mr. Gilmore reduce the ensemble of his jubilee to one-fourth its present size—a smaller chorus, smaller orchestra, smaller organ, and smaller concert-room—he would unquestionably make it a much greater success, so far as musical effect and artistic result are concerned. The possibilities would be infinitely greater; the actual performance could but be in a like and gratifying degree improved. The vulgar idea that 20,000 voices combined are more effective than a lesser number in a smaller space, is happily exploded by the present jubilee, and not even Gilmore will undertake to carry through an affair of such magnitude again.

We might point out other particulars in which the grand scheme has been a failure,—the pianoforte solos for instance, which were a very glaring absurdity in a room of 500 feet long. But we pass to the special excellences of the jubilee, which have really given it all its éclat. First and most noteworthy were the foreign military bands. It was a happy thought in Gilmore to engage them, and it has been a happy experience for the patrons of the jubilee to hear them. The critics cannot quite agree which is best, but all admit that no approach to such perfection of style and absolute finish of performance has been reached by any of our American bands. The common harshness and blare of brass is forgotten in admiration of the high musical quality of their tone, their rich blending and contrast of reed and brass, and the symmetry and smoothness of all their performances. It is well worth one's while to go to Boston to hear such playing as theirs, without regard to the rest of the jubilee attractions.

If the jubilee can boast only one great vocalist, it is certainly to its credit that that one is a consummate artist. Mme. Peschka-Leutner has shown herself a soprano of dazzling capabilities. There is apparently nothing in the way of vocal execution that is beyond her reach; and it is not merely the twittering of a bird, but splendid, intelligent singing. To secure so fine a singer was one of Mr. Gilmore's triumphs, and to introduce to America composers so famous as Abt, the German song-writer, and Strauss, the Austrian waltz-maker, was another.

There have been signal errors of management and execution, as was, of course, inevitable with an enterprise of such magnitude; some of the programmes have been unworthy of a festival so ambitious, and all of them have been changed and re changed, apparently by the freak of a moment; but the special triumphs which we have narrated have largely atoned, with the public, at least, for these deficiencies, and have secured for the jubilee the degree of success which it has attained.

(From the Albion, New York.)

The Boston Hubbub.

It has often been affirmed by experienced physiologists that there is a taint of madness in every human organization which culminates in severe attacks under extreme provocation, and that the principle is applicable to communities as well as to the individual. We could adduce many instances confirming the truth of this axiom, but no more convincing proof could be offered than that of the Jubilee, which appears to have driven the Hubbub as clean out of their wits as if they had been bitten by the tarantula, or by a pack of infuriated demoniac bow wows. If music were made to soothe the savage breast, we look upon it as a very impertinent compliment on the part of the concocter of this hullabaloo that the Bostonians were indulged to such a gigantic extent in this ecstatic amusement; the more so as the melody of the be-puffed impresario is so unlike that of Orpheus of old, who first originated the idea of a peripatetic concert accompanied by belles and wild beasts. We have made the most anxious inquiries as to the origin of this stupendous charivari without finding the key to the enigma, except it be that, impelled by a fanatic, the Bostonians resolved to initiate the biggest musical whirlwind ever known in history, and the Jubilee is the result.

It is scarcely possible to talk seriously on such a topic, and if Mr. Gilmore had had any respect or feeling for true artistic effect, he might have known by experience that the music in such a building and on such a scale could but be a gigantic failure. Time and again has the experiment been made to keep twenty thousand voices and instruments in unison and affinity, and invariably it has proved futile. In Germany, that accomplished and music-loving people have long since abandoned the attempt, except in the case of national and patriotic songs. In France it has never been made. Whereas in England the movement has been restricted to such oratorios as were well known to every amateur who attended the performance, and then even it was found preferable to reduce the number of performers, so as to ensure a more perfect and harmonious rendering of the score.

The fact is that the entire jubilee is gotten up for a sensational effect, and there is therefore a lack of real artistic merit in these concerts, which when the novelty is worn off, makes itself more painfully felt at each succeeding performance. Another preposterous idea was that of allowing solos, whether vocal or instrumental, in such a vast auditorium. They invariably result in failure, and in many instances detract greatly from an artist's established fame.

However we may canvass its merits in an artistic point of view, we must give well deserved words of praise for the enterprise and skill with which this unparalleled undertaking has been brought to a climax; and the warmth and spontaneity of the reception tendered to the British, French and Austrian Bands, prove that the Bostonians may carry out a cranky idea, but they never forget that whole souled hospitality for which they are so widely and justly celebrated.

(From the London Orchestra, June 7)

Boston Pomposo, Parliament Agitato.

The proposal to send out the Grenadier Guard to the Boston Festival was made an Imperial question on Monday in both Houses of Parliament. In the Commons Mr. Cardwell was sternly interrogated by the Earl of Yarmouth, and after admitting that her Majesty and the Commander-in Chief had sanctioned the arrangement, was warned that the noble Earl would "call the attention of the House to the question." Whereat the House laughed heartily. But the Lords had a clear fling at the matter. The Marquis of Hertford denounced the idea of allowing her Majesty's Guards to be shown by some Barnum at so much a head; the Duke of Richmond wished to know how discipline was to be maintained among the bandsmen under the charge of a single officer; and Lord de Ros protested on grounds of military discipline against such an act taking place. We are not informed whether Lord Granville or Lord Lansdowne appeased the well-founded fears of the Duke of Richmond by promising that a strong guard armed with Martini-Henry rifles and fixed bayonets should be ordered to accompany the band and keep order, and that a score of cats-o-nine-tails and a dozen whipping triangles should also be shipped, so that the least infraction of discipline might be promptly punished. Something of this sort would perhaps relieve the anxiety of the noble Duke, who has no faith in the Grenadier bandsmen behaving themselves on foreign shores. Who knows? They might even, in the event of a sudden rupture with the United States over the Alabama business, join these plausible Yankees, and trumpet the vanguard of their march into Canada! Well may the Duke of Richmond quiver in his patent leathers.

What strikes any unprejudiced reader of the discussion is the trumpery nature of the whole affair. What does it amount to? A Boston impresario gets up a great musical demonstration—gives a musical party, in fact, to which he invites other nations to send their musico-political representatives. The American Government back him up; the Governor of his native State give him credentials, President Grant sends him to all the ministers abroad, asking them to use their best influence to obtain the co operation of foreign governments. Thus the enterprise becomes a national affair; and friendly states are glad to fall in with the idea, not merely to please Mr. P. S. Gilmore, but to please the Republic of the United States. At such a simple act of international courtesy, why should noble lords fling down the gauntlet of defiance? The Boston Jubilee may not turn out a very grand event, either artistically or politically considered. It may not be worth much more, perhaps, than one of our international exhibitions. It can hardly be worth much less. But, taking it at its lowest computation, how unwisely churlish would it have been to refuse the proposal of the American organizers, seconded as that proposal was. The relations of this country with America just now demand more than ordinary delicacy, and call for as much goodwill as can decently be shown. Ought we to prove less compliant than Prussia? The Emperor of Germany is sending out his bandsmen without so much as a big Krupp to overawe them, or a Grand Upper-General-Flogmaster's Staff Intendant to take it out of the back of any mutinous Pickelhaube. As for the allusion of the Marquis of Hertford to Barnum, that sneer should never be uttered within a stone's throw of South Kensington. The Albert Hall is very high and imposing, but any missile flung at Barnumese enterprises abroad may rebound with uncomfortable effect upon our own stately edifice. Our own exhibitions and natural enterprises have just that delicate suspicion of the Barnum principle, which makes it unsafe to be too satirical towards others. But different skies, different complexions. Her Majesty's Guards blaring away under the auspices of the Cole Family, or performing the March from "Athalie" (harmonized by Gounod), or the "Poppytopsicalms Waltz" (re-harped by Gounod, with prelude, introduction, and interpolated melody by Gounod), fulfil their natural mission. But Her Majesty's Guards, stepping forward to play "Rule Britannia" and "God save the Queen" on a Boston platform, constitute, it seems, "a most irregular proceeding," even "an unheard-of outrage."

Inside Views of the Jubilee Chorus.

(From the Boston Daily Advertiser.)

II. THE CHORUS AND THE CATACOMBS.

There are two ways of considering the chorus,—one by viewing it from the auditorium and one by studying its habits at home in its underground haunts. The first shows a vast and organized body, magnificent in its proportions, grand and terrible in voice and awayed and shaped by one controlling will. The second reveals this imposing collective resolved into its component parts, the mighty voice split up into a perfect Babel of tongues and the one will replaced by as many wills as there are individuals. It is the difference between the prima donna on the stage and the prima donna in the green room or in the kitchen; between Zenobia enthroned and Zenobia hungry; between Apollo and Pan. One may gratify the most morbid taste for contrasts by the mere passage of the chorus-secluding gate. He hears the noble bass voices soaring and swelling into the patriotic measures of the Marseillaise; he listens to the notes of "Let the Bright Seraphim," until he is more than disposed to allow those radiant but doubtful creatures to follow the bent of their inclinations; then he goes behind the scenes and finds the singers pouring in here larger instead of pouring out here melody; he discovers the white angels of peace whom he has heretofore worshipped from afar staying the demands of hunger with Washington pie and jelly cake, till the white aprons on which they picnic are of the hue of their chorus books, and the observer concludes to let the bright seraphim pursue unmolested their rehearsals for the dyspepsia. It is not far from the sublime to the ridiculous; there is but a wooden gate, with attendant policemen, to pass, and the change is effected.

From twelve to three o'clock there is a steady stream of choral jubilants pouring into the Coliseum. Each has his or her red-covered book guarded and borne with affectionate care. So frequent are the singers and the red-covered books that it is a matter of speculation whether the astronomers on neighboring planets have not remarked and wondered at an extraordinary and sanguine-hued appearance on the face of the Earth. It is to be hoped that they will not attribute the red phenomenon to any great outpouring of blood, else Mr. Gilmore's efforts to celebrate peace will be gravely misapprehended, and the Jubilee will bring us to had repute with our trans-ethereal observers. But of the opinions of the celestial press we must remain forever ignorant. The spirit of Tycho Brahe obstinately refuses to play the Demosthenes to our Woodhull, or we should be more than glad to print extracts from the Venus morning journals giving full and accurate pen-photographs of the remarkable red spots which have been seen for the past five days near the north pole of the Earth. By trains, in the indescribable vehicles which run to and from the distant railroad stations, and on foot come the bearers of the crimson books. At three o'clock twenty thousand, more or less, have packed themselves into musical phalanx and await the or a signal to arise. Meanwhile we may view them to advantage from the auditorium beyond.

Similes have been exhausted in attempt to describe the chorus as it looks to a spectator. Certain it is that such a compact mass of heads has never before been witnessed in this immediate vicinity. It is bewildering to look down upon the acres of cranial expanse and to compute the quantity of adjacent brains which are giving their whole energies to the task of making a noise. Where people are counted by thousands individually is thoroughly submerged. And yet more than one member of the chorus probably fancies that his or her voice is heard clear and pure above the blended voices of the remaining nineteen thousand, nine hundred and ninety-nine, and even dares to hope for favorable notices from the New York critics. It is just so among the audience. Every man's applause sounds louder to himself than the combined plaudits of those around him. And perhaps every man's judgment seems to himself better than the judgment of his less discriminating neighbors. De Smith looks pityingly over at De Robinson when that misguided individual shows his utter lack of musical taste by applauding the horrible staccato movement. De Robinson institutes a most startling series of persuasive praises when he distinguishes the auxiliary part of the saxophones, and wonders why De Smith comes to the Jubilee when he wants appreciation so lamentably. Strauss, perhaps, is leading the orchestra through the delicious numbers of one of his own compositions, and every muscle in his body is waiting too in perfect time. The musical critic of the Machias Morning Jupiter observes to a less enlightened neighbor: "Splendid fiddler Strauss is. If he could only keep his body still. But he is really worse than Gilmore." The chorus has heard the signal to arise and is obeying it, by little patches of a thousand or so, here and there. The impression one gets is something like the undulations of the floor as it rises and falls to the eye of one who has just landed from a sea voyage. A popular conductor appears from below, as Venus appeared from the sea, and walks down toward the stand. Just twenty thousand masculine hands are clapped and just ten thousand feminine handkerchiefs are fluttered in the air. Somebody aptly compared the sight to a mammoth corn-popper in full operation. This is new and better than the snow-storm simile which has been used occasionally. While they are applauding we take the opportunity to pass from the auditorium into the chorus department. Some poor imprisoned maidens of the chorus, who long to get outside and hear how the singing sounds, stand disconsolately at the dividing barrier, like Peris at the gate of Paradise. But the guardian policemen are proof even against choral blandishments, and they are obliged to content themselves with what they can see and hear through the slats.

Within the gates there is a city. A city it is in its population, and the catacombs in appearance. All the great passages and promenades are teeming, swarming with life. The sight is unique and almost indescribable. It can only be touched upon here and there. Overhead men are doctoring the long, slender rods which connect the finger-board with the organ, just as nerves connect the brain with the vocal muscles. And there are almost as delicate as the nerves of the human body, requiring constant medical attendance. Beneath them is a steady stream of people. Washington street on Saturday afternoon, or Winter street at the height of shopping time, are not more thronged than is the broad avenue running across the north end of the Coliseum under the platform. Close at hand is the beer counter under Carl Knappe's genial management. Old King Gambrinus, green be his memory, would have been delighted to see the long line of jolly Germans who from morning to night serve out the amber fluid to thirty thousands. Bases and tenors flock thither between the choruses. It would be an interesting and profitable bit of statistical science to compute the exact number of barrels requisite for one performance of "The Heavens are Telling." Differences of nationality and lingual difficulties melt away before the magic sparkle of the Highland brew. It is, like the alkahol of the Rosicrucians, a universal solvent. And, premising from the frequency with which some of the orchestra invoke its blessing, it must in many cases leave them universally insolvent. The lead lemonade which attempts a competitive business over the way is wholly in the shade, and the proprietor wears a visage as sour as the drink he ostensibly vends. It is amusing to see the young man who wields a powerful bass in the service of the Rising-Sun Choral Society steer for the lemonade counter, catch the inspiration of the Teutonic nectar beyond, water a moment between fixed principles and genuine thirst, and fall as many have fallen before him. The refreshment counter offers every possible aid to indigestion at surprisingly moderate prices. But not there do the blooming country sopranos immerse themselves. They prefer to picnic on their own providently prepared luncheon, and may be seen in little knots at any hour of the day discussing home-made doughnuts and Johann Strauss's long black hair. The hero of their talk appears among them followed by his mysterious and sphinx-like valet. Strauss is immediately surrounded by an army of blonde-haired mädchen who besiege him for autographs on their fans. He complies, immensely delighted of course at the opportunity to improve his handwriting by extended practice. Strauss's fate is the fate of all the foreign musicians. From the greatest living soprano down to the bass-drum men in the bands, all are pestered and hunted by a swarm of autograph hunters, who sacrifice every feeling of courtesy and forbearance which they may chance to possess to the insane mania for acquiring mementos of the unfortunate strangers. Some have shrewdly provided themselves with blank books for autographic purposes, and some rely on the white-wood or pasteboard of their fans. If Herr Johann does not hereafter waltz away to the nearest shelter upon the mere sight of a fan, his American experience has fallen short of its natural effect. The stars, upon retiring from their temporary zenith and passing down the facilis descensus which leads from "The Heavens are Telling" to the subsequent beer beneath, are surrounded by an aggressive crowd who compliment the performance with polyglottal profusions and enter fresh applications for autographs. The members of the brass bands show commendable attention to duty. No sooner have they come down from their places than they station themselves, ready for recall, at the most convenient point in the neighborhood of the stairway. This, by the merest chance, is the beer-counter; and there these inflexible remain, true to their military faithfulness, and not to be lured away from the post by even the sweetest of Teutonic smiles or the most wanton of Gallic glances.

The chorus is so large and so complete a community in itself that it necessarily includes specimens of nearly every type of character. Some of its members display those peculiar qualities which would fit them admirably for city missionaries or Sunday school runners. The number of outside and unticketed individuals whom they manage to gather into the Coliseum and under the broad banner of peace reflects credit alike upon their charity and strategic abilities. By these kind offices the ticket-sellers are spared much unnecessary labor, and the financial managers are saved from the temptations which an overplus of profits would entail. Rumor says that the firemen have rendered the chorus marked assistance in swelling the numbers inside with those who would otherwise have staid outside. As the chorus sits in its glory up stairs one can approach it but with feelings akin to awe. In its forty thousand hands are the destinies of the Jubilee. Suppose the altos should strike, as the sturdy firemen in the Anvil Chorus have already done. Suppose the tenors should take offence, or the basses demand fewer hours' work and free lager. But the chorus, perhaps because it knows not its own strength, is quiet and tractable. Its marked characteristics are affection for the organ and modesty, nay, even self-depreciation, in speaking of its own merits. But without stopping to give praise where praise would be offensive to its shrinking nature, we will briefly consider the chorus in its seats. They all sing, or nearly all. A rural editor observed to his companion that it is remarkable that there should be so large a number of singers among them. One of the strangest developments of the Jubilee is the change of voice extensively brought about by a week's singing. At the outset the tenors and basses sat apart from the altos and sopranos; now many of the tenors find it necessary for harmony and musical accord that they should sound out their measures from the alto seats, and some of the basses have even wandered as far as the remotest soprano. Even with these important changes there seems to be the completest harmony and good feeling between aborigines and immigrants. Such are the triumphs of the peace angel! Some sing as if it were a blessed privilege, some as if it were a sad duty; some hardly open their lips, as if fearful of the inhabiteness of probable false teeth; some open their mouths till the yawning abyss almost makes one expect to hear the bark of Cerberus. Here a short but enthusiastic Boanerges from the forest primeval bends back to his work and roars forth a bass before which Jove's thunders are whispers; here an effeminate youth, with blonde whiskers, lips his high falsetto with as much confidence as if he had not been examined six times before he gained admission to the Handel and Haydn. Again, a mature Boston beauty, whom forty years of maidenly training have stripped of all useless flesh, gazes over her glasses at the page and warbles every note with scrupulous accuracy, and pronounces every word with cultured exactness. The girl on her right, rosier and more rounded than she, if we do say it, doesn't sing at all, but looks whole flocks of Offenbach's music at the tenor opposite, and yet he seems to enjoy it.

Down stairs all is in a whirl. The long, dark, delightful passages are crowded with rearing chorus-deserters, who insanely prefer to stroll and to flirt rather than to sing the stately and classic music of the oratorio. Representatives of the press dot the crowd and look and feel very much like "Israel in Egypt." One meets singers, notabilities, ladies, gentlemen, ladies, firemen, ladies, policemen and ladies until he can only breathe a silent benison because he means no harm. Round once more again with kind nods to friends, wistful glances at Gambrinus, mild curses at the stupid Teuton who ran his bassoon into your sense of sight, a last look at the catacombs, with all their incongruous life and animation, and you are back in the auditorium a little wiser perhaps, than when you started.

III. HOW IT SEEMS ON THE STAGE.

The great chorus—which has already been heard from in our columns—sends us the following communication touching its own sensations and its own estimates of itself. Not lacking in appreciation of the choral body ourselves, we think we may say that it is not afflicted with excessive modesty, if the record of our correspondent reflects its feeling. We do not deny, however, that it is a great moral and æsthetic support to the singer to be able to sing so as to please himself,—if not always to please his audience:—

This is the choir. Here, on a steep hillside are tenors by the thousand. Lapping over extended lines are the sopranos,—young, pretty, in lively spirits and cool dresses. No display,—comfort is the rule. Opposite a huge bank of faces,—the bass. Far down over the sea of violins is the conductor's stand. Yonder, the house. Description is useless. It is the Coliseum as seen from the stage. Every seat is filled, and a buzz of conversation thrills through the air. A certain sense of expectancy pervades the place, and eyes and glass turn everywhere in an inquisitive unrest. The banners flutter in the breeze, thousands of fans wave, and over the multitude sweeps the fresh east wind. Though warm it is not uncomfortable, and the choir is in its best mood,—placid, hopeful and ready for work. By and by it will catch fire and blaze with the white heat of enthusiasm and love of art.

And now the master comes. A ripple of pleasure breaks out among the altos. He walks down among them, and there is a sudden opening of red books. He mounts the stand; the twenty thousand rise; a chord on the organ, to give the pitch, and a queer, breathless sort of hush spreads over the hillside of heads.

With one precise, quiet expression comes the simple line in severe unison, spreading out into rich harmony at the end:—

"Thou forest broad and sweeping,
Fair work of nature's God,
Of all my joy and weeping
The consecrate abode."

Every part can be heard distinctly. Now the tenor breaks out in brilliant crescendo,

"You world deceiving ever,"

The soprano and bass follow after sweeping upward into the strange close harmony of the next line,

"Murmurs in vain alarms,"

The voices mingle in a grand, deep whisper—sweet and harmonious,—

"Oh! might I wander never,
From thy protecting arms."

A pause, and the bass fling over the wide valley their appealing notes,—

"Oh! might I wander never,"

The thousands of young men around, behind and above us join the sopranos in the graceful, intermingling strains. An abrupt pause, while from the alto comes, as it were one voice, on a single sustained note—how strange and almost pathetic in its peculiar quality,—

"From thy protecting arms."

The parts mingle and fade away into silence. Three times the master's hand leads us through the harmonious maze and then we sit down. A majority of the vast audience receive our work passively as if not quite sure of itself. At once a murmur of talk spreads over the choir. Questions fly in every direction. "How was it?" "Oh! good—excellent!" "Did you hear the bass?" "First-rate alto—grand tone." "Went very smooth; had no org—" "Yes." "Quiet house, is it not?" "Yes; who cares?" "We sang that for our own gratification." "Say, neighbor, aren't you glad you came?" "Sounds much better than in the house."

This last remark is eminently correct. The choral music and, in fact, all the music sounds much better on some parts of the stage than in the house. Our seat among the tenors gives us a good view of the whole building, and enables us to hear everything distinctly. Another number on the programme follows, but we will not stop to notice it. Our object is to show the spirit that animates the choir, to give its impression when in its best mood, and to describe, as best we may, the sensation of actually being in the work. We cull out peculiar moments of the week's work when the fates combine for the best results. We have spoken of the choir when it was petulant, nervous and unhappy. Now we record its happy moments and its triumphs.

Gigantic figures on the conductor's stand give the page. Books are opened, fans and hats tucked away, and a sort of flash and sparkle spreads over the countless faces. It is not the expectation of showing our skill; no, it is rather inspired, we believe, by the real love of art, and if by reason of the building the people down below do not hear the music, you may be sure we do. The electric shout of the soprano, the delicious alto, the thunder of the bass and the tremendous peal of the tenor are real things to us. The rush and sweep of the mighty chorus appeals to us, and to be very, very frank, we positively enjoy the chorus music. Conceited! Well, yes, if you like the word. Say, rather, happy in art, that takes us out of ourselves, and is higher than we.

A chord on the organ! Who's at the key-board? People look round nervously. It's a vital question with us. No time for—Look out, there! The white baton sweeps us all up, and the music bursts out like flame.

"The Heavens are telling the glory of God."

A trifle unsteady, the interlude gives us confidence. No time for looking about. Half an eye on the book and an eye and a half on Zerrahn,—

"The wonders of his work
Displays the firmament."

Short and crisp the chords succeed each other. In singing the orchestra is unheard. In the interludes it breaks out like a flash of light. The group of artists at the front of the stage take up the solo:—

"The day that is coming
Speaks to the day,
The night that is gone
To following night."

Steady there, gentlemen. A look and a sign from our master, and the men about us burst out with fiery energy:—

"The Heavens are telling."

The sopranos blaze out with the repeated theme, and far away we hear the bass bringing up their heavy guns. Once more the solo artists wind through the lovely theme—

"In all these lands resounds the word."

An involved and beautiful bit of writing, and with a deafening crash the tenors about us shout the splendid theme. The time quickens. Swiftest allegro now leads the way. The pulse quickens in spite of one. Somehow the excitement and rush takes one out of himself. Sing—and sing you must. A short interlude, and over the valley comes the trumpet call of the bass:—

"The wonders of his work."

Look at Mr. Zerrahn, gentlemen! His face is turned to us. The perspiration may start out on your face, but sing you must. In a sort of rage the young men fling out the aspiring strain:—

"The wonders of his work
Displays the firmament."

It ends with a curious snap, and we hear the soprano and alto bearing aloft the brilliant theme. The bass climb up from the depths. The baton sweeps us after, and the choir is lost in one tremendous river of sound. Safe and sure, though full of whirlpools and rapids. Secure in itself, as may be seen at the end of the phrase, where every voice stops short at the exact instant. An interlude and the great mountainous climax comes. No time for comment now. Sink the world for once. The tenors have the melody and announce it with fiery zeal. The parts seem to storm and roar about us. The soprano climb to dizzy heights. The bass break out in tremendous peal on peal, as their glorious part steps upward in chromatic thunder. We fling out flashes of high tenor regard. Jealous of anything save the Master's hand. It is impossible to tell where we are. Keep on and trust your leader. The organ roars, and in the splendid din and rush the orchestra labors on all unheard. In one tremendous crash we reach the end, and march in solid phalanx through the last chords—united, safe and in perfect time. The last energetic chords close with a hearty ring. Mr. Zerrahn's fine face is lighted up with a gratified smile, and we sit down rewarded.

Joachim's Hungarian Concerto.

[From the London Observer.]

Among the pieces written by great violinists for their own instrument with a view to public performances there is but one which can with any degree of justice be mentioned together with Herr Joachim's master-piece, and this is Spohr's "Gesangs-scene," a concerto in the form of a scena cantata. Not that the two works are in any sense similar either in conception or execution, but they are both widely removed from the ordinary standard in shape and style, both essentially pieces of beautiful and original music, and only in a secondary sense a scaffolding for the display of virtuosic cleverness. To gratify our individual tastes we would go further to hear this Hungarian concerto adequately played, which probably means to hear Herr Joachim himself play it, than anything else in the whole range of violin literature, with the sole exception of Beethoven's supremely beautiful concerto in D major, and, perhaps, of the wonderfully bright and polished one by Mendelssohn. Herr Joachim, in this symphony with violin obligato—for such it virtually is rather than a concerto—makes use of the singularly characteristic rhythms and peculiar melodious phrases of Hungarian people's songs and dances, such as Chopin, in his polonaises and mazurkas, uses those of Poland—that is to say, he has not transplanted them directly into his work, but has conceived and executed it entirely in their spirit. The tunes of Hungary, and more especially the manner in which the wandering gipsy violinists—who have been for centuries the national Hungarian musicians—play and embellish these tunes, have been to him the types after which he has fashioned the style of his work. The influence of people's tunes on nearly all modern composers is far greater than is generally supposed. Beethoven's works, and even some of his greatest, are not unfrequently imbued with a spirit of, and now and then contain distinct quotations from, German, Russian, and Hungarian folk songs. Thus, for instance, the themes of the last movement of his wonderful Seventh Symphony in A is a Hungarian peasant's dance, and it would be easy to enumerate a score of similar instances.

The Jubilee—A Retrospect.

(From the Daily Advertiser.)

I.

The great musical festival is now a thing of the past; the dusty cloud of excitement which enveloped it during its progress has had time to clear away; and our local readers have been permitted to draw a quiet breath of relief at the prospect of returning to the even tenor of their ordinary life. We have now reached the proper moment for taking a tranquil backward glance over the three weeks of the Jubilee and for making up the record of its successes and its failures. It will doubtless be possible at the present moment to undertake this without provoking the angry snarls of the few who, from motives of personal or pecuniary interest or from mere ungoverned enthusiasm, constituted themselves a kind of "committee of public safety" on the jubilee, and attempted to browbeat every soul who did not join unreservedly in their indiscriminate shouts and hurrahs. The success of the affair, from a business point of view, has been definitely settled by this time, and, therefore, the voice of rational criticism will be allowed a hearing without an imputation of unpatriotic or ungenerous motives.

In what we have to say we shall confine ourselves exclusively to the æsthetic and artistic aspects of the festival. With its personal gossip and its scandal we shall have nothing to do—either at this or at any other time. It is inevitable that every such great enterprise should be made, to a certain extent, an instrument for accomplishing the selfish ends of a few intriguing men; and in the case of the Boston Jubilee it is a subject for congratulation that the motives of nearly all the principal officials were unquestionably pure and good. With the others, as we have said, we shall not concern ourselves. But, looking merely at the musical results of the festival, we find that a moment's reflection simplifies the whole subject amazingly. Our readers will acquit us of the fault of frequent boasting about the success of our prophecies in time past; and we think we may be pardoned the expression of a little satisfaction that the predictions we made on the 31st of May have been fulfilled almost to the letter,—in the opinion of the great majority of competent judges. In the article referred to, we ventured to prophecy that Mme. Rudersdorff would fail; that the pianoforte playing—in spite of the great presumable skill of Mme. Arabella Goddard and Herr Franz Bendel—would be ridiculously insignificant; and that the foreign bands would probably play finely and heighten the sentimental and musical interest of the occasion by their presence. Very few will now contradict the soundness of these views. Mme. Rudersdorff barely succeeded in making herself audible in the remote portions of the Coliseum,—and she was so completely overmastered by the size of the building as to be incapable of singing either with taste or expression; the performances upon the piano were simply absurd; and the efforts of the French, English and German bands were, with those of Mme. Peschka-Loutner, the most attractive and successful features of the festival concerts. In the noble German soprano we made the acquaintance of a singer of immense power and compass and purity of voice,—endowed, moreover, with every grace and gift which belong to the most consummate vocalism, as well as with the greatest freedom and breadth of style. Of the greatness of the artist's power of expression—the crucial test by which the rank of every singer is finally determined—we can, on the other hand, only say that it appears to be eminent; but it would be absolutely necessary to hear her in a smaller hall before she could be fairly ranked among such of her compeers as Nilsson and Parepa-Rosa. The foreign organizations—with the exception of the Irish, which was at best but ordinary—were not only sources of great pleasure to the listeners, but were absolute revelations to the American mind of the possibilities of military bands. Each by turns, as each was heard, seemed the best of the three; and finally the best judges were forced to expatiate upon the English as first in sweetness, smoothness and elasticity of tone; upon the German as surpassing in vigor, power and earnestness; and upon the French as leading in delicacy, finish and taste.

Upon all these points there can be but one opinion. In considering the choral work of the occasion we tread upon more delicate and difficult ground; and the consideration of this subject, and of other points which require notice, we shall defer to a second article.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 18, 1872.

The Second Gilmore Jubilee.

I.

The great, usurping, tyrannizing, noisy and pretentious thing is over, and there is a general feeling of relief, as if a heavy, brooding nightmare had been lifted from us all. Verily the Gilmore dog-star has raged, as we anticipated, through a "heated term" of three long, weary, crowded, confused mid-summer weeks, during which one saw nothing, heard nothing, read nothing, ate and drank and breathed nothing but jubilee, jubilee, and everybody suffered from an oppressive sense of over-much-ness in the very atmosphere, while all newspaperdom kept up such a multitudinous ringing chorus in praise of our dear old Athens, that no one would be surprised to hear her name pronounced hereafter, Boast-Town. God forbid! A little modest dignity and self-possession, neighbors, a little less of childish sensitiveness to New York criticism and whether playful or malicious satire, a little less ambition for the display of enterprise on an unprecedented scale, will win the world's respect in the long run more surely than a thousand "jubilees."

We wish to do all justice to this strange and mammoth enterprise; we would estimate it at its true worth, if possible, and show in what sense and in what degree it has or has not been successful; for nothing is distinctly said in that cheap, vague, convenient catchword of the newspapers: the Jubilee is "a success," Gilmore is "a success," &c. But at the outset a puzzling difficulty presents itself in the strangely ambiguous aspect of the whole thing. If it had only been more uniform or more consistent in its professions of its own intention! What did the Jubilee purport to be? One thing to-day, another thing to-morrow; all things, apparently, to all men. If you measured it by its high-art pretensions, the jubilee advocate would answer: "O, you must not judge it from an artistic standpoint; it is not for artists and for refined tastes, it is for the People, a people's holiday affair, &c., a magnified, protracted, glorified Fourth of July enthusiasm." But turning to the official advertisement, you found it proclaimed as the greatest musical event in all history, &c., &c. Or you were very often told: "You must not take it for a musical festival as such; it is a Peace Jubilee, with music for the jubilating medium." O, very well! But is it a Peace Jubilee? Did anybody call for a peace celebration, except the ambitious "Projector"? And did he care whether it were peace or something else, provided he could only have a jubilee bright and big enough to project his own shadow, (as he stood "conducting" (!) in its fore-front), far and wide across the world? We have not yet met the first person, even among the most ardent jubilants, who ventured to insist upon it that Peace really entered as a motive into the design; and it is very certain that the nation was not moving, of its own spontaneous impulse, in a peace jubilee direction; if it had been, it would have set about the work in quite a different manner, through very different agents, not selecting the leader of a common street band for grand high commissioner, and not concentrating the whole festivity upon one spot, under one mammoth roof, but letting every town and city celebrate and jubilate at its own centre in its own way.—Another ambiguity: Was it Gilmore's Jubilee? or Boston's, or the Nation's, or the World's? In the first sentence of this article we called it a usurping thing; by which we meant, that, being really a private enterprise, its skilful undertakers had contrived to usurp the name and official countenance of the City of Boston for it; municipal officers lent themselves to the work as if the people had elected them for that; the city police force, the committee, the military to some extent, were put at the service of the Jubilee; the public treasury bled freely; even the boys of the Latin and High schools were called out under arms to do escort duty in Gilmore's first triumphal progress through the streets on the arrival of one of his foreign Bands. For all which will not strict account be held some day or other, and the question "by what right" come up? Of Presidential and other extra-official endorsements, or certificates, we will not speak.

For the people, was it? And yet the people were to pay fifty dollars for a season ticket, five dollars for a single concert, when better music, more enjoyably, can be heard in common music halls, nearly all the year round, in any of our large cities, certainly in Boston, for a dollar! And speaking of the People—the dear People, we must note another ambiguity: In one sentence we are told that this great musical peace festival is a national, a public concern, and in another the said public receives most pointed warning that "by special contract with the Executive Committee, none of the foreign Bands or distinguished Artists engaged for the Jubilee will perform at any other place in this country than the Coliseum, Boston!" It is all done in the public interest, for the public good, and yet the attractions are boxed up with all that jealous exclusiveness with which opera managers guard their song birds. Through every newspaper for months this worthy Public has been exhorted and dragged into the duty of supporting the Jubilee as a great means of public education; but not one drop of that rich education, not one note of the luscious music lent us from abroad in international exchange and reciprocity of peaceful and fraternal feeling, must leak out from that "sacred shed" to comfort one not armed with the open sesame of a five dollar bill! We do not charge the inconsistency to any wrong or selfish motive; we willingly allow that it was simply acting from the dictates of financial prudence, bound to make both ends meet if possible in an expensive enterprise involving great risk. We only mention it to point out one inherent fallacy in the whole scheme. Had it been really the Nation's festival, it would have been managed in the Nation's way, in some way free to all the people,—and of course therefore not all in one Coliseum or one city. The Greek Olympic games were free to all. Some day, perhaps, the American nation, the American people, will organize a universal, true Peace Jubilee: but monster choruses, and monster auditoriums will not be necessary to it, and will have gone the way of all the other antediluvian monster things. Perhaps it was just our Gilmore's mission to set the vain imagination of such things at rest, and put them through their transitory period once for all.

But we have not yet done with the ambiguities. If to some the Jubilee project wore the face of Music, to others that of Peace or Patriotism, it had still another face for the more numerous and more enterprising class on whom it most relied for solid guaranty and vigorous organizing, advertising energy. It flattered the business pride of our ambitious city in this period of remarkable material expansion. It was to be a great advertisement of Boston, a signal demonstration to the world of Boston business enterprise and means, of Boston organization and good order. It was to crowd hotels and railroad cars, and all our streets for weeks, so that business might increase, and the newspapers have a topic whereon to expatiate without stint, and plain business men of enterprise might rise into importance in what seemed to be a patriotic work of culture, and the name of Boston be no more provincial—hard to find upon the globe. This was the point of view in which it was most vigorously pushed; this the argument most used in the appeal for guaranty subscriptions; and to the class most eagerly alive to this incentive, most filled with this sort of ambition and esprit de-corps, was the chief executive control of the whole thing entrusted; for it is well known that the chief managers, including the prime mover himself, were not men much distinguished for musical taste or culture, (though the latter was a band master and player of the cornet), and some of the others held a higher position among the dealers in musical merchandize. In short, it was not from the historical, refined, quiet Boston that this thing sprang, but rather from the bustling young business Boston, the new Boston, in its pride of mercantile expansion, glorying in "annexation" and "improvements," levelling old landmarks, banishing churches and fine dwellings to the Back Bay, and—rivaling New York! In this sense was the Jubilee crusade preached, and in an almost overriding spirit. All the newspapers were in for it with one voice, writing it up in endless columns without stint, magnifying every insignificant or even ridiculous detail of the plan, and suffering not one hint of doubt or criticism to find expression publicly, although in almost every cultivated circle the project was discussed with little sympathy. In short, the Press being the great medium of advertising, and advertising being the main lever and machine of modern trade, the Press instinctively put all its shoulders to the wheel, and virtually became as much a part of the Peace Jubilee as Gilmore and his Band. The man has always had a knack of managing the Press; he is a rare virtuoso on the paper trumpet, whatever he may be with the brass. Now against a Press so pledged and thoroughly united, and against such appeals to the business esprit de-corps, resistance, even refusal to subscribe, requires more heroism than most men possess; and hence we characterized the scheme, at the beginning of these remarks, as "tyrannizing."

Enough of the ambiguous aspects of the "World's Peace Jubilee." Whatever else it was, it was a thing of most magnificent pretensions. Recall the first official trumpet blast; read that "Prospectus" which the Projector circulated through the length and breadth of all the land, likewise in Europe, to impress the general imagination and to "fire the people's heart." What startling promises! A chorus of 20,000 voices, an orchestra of 2,000 instruments, military bands from "every nation," delegations even "from classic Greece and the Holy Land, from Turkey, China, and Japan," &c., &c., unprecedented glory for "God save the Queen," a Coliseum that "will seat a Hundred Thousand People!" And then, when it came to shaping programmes, "the greatest series of concerts ever given in the world," the "greatest chorus ever organized, in Oratorio selections every day;" the "orchestra of 1000 skilled musicians in classical and popular Overtures, Symphonies, &c., each day;" the "Bouquet of Artists;" "Anvil chorus" with 100 anvils, cannons, all the city bells, each day; marvellous pianists on a colossal, marvellous pianoforte, the "greatest living Soprano," other great Sopranos, "the great Strauss" (who sets the waltzes whirling), the "great composer Abt" (hero of German sentimental part-song clubs),—all this array of talent to "interpret the noblest compositions ever written" to the largest crowd that ever listened! Of course it excited a vast deal of innocent enthusiasm, and of strange, half feverish expectation. Among the chorus singers in hundreds of towns, remembering the pleasure of the Jubilee of '69, the challenge was accepted in good earnest. They would learn something from it and go home with their minds enriched, their souls enlarged by it. The busy weeks of rehearsal, much of the time on good music, would be all clear gain, even should the performance on the Coliseum platform prove a failure. But to many thoughtful persons, who still kept their heads, although they read their Advertiser and their Transcript every day, the whole thing looked too much as if a knot of smallest poetasters and dime novel writers were to invite the master intellects and poets of the world to join them, in a temple of their planning, in a great Unitary Festival of Poetry and World's Literary Congress; or as if George Francis Train and Count Johannes were to summon all the statesmen of the earth to sit with them in council to revise the whole code of international law; or as if some aspiring scene painter, some P. S. G. of the pictorial craft, should get ten thousand of his brother brushes to engage with him in painting a canvas as large as Boston Common and the Public Garden, and summon mankind to a pictorial Jubilee, an exhibition of the greatest work of Art that ever was attempted in the world.

Music to many is so ethereal, subtle and mysterious a thing, so much of the miraculous is mingled in their imagination of its magic potency, that they fail to see the intrinsic absurdity of a monster scheme in music, when any suggestion of the like in any other art or sphere would strike them as ridiculous at once. Many who thought the chorus and the building of the former jubilee too large for proper musical effect, but who nevertheless were agreeably astonished that so much of the music went so well, had fondly trusted that the true lesson had been learned from that experience, and that nothing would again be undertaken on so large a scale; how much better to let well enough alone! but here was the audacious proposition (heedless of the old warning about "vaulting ambition that o'erleaps itself") of an affair twice as big, backed by a determined and well organized conspiracy to put it through at any risk.

Of course there was only one way in which it could be put through. Practical men, we give them that credit, were at the head of it, and soon saw the necessity of reducing the whole programme within practicable limits. Taking the old Coliseum for a standard, they began to build one just a little larger; it is said that the whole difference was fifty feet in length and fifty feet in width. As the idea took outward form and substance, an enormous shrinkage silently went on. The huge figures were still used for advertisement, sent off as echoes into California and Illinois and Germany and England, to re-echo here at home, and multiply the myriad tongues of rumor, while a more moderate scale (nevertheless too large in our view) controlled the realization. The auditorium, instead of 100,000, had 21,000 seats! Supposing that 9,000 persons could have stood in aisles and corridors, there may have been 30,000 people in the audience on the most crowded day, whether it were the President's day or that of Gilmore's benefit. The chorus at the utmost numbered 19,000, shrinking to half that after the first week, and really finding its vocation almost gone (except for Psalmody and hacknied repetition of "Star-Spangled Banner" and the like), so popular had the music of the three admirable foreign Bands become in comparison with the imperfectly produced or imperfectly heard effects of the grand chorus in compositions of a more artistic and elaborate structure.

The Grand Orchestra (one of the better features this time, and far better than the last) could hardly have exceeded 800 instruments the first week, and was very much reduced during the last half of the time, while the countless Brass Bands that were to have made it up to two thousand, were nowhere visible, nor were they missed; having the fine foreign bands, the instrumental legion was more serviceable without them. The Bands "from every nation" were just three, capital ones all, from England, France and Prussia. Of soloists, distinguished representative composers, &c., when we come to speak in detail of the execution of the music. The Monster Drum, on which much ink and gush were wasted, did duty in procession through the streets as drummer-in, but after the first trial it was soon drummed out and hung up as a trophy as far off from the stage as possible. Great also was the shrinkage in the proportion of "noblest compositions ever written" in the programmes as performed. The "Classical Overtures," except by Bands, which at the best are substitutes for and imitations of an Orchestra, could be counted on five fingers, while under the head of "Symphonies," or parts of symphonies, there figured not one solitary representative. The reason of this was very obvious; the classical numbers, at first set forth with so much parade in the general prospectus programmes, were mainly for the purpose of conciliating the classical element in the community and giving the whole thing a respectable appearance at home and abroad; but really such music was so little in accordance with the ruling spirit of the Jubilee, that whatever was classical, even the carefully prepared and admirably performed

Oratorio of "Israel in Egypt," necessarily appeared to disadvantage, so that after a few trials the very genius of the place, of the occasion, all things in fact, conspired to crowd it out. This "greatest musical festival of all the ages," in short, was one which in its very nature could offer only a left-handed hospitality to the best kinds of music, though in its own way it furnished so much that was enjoyable, instructive and at times inspiring.

We have occupied far more space than we intended in this preliminary examination of the project in itself, of its professions, and of the way in which it was worked up. We have surveyed the Jubilee from the outside. We have now to go inside, and report somewhat of the interesting scenes and experiences to be found there, see what it realized in music, and try to estimate its musical, social and educational results. This will require another article.

MADAME RUDERSDORFF has been making arrangements to return to this country in the autumn with a choice concert troupe. Among them will be Fräulein THERESA LIEBE, a young violinist, who has made the impression of an artist of rare promise in Paris and in London, and Miss ALICE FAIRMAN, a young English Contralto of fine voice and style. Other attractions will soon be made known. Mme. Rudersdorff is so complete an artist and musician, and commands so rich a repertoire of the best music, much of which has hardly at all been heard here, that her concerts must be of the greatest interest to the real music lovers. She will doubtless bestow a good share of her time on Boston.

Mr. OTTO DRESEL, after an absence of nearly four years abroad, arrived home with his family in the beginning of the week. No musical character in Boston could have been more seriously missed during these four years.

Mr. MYRON W. WHITNEY, our grand Basso, also has arrived.

A correspondent of the Springfield Republican has been "interviewing" the heroic leader of the Prussian Band, and writes:

I was much interested in the history given us yesterday from Herr Saro,—every inch a soldier and the "best band-master in Europe,"—concerning his numerous orders. The first is the iron cross, on a white and black ribbon, and given only for bravery in the field. This he wears for the whole band, which distinguished itself. This reward for bravery was originated by William the Third, in 1813, and after the French war was restored. The second medal is the military mark of honor for 25 years' service in the army. The third was bestowed in the late war with France, 1870-1. Every one of the band wears this medal. The fourth is in remembrance of the campaign against Austria in 1866; several of the band wear it. Fifth is the Hohenzollern medal, given in the campaign against Denmark, 1848. The sixth is the Austrian bravery medal, bestowed in 1863 at the reunion celebrating the fiftieth birthday of the Kaiser Franz Regiment; the Emperor of Austria personally bestowing it. The seventh is the French military medal, ranking second to the legion of honor, which holds the highest place of merit; Napoleon Third gave it in person in 1867 as first prize for the best music at the national exhibition. Herr Saro wears also a gold buckle, given him for 20 years' active service; only one other in his band wears it. Herr Saro is very enthusiastic over the jubilee, saying that it would be impossible to get it up anywhere else and that its grandeur and immensity are like everything else in America. He observes that we have no social life in America, that the department of music is carried on like a business, and not as an art. This was his first impression about the jubilee—it was a business undertaking almost wholly, and this idea has not been dispelled. He refers gratefully to the kindness and generosity bestowed on all sides, saying "Das Land und Volk gefiel mir wohl,"—the land and the people please me much. He bears the title of "Royal Musical Director."

DUESSELDORF. Of the 49th Lower-Rhine Festival the Neue Zeitschrift says:

The newly ornamented hall was furnished with 600 seats in the gallery and 1309 in the parquet. The broad, horizontal podium, or stage, had the usual imposing appearance: two Directors, five soloists, about 673 singers, and 132 instrumentalists, under the conductorship of Anton Rubinstein and Julius Tausch. The quartet of solo vocalists consisted of Mme. Parepa-Rosa, an imposing appearance, whose name had been used as a sort of signboard of the whole Festival, and of Herren Franz Diener, Gura and Robicek. The organ was in the hands of Herr Knappe of Solingen; the harpist was Herr Hankel of Dessau; Jean Becker and Bargheer led the 47 violins. There was no very distinguished list of soloists, but the orchestra as a whole was equal to its high task. Rightly recognizing that the centre of gravity as to artistic means in the Rhenish musical festivals lies in the chorus, they had put upon the programme of the three days six great choral works: Bach's Cantata: "Ich hatte viel Bekümmernisse" (in Robert Franz's arrangement), Handel's Ode to St. Cecilia, "Miriam's Song of Victory," by Schabert (finely instrumented by Fr. Lachner), Rubinstein's "The Tower of Babel," the finale from Mendelssohn's "Lorely," and again the final "Amen" chorus from the Bach Cantata.

The first concert offered the two first named vocal pieces. The chorus in the beginning was a little indolent and lifeless in the giving out of its tones, which made a much more unpleasant effect with a mass of 6 or 700 singers than with a smaller choir. But soon the lifelessness disappeared and gave place to an enthusiasm which, particularly in the closing chorus of the Bach Cantata: "Worthy is the Lamb," &c., and in Handel's Ode, produced beautiful results. As a chorus director Rubinstein did not show himself to be quite in his own place, but his conducting of the F-major Symphony of Beethoven was truly inspiring. Indeed such an interpretation of the Beethoven genius may seek far for its equal, and only a congenial nature can so bring us nearer to the great tone poet.

About the soloists we did not find ourselves so enthusiastic as we had expected. Mme. Parepa-Rosa, to be sure, announced with so much pomp, is altogether a good singer and, what most delighted us in her universal activity in art, also endowed with genuine musical conception. Yet she did not succeed in warming us.

CASSEL. This whilome electoral capital will shortly be full of life and bustle. The General Musical Association of Germany will hold its annual gathering here from the 26th June to the 1st July. There will be four grand concerts of instrumental, vocal, and chamber music, and one grand concert of sacred music. Thanks to the liberality of the Emperor, not only is the Theatre Royal, together with every one connected with it, placed at the disposal of the Association, but a large sum of money has been presented to the latter. The local artists, moreover, will be reinforced by considerable contingents from the Court-orchestras of Sonderhausen, Weimar, Meiningen, Brunswick, and other celebrated musical bodies. The chorus will consist of the various local associations, strengthened by the Minden Choral Union, with contingents from Erfurt and Weimar. At the sacred concert one of the three renowned Thuringian church-choirs, namely, that under the direction of Professor Müller-Hartung, will lend its valuable aid. Among the soloists will probably be, for the violin, Herr Wilhelmj, from Cassel; Herr Jacobson, from Bremen; Herr Winnlinger of this place, and others; for the piano Mdle. Sophie Menter from Manich; and Mdme. Urspruch, from Frankfurt; for the violoncello, Herr Krumbholz, from Stuttgart; Herr Lorleberg, from Cassel; and Herr Grütsmacher, from Meiningen; for the organ, Herr Rundnagel, Court-Organist of this place; and Herr Voigtmann, of Sangerhausen. Among the female vocalists will be Mdle. Marie Lehmann, of Hamburg, who lately produced so great a sensation at the Bayreuth Festival; Mdme. Merian, of Weimar; Mdme. Müller-Berghaus; and Mdme. Hempel-Christinus. In addition to the composers who will conduct their own works, the following gentlemen will wield the baton; the three Capellmeisters, Reiss, Lassen, and Erdmannsdörfer; Professor Müller-Hartung; and Herr Hempel, Musikdirector. Among the older compositions included in the programme will be "Die sieben Worte des Erlösers," Heinrich Schütz; "Ach, wie flüchtig," Sebastian Bach; and a Violin Concerto, Spohr. The more modern school will be represented by Liszt's Heilige Elisabeth, and A major Concerto; Volkmann's overture to Richard III; a Violin Concerto, and "Wald-Symphonie," by Raff; the Quintet in F minor, by Herr Brahms; the "Nibelungenmusik," by Herr Lassen; "Prinzessin Hlea," Herr Erdmannsdörfer; "Das Geisterschiff," Herr Michalowich; "Sigurd Slembe," Herr Svendsen; "Huldigungsmarch," Herr R. Wagner, etc., etc., besides a large selection of songs by living composers. A committee has been formed, with the Chief Burgomaster as chairman, for the purpose of providing all the members of the Association with board and lodgings free of cost, and also of making the other necessary arrangements for properly entertaining the visitors.

MILAN. Tannhäuser and Lohengrin are to be brought out next spring at the Scala. Herr R. Wagner has been requested to superintend the production, and, also, to select the company to sing them. He acceded to both requests, and entered into negotiations with several artists. He has already engaged Mdlle. Marie Lehmann, who sang at the Bayreuth Festival. In a letter to this young lady, he announced his intention of engaging a company of his own, and, after thoroughly drilling them himself, of going about with them and showing the world how his operas ought really to be sung.

JULIUS RÖNTGEN. Professor Oakeley, in his interesting notice of the Düsseldorf Festival in the Guardian, says:—It may be within the recollection of musical readers that in a notice of the last meeting here, three years ago, allusion was made to a youth of fourteen of extraordinary promise, who had come from Leipzig with his father, Herr Röntgen, leader, with Japha, of the first violins at that festival. The talented son, Julius Engelbert Röntgen, again here on a visit, gave, as in 1869, a matinée musicale, on the Wednesday of the festival week, which, though private, was attended by some 200 persons, chiefly musicians, glad of an opportunity of judging of the powers of this rising genius. There seems every reason for hoping that the promise evinced in childhood will be carried out, and that, as Joachim and other illustrious musicians have foretold, this engaging and gifted youth may become one of Germany's great sons of Art. At his matinée young Röntgen—who has already composed two overtures and a symphony—introduced the following of his chamber music:—

Prelude and Fugue in C minor, on the theme "B. A. C. H."

Sonata in B flat, for pianoforte and violoncello.
Sonata in B minor, for pianoforte and violin.

In the first sonata the composer was ably assisted by Herr G. Bartel, of Sondershausen, now resident at Düsseldorf, who played the difficult violoncello part, almost at sight, like a thorough artist. The violinist was Herr von Beckerath, whose services were also valuable. The occasion of surpassing interest, and should Julius Röntgen become, as is not improbable, a great master, this matinée, as well as that of 1869, will be treasured in memory by those present at them. The look of inspiration—of heaven-born genius in the bright young face, and his apparent unconsciousness of the presence of a large audience of musicians, as the young composer, wholly wrapped up in his divine art, sat at the pianoforte, with the two conductors of the festival, Rubinstein and Taubert, on either side of him, could hardly be forgotten by any one amongst the listeners who hove down before musical talent as one of the highest, most rare and precious, most mysterious of the good and perfect gifts from above.

GEWANDHAUS CONCERTS AT LEIPZIG. The programme of the twenty concerts and the two benefits of the past season are thus summed up in the Signale:—

Symphonies. Beethoven, No. 2, 3, 4, 5, 8, 9; Mozart, in E flat and G minor; Schumann, Nos. 3 and 4. Gade, Nos. 4 and 8 (new); Mendelssohn, Scotch; Haydn, in E flat; Abert, One; Judasohn, No. 1. Schubert, Unfinished Symphony in B minor, Andante from the Tragic Symphony.

Overtures. Mendelssohn: "Midsummer Night's Dream," "Ruy Blas," "Melusina"; Beethoven: Coriolan, Leonore Nos. 2 and 3; Cherubini: Anacreon, Les Abencerrages; Weber: Jubilee Overture, Freyschutz; Mozart: "Zauberflöte," "Figaro," Mohr, Joseph; Rietz, in A minor; Auber, Masaniello; Reinecke, King Manfred; Volkmann, Richard III.; Bargiel, Medea; Gade, Ossian; Dietrich, Die Normannenfahrt.

Other Orchestral Pieces. Joachim, 2 Marches; J. S. Bach, Suite in D; Franz Lachner, Suite No. 6; Goldmark, Scherzo; Rubinstein, Don Quixote.

Violin Concertos, &c. Spohr, Nos. 7 and 9; Mozart, —; Mendelssohn, —; David, No. 5; Schubert, Rondo brilliant, Op. 70, arranged by David.

Piano Concertos, &c. Beethoven, No. 3 (in C minor), No. 4 (G), and Choral Fantasia; Schumann, in A minor, Concertstück in C; Reinecke, —; Grieg, —; Lisloff, Concerto Symphonique, No. 3; Chopin, in F minor; Mendelssohn, Rondo brilliant in E flat.

Concertos for Violoncello. Haydn, —; Goltermann, No. 3; Lindner, —.

Concertos for several instruments. Mozart, for two pianofortes; Handel, for obligato violins, obligato violoncello and string orchestra.

Smaller Solo pieces with and without accompaniment.

(1) For Pianoforte.
Schumann, Andante in F (transcription). In der Nacht (from Fantasiestücken Op. 12), No. 4 of Nachtstücken, Op. 22, Scherzino from the Fräulein-schwank; Chopin, Notturmo in D flat (twice); Scherzo, in B minor; Ballade, in G minor; Leschetizki, L'Aven (Romanza), Mazurka; J. S. Bach, Prelude and Fugue in A minor (translated by Liszt), Prelude and Fugue in E flat minor (from the Well-tempered Clavier); Mozart, Fantasia and Fugue in C minor; Tausig, Hungarian Gypsy dances; Gluck, Gavotte (transcribed by Brahms); Schubert, Impromptu in F minor (Op. 142).

(2) For Violin.
Rietz, Arioso; Leclair, Sarabande and Tambourin; Vitali, Chaconne, (with piano accompaniment by David); Auer, Reverie; Paganini, Caprice.

(3) For Violoncello.
Lubeck, Serenade; Vieuxtemps, Reverie; Piatti, Tarantella.

(4) For Harp.
Parish-Alvars, Fantasia on Italian motives; Aptommas, Fantasia on Welsh melodies.

Choruses and Ensemble pieces. Fr. Lachner, Requiem (twice); Schumann: Manfred, Faust music (3rd part); Gade, Comala; Handel, L'Allegro, il Penseroso ed il Moderato; Mendelssohn, Loreley; Mozart, Ave Verum, Sextet from Don Juan; Dietrich, Morning Hymn; Max Bruch, Frithjof at his father's tomb.

Arias with Orchestra. Mozart, One from Figaro, Scena and Rondo with piano obligato, One from Titus, Concert Aria (Alcandro, lo confesso); Beethoven, from Fidelio and Ah perfido; Spohr, two from Faust; Rossini, from Semiramide and Il Barbiere; Weber, from Euryanthe; Holstein, from the Haidesnacht; Mehul, from Joseph; Rossi, from Mitrame; Marschner, from Hans Heiling; Boieldieu, from John of Paris; Bach, from the White-side Cantata.

Songs with Piano. Schubert, ten; Schumann, five; Mendelssohn, three; Mozart, two; Weber, one; Wagner, one; Lassen, one; Brahms, one; Reinecke, one; J. S. Bach, one; Loewe, one; Robert Franz, one.

Of the works above named, fourteen were heard in Leipzig for the first time.

The Operas given in the Leipzig Stadttheater during the month of March were:—Wagner's Meistersinger and Fliegender Holländer; Fidelio; Freyschutz; Boieldieu's Dame Blanche; Auber's Le Maçon, and Fra Diavolo; William Tell; and Fr. Lachner's Catharina Cornaro, composed thirty years ago.

DER FREISCHÜTZ was recently revived at Covent Garden with Mme. Lucca and M. Faure in the principal parts. The London Times says of the performance:—

The revival of "Der Freischütz" was interesting for two reasons. First, M. Faure, who was never heard in the part before, played Caspar. We may say at once that a more intelligent and dramatically forcible portrayal of the character has not been witnessed since M. Formes was in his prime. But M. Faure does everything well. He is an artist par sang, and studies con amore whatever part may be awarded to him. Thus his Caspar was understood and applauded by the audience—a musical audience, as may be imagined, the opera being "Der Freischütz." He was encored with one voice by the whole audience, in the famous drinking song. The Agata of Mme. Pauline Lucca was what every amateur expected it would be—the genuine Agata of Kind and Weber, the Agata of the story and the Agata of the music. From beginning to end it was the right thing. Mme. Lucca gives us a living character of flesh and blood, not, as is too often the case, an Agata who has to sing a grand aria, an air, a duet and a trio, more or less well, and in the intervals to walk the stage, as if indifferent to all that passes. No greater or more legitimate success could have been achieved; and so much did Mme. Lucca impress the audience in the magnificent soliloquy of the second act, when Agata awaits the return of Rodolph, that the allegro—delivered with amazing vigor and dramatic effect—was encored and repeated—an event of almost unprecedented occurrence. Equally admirable, in another sense, was the beautiful romance, with violoncello obligato, which Agata sings alone, at the commencement of Act III., and which Mme. Lucca gave with finish and depth of expression that reminded us of Jenny Lind in her best time.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

A Moonlight Sonnet. 4. G to e. Abt. 35

Ship-like, full-breasted, travels the moon,
Swift as a gondola in a lagoon.
Thro' the cloud-highlands in silvery glow,
Thro' the white islands in turreted snow.

This fine poem is set, by Abt, to most appropriate music, and will repay careful study. The words are by Dr. Mackay.

A Rose in Heaven. 4. F to f. Abt. 35

A well beloved hand
Had gently reared that charming flower of flowers.

Some ruthless hand had torn it from its stem,
And like a dead Queen it lay upon the grass.

The beautiful, but common theme of the Rose here finds in words and music a new rendering, and the song cannot but be very sweet and effective, if sung with any skill or feeling.

Strolling on the Sands. 2. G to c. Wellman. 30

Comle. A pretty chorus.

Thirty Years Ago. 2. F to d. Barker. 30

The girls took music lessons
Upon the spinning wheel,
And practised, late and early
On spindle, swift and reel.

An amusing account of the ways of the people who lived (considerably more than) thirty years ago.

When the World is hushed in Sleep. Serenade.

3. G to f. Pratt. 30

O, when the world is hushed in sleep,
And dew-drops gem the drooping flowers,
Love's vigil then I fondly keep,
While glide away the moonlit hours.

Sung (with great applause of course) by William Macdonald, and the words are by George Cooper. A very good song for a robust and sweet voice.

Sweet Thoughts of Thee. 3. G minor to e.

Adapted by Rosabel. 30

Sweet thoughts of thee, like wayside flowers
Spring up and cheer the passing hours.

The pretty Italian melody is minor, but not dismal, and the general effect is delicate and sweet.

Instrumental.

Oak Bluffs Galop. 3. Eb. Etna Godfrey 40

The Title Page contains a pleasant picture for hot weather:—of the Sea View House, Oak Bluffs, Martha's Vineyard. The tumbling waves in the foreground are very suggestive of a cool bath therein; from which locality we might listen comfortably to this very inspiring Galop, played, as it often will be, in the parlors of the great hotel.

Bird as a Prophet (Vogel als Prophet). 4.

Bb. Schumann. 50

Bird songs are frequently introduced in pieces for a bright effect, but in this, a choir of warblers seem to have contributed their favorite airs, which are woven together into rich harmony by the hand of the master. The portrait of Rubinstein "may certify" that this is a good encore piece for concert playing.

Heart's Desire Mazurka. 3. F. Zahonyi. 30

More like a real Mazurka than any published lately, and is one that will highly please persons of delicate taste.

Mazurka Caprice. 5. Eb. Pratt. 40

A doubled and twined mazurka, containing "tours de force" and "tours de execution." A dashing exhibition piece, with passages full of expression.

Hungarian (or Sedlican) Polka. 3. A.

Petrak. 30

Very light and taking affair, throughout.

Books.

THE STANDARD. A Collection of Church Music, by L. O. Emerson, of Boston, and H. B. Palmer, of Chicago. Price, $1.50; $13.50 per dozen.

This book which has been so generally "announced" in multitudes of papers, is ready for delivery. Many thousands are already ordered, and it would seem that a work so "powerfully" edited and fully advertised, cannot fail to have the largest kind of a circulation. So crowd in with the rest, and send your orders early!

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 817.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 27, 1872.

VOL. XXXII. No. 9.

The Music of the Future.

BY A MODERN.

Hence, loath'd Melody!
Thou apish semblance of articulate sound,
The world hath done with thee;
No more shall fingers weave thy voluble round,
Jigg'ing Sebastian; hence, ye shadowy forms,
Ye dilettante swarms,
Handel or Haydn, powerful erst,
In man's fond infancy,
Now on the tranc'd elements hath burst
The music of the true, the undefil'd;
Ye snare no more men's hearts by sugared art be-guil'd.

Hence, ye cobweb spinners, hence;
Fancy yields to conquering sense:—
See! the great Tannhäuser comes,
Cymbals clash, sound kettle drums,
Now the pipe, the clarion brays,
Vocal in Tannhäuser's praise.
Scion he of giant brood,
Nursling of the savage wood,
Playmate of the shaggy bear,
Nature's sole interpreter.
Ears he hath for the hidden cry
Of the wild wind sweeping by,
Skill to phrase in rugged tones
What old Ocean hoarsely moans.

Yield, ye sour-lipp'd critics, yield,
See, Tannhäuser storms the field;
Cease, ah! cease your droning hum,
Tweedle-dee and Tweedle-dum.
With your routed legions flee,
Tweedle-dum and Tweedle-dee.
Fly, Mozart, Beethoven, fly,
Vain your link'd panoply,—
The sweet web of golden mail,
Crushed beneath the hero's flail.
Music, heavenly maid, is born,
Not that false siren, who hath shorn
The locks from many a champion's head.
On her lap of dalliance spread,
Which such fell enchantment wrought
That their manhood they forgot,
Babbled weak and soulless trash,
Sentimental balderdash,
Lapsed in pretty mincing measures
Gilded pinchbeck, tinsel treasures,
And the rapturous world was tickled
By the dulcet tones that trickled
From a lorn lute amorously;
Or paled, as tuned to loftiest key,
In measured march of awful sound,
Thunder-music shook the ground.

Slavish fiddlers of old time
Toiling at a painful rhyme,
Fain to cozen the nice ear
With a puling tune, and tear
Sense from sentiment apart,
So you could but touch the heart.
Pshaw! mere study of effect,
That ne'er could reach the intellect.
We can bid each passion thrill
On a note, and pass at will
From grave to gay, from hot to cold,
In convolutions manifold.
Rhythmical our movement flows,
Slow the varied fabric grows,
Of fantastic shape and style,

Mazy as a Gothic pile,
With pepper-boxes here and there,
And crawlings of a random stair.
No dull classic Parthenon,
With formal pillars of cold stone.

Not such a temple will we build
To honor him, whose song hath fill'd
Our rapt spirit with new delight;
Hail, Baireuth! the favored site
Of our palace, whence shall flow
Streams of rhythmic sense that glow
With clear metallic lava heat,
And shrivel the flaunting vines that meet
Its solid force with wantoning
Of tendrils in the buxom spring.

Earth shall soon forget her youth,
And the dreams she dreamed were truth
Fade before the critic's glass.
Our poor fathers! let them pass
With a mild and patient smile;
Their day is o'er;—their whims beguile
Our trained intellect no more.
Burn, moderns, burn the hived store
Of old experience, musty grown,
Doddered eld with eyes of stone,
Bid Fancy loose each drivelling thrall
And common sense be all in all.

London Spectator.

Wagner on Beethoven.

[Extracts from his Essay written as a contribution to the Hundredth Anniversary of the Composer's Birth.]

We see young Beethoven, on the other hand, (i. e. not like Haydn and Mozart), facing the world from the outset with that defiant temperament, which kept him in almost wild independence of it throughout his entire life; his enormous self-consciousness, supported by haughtiest courage, shielded him, at all times, from the frivolous demands upon music of the pleasure-seeking world. He had a treasure of inestimable wealth to preserve in the face of the importunities of effeminate taste. It was his mission to announce the divination of the inmost contemplation of the world of tones, in the same forms in which music was to display itself merely as a diverting art. He therefore resembled, at all times, one truly possessed; for, what Schopenhauer says of musicians in general, held good with regard to him:—"They speak the highest wisdom, in a language which their reason does not understand."

The element of "reason," in his art, he encountered in that spirit which had furthered the formal erection of its external scaffolding. When he perceived how often the great masters of his youth had moved in that architectural scaffolding of periods, with trite repetitions of phrases and floscules, with exactly divided antitheses of loud and soft, with introductions consisting of so and so many measures, the gravity of which was determined according to prescribed recipes, and through the indispensable portals of so and so many half-cadences, to the beatification of the noisy final cadence,—the element of reason which here addressed him, seemed a very scanty one. It was such reason which had constructed the operatic aria, had dictated the mode of stringing together the operatic pieces, and by which Haydn had been led to fetter his genius to the counting of pearls on his rosary. For with Palestrina's music religion had vanished from the [Roman] Church, while, on the other hand, the artificial formalism of Jesuitical practice counterformed religion and at the same time music. So, to the thoughtful beholder, does the architectural style (also Jesuitical)

of the last two centuries cover venerable, noble Rome; so did the glorious Italian painting become effeminate and dulcified; so originated, under the same guidance, the "classical" French poetry, in the spirit-killing laws of which we may find a very speaking analogy to the laws of construction of the operatic aria, and the sonata.

We know that it was that "German spirit," so much feared and hated in "Ulramontan;" regions, which everywhere, and in the sphere of art as well, savingly opposed this artfully-conducted corruption of the spirit of European peoples. If, then, we have honored our Lessing, Goethe, Schiller, and others, as having, in other spheres, rescued us from perishing in that corruption, it becomes us to-day to point out with reference to the musician Beethoven, that through him, inasmuch as he spoke the purest language of all peoples, German spirit redeemed the spirit of humanity from deep ignominy. For inasmuch as he elevated music (which had been degraded, as regards its proper nature, to the rank of a merely diverting art), to the height of its sublime calling, he has opened to us the understanding of that art in which the world explains itself as definitely to every consciousness, as the most profound philosophy could possibly explain it to that thinker who is well versed in its most abstract conceptions. And the relation of the great Beethoven to the German nation, is based upon this alone, which we shall now endeavor to illustrate by those special features of his life and productivity, which lie within our knowledge.

Nothing can give us a more instructive disclosure of the relation of the artistic method of proceeding, to manufacturing in accordance with those conceptions of reason, than an exact apprehension of the course followed by Beethoven in the development of his musical genius. Had he consciously transformed the external musical forms which he found extant, or even overthrown them, that would have been acting from his reason; but we nowhere find a trace of this. There certainly has never been an artist who speculated less on his art than did Beethoven. But, on the other hand, the already mentioned rough vehemence of his human nature shows us how he felt the interdiction that was laid upon his genius by those forms, almost as immediately in the sense of a personal suffering as he did every other constraint of conventionality. Still, his reaction in this matter consisted solely in a haughty, free development of his inner genius, which could not be hindered by anything, not even by those forms. He never altered from principle an already invented form of instrumental music; the same structure can unmistakably be pointed out in his last sonatas, quartets, symphonies, &c., as in his first ones. But let us compare these works with each other; let us, for instance, place the Eighth symphony, in F major, by the side of the Second, in D major, and wonder at the entirely new world which meets us there, almost in precisely the same form!

Here again appears the peculiarity of the German nature, which inwardly is so richly and deeply endowed that it is able to leave the impress of its being upon every form, since it re-models the form from within, and is thus relieved from the necessity of externally overthrowing it. Germans, consequently, are not revolutionary, but reformatory; and, in fine, they thus come to possess a wealth of forms for the manifestation of their inner nature such as is possessed by no other nation. This deep inner fountain appears exhausted among the French, so that disquieted by the external form of their affairs, both in art and in the state, they believe themselves forced to have recourse to the total overthrow of that form, in the persuasion to a certain extent, that the new and more agreeable form must then come entirely of itself. So their rebellion, strangely enough, is always against their own nature, which, after all, does not appear to be deeper than is expressed by that form which so disquiets them. On the other hand, that our poetical literature in the Middle Ages was nourished by the translation of chivalric poems from the French, did not injure the development of German spirit: the inner depth of a Wolfram von Eschenbach formed enduring poetic models from material, which, in the prototype, is preserved merely as a curiosity. In like manner we adopted the classic forms of Roman and Greek civilization, imitated their language and versification, and contrived to appropriate to ourselves antique intuitions, but only while enunciating in them our own inmost spirit. We thus received from the Italians music, with all its forms; and what we conceived in them lies before us in the incomprehensible works of Beethoven's genius.

* "BEETHOVEN": by RICHARD WAGNER. Translated, with the Author's express Permission and Approbation, by ALBERT R. PARSONS. Indianapolis: Benham Brothers. 1872.

To attempt even to explain those works would be a foolish undertaking. When we review them in their proper order we must perceive with ever-increasing distinctness the permeation of the musical form by the genius of music. In the works of his predecessors it is as though we saw a painted transparency by daylight, and thus had before us a pseudo work of art, obviously not at all to be compared, in drawing or coloring, with the work of the genuine painter; a work belonging to an altogether lower style of art, and therefore looked down upon by just connoisseurs: this transparency was displayed to adorn festivals—at princely tables—and for the entertainment of luxurious companies, &c., and the virtuoso placed his artistic dexterity, as the light appointed for the illumination of the picture, before, instead of behind it. But Beethoven places that transparency in the silence of night, between the phenomenal world and the deep inner world of the essential nature of all things, out from which he then throws the light of the clairvoyant against the back of the picture: and now it revives in a wonderful manner, and another world stands before us, of which the greatest masterpiece of a Raphael could give us no intimation.

The power of the musician here is not to be apprehended otherwise than through the idea of magic. It is certainly an enchanted state into which we fall while listening to a genuine Beethoven composition, when we perceive in all its parts, instead of that kind of technical conformity to the end in view, which might appear to us upon jejune meditation,—a spiritual animation, an activity now delicate, and then appalling, a pulsating elevation, joy, longing, fear, lamentation, and rapture, all of which, again, appears to originate only from within the profoundest depths of our own soul. For the feature of Beethoven's musical creations, which is so important for the history of art, is this: that here every technical accident of art, by means of which the artist, for the sake of intelligibility, places himself in a conventional relation to the external world, is elevated to the highest importance as a spontaneous effluence. As I have already elsewhere expressed it: "there are no 'accessories' here, there is no framing of the melody, but every voice in the accompaniment, every rhythmical note, indeed, every rest itself becomes melody."

Let us now examine whence Beethoven obtained his power, or rather, as the mystery of natural endowment must remain veiled to us, and we have only to accept, without further question, the existence of that power, from its effects, let us endeavor to make clear to ourselves through what peculiarity, what moral impulse of personal character, the great Musician was able to concentrate that power upon the one enormous effect which constituted his artistic deed. We have seen that we must exclude all assumption that the development of his artistic instinct was led by anything like a cognition of reason. On the contrary, we shall have to keep solely in view the manly strength of his character, to the influence of which, upon the development of the Master's inner genius, we have already had occasion to allude.

We there brought Mozart and Haydn at once into comparison with Beethoven. If we consider the lives of the two former, and contrast them with one another, a transition becomes apparent in respect to the external appointments of life, from Haydn, through Mozart, to Beethoven. Haydn was and remained a prince's attendant, and had, as a musician, to provide for the entertainment of his pomp-loving lord: temporary interruptions, such as his visits to London, altered the practice of his art but little in its character; for there, too, he was never more than a musician recommended to and paid by men of rank. Submissive and devout, the peace of a benevolent, cheerful disposition remained his to a good old age: only, the eye which looks at us from his portrait is filled with a soft melancholy. —Mozart's life, on the contrary, was an unbroken struggle for a peaceful, secure existence, while his existence was really destined to remain peculiarly full of hardships. Caressed, when a child, by half Europe, he found, as a youth, every gratification of his viciously aroused inclinations rendered difficult even to most oppressive hardship, only, from his entrance upon the age of manhood onward, to sicken in misery toward an early death. Musical attendance upon a princely master at once became unendurable to him; he sought to support himself from the applause of the great public,—gave concerts and "Academies;" his fugitive earnings were sacrificed for the enjoyments of life. If Haydn's prince continually demanded new entertainment, Mozart was none the less compelled to provide something new, day by day, to attract the public; fugitiveness in conception, and in execution according to acquired routine, becomes a chief basis for the explanation of the character of their works. Haydn wrote his truly noble masterpieces only after he had become an old man and was in the enjoyment of comforts secured to him by home and foreign reputation. But Mozart never attained that: his finest works were sketched between the arrangement of the moment and the anxiety of the coming hour. So a remunerative attendance on a prince presented itself before his soul as, after all, the longed-for means of procuring a life more favorable to artistic productivity. What his Emperor withheld from him, a King of Prussia offered: he "remained true to his Emperor,"—and perished miserably for it.

Had Beethoven made his choice of manner of life in accordance with cold considerations of reason, that could not have guided him with greater certainty, in view of the history of his two great predecessors, than he was in fact guided by the naïve expression of his inborn character. It is astonishing to see how everything here was decided by the powerful instinct of nature. That instinct speaks quite plainly to us in Beethoven's abhorrence for a life tendency like Haydn's. A glance at young Beethoven probably sufficed, also, to put any prince out of the notion of making him his chapel master. But the complexion of his peculiarities of character appears more remarkable in those of its features which preserved him from a fate such as Mozart's. Like him, placed entirely without means in a world where only the useful pays, while the beautiful is rewarded only when it flatters the senses, and the sublime must remain without any return whatever, Beethoven, in the first place, found himself debarred from inclining the world to himself by the beautiful. His physiognomical constitution expressed with overpowering pregnancy, that with him, beauty and softness must pass for identical. The phenomenal world had limited access to him. His eye, almost uncomfortably piercing, perceived in the external world nothing else than vexatious disturbances of his inner world, and warding them off constituted almost his sole rapport with that external world. So the spasm became the expression of his countenance: the spasm of defiance kept his nose, his mouth in that tension which could never relax into smiles, but only into unnatural laughter. If it is held to be an axiom of physiology for high intellectual endowments that a great brain must be enclosed in a thin, delicate skull, as if to facilitate the immediate cognition of external things, we saw, nevertheless, upon the inspection of his remains a few years ago, in conformity with the entire skeleton, a skull of unusual thickness and firmness. So did nature guard in him a brain of extreme tenderness, in order that it might look towards the interior only, and carry on in undisturbed repose the world contemplation of a great heart. What that exceedingly robust strength enclosed and preserved was an inner world of such conspicuous delicacy, that, left defenceless to the rough touch of the external world, it would have gently dissolved and evaporated,—as did Mozart's genius of light and love!

Now let us say to ourselves how such a being must have looked at the world from within such a massive frame!—Certainly the inner impulses of that man's will could never, or but indistinctly, determine his apprehension of the external world; they were too violent, and, at the same time, too gentle, to be able to cling to one of the phenomena upon which his glance fell only in timorous haste, or in that mistrust felt by one constantly unsatisfied. Nothing here involved him even in that transient illusion which was able to entice Mozart forth from his inner world, in the mania for external enjoyment. A childish gratification in the dissipations of a great and voluptuous city could scarcely touch Beethoven at all, for the impulses of his will were much too strong to permit him to find the slightest satisfaction in such superficial, motley pursuits. If his inclination to solitude, especially, was nourished by this, that inclination, again, coincided with his destined independence. A wonderfully sure instinct guided him in this respect, and became the main incentive to the manifestations of his character. No cognition of reason could have directed him more plainly than did this irresistible bent of instinct. What led Spinoza to support himself by glass-cutting—what filled our Schopenhauer with that anxiety to preserve his little inheritance unimpaired, which determined his whole outer life, and, indeed, inexplicable traits of his character,—i. e., the discernment that the veracity of philosophical investigations is seriously endangered by dependence upon the necessity of earning money by scientific labor, that fixed Beethoven in his defiance towards the world, as well as in the almost coarse inclinations manifested in his choice of manner of life.

Beethoven was really forced to support himself from the proceeds of his musical labors. But as nothing enticed him to secure for himself a cheerful, agreeable manner of life, he had less necessity for rapid, superficial labor, or for concessions to a kind of taste which is only to be reached through the pleasing. The more he thus lost connection with the outer world, so much the more clairvoyant was his glance into the inner world. The more confident he became in the employment of his inner wealth, so much the more confidently did he make his demands outward, and he actually required from his benefactors, that they should no longer pay him for his compositions, but so provide for him that he might work altogether for himself, unconcerned as to the rest of the world. And it really happened,—a thing unprecedented in the lives of musicians,—that a few benevolent men of rank pledged themselves to keep Beethoven independent in the sense demanded. Arrived at a similar turning-point in his life, Mozart sank prematurely exhausted. The greatness of the benefit conferred upon Beethoven, although he did not long enjoy it uninterruptedly or without diminution, founded, nevertheless, that peculiar harmony which, from that time on, was manifested in the Master's life, howsoever strangely constituted. He felt himself a victor, and knew that he belonged to the world as a free man only. The world was obliged to accept him as he was. He acted like a despot towards his benefactors, who were noblemen of high rank, and nothing was to be had from him, save what, and when, he pleased.

But he never felt a desire for anything save what now alone, and continually occupied him, the magician's play with the shapes of his inner world. For the outer world now became extinct to him,—not because blindness robbed him of the power of seeing it, but because deafness finally kept it at a distance from his hearing. The ear was the only organ through which the external world could still crowd in upon him and disturb him: it had long since died away to his eye. What did the enraptured dreamer see, when, staring fixedly before him with open eyes, and animated alone by the waking state of his inner world of tones, he wandered through the motley crowded streets of Vienna? The beginning and increase of his infirmity pained him greatly, and disposed him to profound melancholy: after complete deafness had set in, no serious complaints were heard from him, even over the loss of the capability of hearing musical performances; only, the intercourse of life, which, in itself, had no charms for him, was rendered difficult, and he now avoided it more and more decidedly.

A musician without hearing!—Is a blind painter to be imagined?

But we have heard of a blind Seer. The deaf Musician, who, undisturbed by the bustle of life, only heard the harmonies of his soul, and spoke from its depths to that world which to him had nothing more to say, now resembled Tiresias, from whom the phenomenal world was withdrawn, and who, in its stead, discovered the basis of all phenomena. So does genius, when emanated from everything external to itself, exist wholly in and for itself. What wonders must have been disclosed to one who was, at one time, able to see Beethoven, with the vision of Tiresias: a world wandering among men,—the abstract-self of the world, as a wandering man!

And now the musician's eye became enlightened from within; he now cast his glance upon phenomena also, which, illuminated by his inner light, were re-impacted in wonderful reflex to his soul. Now again the essential nature of things alone spoke to him, displaying them to him in the calm light of beauty. He now understood the forest, the brook, the meadow, the blue ether, the merry throng, the pair of lovers, the song of birds, the flight of clouds, the roaring of the storm, the bliss of beatifically moved repose. All his seeing and shaping now became permeated with that wondrous serenity which was first imparted to music through him. Even the lament, which is so inwardly original to all tone, hushes itself into smiles: the world regains its childish innocence. "To day art thou with me in Paradise"—who does not hear the Redeemer's words call to him, as he listens to the "Pastoral Symphony?"

That power of shaping the incomprehensible, the never-seen, the never-experienced, which, however, through it become most immediate experience of most evident comprehensibility,—now grows with him. The joy in exercising this power becomes humor: all the pain of existence is wrecked upon the immense pleasure derived from the play with it; the creator of worlds, Brahma, laughs to himself as he perceives the illusion with reference to himself: regained innocence plays jostlingly with the thorns of unexpiated guilt, the emancipated conscience banters itself with the torments it has undergone.

Never has an earthly art created anything so serene as the symphonies in A, and F major, with all of those works of the Master, so intimately related to them, which date from that divine period of his complete deafness. Their effect upon the listener is precisely that of emancipation from all guilt, just as the effect of our return to the phenomenal world is precisely that of a squandered paradise. So do those wonderful works preach repentance and amendment of life, in the deepest sense of a divine revelation.

The Jubilee—A Retrospect.

(From the Daily Advertiser.)

II.

Speaking of the musical aspect of the Jubilee, we have thus far dealt exclusively with points on which there is a practical unanimity of opinion. To our list of successful features of the affair we must add the appearance of Herr Johann Strauss and the instruction and enjoyment derived from his unique method of conducting. It is not likely that Mr. Zerrahn or Mr. Theodore Thomas, or any other eminent American conductor, will desire or attempt to imitate the peculiarities of the Viennese method; but it is equally certain that these and other intelligent musicians, who have the opportunity of studying Herr Strauss's style, will gain many new and valuable ideas to be used in eliciting the melodious harmonies of the fascinating concert waltz. Of the select orchestra itself and its work very little can be said that is not common-place and that was not plainly foreseen. Made up almost wholly of professional musicians, ready, skilful and "subservient to command," it was scarcely possible that it should make any serious failure; and, indeed, it is to be credited in its performance of dance music with a high degree of absolute success. But there were the ever-present obstacles of the size of the auditorium and the unwieldiness of its own numbers, which, steadily operating, either singly or together, made it impossible for such fine effects to be produced as have been frequently heard from Mr. Thomas's and Mr. Zerrahn's orchestras in the Music Hall. If any proof were needed of the truth of this, it would be found in the character of the selections presented. In this respect the Jubilee of 1872 was far behind that of 1869, not a single symphonic fragment even being performed on the latter occasion, and the instrumental repertoire of 1872 being narrowed down to a few operatic overtures, military marches, waltzes and polkas, which were given over and over again. Considering the difficulties with which it had to contend the orchestra did finely; but, judged by the absolute success obtained on less pretentious occasions, its efforts were not especially impressive except in the one particular already noted.

In summing up the results of the choral work of the festival we desire above all things to do justice to the chorus itself and to the spirit of conscientious fidelity which animated the great majority of its members. The mere assemblage of such a body, after months of careful preparation, was an impressive circumstance, and when we consider the amount of assiduous and self-denying exertion which this preparation involved, the cheerful patience with which for more than a week the great company of singers bore the fatigues and hardships of their daily labors at the concerts, and the comparatively slender share in the popular acclamations with which they were rewarded, we congratulate the Commonwealth upon the possession of material so well adapted for the advancement of the divine art. The test of genuine devotion to art is ever the willingness to sacrifice one's self in its service, and the history of the jubilee chorus furnishes the best possible proof of the gain which our community has made in this direction. Nor do we deny that a surprising degree of precision and skill was obtained, considering the obstacles presented—as in the case of the orchestra—by the size of the building and the number of the performers. And we take this occasion to express our high admiration and appreciation of the great ability and patience which distinguished the efforts of the gentlemen who trained the chorus and to whom the measure of success attained is largely due; the combination of mental and moral endowments—to say nothing of professional—exhibited by Mr. Zerrahn, for example, in the accomplishment of his work was nothing short of remarkable. But, after everything has been granted that can be granted, the truth remains that the chorus obtained nothing more than a succès d'estime. In the way of the finer effects of vocal shading and coloring nothing could be accomplished which was worthy of direct comparison with the efforts of smaller bodies. Even a good degree of precision could not be obtained from the entire body of twenty thousand singers except in the performance of smooth, broad chorals with a steady and rather slow movement. For anything else the chorus was too large—twice too large, or more than that—and to this fact we have the earnest testimony of many of the most serious and intelligent members of the chorus, a résumé of which was printed in this paper some two weeks ago.

Touching the power and impressiveness of the volume of tone emitted by the chorus, we prophesied in our leader of May 31 that it would be disappointingly out of proportion to the number of singers. If there is one person of any critical knowledge and of the slightest experience in listening to choral societies who now disputes this proposition, we should be glad to know it. And in the simple assertion of this fact we disclose the ignorance and silliness of the blatherskites in which the principal New York papers—with the worthy exceptions of the Tribune and the Evening Post—have indulged themselves. Besides the "Anvil Chorus," of which almost everybody became heartily sick, and the Star Spangled Banner with its cannon accompaniment, there was not a noisy piece in the entire list of programmes. And during the choral performances the auditor, though stationed in the most favorable position, was inexpressibly teased and disturbed by the lack of power in the passages marked forte and fortissimo. Some persons, in discussing this subject, have said that the weakness of effect was chargeable upon the size of the building and not upon the inefficiency of the chorus, but even if this were true, it must be remembered that the number of the chorus and the size of the building are inseparably connected. As a writer in the Cincinnati Gazette has well observed, "It is unavoidable that the great chorus and the great audience must occupy space in proportion to their magnitude, and as the sound of many voices reaches no farther than the sound of one, this space must inevitably diminish the effect." To every listener, therefore, whose position in the "Coliseum" was remote from the stage, the effect was necessarily very weak, when the numbers of the singers and the effects produced by a Music Hall chorus were considered; but even at a moderate or trifling distance from the platform no such tremendously grand and overpowering results were obtained as have been constantly experienced at the oratorios produced by the Handel and Haydn Society—the explanation being partially found, no doubt, in the law that imperfectly harmonized sounds destroy each other. During the performance also of every choral number in quick time, a perfect jumble of sounds reached the ears of those whose seats were close to the stage,—the difference in the distance of the listeners from the nearer and from the more remote singers being sufficiently great to blend together the sounds of successive notes. It is useless to fly in the face of the laws of acoustics—especially when they have been demonstrated to be true in experience as well as in theory; and the lessons of the Jubilee will be but poorly learned if it has not taught us that the artistic results from the performances of choruses twenty regiments strong are sure to be unsatisfactory and unworthy of their numbers and their preparation.

Looking at the festival as a whole, there can be little doubt that the good decidedly preponderated in its concerts over the bad. It brought together a company of foreign artists which could never have been gathered in this country upon any other occasion; and it stimulated the love of music throughout the country. It had obvious imperfections and limitations, especially in the scope, freshness and variety of the compositions presented; but it has given a new and mighty impetus to the wave of art enthusiasm which is soon, as we hope and believe, to spread itself over the length and breadth of the land.

The First Day of the Jubilee.

(From the Providence Journal.)

Boston, June 17th, 1872.

While the ponderous tone masses of the grand jubilee opening are still ringing in my ears, I propose to give you a few impressions of its effect upon me. While I admire the courage and perseverance that can conceive and carry out, even with limited success, the immense undertaking of bringing together the heretofore unheard of numbers of vocal and instrumental performers, and so marshaling and training them in their various and wide apart localities, that in the first day of their coming together they produce musical effects but little short of the sublime, I cannot gush over the performance as a whole, with the enthusiasm of many who seem to feel that any fault-finding is hypercritical and uncalled for. I shall, however, speak of the performance as I found it, and praise or condemn as my judgment may dictate, and my taste discriminate.

The building itself is a marvel, of more tasteful design than the former Coliseum, and the decorations are in excellent taste throughout. It would be difficult to give you an idea of the immensity of the building, but when you realize the fact that it is large enough to seat comfortably the whole population of Providence, you will have some impression of its extent and capacity. So far as possible, too, everything has been carried out on the most liberal scale, in regard to the needs and comforts of the performers and the public. Of course it should be expected that on the opening day there would be some shortcomings and annoyances; but these will soon be regulated, and there will be no cause of complaint of anything that admits of remedy. The series of concerts was opened with a prayer by the Rev. Phillips Brooks, of Trinity Church, Boston, and though his voice is powerful beyond the ordinary, yet it scarcely could be heard beyond a very limited circle of earthly listeners. Next came an address of welcome by William Gaston, Mayor of Boston, which reached the ears of but a small number of the audience. After him followed General Banks, with an inaugural oration, which was doubtless excellent in its way, but being rather long for the occasion, the audience became impatient and applauded him down. The concert opened with the grand choral Old Hundred. The melody was first given out by the powerful organ, after which the combined forces of the "twenty thousand" singers, the "two thousand" instrumentalists and the organ took up the theme with a steadiness of movement and breadth of tone that was really sublime, filling every corner of the vast building with a richness of melody and harmony quite indescribable. If the following numbers of the programme had kept pace with that first effort, I should have nothing but praise to report to you. But it was after all the great thing of the entertainment, and I never expect to hear the like again. Mr. Gilmore conducted it, but so nervously and unsteadily that I wondered how the great mass should march so steadily onward in spite of him. The second piece was by the grand orchestra, most admirably led by Zerrahn,—the overture to Rienzi by Wagner. The work is not a favorite with me, the ideas being crude, and the effect noisy, without breadth or originality. The performance, in spite of good leadership, was very indifferent, and, toward the close, just escaped a break-down. No. 3, a chorus from Costa's oratorio of "Nathan," was also indifferently rendered—to my great disappointment; for I thought its steady martial movement would carry it through safely beyond a peradventure; but it dragged heavily towards the close, and the voices failed to take up the theme with the promptness required to give it the proper effect.

No. 4, a piano solo from the Prophète, by Hei Franz Bendel, was almost an absurdity, the tone of the instrument, in the vast space, sounding like a clavier of Mozart's time. It was doubtless a clever performance, and the Herr seemed to work very hard to make it so, but it was a fiasco, nevertheless. No. 5, "Farewell to the Forest"—a four part song by Mendelssohn, was fairly rendered, but it was far better done on a former occasion by the Handel and Haydn Society. No. 6, the "Inflammatus," from Rossini's Stabat Mater, had very fair treatment from Madame Rudersdorf, chorus and orchestra. The solo was somewhat hard and strained in the effort to fill the house, but the delicious music sang itself into the hearts of the listeners so deeply as to silence criticism. No. 7, concluding the first part, was only a partial success. Written for solo voices, with a filling up for the chorus, it cannot be rendered by even a "Bouquet of one hundred and fifty artists" without destroying the effect intended by the composer. The voices were not always in tune, and it lacked the promptness of movement that is required for its due effect. It was encored and repeated, however, more I think on account of the beauty of the music than for its execution. We have not time or space to enumerate the pieces of the second part; on the whole, they were no better—no worse than those of the first, and the prolonged entertainment was getting a little tiresome. The United States Marine Band played a selection of American, English and French airs, with good effect, which was much applauded and encored. Instead of repeating a portion of it, they played a long, uninteresting overture, which badly exhausted both time and patience. The "Star Spangled Banner" was given admirably in the first verse, but the second dragged fearfully, giving further evidence that Mr. Gilmore is not a good conductor of voices, however skillful he may be as a band leader. The third verse was ~~unsuccessfully~~ done, a solo given by Mrs. Houston West being taken up a quarter of a tone sharp, the effect of which was simply execrating. Strauss and his Danube Waltz were capital. The Anvil Chorus was no better and no worse than in the former time, but always effective. The audience was neither large nor very enthusiastic. I should judge there were about nine thousand persons present. This in a space made to accommodate forty (?) thousand, and looked rather shy.

But the crowd from a distance has not begun to gather yet—the second, third and following concerts will doubtless make a very different show.

I would advise every one who can to hear at least one concert of the series, for the sight alone of the vast building and the mass of people under its roof will well repay one for the cost and trouble. I have but little faith in the good musical effect upon the public of such monster gatherings—it seems to me unwholesome food that will produce unhealthy growth in the divine art, if any at all; but there are many who think otherwise, and I will not at present discuss the matter, but let time decide.

The True Waltz Tempo—Strauss in New York.

(From the Weekly Review, July 12.)

Let us confess that we have learned something from Herr Johann Strauss. Let us admit that we were wrong and that he has set us right. It has been our practice to play waltzes too fast; at a tempo, indeed, that left light and shade out of the question. We have often adverted to this dizzy pace, and condemned it for its expressionless impetuosity. A waltz should picture a gliding grace, and not a dizzy, whirling madman.

Hear a waltz played by Thomas' orchestra and the same by Strauss's hand and you hardly recognize it as the identical piece. Not only does the former take the tempo altogether too quick, but fails, consequently, to give it that variety of expression without which the performance is mere mechanism. This quality is required in waltzes as well as in symphonies and overtures. Strauss's waltzes are splendid compositions, and are acknowledged by all our first class musicians to be the best we have. Their very excellence implies that they ought to be played with genuine significance.

It is really wonderful how a pianissimo or a forte, a retardando or a crescendo, an emphatic accent or other mark of expression animates, improves and heightens the effect of a piece. It gives it life and color at once, and this has been observed and will never be forgotten by all who have heard Strauss's waltzes performed under Strauss direction. He is, beyond question, a splendid and masterly conductor, and deserves all the applause he has received in Boston and New York. He has opened the eyes of the American people to the proper waltz tempo, and we cannot help thinking that a great reform will take place with us in the performance of his pieces. We have had an opportunity of hearing how he designed and wants them to be played, and let us profit by the instruction.

The three grand orchestral concerts at the Academy of Music, over which Strauss has presided, were brilliant triumphs of instrumentation. The first, on Monday evening, opened with the overture to "William Tell" (Rossini), with the orchestra under the baton of Mr. Carl Bergmann. Under the same direction the orchestra, composed of sixty-two select instrumentalists, performed Meyerbeer's "March aux Flambeaux," the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin" (Wagner), and the overture to "Rienzi" (Wagner). We all know how Bergmann can conduct. His forces proved most efficient, kept admirably together, and did themselves and their director great credit, especially in rendering Wagner's two pieces, which were done in a manner that convinced the most prejudiced and sceptical present that Wagner has a delicious vein of true melody as well as higher claims to our admiration. With such interpreters the public cannot fail to learn and appreciate Wagner's greatness.

Mr. Johann Bonawitz, in the first part, played the "Tannhäuser" March, arranged as a pianoforte solo by Lacz, and in the second another pianoforte solo founded on Luther's Hymn, arranged by Bonawitz himself. These pieces were finely performed, but in playing the former the octaves for the left hand were, on account of the excessive heat, anything but clear in their delivery. The latter piece is not very effective, except in the finale.

Strauss, as may be gathered from what we have promised, gave his waltz, "Künstler Leben" (Artist Life), in slower time than that in which it is taken by Thomas, but the effect was so delightful that an encore was a foregone conclusion; it took the shape of one of his beautiful polkas. The "Circassian March" is a very original and characteristic composition, by Strauss, and was played in brilliant style. We could take no exception to its performance, unless to the introduction of singing by the orchestra, which reminds us too palpably of our negro minstrels. His famous, favorite waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," was given with even more than its usual éclat. A double encore was imperatively demanded, and on the second response assumed the form of his "Tritsch Tratsch Polka." His "Pizzicato Polka" proved a bright and marvellous piece of execution. The pianissimo and crescendo were perfect. Thrice in succession was this charming gem presented, to satisfy the delighted and almost insatiable craving of the public, that seemed to grow by what it fed on.

Wednesday evening's concert was thronged and brilliant. The overture "Jubel" (Weber) was magnificently played by the orchestra, under Mr. Bergmann's direction—we cannot remember when we have heard it better done—and the second finale of "March" (Vendi), the overture to Rossini's "Siege of Corinth" and the March from Wagner's "Tannhäuser" were given, each in appropriate style, equally admirable. Mr. J. A. Bonawitz's pianoforte solo, "Schlummer Lied" (Schumann), and "Scherzo" (Chopin), was most scientifically performed, and, though well received, deserved far more applause than it won. The first half of his solo in second part, "Allegro Leaf," an improvisu composed by the performer, is very pretty, resembling in character some of Mendelssohn's songs without words. It had a pleasing effect, but the other half, Liszt's "Chromatic Galop," was started at too rapid a tempo, and as it coursed on lost clearness of articulation. Pianists should beware of such hasty outsets, lest the growing pace and excitement carry them beyond their executive capacity. The flow of melody through the Strauss portion of the programme was clear and brilliant as that of a mountain brook. The waltz "Tausend und eine Nacht," the polka "Tritsch Tratsch," the waltz "Morgensblätter" (Morning Papers), and the polka "Annen" were given in all their bright and charming color, and "painted" in perfection, winning double encores, and thus introducing other sparkling favorites. The orchestra was superb, and whatever envy or ill-nature may say to the contrary, kept together like the Macedonian phalanx, and marched to harmonious victory with the certainty of the Roman legion.

A Talk with Mr. Strauss.

(From the New York Sun, July 12.)

A Sun reporter had an interview with Johann Strauss, the famous Austrian composer, yesterday. Mr. Strauss has a magnificent suite of rooms in the Clarendon Hotel. The entrance is guarded by a footman who receives innumerable cards, letters and notes, and who is occasionally relieved by a pretty servant girl, whom Mrs. Strauss has brought with her from Vienna. Mrs. Strauss has another maid, so that there are three servants to take care of the composer and his wife. The latter has noble blood in her veins, having been born a countess; and two maids for a travelling countess is surely not too much.

Johann Strauss was standing in the centre of his room when the reporter entered. He is 45 years old, tall, good looking, has a black mustache, long, flowing black whiskers, a fine forehead, black hair which is brushed back, a quick, expressive eye, and an honest, genial expression of countenance. He was elegantly dressed after the latest Viennese fashion. Any one seeing him walk down Broadway would take him to be some swell from Murray Hill. Johann Strauss is evidently a ladies' man. He is neat rather handsome, and has very agreeable manners. He talks very naively, as if he was speaking entirely without reserve or constraint.

HOW STRAUSS LIKES AMERICA.

The Sun reporter asked the famed composer how he liked America.

Johann Strauss (in German—he does not speak any English)—Oh! this country is superb, magnificent. I never had an idea of the grandeur of this country, and I never would have thought that there is so much appreciation of good music here.

Here a card was sent in: "Das geht so den ganzen lieben Tag," he said.

Reporter—How do you like Boston?

Johann Strauss—I did not like it. Boston is Puritanical, stupid, dull. There is no life in the street. There is no display of elegance or luxury. The women are homely, and do not dress nicely. I do not like Boston. But with New York I am perfectly charmed (mit New York bin ich ganz entzückt).

MRS. STRAUSS.

Here Frau Strauss entered. She is a brunette, has a very pleasant face, and is very ladylike. She was dressed with exquisite taste after the latest Viennese fashion. She greeted the reporter cordially, and addressed him in very good English, but when she found that the reporter spoke German, she said, very good naturedly, "Ach, das ist ja prächtig; da können wir ja Deutsch sprechen." (Why, this is perfectly splendid; then we can speak German).

Frau Strauss—I think we should stay longer if it were not for this terrible heat. You know it's very hot in Vienna, but this heat is perfectly monstrous. Last night we could not sleep a wink; we did not sleep five minutes in the whole night, and still the clerk says he has given us the coolest rooms in the house.

WOULDN'T LEAVE VIENNA FOR THE WORLD.

Reporter—Could you not make up your mind to stay in this country?

Frau Strauss (laughing and showing her teeth, which are very pretty)—Oh, dear, dear no, not for the whole world. We would not leave Vienna for the world. We have everything so charming there; there are a thousand ties that bind us to Vienna. We live in Hietzing, right out of the city, in our own house, which we occupy all by ourselves. We live in English style, have our horses and carriages, ride and drive where we want to, and have everything our hearts can wish for. This hotel is much better than the St. James Hotel; but still, you know, hotel life is not what home life is.

Here Herr Strauss came back from the other room, whither he had withdrawn, to talk with a visitor. Three cards were sent in. "Engaged," was the answer in every instance.

STRAUSS'S LOVE FOR MUSIC.

Reporter—Were you very fond of music when a child?

Herr Strauss—Oh, yes, very fond. I was trained for the opera originally, but when I had composed my first waltz my career was decided.

Reporter—How old were you then?

Herr Strauss—I was seven then. I will send you this waltz; it has never been published. I am now collecting the best American compositions, in order to publish them in Germany.

Reporter—When do you compose, in the daytime or at night?

Herr Strauss—Altogether at night. I don't know of a single waltz that I composed in the daytime. Du lieber Herrgott! (Thou dear Lord!) Do you know how much I pay here for a shave? Fifty cents! fifty cents! a whole guilder! Ich bin nicht schandhaft. There is one thing that is very poor here, the beer. Oh! in that respect this country is very deficient, very.

DOESN'T LIKE AMERICAN BEER.

Reporter—I thought the beer here was better than in Germany.

Herr Strauss—Oh! dear, dear, no! No comparison. It's awfully bad here, and I am actually sick for want of our delightful Vienna beer.

Frau Strauss—The beer is thick and heavy here. Oh! its very poor.

Herr Strauss (smacking his lips and throwing himself back in his chair, in an attitude of rapture)—The beer in Vienna is divine, divine (gottlich). Go to Vienna, drink beer, and die. (Gottlich, gottlich!) But in every other respect New York is charming. Life here must be very pleasant. New York is much more gay than London. What a bustle, what an uproar there is here all the time.

MRS. STRAUSS ON BROADWAY.

Frau Strauss—Oh! Broadway is so magnificent. What a throng of vehicles all the time. Why, the Ring (the finest street of Vienna) is nothing compared to Broadway as far as life and bustle are concerned. The horses are here much finer than in Vienna. I have been in the Central Park. It's superb; much finer than our Prater. I have seen all the celebrated parks in Europe, but I never saw one that surpassed the Central Park in grandeur and beauty.

Here Herr Strauss was called away. Frau Strauss spoke of the Grand Duke Alexis. She said he and his two brothers used to come to her husband's house in St. Petersburg and blow on the cornet apion. When her husband met the Emperor Francis Joseph in the Imperial Gardens in Schonbrunn, to which he is invariably admitted, the Emperor says, "Gruss sie Gott, wie geht's?" (God greet you, how are you?) Her husband had a standing invitation to all the court festivities, being Knight of the Order of Francis Joseph. She said her husband had resigned all his positions, and did nothing now except working in his night-gown at home and composing operas, "which pays him infinitely." His last opera was produced sixty times in Vienna. For his services in Boston he had received $25,000 (£5,000).

STRAUSS ON AMERICAN RAILROADS.

Herr Strauss (coming back)—I want to mention something else to you that is perfectly awful, monstrous. These are no fahnwacher (flagmen) on the railroads here. Why, it's perfectly monstrous.

Frau Strauss—My husband says he'd rather be killed at once, and be done with it, than to take another trip on an American railroad. He knows he'd be a dead man, anyhow.

Herr Strauss received here three or four more cards. "It goes like this all day," he said. "In Boston I was bored out of existence by people asking for autographs, and then I have about fifty callers a day who beg for money. They are in every instance Germans. Not one American has begged of me."

The reporter took his leave, thanking Herr Strauss for his kindness. Herr Strauss gave the reporter a cigar, which he said was as good in any in Vienna, and his photograph. Then he said: "I am glad to have seen you. You are a nice, amiable fellow."

The reporter blushed, and bade the famous composer good day.

The Garde Republicaine Band.

The famous band of the Garde Republicaine of France has won such a reputation in this country, that a brief description of its organization and the instruments used by its members, may be found interesting. The band was organized by M. Paulus in 1854. It was composed of fifty-four members, enlisted men who are entitled to a life pension after serving a term of twenty-five years. M. Paulus associated M. Maury with himself as sous chef. This band has always a long list of applicants ready to fill any vacancies that may occur. Each one must have served in another band of the line for at least two years, and must be able to read and write. The Garde de Paris, to which the band is attached, and which two years ago became the Garde Republicaine, is a regiment of 2600 men—2000 infantry and 600 cavalry. Like the Household Brigade in the English army, this regiment always remains at the capital. To be a member of the band necessitates a comparatively small amount of service, and each man can live wherever he pleases in Paris, wear citizen's clothes when off duty, and accept engagements wherever offered. Thus it is that nearly every member receives double pay. M. Maury is solo cornet at the Grand Opera. Three of the band are professors in the Paris Conservatory of Music. M. Silvestre, whom competent directors pronounced the smartest cornet player they had ever heard, is only 22 years old, but has played the cornet for twelve years. Well might Dan Godfrey say that he could not expect to beat a band of picked professional musicians. The band is organized on the model of Adolphe Sax, which has been adopted for the military bands of the French army. The organization consists in reproducing in military music all the disposition of ordinary music, increased considerably in sonority, inasmuch as military music is so often called upon to be played in the open air, and as its warlike qualities are its first requisite. The instruments used by the band are the following: Two grandes flutes in c, two petites flutes in d flat, two hautbois in c, two petites clarinettes in e-flat, eight grandes clarinettes in g flat, one soprano saxhorn in e-flat, three contralto sopranos (?) in g flat, three cornets a-piston, six saxophones, four trombones (with six pistons), three trumpets, two horns, three alto saxhorns, in e-flat, two baritones in g-flat, four basses (with four cylinders) in g-flat, two contra-basses in g-flat, one contra-bass in f flat, bass drum, two kettle drums and cymbals. M. Sax explains the organization as follows:—

"I have created for the bass, corresponding to the quartet of strings, the numerous family of saxhorns, around which are grouped, in families as complete as possible, all the episodic instruments destined to form a sonorous palette, and to bring forth a variety of tones. I have, guided always by the principle of forming complete groups, augmented or diminished the number of certain instruments, such as the clarinets, for example, augmenting the number of small ones in order to maintain the sharp register, (le registre aigu), always badly kept up by large clarinets. It will be remarked, in the music of the Paris Garde Republicaine, that there are many families of instruments with six pistons—trumpets, trombones, bass saxhorns, and contra bass in e-flat and b flat. These instruments constitute one of my latest and most important inventions. By the reunion of seven independent tubes they give the chromatic series of the notes of the gamut in first harmonic sounds; that is to say, not resulting from any combination of different tubes, the sounds are consequently produced with a purity and mathematical precision, something which was impracticable, as every one knows, by means of the old three piston instruments. As the differences of tone in the various instruments are not created by the matter which composes them, nor by the system of the mechanism, but rather arise from the proportion of the tubes, the process of the six pistons and seven independent tubes was applicable to all instruments with mouth-pieces, and I have applied it."

For the sake of comparison, we append a list of the instruments of the Kaiser Franz Grenadier Garde Band: Flute, piccolo, two oboes, two bassoons, two e-flat clarinettes, ten b flat clarinettes, four French horns, two tenor horns, two baritones, four trumpets, three cornets, four tubas, two contra bassoons, four trombones, two snare drums, bass drum, cymbals and glockenspiel.—Courier.

The New York Weekly Review gives the following table showing the respective constituents of the three bands:

	French Band.	German.	English.
Clarionets.....	9	14	16
Flutes.....	2	2	4
Oboes.....	4	2	1
Saxophones.....	6	—	—
Pistons.....	2	—	—
Rugles.....	3	—	—
Trumpets.....	3	4	2
Horns.....	2	4	4
Baritones.....	2	2	2
Bass.....	4	3	6
Contra Bass.....	3	—	—
Alto.....	4	2	4
Trombones.....	4	4	4
Paris Bugle.....	1	—	—
Cymbals.....	1	1	1
Drums.....	2	2	2
Bass Drums.....	1	1	1
Cornets.....	—	3	6
Fagotti.....	—	2	5
Contra.....	—	2	—
Total.....	53	48	58

"National Music Meetings" at the Crystal Palace.—Competitive Singing.

A London Correspondent of the Boston Courier writes:

While you Bostonians have been enjoying your monster Musical Jubilee we Londoners have been treated to something quite new in the musical way, namely: a competitive examination or trial of well-known vocalists. This idea originated with Mr. Wellert Beale, a well-known musician and journalist, and the scene of this novel performance was the Crystal Palace. It is difficult for English talent to get a hearing—harder for it to get a prize; but the Crystal Palace Company came forward, and are ready to decline no reasonable offer, and to present a bona fide prize to the candidates who win a fair field and no favor. Is it necessary to say that the winners leave the seat of contest with a reputation, to a great extent, made? One successful competition probably saves the singer some years of tedious and disheartening struggle to get before the public, and persons of real talent are thus able to start at once on their career. Meanwhile it must be confessed that a good many of the competitors are grotesquely and amusingly bad. On Thursday, June 27, the contest began. Those who had been selected to compete appeared, one by one, on the Handel Orchestra, and on a raised platform in front of them sat Mr. Sterndale Bennett, Sir Julius Benedict, and Signor Arditi. Six ladies appeared in succession. Some seemed confident, others timid, all more or less awkward, but there was little doubt about the winner, who came last, Miss Williams, who ought to succeed well: she has a good voice, good presence of mind, and nice taste. She is a pupil of Mr. Welch's. When her number (19) was hoisted up as the winner it was greeted with unanimous applause. She has evidently not yet formed her concert-room deportment. She bows to the enthusiastic audience as though she were vastly offended with them, and desired to be out of sight and hearing; but a slight stiffness of manner is after all, preferable to the opposite extreme, and is of only the smallest importance when the singing is good. The gentlemen tenors were entertaining enough. One stepped forward with the utmost confidence, evidently believing intensely in his easy superiority, but he had not a chance—we were going to say, a voice. Another could not sing any of his runs and flourishes, but seemed quite unconscious of his defect; another sang flat, with the most winning smile, and we need not say the least winning voice. The winner again came last. Mr. Dudley Thomas was beyond comparison the best. He is a light, agreeable, and rather finished tenor, wanting in power but not in sweetness, with good taste and an easy, unaffected style. At half past four o'clock a concert took place, at which Miss Williams and Mr. Dudley Thomas confirmed the good opinion which the judges and the public had already conceived. The following Saturday the contraltos, baritones, and basses competed, Signor Arditi, Mr. Barby, and Dr. Wyld being judges. Miss Hancock, who has an agreeable and a good method, was the fortunate candidate. She will doubtless, please even more when she loses a little of the self-consciousness which is, perhaps, inseparable from the novelty of her situation. A sharp contest took place between the basses, Mr. Pope and Mr. Wadmore, both of them pupils of Signor Randegger. Mr. Wadmore—not at all a fierce bass, or a bass-looking gentleman at all—won. He is young and amiable in appearance—and if he aspires to do the dark villain on the stage, he will take a deal of dressing, or, as the Americans say, fixing up—but he seems to have pluck enough for anything. At the afternoon concert the winners—ladies and gentlemen—appeared and sang songs chosen for them almost at the last moment, thus displaying a great knowledge of music as well as readiness. It is true that When Other Lips and Non piu andrai are not very unknown songs; but still to sing, especially the latter, at a moment's notice, on such an occasion, requires nerve, which Mr. Wadmore certainly possesses. The concert was filled in by the admirable band of the Crystal Palace, under Mr. Manns, and the Crystal Palace choir. The other soloists were Miss Edith Wynne, who sang charmingly, Madame Patey, who was encored in Arthur Sullivan's Golden Days, and Mr. Santley. The Crystal Palace choir has wonderfully improved. During the week choral societies and bands of different sorts will compete, and on Saturday the distribution will take place, followed by a grand vocal and instrumental concert. The prize range from £1000 to £30.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 27, 1872.

The Second Gilmore Jubilee.

II.

We have thus far spoken of the plan itself, and seen from what mixed motives it sprang, and what an ambiguous aspect it presented. Yet in the main it claimed to be a musical festival, "the greatest series of Concerts ever given in the world!"

Leaving aside therefore, for the present, "Peace, and Patriotism, and the 'glory of Boston,'" and the assumed "international" importance of the affair, simply looked upon as Music, what did it amount to? What was realized in Art, for Art, for musical taste and culture in a true and profitable sense? Admitting fully all that may be claimed as to the beauty and commodiousness of the great Coliseum,—that magical creation of a night almost,—literally the work of six weeks, a fair and stately structure large enough to hold the population of a small city, cheaply but tastefully decorated, charming the eye with a fine harmony of lines and colors, and that free wavy play of flags and streamers which is so like the form of music, its admirable ventilation and its cheerful aspect; admitting the inspiration of the scene, the living presence of two vast multitudes there face to face, the singers and the sympathizers (if one could only count under the latter head the restless crowds who, whether because they could not hear, or because a vague curiosity rather than music brought them, wandered about in ceaseless tramp through the surrounding corridors!); admitting too, not without pride, the perfect right of our good City to admire herself there in so large a mirror of her most exemplary good order, peace and cheerful courtesy, and the good impression that it evidently made on strangers (though why would so many people talk aloud and move about when much of the music was so soft!); cheerfully conceding all praise to the executive energy and the organizing skill which made so many forces work together to one end; and never doubting that there was a great deal of pure enjoyment and even quickening experience of life in those great crowds, from day to day; granting all this in as full measure as you please, the real question, after all, is: What about the Music?

And the first point that claims attention is the programmes. Now the ambiguity which we have seen in the Jubilee project as a whole was sure to affect each and every programme. To a true programme, an artistic programme, the first essential is unity of motive. A good programme is like a good composition; it must all grow out of one good leading motive, to which all the other accompanying motives must stand in true relation of support or pleasing (never distracting, never unrelated, miscellaneous) contrast. Here, it must be confessed, the motives were terribly mixed. Read those opening programmes (and they were the best), which we have placed on our last page as specimens of passing follies of our age for curious readers in the future, should any chance to peep into our musty files. See what strange bedfellows are thus brought together. (And, by the way, we are told that the "Music Committee," a thing of names, and chiefly good for advertisement, was never called together or consulted,—so much the better for them.) The hobby of the great "Projector" we all know; he is nothing if not startling; his ruling passion is "to make a noise in the world;" "Anvil choruses, cannons, bells, and roaring, overwhelming sound waves are his element. It is true, most people who went there hoping or dreading a tremendous noise were disappointed, and the marvel that has made the most talk was, the gentleness, the softness of the sound of 20,000 voices even with all those auxiliaries. Nevertheless does anybody doubt that it meant noise? Kind Nature, with her wise acoustic laws and limitations, came to our relief. It was not Gilmore's fault that the artillery and bells disturbed the outside city more than they did the audience within, or that the hundred anvils, instead of a hearty blacksmith ring, produced a toy-like jingling sound as of so many sleighbells, not answering at all in loudness to the scarlet skirts they wore. (How feeble compared to the three or four anvils on the operatic stage! But then an anvil is an industrial machine, and not a musical instrument, and perhaps in order to its true and hearty ring there must be something forged upon it, some useful metal interwoven between the anvil and the hammer. Suppose Mr. G. should try it; hissing hot iron, sparks and blazing furnaces,—would not that make a rousing jubilee!). But of course this element had to go into the cauldron; no Gilmore jubilee without guns and anvils, and all sorts of claptrap. And for the sake of this, to give it ample room and scope, popular national hymns and airs, "Hail Columbia" and "Star Spangled Banner," "God save the Queen," the "Marseillaise," &c., as well as the sentimental "songs that everybody knows," sometimes ridiculously sung by 5,000 altos, alternating with as many tenors or basses, in unison, held in the long run the lion's share in these most incoherent programmes. All well enough, if nothing else had been attempted, if the design had only limited itself to that. Then there would have been unity of purpose, and the thing as a whole would have had a character, such as it was; a much more respectable character than can result from any mingling of incongruous ingredients, from any bringing together of things which do not belong together, out of a foolish ignorant ambition of the less to (seem to) include the greater. Then it would have been an honest Fourth-of-July affair upon an unprecedented scale, vastly interesting, no doubt, and perhaps beneficial to a very large class of people, though musical people, as such, might take comparatively little interest in it. For the enthusiasm of such occasions, the electric thrill of sympathy, the bravos and the flutter of white handkerchiefs, are not to any great degree a musical experience, do not spring so much from the music as from some social or patriotic sentiment with which the old tune has become associated. Here the "Projector" is in his element, here he has large publicity, and here in God's name let him celebrate and jubilate to his heart's content with all the sympathizers he can find; no reasonable being can object to it, if it will only seek to pass for simply what it is.

But no! This would not satisfy this vague, unlimited ambition. It must be a great feast of Music, a great musical event, "the greatest" in all history; this Fourth-of-July element must cover the whole field of Music, and the Gilmore baton flourish over Symphony and Oratorio, as well as "Hail Columbia!" Each and Beethoven must be invited upon the same platform with the people's idols. They, were they living, might decline the honor; for artists know and feel the difference of spheres, and if there is one law of life which music most persistently illustrates, it is that spheres are not to be confounded. Nevertheless bring them out and set them up there; having their music we have them; and as for living artists and composers, if the best be shy of such distinction as we offer, are there not always "available" ones, among artists as in all other classes, who, having fame such as it is, would like a little more and gold to boot? So raise the sign in blazing letters, which the world may read: The greatest music and the greatest artists all combined in our great musical World's Jubilee! So in this Yankee-doodle setting we have choruses from "Messiah" and "Creation" and "Elijah," even a whole Oratorio of Handel; Chorales by Bach naively set up (or down) in a row with homely old New England Psalm-tunes (for these too were represented in the mixed motives and the managing Committee); classical Overtures (a few); Italian Opera Selections, for which a "Bouquet of Artists" are flatteringly enlisted as a sort of legion of honor; and whatever else was easily available under the head of classical or high Art, old or modern. And all for what? Not because such things belonged in this strange element; not that they might give tone and direction to a festival conceived in quite another spirit; not that "high Art," that Music in its highest sense should be exalted to a higher throne, surrounded with a ray more of divinity, than the most hack-nied stock in trade of street, or choir or ball room music. Not for its own sake was the higher music brought into the plan, but only for its good name, to make the plan respectable, conciliate refined taste, and secure the co-operation of really artistic leaders and musicians, without whom it could hardly boast itself to be a musical festival in any very worthy sense. In short the classical pieces were pretty sure to pass (with thousands of the unmusical and unreflecting) for very good endorsement of the claptrap; it must be a true bill, for it bears the names of Handel, Bach and Beethoven upon the back; good company where they are, is it not?—But what if they are ill at ease, and not at all at home there! And even so it proved; for it was soon found that these were not the things that went best, or were heard best, or which seemed to be much in the spirit of the place and the occasion, or to the liking of the larger crowd congenial with that spirit. So, after a few days, the classical element began to be pushed more into the background; the best thing by far of all, in an artistic point of view, the "Israel in Egypt," which gave such tempting scope to the best powers of our Handel and Haydn Society, securing them for nucleus of the great chorus, came near being dropped out entirely, as it would have been, had it been "postponed" a week in the interest of the more paying matter of the programmes; for if there was one reason for postponement at the time, there would have been twenty at the week's end; and, as it was, though well performed, it was thrown away upon the smallest and most inattentive audience of the whole three weeks. Of course the more serious and valuable members of the chorus began to drop away, as the choral functions became reduced to repetition of the same old national airs and psalm tunes. And egotistic vanity, not competency, too often dictated the conductorship in the performance of these same classical compositions, so that you would hear an Overture, perhaps, with a man making the motions in dumb show before an orchestra, who heeded not but, smiling in their sleeves, played on as they knew how.

Another mixed motive, resulting in another incongruity and positive fatuity, lay in the piano making interest which exercised a strong voice in the councils of the Jubilee. No one for a moment could be blind to the fact that solo performances on the Piano-forte must be thrown away upon the chief part of an audience in so vast a space. Yet in each programme such unheard, unheard of exhibitions had to figure, partly that the "Grand Orchestral Piano" might be advertised, and partly that the name and presence of some distinguished European virtuoso might advertise the Jubilee. Only less out of place there as a rule, with one conspicuous exception, were the vocal solos; and what could be more ludicrous (except the execution) than the bare announcement of a melody, say Abt's hacknied "Swallow" song, for which 5,000 voices are massed into one! We hope the rubicund composer will survive the compliment,—and the song too.

Then, again, there was the "international" element, which entered as a motive, and more effectively, perhaps, than any other, being so well represented by those three noble European Bands; though how far anything international was really intended by the governments who sent them, or perhaps, more properly, permitted them to come, is more or less a matter of imagination. There was a graceful look of courtesy about it to be sure, and a sincere reciprocation of good feeling, to the credit and the satisfaction of all parties. At any rate it was a happy hit, and made the chief sensation of the Jubilee. But for the musical Art significance of European, or of any nations, one does not look first or mainly to the military Bands. If it were simply and ostensibly an international meeting or festival of Bands, competitive, or otherwise, that in itself would have a unity of character and might be a good thing; but that, though every country should be represented, and by its very best in that line, would by no means come up to the pretention of "the greatest musical event of the century;" because, musically considered, any Birmingham or Düsseldorf, or Boston Handel and Haydn Festival is really better. As a sensational device the Bands were capital; but it takes something besides Bands to make a musical Art festival; here, to be sure, there was something else,—thousands of instruments and voices, &c., &c.—but from the first the Bands took precedence, while chorus, orchestra, and all things classical had to accept the less conspicuous rôle, serving as frame-work or mere remplissage. Another sensation was the presence of the Vienna "Waltz king," STRAUSS, without his orchestra, but showing how he could electrify the orchestra he found before him. And there were the two famous foreign singers, the two famous pianists, and the German Emperor's Cornet Quartet (not a very significant contribution to the greatest of all Musical Festivals), the genial and hearty looking sentimental part-song composer, ABT; and a sprinkling of original compositions for the Jubilee by some half a dozen European composers, none of them of the highest rank, some of them unheard of here till now, while some of the most important of these contributions (a solo and chorus by Sir JULIUS BENEDICT, for instance, and the 150th Psalm by RANDROGER, both written by request, the solos to be sung by Mme. RUDERSDORFF) were promised only, but not given. But the point is: taking all together, Bands, composers, solo artists, was here enough to constitute a really representative, significant, substantial contribution of the musical Art of Europe to an international music meeting of the highest order and pretention? Any single week during the musical season in London, Berlin, Leipzig, Paris, or Vienna, offers more of interest to a true music lover, than the Coliseum in its whole "heated term." You could not hear 20,000 singers there; but 20,000 singers are "no good," as the boys say.

To help out the sensational illusion of the "international" idea, the Jubilee was made a "song of degrees" or "Days." There was first the American day, of course, for that came on the anniversary of the battle of Bunker Hill. Then followed the English, the German, and the French day, which was very well so long as the three distinctive Bands held out. Then came the Austrian day, on which the only things Austrian were a "Kaiser" Overture on Austrian themes by Westmayer, rather a graceful composition, and Strauss's "Beautiful Blue Danube waltz;" then the Russian day, without a Band or note of Russian music, but for a chief novelty a choir of colored singers, with "cannon accompaniments," canonizing John Brown's soul "marching on." There was also an "Italian day," with no Italian music on the bill except Rossini's German Overture to "Tell." And there was an "Irish day," of course—for was not this "our new St. Patrick's" festival?—with some sort of an Irish Band trumped up for one of the last and hottest days, when the enthusiasm was chiefly spent upon procession through the streets. And there was President Grant's Day, and a Horace Greeley day, and Gilmore's own day, when all the Bands played, and all the patriotic songs and guns and anvils were in fullest blast. But in all this was Music paramount, or something else? Did St. Cecilia preside? Was Art remembered? And did Bach and Beethoven still keep their places on the equal platform?

But now for the result, the actual performance and effect. And fortunately here we have only for the most part to repeat what everybody else is saying; for, from the moment it became clear that the Jubilee would not succeed financially, it was marvellous with what a freedom and alacrity of criticism so many even of the newspapers began to point out all the errors and shortcomings and absurdities of the whole thing, and admit that the "unprecedented and gigantic musical success" was after all a failure!

Some features were successful, some were not. The least successful (counting out the solos) was just that which formed the glory of the former Jubilee, and which alone could justify the colossal proportions of the undertaking,—the great Chorus. The Chorus simply uttered what it achieved three years ago. And not by any fault of its own, or of its chief instructor and Conductor, CARL ZERRAHN. It was simply a struggle against Nature. Twenty thousand singers were not only twice, but four or five times too many for good musical effect. That was clearly enough proved at the first Jubilee, when a Chorus of half the number did produce effects, by no means so fine as smaller choruses in proper music halls, but often very grand and beautiful, and on the whole successful. It turned out better than any sane musical mind expected, but did not work conviction as to any real gain from such great numbers. The experience was set down as exceptional; and exceptional it should have remained; strange that the lesson was not learned beyond necessity of repetition! Only a defiant and insane ambition could have seriously conceived the heaven-storming idea of piling another Ossa upon Pelion. There was a double fate against the valiant twenty thousand, devoted, earnest, full of a zeal truly musical, and thoroughly prepared, as a very large proportion of them, we know, were. (We do not take account of violations of discipline, signs of disintegration or demoralization, in the latter weeks so obvious, for these we fancy only came in after failure was a foregone conclusion.) In the first place, spread over so wide and deep a space, seated so far apart, they could not know whether they sang together; in the next place, even if they did sing perfectly together, to most auditors the tones, traversing such various distances, could not reach the ear at once, so that practically, as one writer has happily said, "it all sounded like a fugue." In plain, slow choral strains, composed of long notes only, such as "Old Hundred" and "Luther's Hymn" and the two Bach Chorales, the volume of tone was rich and sweet and grand, by no means overpowering, and all parts of the harmony were clearly made out—perhaps not always. Here it does not matter so much that there should be perfect precision of attack or rhythm; the harmonies may drag, and yet the effect be fine and the intentions of the music fully realized; to the imagination this is the effect of a strain pouring in wave upon wave from a vast multitude; there is a kind of musical perspective in it, which will not do at all in any quickly moving, polyphonic, imitative, involved composition; here all must be struck at once and heard at once, or it is all confusion. And in this way most of the more elaborate choruses more or less suffered, though some few of them in the first week, before the days of dissolution, made on hearers favorably placed a pretty fair impression. The best success of any was perhaps the unaccompanied part-song by Mendelssohn.—Nor did the chorus exercise its powers on nearly so much sterling matter as it did before. As we have said, it was but a left-handed hospitality that was extended to the classical selections; they went through with the form of introduction and were soon quietly bowed out. Beyond a few Chorales, Handel's "Hallelujah" and "See the conquering hero," Haydn's "The Heavens are telling," Mendelssohn's "Thanks be to God," "He watching over Israel," "Yet doth the Lord see it not," and "Sleepers awake," Mozart's Gloria, Rossini's Inflammatus, a chorus each by Bennett and by Costa, a chorus from Mr. PAINE's new Oratorio "St. Peter," a scholarly and clever work, but sacrificed, and a Hymn: "Peace and Music," written with more view to popular effect by Mr. DUDLEY BUCK, the mighty Chorus was merely heard in common Psalm-tunes, or rose to call in endless repetitions of the National Airs, &c., with boom of cannon. To this complexion, almost wholly, did it come at last. As a piece of honest, earnest, well accomplished work, upon a task worthy to inspire the best devotion, the performance of "Israel in Egypt" by the Boston Handel and Haydn Society for first chorus, and the Societies of Salem, Lynn and West Roxbury for second chorus,—in all from twelve to fourteen hundred voices—stands out as the one most honorable artistic deed in the whole festival,—and to it was least honor paid!

—But again our space is too contracted for doing justice to the other elements,—the great orchestra, the solo singers and pianists, the splendid foreign Bands, &c.,—as well as for some "improvements" of the lesson, as the old sermonizers used to say; for which we shall have to return to the unwieldy topic once more.

WHEATON SEMINARY. The following is the programme of a Soirée Musicale given at this institution on Wednesday evening, July 3, under the direction of Messrs. G. H. HOWARD and W. W. DAVIS, who have been laboring there with the right sort of zeal to increase the knowledge and the love of good music.

"Voca. Voca," Campana.
Symphony in G minor Mozart.
Recitative and Aria, "Ah! s'estinto," Mercadante.
Fantasia, "Fra Diavolo," Fiorantini.
Song, "Solito e Ben," Hayda.
Trio in E flat, for Violin and Violoncello Gumbert.
Duet, "Cheerfulness," Rossini.
"La Carita," Rossini.

NEW YORK, July 22. We all know where Orpheus wandered in search of his love; but such devotion falls before that which led some followers of the heavenly maid,—Music, to leave the cool breezes and refreshing shades of 95 for the Academy, where the thermometer is said to have ranged from 100 upwards. This remark is inspired by a statement of Mrs Grundy to the effect that the three Peschka-Leutner concerts which took place last week were well attended.

For myself I do not know. One old man at the club said that he attended the first concert and that it was a great success. As he was known to have no ear for music, this assertion was received with suspicion not unmixed with scorn, until it transpired that he was from Moscow, and regarded the entertainment as a species of steam-bath, with modifications and improvements. The assertion that the Orchestra laid aside their coats is without foundation, other than the fact that they looked as though they would like to do so. Mme. Peschka-Leutner is said to have been in good voice, and that she met with a warm welcome we may well believe. She was assisted by the so-called, Strauss Orchestra.

Johann Straum gave three Orchestral Concerts in the Academy on Monday, Wednesday and Friday evening, July 8th, 10th, and 12th, and besides these there have been numberless concerts by the foreign bands.—All this would have been interesting but for the intense heat which made life a burden to us.

We look forward, however, to a fall season full of interest; for during the autumn and winter we shall hear more good music in New York than ever before. The Rubinstein concerts are even now definitely announced to begin Sept. 23rd, at Stedway Hall. The great pianist will have the support of Mr. Henry Wieniawski (violinist), Mlle. Louise Liebhart (a soprano well known in England), and Mlle. Louise Ormoul. M. Rubinstein is best known to the public here through his great Ocean Symphony, of which parts have been frequently played by the Thomas Orchestra at the Central Park Garden.

The man who has no music in his soul sits in a front seat at the Garden Concerts. The other night, while the Orchestra was playing the allegretto of Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, this pleasing youth took a notion to smoke, and thereupon scratched an explosion match, which produced much snapping and flaring but no fire. Not to be discouraged, he tried another match, and still another,—always with the same result, and to the manifest annoyance of everyone within hearing, until, suddenly, the conductor's arm dropped to his side—the Orchestra paused, and amid perfect silence Thomas thus addressed this pleasing youth: "Go on, sir! I can wait until your match is lit." But the smoker, not to be outdone in politeness, would on no account go on, just at that time—and so the Orchestra was allowed to finish the Symphony. This is one out of many similar incidents which I have witnessed at the Garden during the summer. Perfect order is maintained there—but no rule can exclude ill breeding. In my next letter I will give a résumé of the programme.

A. A. C.

Taglioni.

THE QUEEN OF THE DANCE.

[From the London Echo.]

"I never refused jewels," said Mme. Taglioni, yesterday; "they were never offered me by private individuals, but I have received costly presents from royal personages." And well did this unconscious eulogium become the ex-Queen of the dance—the incomparable artist who earned a world-wide reputation for grace, flexibility and modesty. By this last and best ornament of womanhood she succeeded in elevating the dance to a position among the arts it had never previously attained, and to the laying aside of the "Taglioni" style must be attributed the decline of the modern ballet. For, in the main, people admire the beautiful, and soon discover that true beauty cannot exist without refinement and delicacy. It is not, perhaps, too much to hope that the return of Mme. Taglioni to London, when, so far as the stage is concerned, her dancing days are over, will promote a return to a style of dancing which pleases without demoralizing, and brings a smile instead of a blush to the face of beauty. In the five and twenty years which have passed since her retirement, stage dancing has fallen greatly. The competition is now one of indelicate display rather than of artistic grace. It is a reproach to our time to turn back the pages of Punch, and to refer to the years when that genial master of the ceremonies wrote of Mme. Taglioni's then active and glorious career upon the stage; and no less is the decorous costume in which Mrs. Punch represents her, a reproof to the artists of to-day, who seem not more inferior to her in powers of performance than they are in personal conduct.

"Yours must be a curious history," I said; "you have known so many remarkable persons." "So Count d'Orsay used to say," she replied; "he said he would give 100,000 francs to be allowed to publish my papers; but I never desired that kind of notoriety. I loved dancing for its own sake, and began to learn at nine years old, my father, an Italian dancer, being my teacher. I practiced six hours a day, till I was fifteen, when I made my début in Vienna in a piece entitled 'La Réception d'une Nymphé au Temple de Terpsichore.' At first I was rapturously applauded, and at my third performance I was called forty-two times before the curtain, till, becoming exhausted, I was carried off the stage. I was extremely active and slender in those days, and people used to say I lived in the air, and never touched the earth. I did touch it, however, mais bien rarement, pendant," she added, laughing. "I scarcely thought of the audience. I knew my father was watching me. I both loved and feared him, and danced for him alone. He was a severe teacher, but when my success was assured, he said, 'Had I told you at first you had talent, your progress would have been stopped. Self-conceit would have prevented effort, therefore I blamed rather than flattered.'"

This strict but judicious master died last year, at the advanced age of ninety-four. His daughter has always enjoyed excellent health, and as she says, "I would never know I was not young if I had not so much to remember." She insisted that "study is always required; no matter how well we know anything, we never know it well enough. Though I was considered the best dancer in the world, I continued to learn and practice two hours a day while I remained on the stage, and I always performed in the morning the dances in's ded for the evening. I constantly invented new steps and movements, and seemed to learn something every day; but when I left the theatre, I felt I had still much to learn." Like all those who have attained excellence in any art, she seems to believe less in genius than in diligent and unremitting labor, and her conversation is characterized by a singular modesty when we remember how, in her youth, she was fêted and caressed. She alluded gravely, but not sadly, to her loss of fortune during the late war, but is hopeful for the future; for, after her long retirement, she is able to teach dancing as well as in her youth, though her flying days are over. "But flying," as she observed, "is only wanted for the profession, and I no longer teach for the stage, but only for the drawing-room." Mme. Taglioni is the widow of a French nobleman, the Comte Gilbert de Voisins, but she is best known by her maiden name of Marie Taglioni. She is very active, bright and charming in manner, is extremely spirituelle, and speaks several languages. In fact, she shows how attractive a lady of middle age can be, when she unites the ease and dignity of years with habitual grace and affability. Mme. Taglioni is now established in London, and occupies herself in giving to young ladies lessons in dancing and deportment.

Specimens of the Jubilee Programmes!

1. OPENING ("AMERICAN") DAY, (June 17).
Grand Choral. "Old Hundred." Franc.
Full Chorus, Organ and Orchestra; P. S. Gilmore, Conductor.
- Overture. "Rienzi." Wagner.
Grand Orchestra, Carl Zerrahn, Conductor.
- Chorus. "Damascus." Grand Triumphal March from Oratorio of "Naamen." Costa.
Full Chorus and Orchestra; P. S. Gilmore Conductor.
- *Piano Solo. Grand Fantasia. "The Skating Ballet" from Meyerbeer's opera of "Le Prophète." Liszt.
Performed by Herr Franz Bendel (his first appearance in America).
- Four-Part Song. "Farewell to the Forest." Mendelssohn.
Full Chorus (unaccompanied); Carl Zerrahn, Conductor.
- Inflammatus. "Stabat Mater." Rossini.
Solo by Madame Erminia Rodendorf; accompanied by full Chorus, Organ and Orchestra; Carl Zerrahn, Conductor.
- *Sextet from "Lucia di Lammermoor," "Chi mi frena." Donizetti.

Sung by the Bouquet of Artists, with Orchestral accompaniment; P. S. Gilmore, Conductor.
Grand Selection of National airs of America, England, Austria, France, etc. Haydn, Gantes.
†Overture Triumphant.

[The last two pieces performed by the United States Marine Band of Washington, Henry Fries Director.]

*National Air. "Star Spangled Banner." Key. Full Chorus, with Organ, Orchestra, Military Bands, Bell and Cannon accompaniment; P. S. Gilmore Conductor; solo in third stanza sung by Mrs. Julia Houston-West.

*Grand Concert Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube." Johann Strauss.
By Grand Orchestra, conducted by the Composer, his first appearance in America.

Grand Scene from "Il Trovatore," Anvil Chorus. Verdi.

By Operatic Chorus, Full Chorus, Organ, Orchestra, Military Bands, Drum Corps, Anvil, Bell and Cannon accompaniments; P. S. Gilmore Conductor.

Chorus. "This is the witness of God," from Oratorio of "St. Peter," now in course of publication. J. K. Paine.

Full Chorus, Organ and Orchestra; conducted by the composer.

Hymn. (Bethany) "Nearer, my God, to Thee." Dr. Lowell Mason.

Chorus, Orchestra, &c.; Dr. E. Tourjee, conductor.

2. THE "ENGLISH" DAY. (June 18.)

Choral. "Now may the will of God be done." Bach. Full Chorus, Organ and Orchestra; Carl Zerrahn, Conductor.

Overture. "Leonora," No. 3. Beethoven. Orchestra; Carl Zerrahn, Conductor.

Festival Hymn. "Peace and Music." Words and Music by Dudley Buck.

Full Chorus and Orchestra; Carl Zerrahn, Conductor.

*Aria and Variations. Proch.

Madame Peschka-Leutner (her first appearance in America), with Orchestra conducted by Carl Zerrahn.

Finale to the 3d Act of "Ernani." Verdi.

Bouquet of Artists, Operatic Chorus, Full Chorus and Orchestra; P. S. Gilmore, Conductor.

Piano Solo. Fantasia on "Last Rose of Summer." Thalberg.

Madame Arabella Goddard (her first appearance in America).

Chorus from "Woman of Samaria." "Abide with me." Bennett.

Full Chorus, Organ and Orchestra; Carl Zerrahn, Conductor.

Overture. "Robin Hood." Macfarren.

†Overture. "Der Freischütz." Weber.

†Solo for Cornet. "Levyathan Polka (performed by Mr. McGrath)." Levy.

[The last three pieces performed by the Band of the Grenadier Guards of London; Dan Godfrey, leader.]

British National Anthem. "God Save the Queen"

Solo in 3d verse by Madame Rudersdorff, with Full Chorus, Orchestra, Organ, Military Bands, Bell and Cannon accompaniment; P. S. Gilmore, Conductor.

*"Star Spangled Banner."

Band of the Grenadier Guards.

Grand Concert Waltz. "Wine, Women and Song." Strauss

Orchestra; Johann Strauss, Conductor.

Scene from "Il Trovatore." Anvil Chorus. Verdi

[Given as on previous day.]

Romanza from "L'Eclair." Halévy.

1st verse, Sopranos in unison; 2d verse, Sopranos and Tenors in unison; Flute, Oboe, and Violoncello Obligato, with full Orchestral accompaniment; P. S. Gilmore, Conductor.

Chorus from "Elijah." "He watching over Israel." Mendelssohn.

Full Chorus and Orchestra; Carl Zerrahn, Conductor.

Missionary Hymn. "From Greenland's Icy Mountains." Mason.

Chorus, Organ and Orchestra; Dr. E. Tourjee, Conductor.

3. THE "GERMAN DAY." (June 19.)

Choral. "A Strong Castle is our Lord." Luther.

Chorus and Orchestra; P. S. Gilmore, Conductor.

Overture. "Tannhäuser." Wagner.

†Aria e Varie. Proch.

Mme. Peschka-Leutner with orchestral accompaniment; Carl Zerrahn, Conductor.

Chorus from "Elijah." "Yet doth the Lord." Mendelssohn.

Chorus and Orchestra; Carl Zerrahn, Conductor.

Four-Part Song. (unaccompanied) "Farewell to the Forest." Mendelssohn.

Chorus; Carl Zerrahn, Conductor.

Grand Concert Waltz. "Morgenblätter." Strauss.

*Pizzicato Polka. Strauss.

[Last two pieces by the Orchestra; Johann Strauss, Conductor.]

Piano Solo. "Souvenir de Hungary." Bendel.

†Etude for the left hand. Bendel.

Fantasia on themes from Meyerbeer's opera of "Le Prophète." Wienrecht.

†Overture to "Oberon." Weber.

†Selections from "L'Africaine." Meyerbeer.

[Last three performed by the Band of the Kaiser Franz Grenadier Regiment, of Germany; Herr Heinrich Saro, Leader.]

German Union Hymn. Dedicated to William I., Emperor of Germany. Keller.

Chorus, Organ, Orchestra, and Military Bands; M. Keller, Conductor.

"Hail Columbia" and "Yankee Doodle." Kaiser Franz Grenadier Regiment Band.

Fest and Friedens Gruss. Moehring.

Scotch Song. Me d l sohn.

†"De K p lle." Me d l sohn.

[Last three performed by Emperor William's Cornet Quartet, Messrs. Kosleik, Philipp, Senz and Diechen.]

Scene from "Les Huguenots." Benediction des Poignards. Meyerbeer.

Operatic Chorus, Full Chorus, Organ and Orchestra; P. S. Gilmore, Conductor.

"When the Swallows Homeward Fly." Abt.

1st verse by Sopranos; Second verse by Sopranos and Tenors; 3rd verse by Full Chorus; Franz Abt, Conductor.

Scene from "Il Trovatore." Anvil Chorus. Verdi.

[Given the same as at previous concerts.]

Hymn. "Kingdoms and Thrones." (Hamburg). Gregorian.

Chorus, Organ, Orchestra, and Cannon accompaniment; Dr. E. Tourjee, Conductor.

4. THE "FRENCH" DAY. (June 20.)

Gloria from Twelfth Mass. Mozart.

Chorus, Organ and Orchestra; Carl Zerrahn, Conductor.

Festival Overture. Leutner.

Orchestra; P. S. Gilmore, Conductor.

Aria. "Let the bright Seraphim" from "Samson." Handel.

Sung by Mme. Rudersdorff; Trumpet Obligato by Mr. M. Arbuckle.

*Scene from "Il Trovatore." Anvil Chorus. Verdi.

[Given as at previous concerts.]

Grand Concert Waltz. "One Thousand and One Nights." Strauss.

†Pizzicato Polka. Strauss.

Orchestra; Johann Strauss, Conductor.

Chorus. "The Heavens are Telling," from "The Creation." Haydn.

Bouquet of Artists, Chorus, Organ and Orchestra; Carl Zerrahn, Conductor.

Piano Solo. Grand International Fantasia on "God Save the Queen" and the "Star-Spangled Banner." Wehli.

Performed by James M. Wehli.

Overture to "William Tell." Rossini.

†"Marche aux Flambeaux" (Fackeltanz) No. 3, in B flat. Meyerbeer.

†"Anna Polka." (Cornet Solo by M. Sylvestre.) Legendre.

[Last three by the Band of the Garde Republicaine, of Paris, MM. Paulus and Maury, Leaders.]

*French National Hymn. "La Marseillaise." Chorus, Organ, Orchestra, Military Bands, Bell and Cannon accompaniment; P. S. Gilmore, Conductor.

Recitative and Aria from "Die Zauberflöte." Abt.

†Song. Sung by Mme. Peschka-Leutner, with Orchestral accompaniment; Carl Zerrahn and Franz Abt, Conductors.

Scene from "Faust." Soldier's Chorus. Gounod.

Operatic Chorus, Full Chorus, Orchestra and Cannon accompaniment; P. S. Gilmore, Conductor.

Solo and Chorus. "Nazareth" Gounod.

Bas Solo by members of the Bouquet of Artists; Carl Zerrahn, Conductor.

Hymn. "Watchman, Tell us of the Night." Dr. Lowell Mason.

(With all the &c., &c., as before.)

*Repeated. †Encore piece.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Dreaming and Thinking of Home. Song and Chorus. 3. G to g. Pratt. 30

One are the faces so loving and kind,
One are the hills and the valleys I know.

The familiar "home" sentiments are included in the poem, which is set to a good melody.

It was a Lover and his Lass. 3. F to f. 30

—And a hey non-ne, no ni no,
In spring time, in spring time,
The only pretty ring time.

This is from "A Selection of Old English Songs," which includes fifteen old favorites, all popular in their day. The above song was "printed" in the year 1800. Words by Shakespeare, and harmony carefully elaborated.

Thy Throne, O God. Sacred Trio. 5. C to g. Verdi. 35

An adaption of Te sol quest anima, in Attila to sacred words, and is, of course, a very brilliant Trio for the Soprano, Tenor, and Bass voices of a Quartet Choir.

Christmas comes but once a Year. 3. D minor to d. 30

The above very true statement constitutes the title of another rare old English song, dating "before 1580," when it seems they had

The pudding, mince pie, and plum porridge divine,
The stingo, the lamb-wool, the nuts, and the wine,
To make old Christmas merry.

The melody has very much of the jovial, bounding motion of "When Johnny comes marching home," and is merry, not minor, in sentiment.

Love's Glance never dies. Song and Chorus. 3. D to f. Price. 30

Let look express what words cannot
My love be told in sighs

Very well put together, and a "taking" song and chorus.

Instrumental.

Shadow Thoughts. Three Impromptus Gracieux. Pratt. ea. 30

No. 1. Hidden Whisper. 3. Eb. The whispering idea is well carried out. A neat, well constructed "Song without words."

No. 2. Mazurka. 3. Ab.

No. 3. Silent Complaint. 3. Eb. The Mazurka is a good one, and the Silent Complaint has a most original, and yet pleasing arrangement of time. It is a very encouraging thing that our younger composers can bring out, as impromptus, pieces of such decided merit.

Le Tourbillon. Impromptu. 5. Eb. Ritter. 75

The name indicates a "stormy" composition, and this is hurried, fierce, prompt, powerful;—those who like melodious notes will be sure to be pleased.

Roseau's Dream. Varied. 4. F. Cramer. 50

One of the nicest and sweetest of pieces for pupils. The melody is charmingly varied, and the variations furnish excellent practice for the fingers.

Dolly Varden Waltz. 2. C. Streathog. 40 & 50

It should be explained that there are five Dolly Varden pieces:—two Songs, a Galop, a Schottische, and a Waltz. Each piece is published with a colored title for 50 cents, and also with a plain title for 40 cents. The pictures are pretty, and worth preserving as mementoes of the present graceful folly of fashion, and the music is also good.

April Showers. Polka Brillante. 3. G. Mrs. Duer. 35

Brilliant and original.

La Doleur. Mazurka Sentimentale. 4. Db. Pratt. 40

For pieces of this grade, some few years since, we were entirely dependent on European composers. Now we have plenty of these of home production. A fine mazurka, "sad but sweet."

Les Trois Grâces. Mazurkas Elegantes. Op. 77. Aglaja. 3. Kölling 50

Very graceful. It is evident that the author has not mistaken his key-note.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 818.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUG. 10, 1872.

VOL. XXXII. No. 10.

Orchestral Players.

[From "Music and Morals," by HAWES.]

The orchestral player, if he knows his business, will deny himself the luxury of expressing too much of himself, yet is he not therefore a machine. Through the medium of the conductor, whose inspiration trickles to him by a kind of magnetism from that electric wand, he, too, realizes the music in its double capacity of expressing the composer's thought and the conductor's private reading or expression of that thought. But the Conductor is now in the place of the Soloist: his instrument is the orchestra, but that instrument is not a machine. You may imagine, if you please, a number of instruments worked by machinery; they may play a movement accurately with all its p's and f's, but that will not be an orchestral rendering of the work. It will be like the grinding of a barrel-organ, and that is all—no life, no emotion, no mind. Catgut, wooden tubes, hammering of calf-skins, and fatal explosion of brazen serpents, all this you shall accomplish with cunning mechanism, more than this you shall not. Therefore the mind, and the heart, and the skill of a man shall be required in every member of an orchestra. To the eye of an uninitiated spectator, that uniform drawing up and down of bows all in the same direction and all at once—that simultaneous blare of horns, trumpets, and flute-notes sounded instantly at the call of the magic wand, may seem like human mechanism, but it is not—it is Sympathy. The individuality of each player may indeed be merged in a larger and more comprehensive unity of thought and feeling, but it is a unity with which he is in electric accord, and to which he brings spontaneously the faculties of personal appreciation and individual skill.

Let no one say that orchestral work is beneath the dignity of a good artist. The very delays and vexations of rehearsal often unfold new turns and critical points in a great work which might otherwise pass unnoticed. The position and use of the other instruments is better realized by one who is playing in the orchestra than by any one else. The fact of the drums being close behind you will sometimes rivet your attention, unpleasantly, perhaps, upon the way in which but two notes are made to produce the illusive but beautiful effect of several repeating the leading subject, as in the opening movement of Mendelssohn's Lobgesang. The tenor close beside you forces a phrase upon your ear, the ghost of which, or a fragment of which, may be just suggested again by a distant flute a line or two farther on. You cannot miss the author's intention. Of course it is not impossible, but it is not easy for any one who has not played a violin or some other prominent instrument in such works as Beethoven's C minor, or Pastoral Symphony, and played it often, to realize the reason why certain passages are given to the tenors rather than to the violoncellos; why some notes are reinforced by the double-bass while some are left to the violoncellos; why the rhythmic beat of the drum is broken here or completed there. A great deal, no doubt, can be done by reading a full score without an orchestra. Some kind, and a very good kind, of appreciation may be formed of an orchestral work from a pianoforte score, especially if it be arranged for four hands. For perfect enjoyment again, let a person study his score at home, and then, taking his seat in a favorable position, not too near the orchestra, with his score marked for reference at certain points rather than for steady perusal, let him concentrate his mind upon the emotional development of the work with a full and foregone appreciation of its intellectual form. But still, if you really want to discover the technical mysteries of the orchestration, you must get inside and look more closely at the astonishing works; nay, you must become one of the works; you must take an instrument, and plod away in the orchestra yourself. When you have tried that, you will begin to understand why so few people succeed in writing well for an orchestra. How easy it is to mistake a tenor for a 'cello texture, or to give a phrase to the clarinet when the texture or consistency of the harmony would be best consulted by the thinner, sweeter, but equally incisive oboe.

There is, therefore, in the orchestra incessant work for the player's mind; and as he is also greatly privileged in constantly assisting in the production of master-pieces, what opportunities for the culture and discipline of the emotional regions of the soul are his! When he opens his part of the "Italian Symphony," or plunges into the "Fidelio," what a magnificent panorama of emotion opens out before him! But it is no unreal spectacle. Like Ulysses, who was a part of all he saw, he is a part of all he hears; shall not something of the spirit and power of the great composers, with whose works he is constantly identifying himself, pass into him as the reward of his enthusiasm, his docility, and his self-immolation?

It may be said that we are taking an ideal view of orchestral playing. No doubt we are dealing with the essence of the thing itself—not as it is, but as it should be. Practically as it is, the vocation of the orchestral player has many drawbacks. The weary repetition of what he knows for the sake of other players who do not know their parts, the constant thwarting of the gifted-players by the stolid ones, and the tension of long and harrowing rehearsals under conductors who do not know their own minds, or who cannot impart what they do know to the players, or who are so irritable, cantankerous, and, at the same time, so vexatiously exacting as to destroy every particle of pleasure or sympathy with their work in the breasts of the executants at the very moment when these qualities are most indispensable to the execution of the music. Then there is the cheerless musical wear and tear of regular orchestral life. The pantomime music, not in moderation and once in a way, but every night all through a protracted season; for we are afraid to say how long the pantomime goes on after the departure of that inveterate bore, Old Father Christmas.

Then really excellent players are occasionally subjected to the demoniac influences of that rhythmic purgatory known as the Quadrille Band; or the humbler violinists are to be met with, accompanied by a sharp and cornet-a-piston, making what is commonly understood to be music for the dancers in "marble halls," or any where else, it matters little enough to them. Shall we blame them if they look upon such work as mere mechanical grind—as the omnibus-horse looks upon his journey to the city and home again—a performance inevitable, indeed, but highly objectionable, and not to be borne save for the sake of the feed at the end? Then we must not forget the low salaries of many orchestral players, the small prospect of a slow rise, and the still smaller chance of ever becoming leaders in any orchestra worth leading. Or, again, the weariness and disgust of your efficient men at seeing themselves kept out of their right places by old, incompetent players.

On the Continent wise provisions are made, and retiring pensions provided by government, or there are special societies for superannuated musicians. Every man in the orchestra knows that he will have to retire when his hand begins to lose its cunning; in his old age he is honorably supported, and he deserves to be, and his place is filled up by an efficient substitute. Art does not suffer, the public does not suffer, the interests of music are not jobbed, and no one is the worse. But in England the government treats music with a supercilious smile, and with the most undisguised stinginess; as who should say, "A fig for your bands and Bear-gardens!" And the prime minister would as soon think of granting pensions to superannuated musicians as of giving an annual banquet in Westminster Hall to the industrious fraternity of the metropolitan organ-grinders.

It is quite impossible to say at what age a man gets past his work, but the conductor of every orchestra knows very well who it is that mars the whole; and it is quite notorious that whatever inferiority there is in our leading orchestras in comparison with leading Continental orchestras is chiefly owing to the fact that a conductor in England cannot very easily get rid of men who have grown infirm in their places, and who would have retired long ago from any foreign orchestra as a matter of course.

It would be foolish to underrate the value of veteran experience and steadiness, but it must be remembered that the muscles will stiffen, and the ear and eye will grow dull, and that many a man whose brain is still active may become, through mere want of flexibility and feebleness of nerve, unfit for efficient work in the orchestra. We repeat emphatically, it is impossible, with so many still splendid old players before the public, to say when age means infirmity; and when we think of the prodigies of military valor, forensic ability, literary and artistic power which we have witnessed within the last few years: when we recollect that Lord Brougham, Lord Lyndhurst, and Lord Palmerston have but lately passed away; that Thomas Carlyle is still with us; that M. Victor Hugo but lately published one of the most stirring and eloquent apostrophes to Liberty; that Sir E. Landseer continues to paint his best pictures; that M. Auber still composed operas in extreme old age; that General Garibaldi is still ready (1871) to draw the sword; that even the Pope feels equal to an Ecumenical Council; and that the aged monarch of Prussia, in company with the still more aged Von Moltke, has just been leading his troops to victory against what all Europe supposed to be the greatest military nation in the world—when we remember a few of such facts, it is not too much to say that the nineteenth century is emphatically the triumphant Era of Old Age.

Letter from Naples.

A SHORT DISQUISITION ON MUSICAL CULTURE—
ITALIAN SINGING TEACHERS IN AMERICA—EN-GAGEMENT OF SIGNOR CIRILLO FOR BOSTON—
HIS HISTORY AND REPUTATION.

(Correspondence of the Daily Advertiser.)

NAPLES, July 6, 1872.

I have been having a little jubilee of my own, but all on Boston account. Not because of Mr. Gilmore's combination, which has been talked about and made fun of even in Italy, where the unseasonable rains and almost the inundation of the Po have been attributed to badinage to the atmospheric disturbances produced by the thunderous racket he was causing to be made on the other continent. The reason of my great pleasure is a much simpler event, but one which I believe is to have the best effect upon vocal culture and the art of singing in Boston; and as one who has had in times past the opportunity of using these columns in behalf of good training and good performance, as well as in criticism of what was bad, in musical matters and manners, I feel impelled to write a few paragraphs about it.

In a letter about the Naples conservatory of music, which appeared in the Advertiser perhaps a twelvemonth ago, I took occasion to say that I considered Naples the best city for a student of vocalism. (Possibly I did not say, what it is but just to add, by way of parenthesis, that for a young vocalist, desiring to adopt public singing as a profession and to make his débuts in Italy, Milan would be the best place to finish in, because there and at Bologna are to be met the majority of the managers and the managers' agents.) I found my reasons in the influence of the conservatory, whose traditions and associations are better than those of Milan or Bologna in many respects, as also in the equability and healthfulness of the climate, and the brío of life there. For, of all people under the sun, the musician needs to be within reach of gay and distracting influences. His constitution and pursuits are generally such as to make him nervously sensitive, moody and morbid, and he ought at times to be almost driven away from himself to save him from depression, despondency and perhaps even the renunciation of his profession. The student or the artist should alike have his quiet place for work; but when he issues thence, he should find himself at once in the midst of a brilliant nature and a busy people. He must every now and then "come out of his shell."

Sun Carlo has no doubt fallen painfully low as a model of performance, or as a school of criticism, and during the last winter it has been the scene of the most disgraceful quarrels and disturbances. The petty limitations of the municipal committee, and their extraordinary demands; the whims and the obstinacy of a pecuniarily embarrassed manager; the contentions of the partisans of different authors; the intrigues of the music publishers, whose chief object in life seems to be the prevention of a knowledge of all musical works except the one opera they are engaged in compelling the public to accept; the scarcity of good singers, and the impossibility of engaging great ones; the necessity of expending enormous sums for the ballet, and of paying back a large part of the municipal subvention to the hundreds of people employed about the theatre under municipal direction, and consequently not amenable to managerial discipline,—these things and others have combined to destroy the intrinsic excellence of the opera at San Carlo, and to render it valueless as a criterion. At the Fonda,—as at many minor theatres elsewhere,—one may hear an opera evenly rendered, and only perceive a lack of strength in the choral and orchestral masses.

Notwithstanding the deterioration apparent in public performance, the spirit of music still lives in Naples and exerts a power for good. Whatever the passing traveller, or the theorist prejudiced in favor of some ultramontane school, may say to the contrary, there is a plenty of serious work done within the walls and under the influence of the college of music, which is in its principles conservative enough, although, no doubt, a lazy lad can manage to slip through his course there with little study and insignificant acquirement; and whenever the public wants the best in music, it will be found that our city has musicians enough able and ready to supply it. Instrumental music and composition, in the oratorio form or upon the model of Bach, may best, of course, be studied in Germany, because there the study can be complemented with the exemplary performance, but the voice must be studied in Italy or according to the Italian systems.

A great fault of our day is the ignoring of what the human voice is and what it can do. The songs of Schumann, of Franz, and even of Schubert, constantly show that those authors did not understand the voice, or were unwilling to consider it. Schumann, especially, has many songs which are really rhapsodies for the piano-forte, with an obligato for the singer, who may get it in if he can. Instead of the instrument being there for the singer, it is the singer who is thrust in to take out what the instrument cannot be made to do alone. There is an ingenious double composition, but no song. The Passion Music of Bach bristles with passages which are no more fit to be sung than is half Wagner's writing, or than are the great master's own fugues and counterpointed chorals. The human throat is treated as though it were no living organ, but a mere bit of dead mechanism, to be set in operation to produce the portions of an elaborated harmonic work for which no other instrument will exactly suit, because unable to enunciate syllables. Even Mendelssohn himself, as Emma Seiler proves in her wise little book, frequently violated in his settings the laws of nature in the voice. As an ideal translation of poetic into musical ideas, a composition may satisfy the reason and touch the feeling of the most critical, when as a practical bit of vocal music even the inexperienced may rightly set it down as a failure. The Italian authors only, as a class, have considered the limitations of the voice; they have the most singable language, almost entirely free from unfavorable elements; and their systems are the only ones which can make the most of the natural voice and prepare it to cope to the greatest advantage with the elementary difficulties of rougher tongues and the technical ones of severer schools.

It will be observed that I make an ample distinction between Italian music and Italian vocalism, and that I am limiting myself to the praise of the latter, and of the former as a vehicle for the same. And I am far from putting forward the notion that all Italian vocalists are good singers. I believe a first-rate Chickering pianoforte to be the best instrument of its kind in the world; but I have seen some pianos of that make which I would not have cared to hear more than once. But if a first rate vocalist of the real, old-fashioned, sincere, laborious Italian school can be found, I take him to be the best of all vocalists. And I have always wished that in Boston there could be established a teacher who knew all about that school, and would bring up young singers patiently, conscientiously and slowly in it. There is such a deal of dreadful incompetency and assumption—sometimes imposture, too—among the teachers of Italian vocalism in the United States! I have inquired about the antecedents of more than one "Professor" who gets enormous prices from credulous American fathers for teaching Italian singing to their children, only to find that he was unknown among musicians here, or had at best left behind him but the reputation of a mediocre instrumentalist, untried in the nature and training of the voice, and among whose old companions the wonder was increasing that such a man should have been able to make place and fortune among a people so well educated and intelligent as the Americans. If any properly trained vocalist has gone from Italy to America purely as a teacher and not as a singer, it has been the exception in the first place, and not the rule. And I believe I do not err in my opinion that no such teacher has been latterly resident in Boston. Corelli was before me, and I have the impression that Mme. Arnoult's method was rather French than Italian; if among the others who have taught since their day there be one who is such as I describe—a teacher by profession from the beginning, educated at home to the knowledge and practice of what would be accepted here as the best schools, I never heard of him, and should be very glad to learn his name and look up his antecedents.

In the before mentioned letter upon the College of Music here, I named two men who I wished could have the training of some young Americans earnest in their desire to learn to sing and willing to devote the much time and labor which are absolutely necessary. And what has induced me to break out into this disquisition is the gratifying knowledge that one of those men is about to leave Naples and take up his residence in Boston. The Mendelssohn Quintette Club, desirous to secure for their new musical college teachers representing the best of all countries and schools, sent out to Italy to know if "the right man" could be had for their Italian department. Whoever knows the Quintette Club will understand just how much is implied in those three short words. One letter led to another, advice was taken, the merits of different men were canvassed, and it was finally decided to make a proposition to Signor Cirillo. About the same time he received a pressing offer to remove to Genoa, and negotiations had likewise been opened with him for assuming the directorship of a Government institution in Athens. But the offer of the club was definite and liberal, and no country shines out to the young, the ambitious and the hopeful like America. After some deliberation the decision was reached and has been already notified, so that I cannot be divulging any secret of the club in announcing here the engagement which they have been so fortunate as to make, and which is to date from the beginning of their first term.

As I understand it, Signor Cirillo is to assume the direction of the vocal studies of the college with relation to the development of the voice as an instrument, without prejudice to the application which the scholar may subsequently make of it in one or another class of music. Naturally, if, when the organ has been made full, true, flexible and expressive, the singer chooses to devote himself to the Italian school, he will remain with his Italian instructor; but if he should prefer to cultivate German music, or English music, either of the secular or the sacred character, he will find in the college another master who will teach him to render such music with his perfected voice acquiring apropos the delivery and phrasing appropriate to the authors of his chosen school. This, it seems to me, is exactly as it should be.

I do not wish to run the risk of endangering Signor Cirillo's usefulness by such anticipatory commendation as shall seem to promise more than a mortal man can reasonably be expected to make good. But as I know much about him, I may venture to say a little, because I believe thoroughly in him as a man who is needed in Boston, and who is capable of doing a great deal of good there. It may be remembered that the Advertiser was perhaps the only paper in the country—certainly the only one in Boston—which from its own acquaintance promised a great singer in Mme. Parepa, and certainly it was never charged with having overrated her merits. A brief sketch, then, and I leave the subject. Signor Cirillo was educated at the Naples conservatory, at the expense of the government, having won his place by a successful contest with fourteen competitors. He studied singing, composition, the pianoforte and the organ, the former under Buzzi, who was the best master that Naples has had in half a century. During Buzzi's last year of failing health, Cirillo taught his special pupils, and after his graduation was continued on the staff of masters for five years, so that he became well acquainted with the system of class instruction. By that time his private lessons compelled him to renounce his connection with the conservatory, and he has had ever since perhaps more constant occupation than any other master in Naples. He is a close student as well as a painstaking teacher, and his system of training, which is quite his own, is sufficiently elastic to be adapted to the special wants of each particular pupil, instead of being applied arbitrarily to all alike. I have seen excellent results from it even when the pupils were not unusually gifted and were studying merely as amateurs, and I know it would effect great things for anybody who should go to work with a will under his direction.

The London "Musical World" on Gilmore's Jubilee.

The World's Peace Jubilee is over; not only for our Transatlantic cousins, who are now fast forgetting it in the excitement of an eager life, but over, also, for us, who have watched it at the distance of four thousand miles. In other words, we know all there is to know about the affair, and can duly appreciate its achievements and its significance. Occupying this vantage ground, a last word may not be out of place.

There are two sides to everything, and the big American Festival has its two sides; one, ludicrous, the other, serious. We fear that the amiable tendencies of human nature have prompted many persons to look chiefly upon the former. At any rate, journalistic human nature has regarded the ludicrous aspect almost exclusively, as being a cheap suggestive of "smart" writing, and a ready excuse for sneers. We admit the provocation to be great. Mr. Gilmore's huge barn on Boston Common—his fluctuating army of singers and players—his sensational admixture of hymn tunes, sacred choruses, colored minstrels, military bands, cannon, bells, and anvils, are irresistible as a recipe for inducing mirth. We cannot help laughing at them, especially when the agglomeration is invoked in the name of art; but he makes a great mistake who sees nothing in the entire affair but food for his humor. The very fact that such a gigantic speculation has been carried out to the end is, in itself, worth serious thought; the full understanding of it being, perhaps, possible only to those who understand the condition of American society in general, and of American music in particular. Our cousins, sensitive though they be, will hardly take offence at the remark, that life with them is chiefly influenced by material considerations. Their "go aheadism" means accumulating dollars, and winning a high place among the aristocracy of wealth; the work of doing this being business and pastime in one. A young and vigorous people is always so, things which are not productive of tangible profit having but a small share of their thoughts. Hence the comparatively small attention enjoyed by music in America, as a branch of culture and a means of intellectual delight. Generally speaking, the people have "no time for that sort of thing," and are satisfied to take what comes in a casual way without effort of their own. This sufficiently explains the elementary condition of music among our kinsmen. It accounts for the tolerance they show towards performances which, among an older people, would not be endured for an hour. It accounts, also, for the infantile state of native American art, and for the ease with which all sorts of pretenders to musical ability pick up a living across the water. We readily acknowledge that a love for music exists among the American people, and we as readily believe that in course of time they will occupy splendid rank as an artistic nation. But that time is not yet; and, meanwhile, the Boston Jubilee does seem a natural outcome from the actual state of things. Cultivated Americans—and there are many of them—would scarcely allow this remark to pass unchallenged; but we say again that Mr. Gilmore's Festival illustrates the average of American taste. If not, why the support it has received, the attention it has excited, and the jubilation to which it has given rise among all classes of society? If not, it would simply have been an impossibility. In point of fact, this is its only raison d'être. The Festival has compelled attention to the existence and claims of music in a form adapted to attain that end by the quickest means and in the most general way. Anything higher would have missed its mark; anything less sensational would have attracted less notice. It is nothing, moreover that, stimulated by the desire to take part in such an affair, thousands of amateurs all over the States have worked hard to qualify themselves?—or that many more thousands have heard, however imperfectly, some masterpieces of art? For such a result we would condone the cannon, bells and anvils; and would pardon all the other sensations of the "big show." Shrewd managers of Sunday schools find cake and tea remarkable helps towards the instruction of the rising race. The Boston "serrations" were cakes and tea in their way; and enticed by them, the great American public received not a few useful lessons. In this light we would regard the Jubilee—a light far more pleasant than that which exhibits it as merely a butt for witicism.

We take the following weighty words of wisdom from the New York Times. The Boston Jubilee, by giving occasion for their utterance, was not altogether without good result:—

"The failure of the Boston Peace Jubilee teaches one lesson which we may well ponder, and that is, that a big thing is not always good and strong, or even successful in proportion to its bigness. The average citizen has been accused of measuring greatness altogether by material size, and we fear that there is some reason for the accusation. For him to say that such and such a thing was 'the biggest on this continent,' was to express eulogy in its highest conceivable form. The discipline of reverses took some of that nonsense out of him during the war, and now here is another little lesson of the same sort, which he will surely listen to, because it is accompanied by a forfeiture in the form of dollars and cents. It is not comforting to us, whatever the journals of the 'Hub' may think, to reflect that some of our Boston friends will have a deficiency of $250,000 to make up anent this dismal failure. But if that loss, multiplied by a hundred, could be distributed over the country, it might be profitably paid, if the failure it atoned for and emphasized should teach us all the weakness of that material vastness we are apt to overrate, and the value of that discipline, thoroughness, and finish we are so inclined to undervalue."

Our Grenadier Band at Boston.

(From the London Orchestra, July 19.)

The Americans have held their great sensational gathering, and music has been the peacemaker. The choir consisted of some twenty thousand voices selected from the singers in the New England churches. There was the English band, the bands of France, Germany, and America, the English day, the French and German day, the American and the programme was made up of all schools, styles, characters, and descriptions. The three great events were the singing of the "Old Hundred Psalm" at the opening of the Jubilee, and the playing of "God save the Queen" by our own Grenadier band, followed by this band's delivery of the American National Hymn: "The Star-spangled Banner." It must be noticed that the three Hymns stood pre-eminently foremost. Their old stereotyped expression of musical thought, known to every one—man, woman, and child—easy of understanding and easy to follow, carried all before them. They put the audience on one level, helped the people to do what they desired—to sing; and created a scene, something to be remembered from that time forth for evermore. The enthusiasm was tremendous, the glow and outburst terrific. These three songs were hymns—something beyond the creed of science, the mere impression on the senses—glimpses beyond the finite, the awakened echoes of the old Faith, the recognition of the one Sovereign Invisible Ruler and the but one race—his people. These hymns made a sympathizing brotherhood of the many thousands present, and brought out in all its force that grand mystery—the relation of the art of sounds with the soul of man.

Second to the singing and playing of these Hymns, was their manner of delivery by our English bands. Confessedly it stands that the Americans never before heard our national hymn of "God save the Queen" played in the way our soldiers gave it. And further, it appears by general report, that never before did the Americans hear their own national hymn, "the Star-spangled Banner," given with such force and direction, such definite conception and feeling, such clear and unmistakable sympathy. The latter fact—if fact it be—is curious. With the echoes of olden days—the rendering of the John Bull anthem of Queen Elizabeth's time—imagination might have some share; and the slightest variation in time and circumstance would be received as the voice of inspiration—the teaching of the long-buried prophet in song—the solemn legacy of an apostle.

But with the comparatively modern hymn of "the Star-spangled Banner" there were not, and could not be, any such associations. Surely the Americans themselves best knew the truest and most faithful expression of their own national song. The Americans lack not instruments, nor voices, and must be credited with familiarity with every phase and trait of their national hymn; and notwithstanding all this our Grenadier Band gave them a new feeling, an unknown perception of the character of their tune which seemed something beyond the mere external. If "God save the Queen" was never before sung with such heart and voice, it is confessed that never before was "the Star-spangled Banner" played with such power and telling effect on the American continent as it was given by our red-coated instrumentalists on that memorable day in Boston. The deeds of our Grenadiers that morning were worth, it is said, the entire cost of the building of the Coliseum. With the national song we get accustomed to its manner and thought, and no one sets to work to dig for ideas to re-clothe or re-adjust it in any way. Probably the English band gave "The Star-spangled Banner" on this occasion with a new score—the work of their band-master; there might have been some little thing removed, and some other small point helped and brought out the more prominently, but we incline to imagine the effect was chiefly produced by the simple, earnest, manly, and unpretending mode of its delivery. Whatever of fresh manner appeared it met the popular hand and heart, and the fervor with which it was received arose from the prevailing idea that our soldiers could not go wrong, and that their way of melting up the national American hymn was the very best thing in the world. In listening to the London way the faculties of the audience were changed. It was not the accustomed way—there was rest from that. It was the Englishman thinking and acting for the American in real earnest, without mask or pretence, and this gave the performance a character both new and dignified.

The result of this extraordinary gathering for the performance of music at Boston, demonstrates that the Americans are, as regards musical compositions, thoroughly and altogether English. They have none of their own of any high and classical character, but they possess the power, as we do, of distinguishing the wheat from the straw and stubble. They are far too materialistic to turn out a real composer of music. Phenomenalism and sensationalism never yet made a Bach or Handel, a Haydn, Mozart or Beethoven, and never will do so. Whilst they tolerate the stuff and rubbish of the modern pseudo-genius, they have too much good sense either to swear by it or imitate it. They stand forward, if not foremost, in their appreciation of good and classical music, and more especially in their keen perception of its proper and just delivery. It is sheer vanity and presumption for any second-rate European artist to go to America and attempt to take the big rôle. No European artist is so quickly and truthfully measured as in America. And yet they have no music—those Americans—nor can they make either player or singer. The American player when he comes to Europe must sit himself down and learn how to play classical music. The American vocalist, must be transformed into the European, and that is a huge difficulty. The American vocalist, like the English vocalist, cannot uphold or advance the Italian opera, and although we have shining and brilliant, and in some instances commanding, success on the American side with the Italian and French opera, we have no real, true Italian vocalization, no Italian utterance, and in fact, nowadays, no Italian opera at all. It has become cosmopolitan. The Swede, the Russian, the Pole, the Frenchman, the Englishman, the American—all assist in these days to make up what is called the Italian opera, and Meyerbeer is the chief apostle thereof. If the American vocalist cannot sing Italian opera in the old and veritable Italian way, certain it is, he or she cannot sing in the school of Handel. This is not singular, for neither can the French nor the German vocalist. It is not a case of tradition. It is sheer want of perception—want of take in—the power to receive and hold what the composer meant. These vocalists mistake the composer, confound his ideal, and grope round his score in more than Egyptian darkness. They may talk of Handel, but they do not believe in him, cannot see into his music, are never in earnest over him, and never truly work at him. They deny the truth of his expression, and as to the marvels of his dramatic life, it is all "total eclipse" with them.

There is no foundation for high classical music in America, for there is hardly any Sunday music (and all national taste and action in music must be measured from Sunday work in song) that is not namby-pamby stuff, something a little short of abomination. It is perfectly incredible what baby-pap is doled out Sunday after Sunday in the American churches. Imagine the Ward-Beecher and Talmadge rations in music! Well, this would be had enough, but it does not meet the case. The American choir, singing in their churches on Sunday is most lamentable. The sentimentalism approaches the idiotic. There is no pretence for the old faith, it is mere hypocritical imitation of the lowest and most effeminate thoughts in secular music of the day. No old master in song would teach such music, or permit any pupil to sing it under any circumstances. Before there can be any American composer, any American oratorio, there must be American faith in real service and worship music. In Europe the church schools have been given up as nurseries for song and classical composition, and the consequence is that the clergy and organists, chanters and chant-makers are all going the broad way that leadeth to destruction. There will soon be no such thing as any distinctive school for church music. Our American brethren should take in hand what we have laid aside—real artistic education for distinctively church purposes. Let them form nurseries for song as the old Churchmen did in England, France and Italy, and discard the shadow for the substance. These would soon prove important enlargements of the empire of musical art, and the next Boston Festival would be something for all America to hear, and all the world to talk about.

What a Prussian Thought of It.

The following is translated from a letter written by a member of the Prussian band, and printed in the Berlin Staatsbürger Zeitung: Our passage to America was agreeable. We had not to struggle either with storms or too high billows. The sea sickness we drove into the ocean; let it be buried there. On the 15th of June we landed at Hoboken, where we were received by the municipal authorities with music, singing, flags and firing of cannon, with hurrahs, hand-shaking and embraces, so that the cordiality of the reception almost turned our heads, and we finally began to believe we had delivered America, without knowing it, from some enemy or other. The deputation that had us welcome appeared in the uniform of Prussian officers, with helmets and horse-tails, and the musicians wore Prussian caps. The only thing we missed were the pretty maids in white. But they omitted them solely because many members of our band are married men, and a reception by pretty girls, the good people of Hoboken feared, might give offence to our wives at home.

I don't remember how often they played and sang to us the "Watch on the Rhine;" but I recall the fact that we were escorted in the midst of them in triumph by an immense concourse of people to the first hotel of the city. The hands of beautiful ladies waved handkerchiefs from all the windows: they threw to us fragrant nosegays and wreaths, and some even threw kisses—but that you need not tell our wives and sweethearts. But it was not until we were seated at the breakfast table that our hosts found out what havoc we Prussians can make in a charge; and splendid wines and champagne flowed here so liberally that we finally had to decline them with thanks—and you know best what that means in the case of a member of the Prussian band. In our gratitude we would have gladly played for the good people of Hoboken; but we were absolutely unable so to do—the mouth-pieces could no longer find the mouths.

If our reception in Hoboken was bewildering, in Boston it was absolutely mad. Imagine our triumphal entry into Berlin after the war, and you have something like a picture of our reception in Boston. The French musicians, who, in 1867, received the prize together with us, did not even look at us. At first we were afraid they would burst with envy in the street; but I think that their physical constitution is, after all, quite solid. At first we greeted them from sheer pity; but the parlez-vous passed us like surly oxen. "Allez-vous-en!" we said, and now we raise our hands no longer to our caps. The Englishmen, on the other hand, are our best friends. The band, under Godfrey's leadership, plays splendidly. It holds but little intercourse with the French. To enable us to accept all the invitations we receive here from private citizens, it would be necessary for the day to contain nine times twenty-four hours and the night twice as many.

As for the Jubilee, to tell you the sober truth, it is a tremendous, truly American humbug! We do not believe that the persons who undertook it will make their expenses. The Boston booksellers will certainly do a thriving business with the little work, "Deafness is Curable." When we are done in Boston we shall go elsewhere; but where? The gods know, perhaps. We are overwhelmed with invitations from all quarters, and Saro has already seriously considered whether, to comply with all demands, he had not better send one of us to every city that wants us. I might write you a good deal more, but the heat here is nearly always fully "thirty carats," and one does not feel like doing anything but drinking. The beer is not good, and I would give the whole French band for one keg of Berlin Tivoli beer on ice!—Advertiser.

A HEALTH TO MADAME ROUZAUD. Hymen has rarely lighted so brilliant a torch as when he presided, the day before yesterday, at the auspicious nuptials of Mademoiselle Christine Nilsson and M. Auguste Rouzaud. We say auspicious because all the facts and circumstances connected with the event are of the happy sort, and give the promise of a marriage life of thorough sympathy and devoted affection. Those who know Miss Nilsson are well satisfied that it was a love-match. From among a great multitude of admirers who were ready to lay rank and fortune at her feet she chose this gentleman, as one who had shown by his constancy the sincerity of his passion; and all the adulation that has been paid her in the capitals of the world, "the applause of applauded men," the incense of the queens of society, has been as nothing in comparison with the homage of this one heart. Mutual attachment is a desirable thing to begin with in a wedding, and in this union all the other incidents were gratifying. To be married by the Dean of Westminster under the roof of the ancient Abbey, to be "given away" by a high dignitary of the diplomatic circle, to receive a diamond bracelet from the Princess of Wales, happens to very few simple country girls in this prosaic age, and sounds more like the imaginary and delightfully improbable plot of a libretto than actual fact. Yet all this took place, and as the young lyric artist knelt at the altar with her bridegroom, in the presence of the rank and fashion of London, the sculptured Handel that looked down on the scene from Poet's Corner might well have sounded his marble trumpet in a nuptial march.

The wedding journey of our prima donna is to be made in a visit to Sweden, the dear native land she has never forgotten, and never seen since she achieved fame and fortune. There she has several brothers and sisters, who have been made comfortable for life through her bounty, and who will receive her with pride and pleasure; and there, at this moment, the best wishes of hundreds of friends and thousands of admirers will follow her from this side of the Atlantic.—N. Y. Evening Post.

Thomas's Garden Concerts.

A correspondent of the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin, July 17, writes:

The building in which the concerts are given is on the southern boundary of the Park, at the corner of Seventh avenue. Somewhat isolated, upon that rocky and desolate tract, which beyond has undergone such a magical change, it rises spangled with gas jets, a delightful refuge to many hastening out from the hot city, or ready, after a cool stroll in the Park, to refresh the body and mind.

The auditorium is quite large, with one gallery, and would readily seat three thousand people in close order, but, fortunately, neither extreme order or disorder is known. The floor is set with numerous tables, at the sides of which visitors seat themselves, and then they chat quietly, order and enjoy refreshments, gaze about at each other, and at the gaudy allegories on the ceiling, smoke and listen as pleases them best. The concert commences at eight, when but a handful are generally present. The musicians, however, tune up as if they knew what an audience to expect, and Thomas takes the stand with his accustomed quiet confidence and dignity. Car load after car load arrive, and by the time that the first of the three parts of the programme is completed the scene is a very different one. The fashionable and middle classes and various nationalities are most interestingly represented in the large audience now to be observed. The few left in Fifth Avenue and the many from any other; the New Yorker, Philadelphian, Bostonian and Jerseyite; English, French, German, Cuban and Italian; Christian and Helrow, Grantist or Greeleyite; all are to be remarked by the student of human nature, be he patriot, theologian, or politician. The intervals between the parts are long and give new animation to the assemblage. On one side of the auditorium is a wide hall opening freely into it; on the other a large bar-room and restaurant, and, in the rear of the stage—most attractive of all—a covered garden, in which all so disposed may promenade the parallelogram of gravel walk, or occupy benches and chairs within the procession. Here one can watch the panorama of faces in the subdued light, enjoying the evening, and still be entertained by the music; for the stage is so little enclosed in the rear that only the pianissimo passages of the orchestra are interrupted.

At each interval the audience effervesces; garden, hall and bar-room are filled from the auditorium, and the stage empties its half a hundred of thirsty geniuses amid the indiscriminate throng at the bar, shouting for lager, and seizing the frothing glasses which are hastily supplied to it. At length a roll call on the drum restores orchestra and audience to their places, and those couples lingering in the garden who have relapsed into personal sentiment take up again the more general one which the next musical composition inspires. The performance, it is needless to inform the reader, is of the highest order, and this representative orchestra of our continent is in such thorough drill that what pleases so greatly now is often but the rehearsal for more ambitious concerts of the season to come. Thomas, with experienced judgment, is constantly presenting novelties to teach his audience and perfecting the execution of such compositions as please it, so that his repertoire is as remarkable in extent and variety as it is charming in rendition. The result of this care it is to be hoped that many of your readers may enjoy at the Garden Concert here, or, if not, with a greater satisfaction when the Orchestra shall again visit Philadelphia.

H.

ZELTER AND HIS PUPIL. The first test to which Goethe put the young artist (Mendelssohn) was to make him improvise on a theme furnished by Zelter. Zelter sat down to the piano, and with his stiff, cramped fingers played a very simple tune in triplets, "Ich träumte einst von Hännchen," as tame and trivial an air as need be. Felix played it through after him, and the next minute went off into the wildest allegro, transforming the simple melody into a passionate figure, which he took now in the bass, now in the upper part, weaving in all manner of new and beautiful thoughts into it in the boldest style. Everybody was in astonishment, as the small childish fingers worked away at the great chords, mastering the most difficult combinations, and evolving the most surprising contrapuntal passages out of a stream of harmonies, though certainly without paying much regard to the melody. It was one of Zelter's principles to be very chary of praise; his aim being to have his pupil from conceit and over-estimation of his own powers—"those cursed enemies of all artistic progress," as he called them. No sooner therefore had Felix finished than he said, in a tone of the most complete indifference, like an old pedagogue bent on spoiling the boy's brilliant success: "What hobgoblins and dragons have you been dreaming about, to drive you along in that helter-skelter fashion!" Goethe saw his object, and taking the hand of the little artist in his two hands, and caressing it, said in a playful way: "But you won't get off with that; you must play more before we can quite believe in you." So Felix had to play Bach's fugues, of which Goethe was particularly fond; then he asked for a minuet, upon which the boy cried out with flashing eyes, "Shall I play upon the most beautiful one in the whole world?" and played the minuet from Don Juan.—Goethe and Mendelssohn, by M. E. von Glehn.

THE MEERESSTILLE AND MENDELSSOHN. Dost thou remember, how we drove away from Padua along the Brenta one evening? The glowing Italian night oppressed us, and one after another, the travellers closed their eyes. Towards morning a voice cried "Ecco, ecco, Signori, Venezia!" The sea, still, immense, outspread before us—only on the far horizon, fine sparkles played up and down, as though the small waves softly spoke together in dreams. So does it interwave, and sparkle, and throb, in Mendelssohn's "Meeresstille;" we dream sleepily, listening to it; we become a thought—rather than that we then think. The Beethovenian chorus after Goethe, and the accentuated words, sound almost rough beside these spider-web tones of the violins. Near the close, such harmony is unloosed and resolved, as if the poet surely looked too deeply into the eyes of a daughter of Nerus, seeking to draw him down; but then upspring a higher wave, the sea grows more murmurous everywhere, the sails flap, the pennants wave, and now away, away. "Which of Meritis' overtures do you like the best?" asked a simpleton near me—and as then the keys E minor, B minor, and D major embraced in a triad of the graces, I could think of no better answer than the best, "all of them." But indeed Meritis conducted as if he had composed the overture himself, and the orchestra played worthily; and then a remark of Florestan's struck me. It was played he said, much as he used to play when he came from the provinces to study with Master Raro; this middle point between art and nature was his most fatal crisis; then came such a hesitation, such a stiffness, that he doubted his own talent. "Fiery as I was, and fervidly as I conceived every work, yet now I must take everything slowly. For my part I disliked the conductor's stick in the overture as in the symphony.—Schumann's Writings on Music." Translated by Fanny Raymond Ritter.

*Mendelssohn. †Schumann himself. ‡Another name for himself.

Music Abroad.

London.

NATIONAL MUSICAL MEETINGS. Of the first two days of this curious experiment at the Crystal Palace we have already copied an account. The sequel is thus told by the Musical World of July 13.

On the third day there were competitions among choral societies, not exceeding 200 in number. A prize of £100, competed for by the South London Choral Association, the Brixton Choral Society, and the Tonic Sol-fa Association—after each choir had been heard in Mendelssohn's well known psalm, "Judge me, O Lord," and the madrigal of Orlando Gibbons, "The Silver Swan," the first and third in Mozart's "Ave Verum," and the second in the choros, "How soon our towering hopes," from Handel's Joshua—was awarded by the judges (Sir Julius Benedict, Mr. Barnby, and Mr. Arthur S. Sullivan) to the Tonic Sol-fa Association, accompanied by marked approval of the other competing choirs. To the Brixton Choral Society a diploma was also awarded for sight-singing—the piece submitted to them being "Grant us, O Lord," a four-part anthem by Mr. Barnby. The next performance was by military bands—one of them being the band of the Royal Engineers, conductor, Mr. Sawerthal, the other the band of St. George's Rifle Corps, conductor, Mr. Phassey, to each of whom, as there was no contest, the judges (Sir Julius Benedict, Sirnor Rundegger, and Mr. F. Godfrey in one case, Sir Julius Benedict, Mr. W. G. Cousins, and Dr. Rimbault in the other) awarded the prize of £50. It is not in our province to criticize these performances, and all we need say is that, in our opinion, nothing could be more impartial and correct than the decision of the judges.

The fourth performance was more interesting than any of its predecessors; and that such had been the expectation of the public generally was proved by the vastly increased attendance. Proceedings were begun by the Bristol Choral Union, a splendid body of men's voices, who sang a chorus from Mendelssohn's Edipus, a serenade ("the Gondolier") by Schubert, &c., in such a manner that a prize of £50 was readily awarded to them by the judges (Messrs. Henry Smart, Henry Leslie, and J. L. Hatton,) although there were no opponents to contest it. The Bristol Choral Union, like the Brixton Choral Society, was also tested in sight singing, and came forth from the ordeal with equal success, the piece chosen for the occasion being a four part song for men's voices ("The Homeward Watch"), the composition of Mr. Henry Smart. Then came a real contest between two well trained military bands, the band of the 2d Battalion Rifle Brigade and that of the 33rd Regiment, each of whom played Weber's Jubilee overture and a march by Gungl, called the Rekrut. The judges (Sir Sterndale Bennett, Messrs. J. L. Hatton, and Arthur Sullivan,) awarded the prize to the band of the 33rd Regiment, accompanied by a high commendation of that of the 2nd Battalion Rifle Brigade. What ensued was the most striking feature of the day, although not a competition. Nevertheless, it was a trial of merit, for the award of the "Challenge Prize" for choral societies not exceeding 500 in number—the prize being estimated at a value of £1,000. This was readily awarded by the judges (Sir Sterndale Bennett, Messrs. J. L. Hatton, and Brinley Richards,) to the South Wales Choral Union, one of the freshest, most powerful, best balanced, and musical body of voices to which we can remember at any time to have listened. With such voices as these to help them out, only provided that Handel's oratorios and other "Saxon" music be admitted at their anniversary celebrations, the Welsh Eisteddfodau might be perennial. When it is remembered that this large chorus is almost entirely drawn from the laboring classes of the "principality"—miners, colliers, &c., their wives, daughters, and relatives—we cannot but wonder at the excellence they have attained—an excellence unattainable except through assiduous and continued study. The result is satisfactory beyond measure. The pieces selected for the South Wales Choral Union were of no ordinary difficulty—which, when we name the final chorus from J. S. Bach's Passion of St. Matthew, "In tears of grief," "Round about the starry throne," from Handel's Samson, and "The night is departing," from Mendelssohn's Lobgesang, will readily be understood. To these were added the national Welsh air "The Men of Harlech" (Mr. John Thomas's arrangement), and, "God bless the Prince of Wales," by Mr. Brinley Richards, both of which, sung in the Welsh tongue, were received with the utmost possible enthusiasm. This exhibition of Welsh choral singing was decidedly the feature of the National Music Meetings, and alone sufficient to render them memorable.

After the competitions and adjudication of prizes, on the third and fourth days, as had been the case at the first and second, there was a miscellaneous concert, the winners of prizes and diplomas exhibiting their talents, combined with performances by the Crystal Palace orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Munns, &c. On Saturday afternoon the first Sydenham Eisteddfod may be said to have culminated with a grand concert, in which almost all remarkable during the foregoing proceedings was re-introduced—the choral societies, military and volunteer bands, and solo vocalists, each taking a part in it. The proceedings require no detailed description. It will suffice to add that what had pleased before, pleased again; and that the administrations of the judges were, for the greater part, with the aid of increased experience, unanimously admitted to be impartial. At the end of the concert the National Anthem was performed, by the combined chorus and orchestra; and, shortly afterwards, the prizes were distributed by H. R. H. the Duke of Edinburgh, who, with characteristic good taste, refrained from a long preliminary address, leaving explanations to Mr. Thomas Hughes, chairman of the Crystal Palace, and simply addressing a word or two of congratulation to each of the successful candidates. Previous to his departure three hearty and unanimous cheers were raised for the Duke of Edinburgh, which were graciously acknowledged. The attendance on Saturday was larger than on any previous occasion, thus showing plainly that the public have become interested in the National Music Meetings, which, if carried on next year with the same spirit and with such improvements as time and reflection suggest, and as the Crystal Palace alone possesses the means of giving to them, may not only become a permanent institution, but a real public benefit.

HIS MAJESTY'S OPERA: Last week were presented Il Trovatore, with Mdlle Tietjens and Signor Campanini; Lucia di Lammermoor, with Mdlle. Christine Nilsson; Semiramide, with Mdlle. Tietjens; Faust, with Mdlle. Nilsson, Madame Trebelli-Bettini, M. Capoul, Signori Rota and Mendioroz, and Rigoletto, with Miss Clara-Louise Kellogg, Signor Campanini, &c. As all these were repetitions, the bare record of their having been given is sufficient. Nevertheless, it may not be out of the way to add that the performance of Semiramide, Rossini's last grand Italian opera, with its admirable "ensemble," under the direction of Sir Michael Costa, and the no less admirable impersonations of the chief characters—by Mdlle. Tietjens, the only Semiramide now on the stage, Mdlle. Trebelli-Bettini, than whom a better Arsace since the incomparable Albani has not appeared, and Signor Agnesi, now as good and effective an Assur as could be witnessed, the best Assur in all probability since Tamburini retired—continues, notwithstanding the fact that the Semiramide is German, the Arsace, French, and the Assur also French (mirabile dictu!), to be one of the most attractive exhibitions of the season. The American prima donna, Miss Kellogg, may also be complimented on the steady progress she is making in public favor, her second appearance as Gilda, in Rigoletto, having created even a greater impression than her first. This young lady has already taken a high position in her art, and wants nothing but opportunity and encouragement to reach the highest—even in this capital, so biased about Italian opera and all its appurtenances.

The operas during the present week have been Martha—with Mdlle. Christine Nilsson as the heroine; Rigoletto, with Mdlle. Kellogg and Signor Campanini, in lieu of Lurzeria Borgia, Mdlle. Tietjens, being indisposed; La Sonnambula—with Mdlle. Marimon; and Lucia di Lammermoor—with Mdlle. Nilsson. La Traviata is announced for this evening—in all five representations; so that London amateurs have enjoyed no less than eleven opportunities of listening to Italian operatic performances in the brief space of six days. The engagement of Mdlle. Nilsson which was originally limited to 12 nights, has been prolonged.—Times, July 13.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. The operas performed last week were the Sonnambula, the Nozze di Figaro, Norma, the Barbieri, and a miscellaneous selection of extracts from various well-known works, for the "benefit" and last appearance of Mdme. Pauline Lucca.

That Mdme. Patti should, at least once in the season, assume the part of Amina, in which, eleven years ago, she made her first début before a London audience, was only to be expected; and that she should be received with enthusiasm in the character which she has fairly made her own ever since her first appearance among us, and which she has sustained, year after year, reminding opera-goers of Malibran in the same part more than any of Malibran's successors, might have been taken for granted. To enter into a description of Mdme. Patti's dramatic and musical realization of the most engaging of all Bellini's heroines would be superfluous. Enough that she was all herself, and made every point tell—from "Come per me sereno" to "Ah, non credea," and its brilliant sequel, "Ah, non giunge"—with the old effect, fully justifying the frequent applause and "recalls" of a crowded audience. The Elvino of the evening (M. Naudin being indisposed), was Signor Nicolini; and Count Rodolpho was represented by M. Faure, who has now no equal in the character.

The "combined entertainments" for the "benefit" and last appearance of Madame Pauline Lucca attracted unusual attention; for, though real amateurs do not greatly care about fragments from popular works, the scenes chosen respectively from Der Freischütz, Faust, and Margherita, and the Africaine served to display to eminent advantage the versatility of this, in her way, unique artist, who, no matter what she undertakes, whether in high lyric tragedy, melodramatic opera, sentimental opera, or opéra comique, possesses the secret of winning the sympathies of her audience. Of this versatility the selected passages from the operas we have enumerated afforded ample proofs. As Selika, in the Africaine, which Madame Lucca first played in London, at Covent Garden Theatre, and afterwards at Berlin, in accordance with a desire frequently expressed by Meyerbeer, that she should be the heroine of his last chef d'œuvre (which he did not live to see produced in public), and as the love-stricken Margaret, in the garden scene in Faust, Madame Lucca has been seen over and over again. Her Selika is a genuine creation; her Margaret is no less piquant and touching than it is original—a Margaret of her own conception. In Der Freischütz, however, she has deserved and gained her chief laurels this year, and it seems surprising that the part of Agatha should never have been allotted to her till now. This, too, however, has been described, and it is unnecessary to say more than that in each of the scenes allotted to her Madame Lucca raised the enthusiasm of the house. That the last movement of the scena in Der Freischütz was encored and repeated, will be as easily understood as that the "recalls" were frequent, and the bouquets without number. A scene from La Figlia, with Mdlle. Sessi, and another from Lucia, with Mdlle. Albani (a great success) completed the programme.

The first performance of Norma this season brought forward Madame Parepa in a character for which she is in every way fitted. We have but one great Norma now, and she is not at Covent Garden. To witness, therefore, so thoughtful, dignified, and spirited an impersonation at the theatre in which the Druid Priestess has been immortalized by the genius of Grisi, was a real satisfaction to amateurs. Madame Parepa knows the music thoroughly, and shows also a thorough knowledge of the dramatic requirements of the character. She was warmly received throughout, and most deservedly so. "Casta Diva," with its sequel, was sung with the facility and correctness of a practised artist; the emphatic solo "Ah non tremare," in the well known trio with Pollio (Signor Naudin) and Adalgisa (Madame Sinico), was delivered with extraordinary energy; the famous duet, "Deh conte," in which Adalgisa fairly divided the applause with Norma, was everything that could be wished,—and so on, without further detail, to the duet in which Norma reproaches and threatens Pollio, and the pathetic sequel in the last scene, after the supplication to Oroveso (Signor Capponi), where the sublime resignation of Norma induces Pollio voluntarily to share the sacrifice to which she is condemned. All was both legitimately good and effective. Madame Parepa was heartily received, and repeatedly applauded and recalled.

The old folk-saying, "Better late than never," was well illustrated on Tuesday night, when Mdlle. Smeroschi made her début as Adina in L'Elisir d'Amore. Twice before had this young lady been announced, and twice had the usual reason for disappointment been assigned; so that, if the public subsequently thought at all of a strange artist unheralded by report, it was only to infer that the chances of her actual appearance this season were slight. The third time Mdlle. Smeroschi proved more successful; and we may say at once that her performance made a highly successful impression. Adina is not a character affected by débutantes; and its selection by Mdlle. Smeroschi must, perhaps, be attributed to the difficulty of finding a character not sacred to one or other of the "light sopranos" in Mr. Gye's troupe. There was, however, no reason for anybody to complain. The new prima donna appeared to advantage, and the public had an opportunity of hearing Donizetti's charming opera—a work which, though written in fifteen days, is an exception to the rule that things of quick growth as quickly fade away. Mdlle. Smeroschi had one of the chilling receptions usually given by our operatic audiences to a new comer who appears without an acknowledged reputation, not a "hand" greeting her as the curtain rose and showed Adina seated among the reposing peasants. But her recital of the story of Isotta, with its interlude, "Elisire di si perfetta," and still more, her singing in the duet with Nemorino, which follows the advent of the soldiers, arrested general attention. From this point, indeed, Mdlle. Smeroschi kept the ear of the house; and, if the demonstrations in her favor were not enthusiastic, they were unmistakably genuine. We endorse without reserve the favorable verdict passed upon the new-comer's efforts. Personally, she is well fitted for light soprano parts, and her natural advantages are set off by a self-command which does not involve self-assertion.

The operas during the present week (last but one of the present season), have been Il Trovatore—with Mdme. Adelina Patti as Leonora; L'Elisir d'Amore, for the long-expected and more than once postponed début of Mdlle. Smeroschi; Lucia di Lammermoor—with Mdlle. Albani; and again L'Elisir d'Amore (Thursday). Don Giovanni was to be given last night. Il Guarany, the new opera by M. Gomes—first time, with Mdlle. Sessi, M. Faure, Signor Nicolini, and Bagagiolo in the chief parts, is announced for this evening—again six performances.

For her "benefit," on Monday, Mdme. Patti has once more selected the Huguenots, in which she will play Valentine, with Signor Nicolini, in lieu of Signor Mario, as her Raoul. This, we need scarcely add, will be her second appearance as Valentine before a London audience.—Ibid.

Of Mmes. PAREPA-ROSA the Athenæum, of June 22, says:

July is approaching, and the débuts at Covent Garden and Drury Lane continue. At the Royal Italian Opera there has been one of some importance. Mme. Parepa-Rosa has returned, and has appeared as Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni." Opera goes, of course, will still recollect her singing at the Lyceum (the temporary home of the Royal Italian Opera after the fire of 1856), when she came from Lisbon and Malta in 1857, the same season as that in which Mlle. Victoire Balle, afterwards Lady Crampton, and the Duchess de Frias appeared. Mme. Parepa, since 1857, has travelled much and learned much. We do not believe that there is an artist existing who has such an extensive and varied répertoire. Her versatility has been most remarkable, but we think it probable that in future she will adhere to the Grisi-Pasta-Tietjens line of characters, for physique goes far in such matters, a fact too often ignored by prime donne. Mme. Parepa is of a musical family, for her mother was a Seguin, a name associated long with operatic and concert recollections. She has a commanding stage presence, and is quite initiated in the by-play required to secure identity with the rôle represented. She is easy, graceful, and, when necessary, energetic. Her voice is rich and round; and her phrasing is unexceptionable. Her Donna Anna is based on the Grisi model,—a better one cannot be conceived; so that both in acting and singing she gave the prominence to Donna Anna which the daughter of the Commendatore ought to have, and was not extinguished by the Zerlina of Mme. Patti. Mme. Parepa is a valuable acquisition, and, being so, she will probably be heard but rarely; for mediocrities or nonentities seem to be at present preferred by the rulers at Covent Garden. The execution, barring the singing and acting of Mmes. Parepa-Rosa and Patti, was beneath contempt.

DUESSELDORF. (Concluded from page 271.) The second day of the Rhenish Festival opened with Schumann's D-minor Symphony, Tausch conducting. The first movement, as well as the Oberon Overture, was taken too fast, so that it suffered in clearness of outline and color. Tausch possesses the excellent faculty of conducting a Schumann Symphony without a score; he also has an electrifying influence upon the members of a chorus. This most important and most beautiful element of our musical festival, its glory and its firm foundation, had been handled with a certain genial superficiality by Rubinstein; and now for the first time, roused by the look and arm of Tausch, in Schubert's "Miriam's Song of Victory," instrumented by Lachner, it revealed the beauty, power and fulness of its tone. On the contrary, the soloist, Mme. Parepa-Rosa, who was very sparing of herself, gave little satisfaction.

Rubinstein's "sacred opera," "The Tower of Babel," formed the second part. Very various opinions of it were heard during the rehearsals. What was greeted with tempestuous applause by the admirers of the genial pianist, met on the other hand malicious smiles or undisguised aversion; and there might have been counter demonstrations and unpleasant scenes, had not the spirit of the Festival prevented. Yet in the end the work found an uncommonly favorable reception. The subject had been put into a fitting form of text by Julius Rodenberg, and Rubinstein seems to have set to work with all his might to produce something of importance. Yet it could do no harm, if he would subject the work to one more thorough criticism and to a partial working over. By the side of great beauties baroque or insignificant passages stand out all the more hatefully; and it cannot be denied that many such places occur in the composition. Brilliant points in the execution were the excellent performance of the orchestra and of the two soloists, Herr Diener as "Abraham," and Herr Gura both as "Overseer" and as "Nimrod." The chorus sang with great precision and warm sympathy, yet was not always equal to its task.

The so-called Artists' Concert, on the third day, opened with Oberlin's sparkling, lively Overture to Anacreon; but the second part began with Berlioz's Overture "Le Carnaval Romain," conducted in a virtuosic style by Rubinstein. We cannot sympathize with the opposition raised by many voices against the selection of this piece; on the contrary this, together with the concluding chorus from the Bach Cantata, repeated for the close of the Festival, gave a splendid frame to this concert. Of the many beauties it enclosed, none were more brilliant than what Rubinstein drew from the rippling tones of his piano, especially in the G-major Concerto of Beethoven, which he rendered with incomparable power, and not less the Etudes Symphoniques by Schumann. But even after this long strain of every nerve and muscle (twenty minutes) no rest was permitted him. Only after Liszt's transcription of the "Erl King" had swept by us, and the rhythms of the well known Turkish March had died away in the distance, were the importunate encumbrances satisfied. The genial pianist was regularly showered with ovations. Mme. Parepa-Rosa in the "Letter Aria" from Don Juan found opportunity to show her Italian art of singing to brilliant advantage, although without warming us in any way. Next to Rubinstein, we owe the noblest artistic enjoyment to the Leipzig baritone, Herr Gura, who by his quiet nobility of style and certainty reminds us of Stockhausen; not the ladies alone, and with perfect justice, were in raptures with the Aria from "Hans Heiling." Of still higher artistic worth was the Ballad by C. Lohse: "Herr Heinrich sitzt am Vogelbeerd," a true pearl of its kind. The sonorous fulness of Herr Gura's organ and the nobleness of his delivery were extraordinary. Herr Diemer in his two airs from the Creation and Elijah bordered a little too closely on the domain of the languishing tenors.

A cheerful banquet, enlivened by toasts in prose and verse, closed the festival, of which the focus of interest from beginning to end was the uncommonly winning personality of Rubinstein. The unsophisticated, almost childlike nature of the man stands in very attractive contrast to his enormous endowments. Quite interesting was Rubinstein's exhortation, received with respectful silence, to make the musical festivals in future still more accessible to the works of living composers, and not to dedicate them only to the worship of the dead.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUGUST 10, 1872.

The Second Gilmore Jubilee.

III.

If the Great Chorus (of 18,000 voices) failed in comparison with that of half the number in the former Jubilee, the Great Orchestra was, on the contrary, much more effective. And yet the number of instruments was considerably larger. Just how large, we are unable to say,—certainly not "2,000," as was announced at first,—that announcement covering one thousand as the aggregate of all the brass bands from all portions of the country, who were to swell the great conglomerate in the patriotic hymns and anvil choruses, but who of course were not included in the Orchestra proper. The brass bands, happily, were kept quite in the shade, if they were there at all; they surely would have marred more concord than they would have made; their absence was at least one improvement on the former Jubilee. Nor do we think there ever were so many as 1,000 in the real Orchestra, i. e., with stringed instruments predominating. In the first days, when the whole thing was fresh and most complete, there may have been 800, with an unprecedented army of bow arms in motion. Possibly 200 first violins, of good average quality, with seconds, tenors, cellos and double basses in a fair proportion, but by no means of the same general excellence. The firm, vital, searching, sweet tone of that great mass of first violins was something marvellous to hear. We recall it most distinctly in the well known figures near the end of the Tannhäuser Overture, and again in the pizzicato of Strauss's Polka by that name. And generally there was great breadth and richness in the sound of most of the Overtures, as well as the accompaniments, which we chanced to hear. For some of the finer tasks the orchestra was, wisely enough, made more select; it was best of all, when it was smallest, on the "Israel in Egypt" day, when it did its part admirably both in the Oratorio and in Beethoven's Coriolanus Overture, although one had to sit quite near and out of the reach (if possible) of restless, noisy people, to hear at all distinctly. It must be owned, too, that delicate passages were at no time heard to good advantage even by those who sat not too far off to hear both sides of orchestra or chorus equally. Indeed this was an experience of our own: When Mme. Peschka-Leutner was about to sing the Cavatina from Ernani, we went far back into the balcony opposite the stage; the conductor's baton waved, the violin bows moved, an army of them, the baton beat perhaps a dozen bars, and all the while our ear could not detect the faintest symptom of a musical sound, until the voice came in, and every tone of that from first to last was perfectly distinct. Yet Mr. Zerrahn assured us afterwards that, purposely, they did not play piano. How must it have been, then, as a general rule? The only reason or excuse for so monstrously large an orchestra is, that it may be heard well in an immense space; but it was not heard well, except within limits; and within reasonable limits a smaller orchestra would certainly have made much better music. That there was much to admire in the unexpected unity and certainty of attack, precision, fire and fervor with which the army did their work, and that the effects produced, with the hearer's imagination quickened by sympathy with such a multitude in presence, were sometimes inspiring, we shall not deny.

But if the scene, the magnetism of a vast assembly visibly united in one purpose, helped the imagination of the listener, making the music more intense to him, this sort of aid began, before long, to desert the orchestral performer not less than the chorus singer. The questionable spirit of the Jubilee, ambiguous in motive and leading to such promiscuity in programme, could not be favorable to the morale of orchestra or chorus. The quality of the task inevitably affects the quality of performance. Had good things been given this great orchestra to do from first to last, perhaps it might have preserved its integrity and high tone much longer than it did. But what did its work consist of,—what the rôle it had to play in "the greatest series of concerts ever given in the world?" Of classical Symphony, as we have said, not a single specimen. Of the great standard Overtures, there were given: Beethoven's to Leonore, No. 3, and Coriolan, that to Der Freyschütz and to Tell, Wagner's to Rienzi and Tannhäuser,—noisy effect pieces, at least Rienzi—and three which were wholly new here: Macfarren's Overture to "Robin Hood," which we did not hear, a Fest Overture by Leutner, and a "Kaiser Overture" by Westmayer, both respectable but by no means strikingly original. In short a few overtures of the kind the most available for a monster orchestra, which of course excluded, with three or four exceptions, the nobler part of the great orchestral repertoire. For the rest, the labor of this great band of instrumentalists soon became reduced to national airs, Strauss waltzes and a variety of clatter. Of course the zeal, the spirit of cohesion, soon relaxed; musicians dropped off, and the same process of demoralization and disintegration went on here as in the chorus. Besides, so long a festival could hardly be expected to fare otherwise; and when it came to the four concerts of the Fourth of July day, the real musical character of the protracted Carnival must have become pretty completely dissipated. (We were not present upon that or either of the personal and crowded days; if we had been, perhaps we should have then been aware of the glittering and noisy army of brass bands, of which one report gives a list of twenty-eight, including the foreign bands.)

Perhaps the best function of the Orchestra which survived to the end, having been kept in daily exercise, was that of playing the Strauss Waltzes under the magnetic personal direction of the "great" JOHANN STRAUSS himself. (Great now-a-days means celebrated.) That these compositions have a genius of their own, musicians will acknowledge with the dancers. And that Strauss has a genius for conducting as well as for composing his own volapudous rhythms and rich tone-color combinations, was proved abundantly on these occasions. Why need we describe him after every pen-photographer has done his best to multiply the image of the mercurial little wizard of the waltz, in every look and motion the liveliest impersonation of his music. Great he is in his kind; but the kind is not a great one. It was really remarkable how well the whole forest of bows and Pan's pipes all obeyed his sign and almost caught his spirit. (Of course it was not the full thousand.) Many doubtless fancied and believed that they were hearing Strauss's orchestra, as well as seeing Strauss, and it seemed almost a pity to undecieve them. But does any reflecting person really suppose that all those hundreds, gathered at random, after one or two rehearsals, were so miraculously imbued with Strauss; that they performed the "Blue Danube" and the rest with anything like the exquisite perfection of his own moderate band of 50 or 60 in Vienna? No, the sensation was the presence of the man. The waltzes were all very pleasant in their way; but what do you think of a festival, claiming to be the great musical event of the century, in which through so many days waltz music formed the best task of the largest orchestra the world ever saw!

Turn now to the soloists. Now that the thing is over, it needs no argument to show that solos, vocal or instrumental, as a rule, were out of place and only tantalizing to the listener in that vast Coliseum. There is something in the actual presence of distinguished artists from abroad; but that is merely sensational, not musical. One of the very foremost lady pianists of the day, no doubt, is Madame ARABELLA GODDARD, by common consent the first in England, and especially at home in the classical music, of which she commands a very extensive repertoire; a sensitive and refined artist, accustomed all her life to the best musical atmosphere and associations. What could she do, in the monster Coliseum and before that crowd? Of course her art was thrown away there; the influences were all depressing to one delicately strung; her performances were limited to only three or four, we think; her selections could not be her own entirely, consisting, so far as we have learned, only of Variations on the "Last Rose of Summer," a Don Juan Fantasia, and Handel's "Harmonious Blacksmith" Variations—the last probably her own selection, and excellent anywhere else. Think of bringing a great artist from Europe, merely to do that! Had the piano performances been given by themselves in the Boston Music Hall, at some convenient hour, say in the evening, forming a sort of side-show like the Organ Concerts, there would have been some sense in it. As it was we could only feel a sympathy for an artist and a lady in such martyrdom preferring not to witness it, and we hope she has not gone home under the impression that she has yet played before a Boston audience. A fitter hero for the time and place was the lion-haired, strong, dashing German prestidigitateur, pupil of Liszt, Herr BENDEL. "Die links Seite von Liszt," exclaimed a German professor to us one evening in Berlin, some years ago, after this same virtuoso had been "interpreting" in his marvellous way a Beethoven Concerto. And all he did here seemed to confirm the description. There was wonderful execution of music only suited to be wonderfully executed. His was the lion's share in the piano thrashing, for he could advertise the new "Orchestral grand" as well as anybody. Mr. WEHLI was Mr. Wehli, and those who could see his fingers fly saw very neat and nimble mechanism. The pianists were only employed for the name of it; the piano was only there at all for advertisement—how fruitful a one, it might be curious to learn statistically a year hence.—Of other instrumental solos mostly on the cornet, most ambitious imitator of flutes and violins in variation pieces and of sentimental Italian opera tenors, we will not speak. They were skillful enough of their kind, and every cornet has his warm host of admirers. But for a Musical Festival!

Of vocal solos there is more success to chronicle, yet not enough to prove them in their right place there. Two distinguished prima donnas were procured, at great expense, from Europe. Of the two the most renowned, to say the least, was Madame RUDERSDORFF, and well was it for the appreciation of her art that she had sung in Boston under better auspices before. From what she did here in the Oratorios a year ago we knew her for a most accomplished artist in the highest styles and forms of vocal art, a thorough musician, familiar with all the great music, full of a true musical seal and animating power, an expressive and inspiring singer, although her voice has passed its prime and freshness. As an artist she doubtless ranks in Europe to-day much higher than Mme. PESCHKA-LEUTNER. But to be heard in the Coliseum she had to make such effort as to mar the continuity and beauty of her tones, and it is not surprising that the majority not only of audience but "critics," were only sensible to these defects, and failed to give her credit which she really deserved. We did not hear her sing the Inflammatus, nor "God save the Queen" and other national airs, for which she has been so severely censured. We did hear her once in "Let the bright Seraphim" and in her two solos in the "Israel in Egypt." They were not sung with all the ease we could desire; but certainly we heard every note quite distinctly, and the singing made a musical, artistic and agreeable impression on us, so far as that was possible in that huge place. It is very certain that she could not do herself much justice there, and we are very glad that we shall hear her under more artistic circumstances during the coming fall and winter.

Mme. PRSCHKA-LEUTNER carried the Jubilee by storm. The sensation she produced with her very first notes, and every time that she appeared, is something phenomenal, not yet satisfactorily explained. For it must be borne in mind that this result does not accord with the European reputation of the singer hitherto. Consult any German musical paper of the last three or four years, or ask any musical person who has heard her sing repeatedly in the Opera and the Gewandhaus Concerts of Leipzig, and he will tell you that she was esteemed a very artistic singer, chiefly noted in "coloratur" (or florid) singing, with a voice very perfectly developed in the upper register, not particularly powerful or pleasing in the middle and lower tones, but never looked upon as one of the world's greatest singers. If she had been, could little Leipzig, musical city as she is, have kept her? Singing in London only a month or two before she came to Boston, she seems to have made no very marked impression. Was it left, then, for some one of the Jubilee's purveyors to "discover" such a pearl? At all events she came here heralded in all the Gilmore organs as the paragon of singers, the greatest that had ever visited these shores, superior not only to the Parepas, Pattis, Nilssons of the present generation, but to the lyric Queens, the Bosio, the Sontag, even the Lind of a more shining period. Well, this was nothing wonderful; this was Jubilee style, Gilmorean hyperbole, to which we were all accustomed. The wonder after all was that this extravagant announcement did not spoil her reception; that the enthusiasm, the delight—perhaps it is not yet time to say the judgment—of the Coliseum, day after day, confirmed the utmost expectation. We hardly ever knew a similar experience. It was our lot to hear her for the first time on the third, the "German" day, when she sang just what she had sung before, to-wit: a Concert Aria with very difficult and brilliant variations, composed for her by Proch, of Vienna. We own to the same astonishment and pleasure with everybody else at the purity and clearness of her tones, not only the very highest, but the low tones; at the perfect ease with which she seemed to sing so that every tone reached every ear throughout that vast space, and satisfied the sense. And not only was there brilliant purity of tone and wonderful flexibility and finish in those upper flights of vocal pyrotechnics, but throughout all the great compass of the voice we noticed no tone that was not sweet, rich and of good volume. What followed by way of encore we forget, but we believe it was one of the simple sentimental melodies of Abt, the composer by her side conducting, as on several other occasions. At any rate this was her usual response. Here too there was rich, sweet, ear-filling melody, refreshing at such time and place. Whether it was sympathetic singing, we presume no one thought; in such a place, to such a sympathetic crowd, anything that was displayed upon sufficient background and that could easily be heard, seemed sympathetic, though it might not have been so in any proper private home and quiet sphere of sympathy. For what had "the sympathetic" in the delicate, interior song sense of the word, or in any but the multitudinous, loud, ringing patriotic sense, to do with a Coliseum? The charm of this singing, therefore, when one came to think of it, was open to the suspicion that in a smaller hall or theatre the voice might prove less fascinating, the song less soulful, the art by no means phenomenal, though the peculiar property which that voice had of thoroughly pervading that immense enclosure, was phenomenal. That phenomenon, as we have said, we tested further when we heard the voice so perfectly in two florid Verdi pieces from the extreme end of the hall where we could not hear the violins. On another day we heard her sing Mozart's bravura Aria of the Queen of Night, and wonderfully well, though of course it was the fireworks up aloft that chiefly dazzled the imagination. Mme. Leutner's selections, though she sang almost daily, were mainly the same round of three or four brilliant show pieces. She has since sung, still the same pieces, in New York, in ordinary halls, with nothing like the same success, if we may trust report. Gratefully acknowledging the real pleasure that we had in her, therefore, we must conclude that it is the part of wisdom to wait till we have heard her under other circumstances and in other music, before we can make place for her in the same heaven of our recollections with such stars as Lind and Bosio and Sontag.

Several also of our own local singers appear to have made a good impression in the solos assigned to them in the great sensational performances of "Star-spangled Banner," &c., particularly Mrs. HOUSTON-WEST and Mrs. H. M. SMITH. Their bright sopranos also made themselves well heard. Mrs. BARRY in "Israel in Egypt" sang two Arias remarkably well, with even, sustained power and nice phrasing; and though her voice is not one of the "heavy" contraltos, yet by its purity and musical quality it was quite pleasing where we sat. But the most successful of these efforts was the Duet of Basse in the same Oratorio: "The Lord is a man of war," admirably delivered by Mr. WINCH and Mr. RUDOLPHSEN, and making such effect that they were obliged to sing it a second time, when it went even better.

We include also in the Solo category the distinctive doings of the complimentary "Bouquet of Artists," whose function properly it was to sing solos. That is to say, a picked choir of from 30 or 40 to 50 or 60 voices on each of the four parts, represented the individual solo characters usually combined in certain very familiar operatic quartets, sextets, &c., of the Opera, such as the Sextet in Lucia. It was magnifying the sol, that they might be heard,—one of the cruel conditions of a place, a scheme too big for anything not bloated beyond nature. We did not chance to hear any of the few pieces which received this treatment; all good judges seem to agree that the voices sounded beautifully together, but that the rendering was—how could it be otherwise?—as rigid and mechanical as it was precise.

It only remains to speak of one more element, and that the chief success, of this stupendous charivari. We mean of course the three European military Bands, omitting as of only nominal account the "Irish Band" which figured in the last days, the days of dissolution. All three of them are splendid specimens of the bands of wind instruments in Europe, or what in Germany is called Harmonie Musik. We are extremely glad that our citizens have had at last an opportunity to hear a veritable Band (nay three) of the first order and to know what is meant by that. To say which of the three is best, is not so easy; each in its own way is best. They are made up on different principles and partially at least, for different uses. Probably for exquisite finish of performance, for all the fineness of almost orchestral execution, for perfect blending of all the instruments, subduing of the rougher elements, as well as for the artistic style and phrasing (as if each were a well trained singer) of each of the 55 instruments; and the excellent arrangement of the music drawn from operas, &c., the palm by great majority of voices has been conferred on the French Band of the Garde Republique; with M. PAULUS as director and M. MAURY sub-director. The composition of the band is somewhat unique, at least out of France, the Sax instruments in their various forms and calibres predominating. We cannot state this composition with much particularity; we have already copied two lists from the newspapers, but these do not agree, nor is either of them at all clear in itself, the terms alto, for instance, by itself not showing us what instrument is meant, while "contralto-sopranos" is plainly a misnomer. It has, however, about 8 admirable clarionets, perfect pairs of flutes and oboes, with piccolo when needed, and something that seems to answer for the Corno Inglese, while in the place of bassoons, as well as of some other instruments, a little corps of Saxophones, smooth and rather thick in tone, supply rich middle color. There are but two French horns, one or two bagles (why so rare with us?), three of at once the smoothest and most telling trombones that we ever heard, some huge bass tubas (double bass), tenderly kept under so as to "roar as gently as any nightingale;" besides plenty of cornets, trumpets, Saxhorns and all the family, with only just enough of drums, &c. Somehow the ingredients are nicely selected and blended for a satisfying euphony of ensemble, in which there is nothing wanting, nothing in excess. Our only question is whether the Sax instruments have not too much family resemblance; whether certain marked individualities of tone among the old standard instruments is not worth preserving even in a Band; whether for instance Saxophones can be as interesting as bassoons well played, and whether on the whole subdued positives are not better than any negatives, however smooth and tractable. In the opening of the "Tell" overture, which this band play with such precision, spirit, fire and delicacy, the soft strains usually divided among the violoncellos were quite well represented by the Saxophones, to be sure. But there is no room to enter into all this. In their playing of numerous Overtures: "Tell," "Semiramide," "Zampa," "Oberon," &c., of operatic fantasias, potpourris, waltzes, marches, national hymns, and their exhibitions of rare solo talent, this Band set us a model which we trust will not be thrown away upon us. It will be remarked, however, that this is not so much distinctively a military as it is a concert band. Its functions have been, we believe, confined to Paris; it is made up with a view to playing in the gardens of the Tuilleries, the Palais Royal, Place Vendome, &c., for the amusement and the culture of the people.

The Prussian Band, on the contrary, of the Kaiser Franz Grenadier regiment, with its stalwart and heroic leader, Herr SARO, so quietly commanding and so thoroughly musician-like, is emphatically a band for service. Their music is heroic, grandiose, warlike and thrilling, entirely in the reigning spirit of the Prussian, now the German empire. We can easily believe the story of how these men with their music went to the front and held the line in the hottest of the fight at Gravelotte. The hearing of the men is superb. It is said that they had too great a preponderance of strong brass instruments. It is true the brass was very powerful, but it was also of the most true and splendid quality, entirely musical; while on the other hand the number of clarionets was greater than in the French Band; and they had four French horns, two bassoons, besides a Contra-fagotto, and likewise oboes, flutes, &c. At Berlin Meyerbeer was court director and sets the standard even now. After the first hearing (on the "German day"), we thought of this as peculiarly a Meyerbeer band, and the selections were chiefly from Meyerbeer and of the overpowering character. But the more we hear them afterwards the more we liked them. They too play d the Oberon and many other Overtures very beautifully and clearly. Above all the Overture to the "Magic Flute," which is perhaps as difficult a task as could be set to a wind band, and in which all the intricacies of the quick fugue movement were most delicately and nicely given. For the fittest band to bring into competition with the French or English we should not go to Berlin, but rather to Vienna or some other German city.

The English Band of the Grenadier Guards, Mr. DAN GODFREY leader, is somewhat the largest of the three, and its appearance was always a signal for great outpourings of enthusiasm, not merely on the ground of international hospitality, that they should come at such a delicate period in the relations between the republic and the mother country, but because its sterling excellence as a musical organization was from the first so obvious. It more resembles the French in subdued and blended sweetness; and if it has not all the fine vital delicacy running through every individual part, there is a certain rich and mellow fullness peculiar to its ensemble. We wish that we had heard it oftener, and near enough to warrant a more critical judgment. What we remember with most pleasure was the very artistic, really orchestra-like rendering of the Overture to Semiramide. Their contributions besides national airs, consisted mainly of Overtures ("Der Freyschütz," "Masaniello," "Robin Hood," by Macfarren, "Rob Roy," by Bishop), and selections or potpourris, now from Meyerbeer's operas, now from Bellini's, now from Verdi's, and again from Fra Diavolo, from Don Giovanni, &c. This Band, too, could show admirable solo playing.

The Bands represented the "international" element in the festival. Of course each one had to play our national airs in compliment as well as those of its own country, and all this amid great demonstration and excitement, the great chorus helping with voices and hand and fluttering handkerchiefs to make a scene of it. This kind of excitement, with all the hearty reciprocity of feeling there was in it, soon became too much a matter of course for each day's entertainment, till it regularly took precedence of Muscle as such, which in a Musical Festival is nothing if not all in all. But in another way we look for great good from the example of these Bands as Bands. In the poor, limited, one-sided, brassy character, or characterless-ness of our own mere military bands, we needed the example sadly. We begin even to have hopes now that our ideal of a Civic Band, which we have been suggesting in these columns for a dozen years or more,—a band not military, but for peaceful civic festivals, for academic anniversaries, and for plentiful supply of music for the people both in grove and hall,—a band with all the reeds and softer instruments, on the generous scale of these three noble ones,—a band under the patronage of the City, wholly or in good part, may after all be realized.

The National Saengerfest at St. Louis.

Mr. Gilmore's "Peace Jubilee" was not the only musical festival upon a grand scale which America has had to boast of during the past midsummer. In the days immediately preceding it occurred the great Song Festival of our German Americans, which seems to have assembled audiences almost as large upon an average, although the affair in number of performers, in duration, in the size of the building, and in brag, was much more moderate. In its artistic tone and character, judging from the programmes and from all reports that we have seen, it was a festival on which the participants and the whole country may look back with satisfaction. We are indebted to Brainard's Musical World (Cleveland, O.) for the following brief account of the several days' proceedings from its special Correspondent.

St. Louis, June 12, 1872.

On this, the opening day of the Festival, the final preparations were completed at an early hour. It was a bright, clear day—a little too warm, however, for comfort, and from early morning the streets in the neighborhood of Turner's Hall have been densely packed. Everybody is in gala attire. The trees are festooned. The houses, public buildings, etc., are handsomely decorated with flags, banners, evergreens, etc., especially in the business parts of the city, and those mainly occupied by the German element.

The Saengerfest is held in a large and commodious building, erected especially for this Festival, on the corner of Twelfth and Washington streets. It is of considerably greater architectural pretensions than are usually found in buildings of the temporary character of this one.

The front of the building presents quite an imposing appearance. The central arch rises to a height of 90 feet, while the towers that flank it soar aloft 130 feet, and are surmounted by flagstaves, from which the flags of America and Germany float. Indeed the display of flags, both exterior and interior, is very fine, and those inside the building are arranged with great artistic effect.

The procession was the largest and finest that has ever traversed our streets. It is estimated to have been from six to seven miles long. Nearly one hundred singing societies, a large number of civic associations, the military, the fire department, as well as thousands upon thousands of citizens on foot, in carriages, and on horseback, were in the line. Mottoes, banners, and flags were plentifully strewn along the line of the procession. The population of the city turned out en masse along the route of the procession, and cheer upon cheer heralded its passage through the streets.

The reception concert was given at Saengerfest Hall to night, and was largely attended, the immense building being nearly full. The programme was as follows:

- Overture. "Die Vestalin." Spontini.
Presentation of the Flag.
Bridal Chorus. "Lohengrin." Wagner.
Orchestra and chorus of mixed voices.
Oration in English.
His Excellency Gov. B. G. Brown, of Missouri.
Evening Song. Abt.
Male Chorus.
Oration in German. Hon. Carl Schurz.
Notturmo, from "Midsummer Night's Dream." Mendelssohn.
Orchestra.
The Heavens are Telling. "Creation." Haydn.
Recitative, Trio, and Chorus.
Orchestra and Chorus of mixed voices.
Solos by Mrs. C. Froehlich, Messrs. P. L. Keller, and C. Froehlich.

This programme was performed exclusively by local talent. The chorus consisted of 450 ladies and 450 gentlemen, supported by an orchestra of 163 musicians. Everything passed off brilliantly, the choruses being rendered with a precision and spirit that I was not prepared for, remembering the fact that many of the choruses have had but little practice.

June 13.

The performance to-day has been a grand success. It was conducted by Franz Abt, and the immense building was well filled. Good judges estimate the audience at from 14,000 to 15,000.

The chorus numbered fifteen hundred, and worked well together. A little unsteadiness was observable at times, but on the whole it was well done.

Mrs. Edmund Dexter, of Cincinnati, was the soloist, and sang Handel's "Let the Bright Seraphim," and the "Shadow Song," from Dinorah in faultless style. Her voice is unusually sweet and under perfect control. The following was the programme:

- Symphonic Eroica. Beethoven.
To the Fatherland. Kreutzer.
Male Chorus.
Let the Bright Seraphim. "Samson." Handel.
Soprano Solo, Mrs. Dexter.
Overture. "Athalia." Mendelssohn.
Freedom of Song. (Liedesfreiheit). Marschner.
Male Chorus.
Shadow Song. "Dinorah." Meyerbeer.
Soprano Solo, Mrs. Dexter.
Roman Song of Triumph. Bruch.
Male Chorus and Orchestra.

Another enormous audience filled the Saengerfest Hall to night, there being fully eighteen thousand people in the building. All the aisles and every inch of standing room were occupied.

The especial and noteworthy features were the singing of Mrs. Dexter and Mr. Steins. The lady was in splendid voice, and sang the solos from Figaro and Fra Diavolo magnificently. She was tumultuously applauded.

Mr. Steins was also heartily applauded for his masterly rendering of his solos in Wagner's Chorus of Armored.

The following is the complete programme:

- Overture. "Egmont." Beethoven.
Dove Song, "Le nozze di Figaro." Mozart.
Soprano Solo, Mrs. Dexter.
The German Song. Schneider.
Male Chorus and Orchestra.
Introduction. "Tristan & Isolde." Wagner.
Orchestra.
The Poet's Grave on the Rhine. Moshing.
Male Chorus.
Ah! Forse E Lui. "Traviata." Verdi.
Soprano Solo, Mrs. Dexter.
Chorus of Armored. "Rienzi." Mozart.
Male Chorus with Orchestra.
Solo by Mr. O. Steins.
Fackeltanz. (Marche de Flambeaux, No. 4) Meyerbeer.
Orchestra.

This has been by far the most successful day of the Festival, both in a musical and financial sense. Hundreds of persons were turned away, being literally unable to gain even standing room.

June 15.

At the closing concert in Saengerfest Hall to night, another tremendous audience assembled. The attendance was not quite as large as last night, but yet the building was thoroughly filled in every part.

The following was the programme:

- Overture. "Titus." Mozart.
"Einkehr." Zoellner.
Sung by the Cleveland Maennerchor.
Arietta and Valse. Venzano.
Soprano Solo, Mrs. Dexter.
Awake. Kuecken.
Sung by the Cecilia Maennerchor of Cincinnati.
Symphonie Militaire (2d part). Haydn.
How beautiful is the Spring Time. Abt.
Sung by the Belleville Saengerbund.
Let the Bright Seraphim. "Samson." Handel.
Soprano Solo, Mrs. Dexter.
Awakening of Spring. Abt.
Sung by the Columbus Maennerchor.
Roman Song of Triumph. Bruch.
Male Chorus and Orchestra.
Farewell. C. Schuppert.
Sung by the Louisville Liederkreis.
Fackeltanz. (Marche de Flambeaux, No. 4) Meyerbeer.
Orchestra.

Mrs. Dexter was in her usual good voice, and sang her solos in an unexceptionable manner, and was heartily applauded each time.

After the concert was over a torch light festival was held at Schneider Garden, at which there was a great crowd, and the festivities were kept up until a late hour.

This morning the delegates assembled at Saengerfest Hall for the transaction of business. Forty-three societies were represented.

A motion to hold a National Saengerfest every fifth year, instead of every second year, was tabled. A motion to allow each society one delegate for every twelve members, instead of two members for each society, was adopted. Cleveland was selected as the place for holding the next Saengerfest. L. M.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Horace and no Relations. Song and Chorus.
2. F to g. Fiske. 30
For Horace and no relations
To fill the public stations
We'll work and vote with pleasure true and hearty.
A campaign song on the Greeley side. The Publishers take sincere pleasure in providing good songs for both sides. Music has no politics, and the more we sing, the better natured we shall be.

Shadows. Baritone or Contralto Song. 3.
D minor to d. Wimmerstadt. 30
The last rose dies in the cold, cold air,
And weary the days go by.
May be also sung by a bass voice. Of a pensive character, but melodious and effective.

O Love Star beaming. (Oh, Stella amate.)
Air, with Variation for Voice. 7. Db to c. Proch. 75
The splendid air sung by Madame Peschka-Leutner at the Jubilee. Of course, only the most skilful vocalists can sing it; but other notes may be substituted for the highest ones, thus bringing it into the compass of an ordinary high Soprano voice.

All are at Rest. (Alles zur Ruh.) Four-part Song. 4. A to f. Abt. 30
Over the blue hill-tops gleaming
Faint rays of sunset are streaming,
Calling from out of the west,
Hie thee to rest!
A beautiful composition, either for quartet or chorus.

O Tell me if you Love me. (Saper vorrei se m'ami.) Duet. Haydn. 65
O tell me if you love me,
Nought earthly prize above me?
A very beautiful duet, with words newly translated.

Instrumental.

MANHATTAN WALTZ. 3. Strauss. 1 00
It hardly seems possible that we have had a Strauss before us in bodily presence, leading, playing, bowing; full of Vienna vivacity, and throwing his own lightning into the movements of the myriad performers before him. But so it has been, and here are a set of waltzes, composed for the American public, dedicated "To the Metropolis (and all the rest) of America," and played in the midst of great applause, under the direction of the composer, in New York. The set is a fine one, any way. Compliment our genial visitor by purchasing largely. Fine portrait of Strauss, black moustache and all, on the title.

Among the Roses. A Tone Picture. 4. Eb. Krug. 30
Belongs to a set called "Music Leaves from my Journal." Is of the nature of an "Idylle," that is, quiet, mild, gentle, pastoral in character, is really elegant, and its three pages, if anything, are too few. It is done before one time of it.

Galop del Amorretta. 3. A. Martin. 40
Galops are so restricted in form that it is quite difficult to make one which "sounds new." This, however, is new, as well as neat. Contains light bounds, and many octave passages.

Mormonite Grand March. 4. Eb. Martyn. 30
A powerful and effective march. Contains Octaves, Sixths, Trills, and Arpeggios, and has a sparkling Trio to relieve the loudness of the Band-Chorus parts.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 819.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUG. 24, 1872.

VOL. XXXII. No. 11.

Conducting from Memory.—A Score!

(By Dr. FERDINAND HILLER.)

"He conducts from memory," I read, last winter, in some notice or other of the performance of some symphony or other by Beethoven, under the direction of some conductor or other. Where? Which? Who? That does not affect the fact, only the thing is not done, or, if it is, only when a man conducts so as an exception, and exclusively compositions of his own choosing. If he is regularly and constantly employed as a conductor, the thing is, generally speaking, an impossibility. Is there any musician who, leaving opera out of the question, could learn by heart, or undertake to do so as occasion required, the oratorios from Bach to Schumann, the symphonies from J. Haydn to Niels W. Gade, and the overtures, suites, and serenades which adorn our concert programmes? I hardly think so.—It is true that we meet with men of exceptionally gifted organizations, like Herbeck, in Vienna, who himself told me that the score of any composition with which he had to do was, as it were, photographed, page by page, in his memory. But, even in his case, this was only for a certain time. Though a prodigy like Dase may possess the power of retaining and combining Heaven knows how many figures, no mathematician will seek to gain a reputation for being able to perform his calculations without material signs.

The virtuoso who can execute his solos without music, is right to do so. The perfect command which he must, in every respect, exercise over his art finds a sort of visible expression in the fact of his playing from memory (though he frequently plays in a style that is simply mechanical). Who shall blame him for using any means, provided they be not inartistic, in order to bring out his special gift? The fact which tells most in his favor is that he requires no one to turn over the leaves for him. The sight of this passive activity, always performing its task clumsily, has something about it which disturbs and puts out both the performer and the auditor. If the non-assisting assistance is omitted, the fact of the music being called into requisition will no more affect our enjoyment than did the fact of Tieck or Edouard Devrient's opening his Shakespeare before him at his never-to-be forgotten lectures, produce a disagreeable impression upon us. After hearing a beautiful stringed-quartet, has any one ever regretted that the ex-cantants were seated before a desk loaded with music? On the contrary, the feeling of security hereby engendered exercises a kind of confidential charm, and promotes calm, undivided, attention to the work of art, which is always the principal thing, or—ought to be. But, even for the virtuoso, the case assumes a very different shape, when he plays compositions with accompaniment of other instruments, or with the orchestra. Here too great an assurance in his own infallibility may easily lead him to underrate those engaged with him. Old Molière was right. One day as a celebrated pianist sat down, without her music, at the piano, to perform in a concerto he had undertaken to direct, he burst out into the ever-memorable Anglo-Swabian words: "I do not do dis! If you make a mistake, it is we who shall be blamed." How easily the little demon who presides over the memory may make a slip is known to the best of us, and however quickly he may pick himself up again—it is too late. A correction, such as is allowable in speech, in order to express a thought properly, would, in a musical performance, simply render matters worse. The tonal thought must, above all things, be given with the greatest exactitude and utmost fluency, under pain of death—to the thought, of course!

But how is it in conducting? Will the absence of desk and score in any way contribute to enhance the effect of a composition? Not in the remotest degree. The only thing is that his apparent virtuosity will increase the personal importance of the conductor in the eyes of the public—a circumstance not advantageous to the work—and tend to the glorification of Mr. X or Mr. Z, which, after all, is the principal consideration with many. The best joke is that the process is not at all wonderful; that it really amounts to nothing. But it staggers the simple minded public, who, under the circumstances, are perfectly incapable of forming a judgment. It would be very different if a man were called upon to play the piece from memory! It is indescribably more difficult to execute a Sonata by Beethoven from memory, than to direct one of his Symphonies so. It would certainly be different again with grand vocal works containing recitatives full of words, polyphonic choruses, and so on—but we are not talking of such works. For a man to be capable of conducting from memory instrumental compositions which he has never seen or heard, when all he has to do is to hold the orchestra together—there is absolutely nothing more required than to find out the tempo, and to keep an eye upon a friendly leader, supposing a fermata interrupts the progress of the work. The orchestra go on playing merrily from their parts—and with the final chord you leave off. Every only half-educated conductor in Germany would be capable of beating time without a score to the most important symphonies, and to some famous overtures. That one man can conduct them admirably from memory, while another, though he has the score, may break down is self-evident. But the conducting from memory business itself is a sort of exhibition on the slackrope, without the slightest importance.

"I do not do dis! Denn wenn Sie Sleh irren, so sind wir klammert."

A musical-director (a real one, and not a person merely bearing the title), is, like every one else in command, a necessary evil. Nay, even the musicians are so with regard to the work of art, which intellectually exists independently in a complete state, and which they are to help to embody, however ethereally. But the director, and those freely subordinating themselves to him, have a higher object: that of presenting in the best light the musical picture confided to them. The more they disappear as individuals from before the audience, the better. Nothing is a greater mistake than for a conductor to assume the place of a virtuoso, and attempt to attract the attention of the public to himself personally, and to what he does. By their fruit shall ye know them. The conductor should remain concealed behind the performance of the orchestra, and therein find his best reward. Nor should he forget, or wish to make others forget, that he is in the service of one higher than he—even should it happen, as it sometimes does, that he himself is that one higher. But the symbol of this noble servitude is the open score. The conductor standing up with nothing before him, assumes an appearance of independence to which he has no claim—the apparent boldness of his action fascinates the deceived public, whom, under any circumstances, it is so difficult to prevail upon to devote themselves exclusively to any important task, and diverts their attention from what, in the eyes of a conductor, ought to be of more account than anything else.

But will not an orchestra follow with more than usual delight and confidence a man who has so made the work to be performed his own, that he hides the score? Just as little as a ship's crew would obey their captain with greater alacrity for flinging his compass into the sea. When in sight of port, at the public performance, such a course may at a pinch be tolerated. But how is it, as long as we are tossed about upon the troubled sea of rehearsals?

If, at a performance, it is the business of a conductor to fill those he leads with that love for their laborious and self-sacrificing efforts which alone can render possible a real success, he has, at the preparatory trials, duties of an essentially different kind. As a most strict critic, he must do justice not only to the spirit animating the work as a whole, but to every one particular detail. To hold a rehearsal without a score is nothing more nor less than unpardonable. No one can so have mastered a composition as to feel certain that every little touch, no matter how small, is present to his mind; that at any passage, he is capable of calling on the orchestra for a repetition; of remarking instantaneously every little instance of dynamic inattention; and of extending a helping hand to every subordinate instrumentalist. The most vigorous energy, effective ardor, and overflowing enthusiasm, do not suffice without the utmost material perfection—without certainly no one can attain either strength or grace. With generally known, and widely circulated works, and first rate resources, it is easier to reach the goal—but, under such circumstances, we must expect, on the other hand, the highest possible demands to be made upon us. Not only must the total conception be exhaustive—the most minute figure must be perfectly rendered. To effect this the aid of the score is necessary.

A score! It is one of the most marvellous creations of the human mind! This concentrated picture of the most delicate coöperation on the part of organs independent of each other, moving harmoniously together, and yet each one individually for itself, is something perfectly unique. If an architect could produce a picture giving the exterior view of every side of an edifice, and at the same time, presenting to the eye the entire internal arrangements, with every detail, he would be offering the uninitiated something similar to what the score presents to the musician. But he cannot do so. He must separate his creation into small parts, in order to make it clear, and even then, his drawings, in most cases at any rate, continue conventional in their nature. But the musician, when acting as conductor, enjoys the unparalleled delight of beholding the wondrous edifice, which exists before his hearing eye, arise as it were before him during the performance, perfect every moment, and yet increasing the moment afterwards! It disappears, it is true, into the sea of air, but it has known a magnificent existence—and so has the conductor with it.

The sight of the score offers, also, the conductor the picture of an ideal performance, side by side with that which strikes his ear, and which is more or less disfigured by earthly blemishes. Hence there arises a series of comparisons and tests, and a continuous stimulus to bring the reality nearer and nearer the Ideal, or, in plain words, to carry the excellence of the performance to the highest possible pitch. Whoever affirms that a work he has learnt stands out as plainly in his mind as in the score before him, deceives himself. It may do so in the grand whole, but not in every particular. The fact of having, in the case of the smallest passage which is not satisfactory, the object in question as plainly put before one as it is in the score is something not to be replaced by any natural gift, or any amount of study.

But the score does even more. It enables us to consider beforehand and prepare for what is coming next; it gives us the power of conceiving as the sounds die away what they will be as they swell up, and as they diminish in strength what they will be when they increase; of perceiving in the combined effect of all what is done by each component part. While it concentrates, the slightest material effort of the senses multiplies incalculably the activity of the human intellect. This is the case here, where, so to speak, one sees and hears at the same time the Present and the Future.

The object of my dithyrambic eulogy of the score is not to induce the leader in musical battles, who is well up in his work, to bury himself behind the said score. He may, at the performance, look in it as often or as seldom as he chooses—though he will do better to look on the score than on the public. If an amiable and genial artist like Rubinstein takes a pleasure in conducting one of Beethoven's symphonies by heart, and mentally sharing in the performance, he is certainly not to be attacked for it. But conducting without the score must not be regarded as a step in advance, as a more than ordinary feat—it must not be considered an effort of skill, always to be opposed, any more than as something attainable by genius alone.

However there is no danger of things going too far. If the public are really to be carried away by the conductor's memory, let them reserve their admiration till they see any one conduct Bach's Passions-Musik without the score. But even were such an act of daring successful, we should still be compelled to say: Acts of daring belong to the circus, and not the domain of art.—London Musical World.

MANNHEIM. According to a trustworthy source, Herr Carl Reiss is desirous of exchanging his post of conductor at Cassel for a similar one here.

Nilsson's Marriage.

THE NUPTIAL CEREMONIES IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

(From the New York Herald.)

LONDON, July 27. "Westminster Old Abbey" was the scene of a brilliant and a miscellaneous assembly this morning to witness the marriage ceremonies of Mr. Auguste Rouzard and Mademoiselle Christine Nilsson, the world-famous singer in opera. The day was unusually clear and bright and warm for London, and Miss Nilsson certainly received the benison that is said to fall upon the bride upon whom the sun shines. The card of invitation which summoned the wedding guests was in these words:—

Mlle. Christine Nilsson and Mr. Auguste Rouzard request the honor of

—Mr. ————
company at Westminster Abbey on Saturday,
July 27, at eleven o'clock punctually.

The favor of an immediate answer is particularly requested.

Entrance through Dean's Yard and by the West Cloister door.

The announcement that the wedding was to be solemnized attracted a miscellaneous multitude of curious people, who swarmed around the grim and venerable doors of the old abbey and swarmed into the cloisters and corridors opened to the public. As a parish church of Westminster, the abbey cannot, under any circumstances, be closed to the public. So the portion known as the choir, extending back to the chancel, and the screen which separates the chancel from Henry VIII.'s chapel, was enclosed, and carefully guarded by police and officers of the chapter. On the outside of the iron railing, in the space known as the Poet's Corner, and in the space immediately opposite, the public, to the number of perhaps two thousand, had swarmed in, and were eagerly clustered around pillars and under the arches and heaped over the chairs and benches in the most promiscuous and unseemly way; while within the choir, where there were probably seats and standing room for a thousand people, the invited guests slowly and impatiently assembled. The entrance to the choir from the dean's yard was trying, on account of the crowd and the absence of discipline or foresight among the attendants. And as the hour of eleven drew nigh the choir was apparently well filled, and a long line of eager guests extended through the middle aisle of the cathedral and the cloisters.

The scene inside the abbey was exceedingly beautiful and impressive. A companion suggested that it reminded him of the famous scene in the "Prophet," or more particularly the wedding scene in "Don Carlos." But the fair and gifted lady who was about to march up the aisle—prima donna in the great opera of womanhood—had never witnessed in her most triumphant hours a scene so splendid and real, and full of color and poetry. Above rose the majestic Gothic arches, gray with the incense and the smoke of ten centuries, under which kings and queens had walked since the time of William Rufus to the coronation chair. The warm, burning sun, arrested by the stained glass of the venerable windows, lost its fury, and fell soft and warm and generous upon the carved woodwork, the quaint panels and the mass of monumental and mural ornamentation. There, grouped in eager expectation, were many of the fairest and brightest women in England, the variegated colors of the summer raiment adding interest and color to the scene. On one side, within a moment's walk, was the Poet's Corner, and the gray figures of Ben Jonson and Dryden and Gay and Goldsmith and Shakespeare looked out upon the unusual pageant with what might have been, fancifully regarded as wondering eyes. Nor was the interest allowed to flag. The coming of some distinguished face caused a ripple of comment and discussion. The American Minister, General Schenk, with his daughters, arrived early, looking unusually well, and not the least concern in his resolute, grim, kindly face as to Washington treaties and international complications. Then came Baron Brunow, the Russian Minister, and Baroness Brunow, followed almost immediately by some of the French legation. Sir J. Benedict, the eminent musician, came early, and among those in the company were Lady Emily Peel, the Countess of Cork; Lieutenant Fitzgerald of the household of Prince Arthur; Mr. Cavendish Bentinck, M. P.; Mlle. Titiens, Sir G. Armitage, Viscount Benington, Sir Michael Costa, Lord A. Compton, Signor Gardoni, Colonel Tomline, M. P.; Prince Poniatowski, Sir R. Gerard, Dr. Doremus, of New York,

Mr. H. C. Jarrett and Miss Louise Jarrett, the daughter of Sir J. Benedict and two of the daughters of Baron Rothschild; Lord Walter Campbell, the brother of the Marquis of Lorne, came in, looking unusually well after his American tour.

By the church law all weddings must be solemnized before noon. About twenty minutes after eleven the Dean of Westminster, Dean Stanley, came into the chancel, accompanied by the Rev. S. Flood Jones and the altar attendants, and proceeded down the aisle. At precisely twenty-seven minutes past eleven the first notes of music were heard, the hymn selected beginning, "Now thank we all our God." Then came the procession of choristers in their quaint white gowns, who ranged themselves in line as far as the sacristarium. Dean Stanley then took his position in front of a raised stool, under the lantern, apparently in the centre of the choir. The music continued. There was a rustle of eagerness and expectation, and at half-past eleven the wedding procession appeared. The bride looked unusually well; her face rather pale and subdued. She bent her eyes on the ground, and seemed to move inadvertently to the presence of the dean. Your lady readers may be interested in knowing that the bride wore a white corded silk dress, with a large entredoux at the bottom of the skirt and large downward running side bands of white satin embroidered with white roses. The bodice of the dress was not cut low, but decorated with bands of embroidered white satin fastened with festoons of orange blossoms. The whole was flooded, as it were, with rich Alençon laces. The wreath was of orange blossoms, with a veil of tulle. The only jewelry visible were a pair of magnificent diamond and pearl earrings, which formerly belonged to the Empress Eugénie. Miss Nilsson was attended by the Princess Catherine Poniatowski, the Baroness Florence de Britton, Miss Cavendish Bentinck, Miss Kate Vivian, and Miss Venetia Cavendish Bentinck, as bridesmaids. These maidens were attired alike in dresses that were extremely attractive and becoming. They were composed of a rich underskirt of white muslin under a large overskirt (manteau de cour) of blue silk trimmed with pink silk. In addition there were wreaths of pink roses, with white tulle veils and golden lockets bearing the monogram initials C. N. in diamonds and rubies. All of these costumes came from Paris, and are said by running critics to be gems of millinery, costing fabulous sums—Miss Nilsson's alone, according to an accurate authority, costing $2,000.

The bridegroom, who bore the battery of curious and perhaps envious eyes that turned upon him with exceeding grace and coolness, was a rather pleasant-looking French gentleman, with kind, open features; of rather a medium height; his face adorned with a tidy, dark beard; his hair carefully parted in the middle. He was in plain morning costume, with a light blue necktie, held with a gold ring, and wearing in his lapel a small bunch of orange blossoms. He was born at the Isle of Bourbon—a half creole. His grandfather married a creole woman, and amassed a large fortune. His father married the daughter of Admiral Boscq, then in command of the naval forces of the Isle of Bourbon, and after retiring from business resided in Paris, which is now the home of his family. The Figaro newspaper adds further in reference to M. Rouzard that he had "a moderate fortune of from four hundred thousand to five hundred thousand francs, not counting his expectations." The grandfather of M. Rouzard, Rouzard of Comtois, was a poor locksmith of Jozac (Charente-Inférieure). His son left France at fifteen years of age, invited by a merchant to the Isle of Bourbon, who, having observed his intelligence, chose him for his clerk. Once there, the clerk speedily distinguished himself, became a partner, then master, married a young creole, daughter of Admiral Boscq, and returned to France at the end of some years, leaving behind him a large commercial establishment, and taking with him his wife and children, three boys and a girl. It is the eldest of these children, Auguste, who has married Mlle. Nilsson. The two brothers, Arsene and Méderic, have continued the business of their father. One of them manages the establishment in the Isle of Bourbon; the other is the representative and correspondent of the firm in Bordeaux, and the father lives in Paris, where he has an office, Rue de l'Ecléquier. As to the sister, Mlle. Josephine Rouzard, she married her cousin, M. Boscq. M. Auguste Rouzard is the only one of the family who has abandoned commercial pursuits, from which his artistic instincts estranged him. He was living alternately in Paris and at the Chateau de la Dixmarie, his own property near Jozac, when he became acquainted with Mlle. Nilsson and proposed marriage to her.

While we are dwelling on these details the bride and groom are kneeling before the Very Rev. Dean of Westminster, who performed the service in an effective manner, his voice—as it began the famous and time-honored invocation, "Dearly beloved, we are gathered together here, in the sight of God and in the face of this congregation, to join together this man and this woman in holy matrimony"—rising so full and clear as to be heard in every part of the abbey. The bride made the responses in a clear and musical voice, so as to be heard throughout the choir. When the service reached the declaration, "I pronounce that they be man and wife together, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," the Dean, followed by the procession, marched into the inner part of the sanctuary, the bride and groom kneeling before him, and the ladies and gentlemen in attendance also kneeling, while the choir, under the direction of Rev. Mr. Jones, intoned Psalm cxxviii., beginning, "Blessed are they that fear the Lord and walk in his ways." This was very sweet and effective, the music being an arrangement of Beethoven's. After this came the exhortation to "all ye that are married or intend to take the holy estate of matrimony upon you," which Dean Stanley read with feeling and emphasis, and placing his hands upon the heads of the bride and groom, closed the service with this blessing, followed by the benediction:—

Almighty God, who at the beginning did create our first parents, Adam and Eve, and did sanctify and join them together in marriage, pour upon you the riches of His grace, sanctify and bless you that ye may please Him both in body and soul, and live together in holy love unto your lives' end. Amen.

This over the following marriage chorale, by Rev. Mr. Jones, and set to music by James Turle, was chanted:—

Father of Life, confounding
Thy majesty and power,
We seek thy gracious blessing
To greet the bridal hour;
The troth in Eden plighted
The wedded here renew;
May they, in their united,
Till death be pure and true.

Jesus Redeemer, hear us!
Still be the Wedding Guest;
Thy gentle presence near us,
Make common things more blest;
Even Care shall be a learning
Of blessedness divine,
If thou wilt still be turning
The water into wine.

Spirit of Love, descending,
Impart thy joy and peace,
These hopes together blending
Bless with thine own increase—
Athwart the roughened ocean,
Or on the peaceful tide,
Thy breath through each emotion
Their heavenward course shall guide.

The Church, thy Bride, hath given
Her blessing on the vow;
Oh ratify from Heaven
Her benison below!
Bless, Father, Son and Spirit,
The union here begun,
That in the life eternal
It may be ever one. Amen.

The company then passed into the Jerusalem Chamber, where the marriage contract was signed. After this there was a wedding breakfast at the house of Mr. Cavendish Bentinck, No. 3 Grafton street, Bond street. At two o'clock they returned to Roy's hotel, leaving at four o'clock in the train for Dover. After resting the night they propose to cross the Channel and spend the honeymoon in Baden. Madame Rouzard will continue to Russia, and sing a month in Moscow and a month in St. Petersburg.

Cherubini's "Water-Carrier" ("Deux Journées") in London.

(From the Athenæum.)

Thursday, the 20th of June, 1872, will be a memorable day in the history of the lyric drama in this country, for it fully established the legitimate claim of Cherubini to be enrolled in the list of composers who have left, as legacies for posterity, masterpieces. Rarely, indeed, has such an assemblage of artists and amateurs been gathered in any opera-house as was present at Drury Lane Theatre, to listen to the Italian adaptation of "Les Deux Journées." The expressions of admiration on the part of the public were palpable and audible enough; and in the corridors, and in the foyer, ordinarily cold and self-possessed musicians declared their enthusiastic appreciation of the work, of the masterly accompaniments of Sir Michael Costa for the dialogue and action, and of its extraordinarily fine execution. Such an unequivocal triumph, it might be presumed, would have been followed by immediate and frequent repetitions of the opera; but the only notification, up to the time we write, of a future representation, is the Impresario's announcement that "due notice will be given of the next performance of Cherubini's opera, 'I Due Giornate.'" This sine die information is confirmed by the language of some of our daily contemporaries, who tell their readers that the work is a masterpiece, but it will not "draw" fashion being opposed to the story as being too simple, and to the music as being too learned. If such be the case it only shows how pressing is the need of a National Opera House, where, at moderate prices, grand and classical opera can be rendered a paying investment. But we protest emphatically against this commercial estimate of the worth of Cherubini's 'Deux Journées'; we deny the premises on which the conclusion has been arrived at. In the first place, the tale is not more "simple" than that of 'Fidelio.' In the two books, the persecution and adventures of a married couple form the mainspring of interest; the escapes of the French Count and Countess are as exciting as those of Leonora and Florestan—in both the devotion of a wife is vividly exemplified. What writes Picchianti, Cherubini's Italian biographer?—"The libretto was so well worked out and so interesting, that Goethe regarded it as a true model." We recorded the opinion of Haydn and Beethoven as to Cherubini (Athen. No. 2330). Now what wrote Weber in 1812 of the Deux Journées: "Fancy my delight when I beheld lying upon the table of the hotel the playbill, with the magic name 'Armand.' I was the first person in the theatre, and planted myself in the middle of the pit, where I waited most anxiously for the tones which I knew beforehand would again elevate and inspire me. I think I may boldly assert that 'Les Deux Journées' is a really dramatic and classical work. Everything is calculated so as to produce the greatest effect; all the various pieces are so much in their proper place, that you can neither omit one nor make any addition to them. The opera displays a pleasing richness of melody, vigorous declamation, and all-striking truth in the treatment of the situation, ever new, ever seen, and retained with pleasure. We can never see enough of such masterpieces."

With every word of Weber's criticism we agree perfectly. We will even go further than the composer of 'Der Freischütz' and 'Oberon.' Our firm conviction is that we should never have had 'Fidelio' had not the 'Deux Journées' been produced. There is more than a mere similarity of story; in the music itself Beethoven has been inspired by Cherubini just as Cherubini was inspired by Mozart: there is no plagiarism, but there are those coincidences into which men of genius fall through sympathy in ideas. But other curious points suggest themselves on hearing 'Les Deux Journées,' for in it Cherubini has evidently created the new Wagnerian theories of operatic treatment. In the 'Deux Journées' there is no aria d'entrata for prima donna, tenor, baritone, or bass; there are no solos interrupting the action of the drama: every character is individualized, and has a marked type,—each one contributing to the concerted pieces faithfully, consistently, and coherently. The spoken dialogue in the original version has been converted by Sir Michael Costa with marvellous tact and skill into recitatives, conveying the imagery of Cherubini. Herr Wagner's proposed annihilation of the tyranny of leading singers in operas is to be found in the 'Deux Journées.' In the first act, how naturally the Savoyard's narrative of the protection of the Count glides into the trio in which the sympathy of Michael the Water-Carrier is enlisted on behalf of the fugitive nobleman, Marcellina, the sister of Antonio, joining in the invocation for a blessing on the preserver. The Water-Carrier's resolve to aid the Count is the prelude to the next trio, where, by the arrival of the Count and Countess, Michael's gratitude is put to the test. This trio is to the ear as melodious as possible, and yet the three parts are contrasted in contrapuntal devices of infinite ingenuity. An impassioned duet between the Count and Countess, in which she expresses her intention of joining in his peril, leads to the finale of the search by the commander and soldiers who are in pursuit of the proscribed Count. This finale, consisting of a sextet, is as grand and imposing, although set for such a limited number of voices, as any choral combination to be found in any opera. It is voiced with prodigious power, and attains a climax of devotional fervor by the appeal to Providence for protection. The second act has a martial tone throughout, for Cardinal Mazarin's soldiers are guarding the outlet from Paris; no person is allowed to pass the city gate without a permit. The tramp of the military, and the denunciation of the persecuted President of the French Parliament by the officers, are noted with consummate skill and with picturesque effect, recalling the vigor with which Beethoven has treated a similar situation in the 'Mount of Olives.' Perhaps Cherubini's setting is more solemn and sacred than the secular tune adopted by Beethoven. The seizure of Constance (the Countess) by the soldiers, and her release by order of the officer who has seen her dressed as Marcellina in the first act, and believes she is the Water-Carrier's daughter, is depicted in a trio and chorus. In the finale there is the escape of the Count, concealed in the water cart of Michael, another masterly movement, ending with the march off the stage of the soldiers, leaving the Water-Carrier to raise his hands to heaven, in gratitude for the success of his stratagem. In the third act the tenor of the composition is quite varied, for we have a deliciously pastoral music in a village, where Angelina is waiting for her affianced husband, Antonio. This rustic number is succeeded by the arrival of the soldiers, still in search for the Count, followed by the appearance of the two fugitives, guided by Antonio who conceals the Count in the trunk of a tree, where, however, he is discovered, as his wife is overheard by two drunken soldiers giving the signal to him to come out of his hiding place. The serious aspect of the drama is, however, relieved by the arrival of the Water-carrier, bearer of the sovereign's pardon.

Some slight additions to and alterations in the original score have been made. Thus, for the opening dialogue, a chorus, from Cherubini's 'Blanche de Provence,' has been introduced, and for the dénouement the last portion of the sextet in the first act is reproduced, in stead of the somewhat abrupt chorus which ended the work. Sir Michael Costa has taken chiefly the glorious overture as his text for the recitatives; the most prominent points of interest are not solely intended to sustain the singers, but there are bits of descriptive orchestration ever and anon. The playing by the band was finer than anything we have heard either in France or Germany when this opera has been given. We do not refer to precision and exactitude, but specially to the vigor of the attacks and the brilliancy of the coloring of the instrumental gems in the score. The choral singing was generally good; the opening of the second act is very difficult, but the chorists had been well trained. The honors of the cast, quod principalis, must be awarded to Signor Agnesi, as the Water-Carrier, Signor Rinaldi, as Antonio, the son, and Signor Foli, as the Commander; nothing could be better than these delineations. So much credit is due to Mlle. Tietjens for undertaking the part of Constance, and so fine was her singing, that we feel disinclined to point out, but we must do so, that if Constance is to pass as Marcellina, there ought to be similarity in appearance, and that Mlle. Rozz, who was the latter, does not resemble the German prima donna. A stronger singer than Mlle. Burmeister is required for even the short part of Angelina; and the greatest failure was Signor Vizzani, as the Count. He acted listlessly and lifelessly a character exacting passion and energy, whilst his defective intonation in the singing was too noticeable to be pleasant.

When we remember the failure of Beethoven's symphonies, of Weber's 'Der Freischütz,' of Meyerbeer's 'Robert le Diable,' when first produced here, we are not at all disheartened that the 'Deux Journées' has not been at first appreciated here by the fashionable supporters of Italian Opera; but, at all events, such a masterpiece ought not to have been produced at a period of the season when the Director has to count upon not losing receipts. However, at the beginning of an Italian operatic campaign must be devoted to débuts, and as the nights of performance are becoming more numerous, as are also the engagements of the singers at concerts, public and private, we must repeat that the production of new works, which shall be successful both financially and artistically, can now only be expected from a National Opera House.

The London Musical Season.

(From the Orchestra, July 28.)

Her Majesty's Theatre is closing. Covent Garden is shut up, the oratorios have run their course, the Crystal Palace has repeated its "Te Deum," the Philharmonics have performed their contracts with their subscribers, Mr. Chappell and Mr. Ella have fulfilled their course, M. Gounod has given his grand concerts, and nothing now remains but the Exhibition and the Royal Albert Hall. The musical season is over, the summer is gone, and the harvest has been reaped. We have had no choral gatherings of the gigantic scale realized in America; no founding of a Titan opera house, as that set in hand by Wagner in Bavaria; no new opera, as in the times of Mozart, Rossini, and Meyerbeer; no new symphony and piano concerto, as in the sunshine of Mendelssohn; nevertheless, much new music has been heard, accomplished performers have appeared, and there has been constant repetition of fine and classical compositions.

With the Italian opera history repeats itself. The popular vocalist has individualized the scene, and little or nothing has been done to elevate the national taste for real musical drama. At Covent Garden there has been marvellous energy and unflinching industry; at Drury Lane more careful selection and better preparation. At Covent Garden it was "Go ahead," at Drury Lane the motto was "festina lente." Both houses peculiarly have been successful, but for careful, just, and perfect performance, Drury Lane carries away the palm. There has been one notable revival—the Cherubini comedy of "The Water-Carrier." It did not fail, it never had the chance. The wicked generation of this day knows not the pearls of the great French Revolution, and left Sir Michael Costa in the situation of old Handel—to his troupe, his water-carrier, and his own privacy. Cherubini had done nothing in the opera to ruin a man's voice, nothing to exhaust or lay up the hero's; there were no break-neck passages, no helter-skelter modulations; nothing but what would bear continued repetition, and in time gain upon the ear and meet with general approbation. The manager appealed to the public spirit, to our national taste; we have no real spirit for Italian opera, no national taste for the musical drama.

There was not a single movement in the opera that was identified with a personal history. No musical Rachel, or Rialto, ever made a great point in it, and so our opera frequenters were content to hear and repeat that Cherubini was all inspiration, earnestness, and grand thought, and then turn their feet another way, leaving Mr. Mappleston with all the Cherubini hy-play of oboes, clarionets, and bassoons, violas, 'celli, and horns, to his own enjoyment; and to such loss as a taste for this classic opera might bring upon him. The carpenters began upon the promised "Lohengrin," and there was, we believe, a giving out of chorus-parts, but the project of its production languished for want of sheer physical strength. Every one in Covent Garden has been worked to within a foot or two of his, or her, operatic grave, and the many green spots and perilous places to be taken care of in the Wagner opera brought on a fit of despair, and so "Lohengrin" was left for better times and clearer intelligence. Nor was there opportunity to bring out the new opera by Verdi, which requires peculiar care from the leading vocalists, much study, and great perseverance on all sides, to give it a fair chance for public favor. Another season may possibly unlock the latest secrets of Verdi, and display the treasures of his gifted and undiminished imagination. We need not refer to the operas that were performed, the daily journals have recorded all this, and with a tenacity of laudation that nothing can transcend.

In church music we have had the three new Te Deums, and some half score anthems by M. Gounod. Certain Englishmen also within the ecclesiastical zone of choirs have published their isolated anthems. Of the three Te Deums everything has been said that need to be said. Of the Gounod anthems, some are grim and low toned, others are earnest and entertaining, and all are carefully written and worthy of study, but there is nothing that will particularly hold its own or come to the front. The old machinery of the Anthem is gone, and the new is too full of imperfections and defects in their æsthetic character to keep church-going folks interested or sweet tempered.

As to the oratorio, the Bach "Passion" of St. Matthew has maintained its supremacy, and the season has been rendered remarkable by the performance of the other Bach "Passion," that of St. John. This second "Passion," not being so long as the St. Matthew, equally, if not more dramatic, equally, if not more elevated in tone, will we think, become the more popular oratorio. It is, throughout, strong and emotive, and with one or two exceptions, not difficult to sing, and will always maintain general sympathy and universal admiration.

Much splendid music, both old and new, has been given at the meetings of the two Philharmonics, the Monday Populars, Mr. Ella's well-known "Union," and the harmonic gatherings at the Crystal Palace. The new symphony and the piano concerto—quartet, quintet and sextet, all built up in the latest notion of musical construction—were listened to submissively, and if they here and there discouraged the auditors, no one could be said to be altogether dissatisfied. People were told they were listening to works of great merit, to composers who enjoyed fixed and certain reputations; but in general they were too ignorant, careless, or idle to study their own interests in the case. There was a verdict of "Be it so," but no enthusiasm.

In the Ballad and Benefit Concerts there has been an immense production of new music, some songs being so lucky as to be remembered at the breakfast table the next morning, others to be dismissed at once in terms of unmistakable petulance, if not in a slight breeze of vexation. Our favorite singers possess the great virtue of humility; they will sing anything and everything, good or bad, provided they be duly addressed in the matter, and they feel it is a duty to which they ought to accommodate themselves.

The composers have had much to rejoice over, the public to put up with, and the publishers have found themselves occasionally laughed at, and at other times it has been their turn to laugh.

There has been much playing upon the organ. The great organ in the Royal Albert Hall affords splendid opportunities for the rendering of the Bach pedal-fugue, the French Offertoire music, and the Mendelssohn sonata. The performers have been Legion; good, bad, and indifferent; but as no organ player ever gets any remuneration for his study, we feel bound to say, upon the whole our native organ players are a very creditable set. But to be just, we must take one player out of the common rack, and this is Mr. George Augustus Tamplin. Mr. Tamplin is the son of the well known Dr. Tamplin, a physician of eminence. Some years ago he studied the new school of music with a direct bearing upon the harmonium, and in this way became an unparalleled performer on this difficult instrument. He worked in the French school, and went far ahead of any of the Parisian celebrities on this instrument. He has applied all this magnificent command of head and hand to the organ. In mixing up the manuals and registers of a large organ Mr. Tamplin is undoubtedly foremost, and in his extraordinary extemporaneous performances he is altogether incomparable. In short he is the only Englishman as organist who deals with the semitonic scale, as if it was the ordinary diatonic. Directly he begins the auditor is made aware that here is the new thing—the true Wagnerian theory, the fashionable lunacy of the year of grace 1872.

Mr. George Augustus Tamplin is, of course, pronounced to be musically mad! Be it so, if he will only have the goodness to bite a few of his confidères.

Although the musical season be in one sense terminated, there is much music lying in the Exhibition worth attention, and calling for sedulous study. There will be yet two months for organ performers, for pianoforte playing, and for hearing the exquisite programmes of the military bands. In one sense this daily playing by our soldiers of much fine music is an education of itself, and must operate beneficially on the natural taste.

Italian Opera in London. Review of the Season.

(From the Times, July 27.)

The season 1872 has not been remarkable for the production of startling novelties at either house. We shall not go again through the old ceremony of reconsidering the prospectuses, and comparing what was promised with what was actually performed. It would, indeed, be a waste of time and space—for, remembering as we do the operative prospectuses of the last quarter of a century, it would be difficult to name one of which all, or nearly all the pledges were fulfilled. Great stress was laid upon the production of Herr Wagner's Lohengrin, at the ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA; the more so because of the artistic, if not pecuniary, success of the same composer's Fliegende Holländer, at Drury Lane, in 1870, when Mr. George Wood was manager, Signor Arditi conductor, and the principal parts were sustained by Mdlle. Ilma de Murska and Mr. Santley. But Lohengrin is far in advance of the "Olandese Dannato," and proportionately more difficult to get up. It would have been a severe tax on the resources at Mr. Gye's command; and as its intended performance was not to be until somewhat late in the summer, all that part of the season to which the manager naturally looks for his harvest would have been in a great measure absorbed by continued rehearsals of a work, the success of which, at the best, could be looked upon as problematical. So Lohengrin was inevitably laid aside—at any rate for a season. The operas of Herr Wagner—which, by the way, have nothing in common with Italian opera proper, or with French opera, as represented by Auber, or with the melange of Italian, French, and German opera, of which the great works of Meyerbeer are types, or, indeed, with German opera itself, from Mozart down to Weber—are exceptional things, as the preparations for the grand performances of the Niebelungen "Trilogy" at Bayreuth, postponed as they are from year to year, sufficiently attest. Had Herr Wagner been in London he would have desired to appropriate half a season to himself for the rehearsals of Lohengrin, and this granted him, would hardly have been satisfied. If Mr. Gye, nevertheless, is still bent upon giving Lohengrin next year, let him prepare it early in the season, and produce it before his vocal

"stars"—his Pattis, his Lucas, his Albanis, &c.—come out; then it might take; otherwise there is no chance for it. The substitution for Lohengrin of Prince Poniatowski's Gelmina, and Il Guarany, by the young Brazilian, Carlos Gomez, discovered a mild sense of irony in Mr. Gye, for which he deserves to be credited. In any case, both were unknown works, the first affording an opportunity of presenting that universal favorite, Madame Adelina Patti, in a new part, the second giving Mr. Augustus Harris a chance of showing that even the Africaine of Meyerbeer had not entirely exhausted his genius for the invention of scenic splendor and elaborate stage combinations. But of these operas we have no more to say at present. Allowing that Mr. Gye failed to bring out Lohengrin, and the Diamans de la Couronne of Auber, he has certainly not been idle. Besides Gelmina and Il Guarany, he has with unexampled rapidity during a short season of seventeen or eighteen weeks, given to his subscribers and the public no less than twenty-six operas. These were Faust e Margherita, La Sonnambula, Fra Diavolo, Lucia di Lammermoor, the Huguenots, La Favorita, Il Flauto Magico, La Figlia del Reggimento, La Traviata, Hamlet, Martha, Fidelio, Dinorah, Il Barbiere di Siviglia, Don Giovanni, L'Africaine, Le Nozze di Figaro, Rigoletto, Il Trovatore, Der Freischütz, Gelmina, L'Elisir d'Amore, L'Etoile du Nord; Linda di Chamouni, Norma, and Il Guarany—we have named them in the order of their production. Much may be pardoned a director who, in so short a time, can furnish performances, more or less careful and complete, of so large a variety of operas, which, to judge by experience, are for the greater part more or less to the taste of his subscribers. That all were given in perfection we shall not be asked to admit; but when the patrons of the opera are so clamorous for variety, the manager has only to do the best in his power to satisfy them; and this—in spite of what we must persist in thinking the mistaken policy of having two conductors instead of one absolute chief, over the orchestral department—Mr. Gye has certainly accomplished.

What Mr. Gye's principal singers have effected in the course of the season, we need not recapitulate. Their various performances were duly chronicled at the time. We may say, however, that to Mdlle. Adelina Patti, who successfully appeared as Dinorah, Rosina, Zerlina (Don Giovanni), Leonora (Il Trovatore), Gelmina, Caterina (L'Etoile du Nord), Amina, the character with which, in 1861, she made her début, and Valentine, has been assigned a single new character, and no more—that of Gelmina, in Prince Poniatowski's opera so named. Madame Pauline Lucas, who has played Zerlina (Fra Diavolo), Leonora (La Favorita), Margherita (Faust), Selika (L'Africaine), Cherubino (Le Nozze), and Agatha (Der Freischütz), has also been allowed but one new opportunity of distinction—of which, when we name Agatha, it is needless to say she made the very best. No such Agatha having been seen and heard before on the stage of the Royal Italian Opera—the genuine actress and the genuine dramatic singer, great in both instances, being enthusiastically recognized. What the other well known artists in Mr. Gye's company achieved—including Mdlle. Sessi, who gave real life and character to the heroine of Il Guarany; M. Faure, whose Caspar was only inferior to his Hamlet, inasmuch as the music does not lie quite so easily for that distinguished artist's voice; Mdlle. Scalchi, with the voice and a fair promise of the skill of Albani herself; Signora Naudin, Cotogni, Baggiolo, &c.—has been already told in the periodical record of the season. Among Mr. Gye's new engagements, we may at once dismiss all the German singers destined to take part in Lohengrin, as of little note; but a word of praise is due to Mdlle. Smeroschi, who sang twice in the Elisir d'Amore; and many strong words of praise to our esteemed English soprano, Madame Euphrosyne Parepa, who proved triumphantly that another Norma was not an impossibility. Mdlle. Emma Albani has already done enough to warrant a belief that she will become a shining star in our operatic firmament. This extremely prepossessing young Canadian made her début early in the season as Amina, and created an impression, which was deepened by her next performance, as Lucia, and became stronger and stronger in each new character she portrayed. Her Martha, Gilda (Rigoletto), and Linda (Linda di Chamouni), one by one raised her higher and higher in the appreciation of the public. The charm of youth, added to the charm of a beautiful voice, full of sympathetic tones, a quiet, unaffected modest demeanor, and undoubted intelligence as an actress, produced their inevitable effect; and when the curtain descended upon Mdlle. Albani's last performance of Lucia it rose again for a new singer to be greeted who had in a single season won and merited a "name." Into further details about the Royal Italian Opera we need not enter, beyond saying that, on the whole, Mr. Gye has certainly deserved well of his subscribers.

Mr. Mapleson opened HER MAJESTY'S OPERA a fortnight after Mr. Gye, and closed the doors of his theatre exactly a week later. Mr. Mapleson's promises of absolute novelty, as set forth in his prospectus, amounted to two operas—the Deux Journées of Cherubini and the Diamans de la Couronne of Auber, under the Italian name of Caterina. Of these, the first was presented once; and a finer performance in its way—thanks to Sir Michael Costa, his added recitatives with orchestral accompaniments, his careful preparation, and his admirable conducting—has rarely been heard. Nevertheless, Les Deux Journées did not hit the public taste, and was never repeated. Auber's opera escaped a similar fate, inasmuch as, though repeatedly announced, up to almost the very end of the season, it was ultimately withdrawn—for the present, which may fairly be taken to signify sine die. Mr. Mapleson's seasons ran for upwards of sixteen weeks, during which the following operas were produced in the order given:—Fidelio, La Sonnambula, La Figlia del Reggimento, Semiramide, the Huguenots, Don Pasquale, Faust, Lucresia Borgia, Lucia di Lammermoor, La Traviata, Il Barbiere di Siviglia, Il Trovatore, Les Deux Journées (Le due Giornate), Rigoletto, Martha, Le Nozze di Figaro—in all sixteen operas. We have heard no Der Freischütz, Anna Bolena, Dinorah (for Mdlle. Marimon), Ballo in Maschera, Il Flauto Magico, &c.—although the prospectus announced them all; but the same excuse we have off red for Covent Garden holds just as well for Drury Lane. In sum—with regard to novelty, Mr. Mapleson has brought out one single opera—Cherubini's Les Deux Journées, and that, we repeat, was presented once and no oftener.

What Mr. Mapleson's chief singers have done stands as little in demand of detailed record as what Mr. Gye's chief singers have done. Take, for example, Mdlle. Christine Nilsson. This accomplished and highly popular lady, during the course of her engagement of 15 or 16 nights, has appeared as Violetta (Traviata), Margaret (Faust), Lucia, Martha, and Cherubino (Le Nozze),—in every one of which characters she was already familiar to London audiences. Nothing new was set down for her. Lucy Mignon and Desdemona (not to speak of Ophelia), the parts which, far more than any of those we have enumerated, stamped her in the eyes of the London public as a first class artist, were abandoned, so that really Mdlle. Nilsson, after her two years' absence in America, has not been allowed a fair chance of renewing the old associations, and re-establishing herself as a prime favorite. Mignon would have been a god-send for Mdlle. Nilsson and not less a god-send for her admirers—of whom she has very many and enthusiastic in this country; but the sempiternal Violetta, Margaret, Lucia, &c., are enough to pall upon the most insatiable appetite.

Mdlle. Marimon, too, has been limited again to Amina, Maria, Norina, and Rosina; while the versatile and indefatigable Mdlle. Tietjens has not been vouchsafed a single new part, except only that of the heroine in Cherubini's opera, which is not by any means suited to her. Mdlle. Marimon, however, has maintained her position as in certain respects, and in certain characters most favorable to her peculiar idiosyncrasy, the most wonderful "vocalist" of her time. And yet the more we see of Mdlle. Marimon the more we are convinced that she is vocalist "et præterea nihil." She has no "charm;" and even when she has executed passages in the manner which perhaps no other living singer could equal, she leaves one—on the stage at least—comparatively unmoved. In the concert-room it is otherwise; there, no matter who may be the other lady singers, Mdlle. Marimon invariably carries off the palm. Such fluency and executive facility as this lady possesses in a certain style of vocalization are scarcely rivalled, assuredly unsurpassed. Signor Campanini, the new tenor, who created a veritable furor on the night of his début as Gennaro in Lucresia Borgia, has evidently won the favor of the public—if not the unequivocal admiration of connoisseurs. This gentleman has not only much to learn but something to unlearn; and he must both learn and unlearn before he can honorably maintain the position originally claimed for him as Signor Giuglini's legitimate successor—a position which would, now-a-days, signify neither more nor less than that of the first tenor on the Italian boards. Signor Campanini has been heard successively as Gennaro, Edgardo, Manrico, the Duke of Mantua, and Lionel—on each occasion, while here and there exciting unqualified admiration, giving room for serious criticism on the part of unprejudiced hearers. He is young, however, and if he also is wise, he will strive his utmost to maintain the position to which his most enthusiastic admirers consider him entitled, and which the operatic public generally would only be too glad to see him attain. On the other hand, M. Capoul, the French tenor, has few of the requisites to excel in the school of Italian opera. He is not only French in style and mannerism, but French to such a degree of exaggeration as bona fide amateurs of Italian Opera would in the end scarcely be inclined to tolerate. Miss Clara Louise Kellogg, the American prima donna, has, for the second time in this country, merited and earned an honorable success. This young lady is a legitimate artist in the full meaning of the term; and in each of the characters she has essayed—Linda, Lucia, Gilda, Violetta, and Susanna (Mozart's Susanna before all)—has created an indelible impression, so much so, indeed, that every subscriber would have been only too pleased to hear her in some new part. That any new part undertaken by Miss Kellogg would be studied perseveringly and conscientiously her antecedents suffice to show.

Mr. Mapleson's general company has been unusually efficient. With a second soprano, like Mlle. Marie Roze—who, if she would consent to take the "compromaria" parts, might, with her voice and personal appearance, be invaluable; a contralto like Mme. Trebelli-Bettini, now unrivalled as a singer of Rossini's music (witness her Arsace), and the Italian school generally; baritone-basses like Signors Rota (who especially made his mark as Mephistopheles), and Mendioroz; a serious bass like Signor Agnesi, a comic bass like Signor Borella, and two in one, like Signor Foli; second tenors like Signors Vizzani and Rinaldini, to say nothing of Signor Fancelli, who pretends to be a first tenor, and a priceless "utility," like Mlle. Baumermeister, excellent in everything she does, the director of Her Majesty's Opera is master of all necessary resources, and with the invaluable aid of Sir Michael Costa, who has trained the orchestra and chorus (orchestra more especially), into such splendid efficiency, might, with a trifle more pains and expenditure on his mise-en-scene, hold his own without fear of adverse criticism. On the whole, it must be admitted that Mr. Mapleson has given a series of performances of which only the most fastidious can find reason to complain. His subscribers might, it is true, have desired a little more variety, and just (if only), an occasional infusion of novelty.

Bach's Chorales.

The Tonic Sol-Fa Reporter (London,) in a recent number prints, in its peculiar notation, several Chorales with Bach's Harmony, prefixing the following remarks:

A few words on the German Chorales, with specimens of which this number is filled, may be of interest. At the time of the Reformation, Luther appealed to his nation's love for song, and fostered congregational singing as a means of religious awakening. In seeking music for his hymns, he availed himself largely of tunes already existing in the church, and of many others whose origin is now unknown. The rise of Luther's style of church music began with the Reformation in the middle of the sixteenth century. A hundred years later it declined; fewer tunes, and those inferior, were composed; while many of the old ones were deprived of their distinct rhythm and triple time, and levelled to a standard of lifeless uniformity. The creative period may be said to have ceased with the advent of the last century. The wave of Luther's revival had spent its force, and church music, as a natural result, was lifeless too. The tunes disappeared from the hymn books, and the organist and precentor, being now supreme, managed things in their own way. "One of the immediate consequences," says the preface to the "The Chorale Book for England," from which much of our information is derived, "was the predominance of the organ in the service at the expense of the singing of the congregation. This led eventually to a practice in every respect to be deprecated, which we still find all over Germany, that of introducing between every line of the hymn, an interlude performed by the organist." The connection of Bach's name with these church melodies is thus explained. "Bach, fully alive to the beauty of the tunes and hymns of his country, adopted the practice in which he was followed by his successors, Mendelssohn and others, of introducing chorales into all his numerous sacred works, either to their own words, or to new ones suiting better the subject of the cantata, thereby doubtless bringing them more readily home to the appreciation of the congregation, who were well acquainted with the old familiar tunes. How Bach harmonized these chorales is well known, and need not be dwelt upon here." It is further stated that when Bach died, his son extracted the Chorales from his father's works, and published them in a separate collection. The common impression that Bach is the author of these tunes is shown, by what has just been said, to be manifestly wrong, and it has only been fostered by the way in which the melodies which Bach harmonized have been spoken of as "Bach's Chorales." A few of the airs are however ascribed to him with probable correctness.

The student who examines and compares the Chorales scattered through Bach's works will be struck by the prodigality of power shown by the great Leipzig organist. The same Chorale is to be found harmonized in four or five entirely distinct ways, and set in as many different keys. The not inconsiderable variations in the melody are also noticeable, the fact being that of these ancient tunes, as of our old English songs, there is no one version that can claim to be the correct one. The arrangement of the parts is rather trying to the singer. The extreme limits of compass in the various voices are used in merciless fashion, and there are wide, unvocal intervals. Characteristic of the style is the frequent crossing of the parts—the alto goes above the air and below the tenor in the very first piece in the present Reporter. But it is perhaps the frequent use of part pulse incidental tones that marks the individuality of Bach's manner. These have the character of melody in whatever voice they may occur. The style of the harmony dictates the rate at which the Chorales should move. It is essential that the incidental tones should be clearly heard; to allow of this the speed should average M. 60, and hardly ever exceed M. 66.

A good deal of criticism has been directed against Mr. Barnby in his recent revival of Bach's Passion music, for "turning the chorales into part songs," instead of doing them in the true German style. What that style is many of our readers know. Imagine a large church, a thundering organ playing the harmonies, and the congregation, who are all sitting, slowly singing the air in unison, with hard and mechanical voices. As a rule everyone sings, because everyone knows the melody; boys and girls cannot be confirmed until they have learnt 30 or 40 Chorales. At each of the pauses the organ, abating nothing of its power, gives an interlude of three or four notes, according to the measure of the Chorale, which over, the thick stream of voices joins in again and another line is begun. Thus a whole psalm is done without the organ having for a moment ceased, and the effect is lifeless and wearisome in the extreme. An attempt to naturalize this style in England would not only be impossible, it would be unwise. In Germany all the people join in the Chorales which are interspersed through Bach's cantatas, just as we join in the responses of the Church of England service. In England, however, they at present only listen to them as part of a performance, though it must not be forgotten that we sometimes get as much good by listening to sacred words uttered in music as by taking part in the utterance ourselves. It is therefore much better to let the music be heard at its best, and to display the rich beauty of the harmony by well-balanced parts and varied expression. For this mode of treatment we have at least the authority of Mendelssohn. Lampadius, who sang in the chorus when the great master revived the Passion Music in Leipzig, says,—"The Chorales he made the subject of the greatest care. They had to be sung with the utmost delicacy of expression, most of them very piano."

The Belgian Artisans' Choir.

The deep toned voices of the Aberdare miners are still ringing in our ears when another musical raid is made upon London. This time the invading force comes from Brussels. The singers belong to a Belgian Friendly Society called "La société des Artisans réunis de la Belgique." It was founded in 1848, and the members must be bona-fide artisans. Music had no part in the original scheme, but the subscription paid by the members is only 5d. a month, and the happy idea of replenishing the coffers by giving concerts was hit upon. We commend the example to the notice of similar societies in England. A choral society was formed under the leadership of M. Lintermans, which now consists of 115 members, all men. They first competed in 1853, and have since been very successful in carrying off prizes. As yet they have not entered the lists with the German Societies, but their friends (as all friends should be) are quite confident they would beat them if they tried.

The artisans, attired in evening dress, made their first appearance in public at the Albert Hall, on 15th ult. They came on to the orchestra headed by the richly-brodered banner which the King lately gave them, and were loudly cheered. When they rose to sing, they gathered in a closely packed mass in half-moon shape round their conductor, who stood on a pile of boxes. Thus arranged, the conductor went to each part and sounded its starting note, afterwards ascending his rostrum. The whole proceeding, which was leisurely done, was repeated before each piece. Nor must we forget the water-drinking, which seemed to be also a necessary preliminary throughout the evening. It would have done the hearts of our teetotal friends good to see it. Remembering that the choir is made up of working men, we must not judge its singing by too severe a standard. It is hardly a reproach to them to say that in point of refined and polished tone and style they were inferior to the Bristol Choral Union, which was heard a few days since at the Crystal Palace. The well cultivated and pleasant quality of the high register of the first tenors was noticeable. It is needless to remind our readers that the "basso-alto" voice is unknown on the continent. The vigor of the "attack" was also a novel experience to English ears. A great deal of pains must be taken with this. When a part enters you feel as if the singers had hit their note with a hammer. Of course this does not apply to the pianissimo passages, which were done with extreme care. The syncopations, in which their music abounds, were also done by the workmen with an ease and force that we have never heard equalled in England. Several of the choruses sung by the artisans contained solos with humming accompaniment. Opinion seems to be divided as to the proper mode of humming in chorus, but we may notice that the Belgians held their mouths slightly open, and the lips, slightly protruding, were allowed to vibrate. The nose, we need hardly say, was not employed. The success of the evening was Ambroise Thomas's "Le Tyrol," a piece which the Paris Prize Choir brought home with them in 1867, and have since frequently performed in a mixed voice form. All the words of this piece were printed in the programme, but strange to say the opening part was missed out, the music being taken up at the words "When God his hand revealing," of our English version. The genius of the music arrested all ears, and produced a furor, so that the choir were induced to repeat the closing movement. The jodel calls, given by the first tenors in their thin register, produced an effect which is missed in the ladies' voices, especially as they sang "la-oo-oo" instead of "la-a-a," as the words stand. On the whole, however, we came to the conclusion that the piece suffers but little in its mixed voice form. The Belgian choir gave several other concerts during their stay in London.

The following notice of the choir we take from the Athenæum. The unforeseen surprise of the writer at the capabilities of the counter-tenor voice is interesting:—

"They are not speculative artists, but bona fide artisans of all trades, singing for love of Art after their hours of toil; the majority are printers and compositors; their president is a working brush maker. The first taste of their quality was in the Royal Albert Hall, a large arena for a small body of voices after we have been habituated to hear therein orchestras of 1,000 performers; but they passed through the trying ordeal triumphantly. M. Guillaume de Mol was associated with M. Lintermans in the direction of the music. The divisions of the voices were nearly equal, that is, there were forty-nine first and second tenors, and fifty-eight first and second basses. The first thing that struck the auditory was that the 107 singers, who were all dressed alike in black, with white gloves and cravats, who had been sitting in a long row, by a wave of the conductor's baton, were all suddenly massed in close order, forming a triangular-shaped phalanx. By this disposition of the executive, the sound was certainly concentrated. The next surprise was in the timbre of the voices. Nominally there are no altos; but the quality at times in the high notes was that of finely-voiced boys—of a Cathedral Choir,—not the peculiar and too often disagreeable tone emitted by our own altos. It is the compass of the first tenors which is so extraordinary,—as they attack the C in alt. fearlessly, and with perfect intonation; at the opposite extreme, in the lowest depths deeper still, the D flat was distinctly heard from the basses. Now as to their method,—for therein is their unquestionable speciality. As in singing, so in writing,—Le style c'est l'homme. Their attributes in execution are precision in the attack, strict observance of light and shade, and uniformity of effect; the collective body, now delivering one part, then intermingling another one, seems to be as one executant,—such has been the force of training and the continuous practice. To state that they observed their pianos and fortes will convey but a feeble notion of their powers; it is in the coloring, in the fine distinction preserved in the gradations of tone, that these workmen produce their extraordinary and exciting effects."—Ibid.

MUNICH. The performances of Der fliegende Holländer and Tristan und Isolde will probably be repeated under Herr von Bülow's direction, in the second week of August.

Music Abroad.

London.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS. The sixtieth season of the old Society, which closed on the 8th ult., introduced the following English compositions: Bennett's Symphony in G minor and "Ajax" Prelude; Cusins's Piano Concerto in A minor; and Potter's Symphony in D. Of the last two concerts the Musical Times reports as follows:

The programme of the seventh concert, on the 24th June, contained an interesting novelty, if such a term can be applied to Bach's Concerto for strings, which was performed for the first time in this country. Although of course somewhat antiquated in form, this work was listened to with the utmost pleasure by the audience, and would have been still more welcome as a specimen of the music of the period had not a slow movement of the same composer's orchestral Suite in D been interpolated between the two movements of the Concerto, in order that the final Allegro might come upon the ear with better effect. No greater contrast with Bach's quiet and masterly composition could have been selected than Beethoven's Symphony in A (No. 7), which commenced the second part, and was played with the utmost vigor and finish. The overtures to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and "Der Berggeist" (Spohr), were the other orchestral pieces, and Mme. Norman Nérada's excellent performance of Spohr's Dramatic Concerto for the violin was one of the features of the evening. The vocalists were Mlle. Titiens and Mme. Trebelli-Bettini. The eighth and last concert of the season was given on the 8th ult., the performance commencing with Brahms's Serenade in D, for orchestra, a work so unequal in merit as to make us doubt the permanent position of the music of "Young Germany," even where such undoubted marks of genius are shown, unless the representatives of the school can be prevailed upon to believe that the worth of a piece is not to be estimated by its length. A "Serenade" in eight movements is too much for an English audience, however it may be endured in Germany, and in spite, therefore, of the undoubted merit of many of the movements—especially the Minuetto and Scherzo—the last note of the work was unanimously hailed as a relief. The orchestral Prelude to the music of Sophocles's "Ajax," by Sir Sterndale Bennett (which was performed for the first time), must not be judged as an "overture," the short introduction in B flat major, leading to the Allegro in the tonic minor, being evidently intended to suggest the character of the important illustrative music which is to follow. The subjects of the Prelude are extremely attractive, and there is so much variety of color in the instrumentation as to invest this brief Prelude with the utmost interest. Mr. Charles Hallé's performance of Mendelssohn's Concerto in D minor was by no means beyond reproach. In many parts the passages were dragged, and in the last movement the tempo was positively altered. The applause, however, was loud and enthusiastic, and a recall at the conclusion of the Concerto showed that our opinion was not shared by the general audience. Mme. Parepa's fine singing of Beethoven's "Ah perfido" was fully appreciated, as was also Mr. Santley's artistic delivery of Rossini's "Alle voci della gloria." Beethoven's Symphony in C minor was included in the programme, and after Weber's "Jubilee" overture, which concluded the concert, Mr. Cusins, the conductor, was called forward to receive the well earned applause of the audience.

ROYAL ACADEMY. On Monday afternoon Mrs. Gladstone distributed the prizes to the pupils of the Royal Academy of Music. Professor Sir Sterndale Bennett, with several of the Philharmonic directors, was present, and Mr. Hullah conducted the concert. We have no space to print the entire list, which is a very long one. The silver medals were gained by Miss Florence Green and Miss Channell (pianoforte); Miss G. Mayfield (singing); Miss Rhoda E. Barkley, Mr. J. Ridgway (composition and pianoforte); Mr. W. Fitton (pianoforte and organ); Mr. Eaton Fanning (general progress); and Mr. Henry Guy (singing). The bronze medallists were Misses Holmes, Martin, Troup, Firth Moultrie (organ) Mr. Howells, and Master H. Walker. Miss Baglehole carried off the "Sterndale-Bennett" prize of ten guineas; and Mr. E. Jones, the prize violin bow. Books and letters of commendation were awarded to many other pupils.

The concert lasted nearly five hours; it ought to be divided into two, as at the London Academy. Mr. Wingham produced a new and brilliant "Festal overture" (in commemoration of the Academy's jubilee), which was signally successful. His symphony, performed at the Crystal Palace last March, has been highly extolled. Mr. Fanning's symphony (first movement) lacks originality of style and continuity of thought; we do not wish to discourage, but we would advise him to study severely. Mr. Henry Guy's Anthem (Psalm C.) is characterized by breadth, boldness, and purpose; the construction is excellent, and the execution by the pupils was most satisfactory. The sacred "part-song" of Mr. Roberts, a medley of the German and English styles, would be improved by greater conciseness; the parts, however, are well written, and the writing may be conscientiously commended. The pianoforte pupils who performed on Monday were Misses Holmes, Channell, Florence Green, Conolly, Baglehole, and Chapman, Mr. Fitton and Master Walker. Miss Channell chose the first movement of Schumann's concerto (A minor), and Miss Baglehole Mendelssohn's Serenade and Allegro Gioioso, in D, both distinguishing themselves by brilliant execution and intelligent conception of the subject, and attention to nuances.

These ladies had already honors at the Academy. Miss F. Green has an elastic touch. Miss Whomes excels less in cantabile than in bravura passages, whilst her style is rather wanting in expression, and, more "taught" than free and spontaneous, leaves room for improvement. Mr. Fitton's firm organ touch disqualifies him from doing justice to the delicate music of Chopin. He played on the pianoforte, and in awkward succession, a fugue of Handel and a study of Chopin. His organ piece was Mendelssohn's first concerto in F minor. Mr. Howard gave a creditable reading of Beethoven's violin concerto (first movement only); his tone in the upper register was remarkably fine and his delivery expressive. The most successful vocal achievement was the scene, "Ah perfido," of Beethoven, admirably rendered by Miss Jessie Jones, and with more eloquence and genuine pathos than we could have expected from an inexperienced and bashful girl. Miss Goode sang the air "Jerusalem," from St. Paul, and Mr. Pope, a sonorous basso, delivered the air of Sarastro (with chorus) "Possesti Nami," with great effect, taking the low E flat at the close. The tenor singer, Mr. Howells (Potter Exhibitioner), has excellent taste, but not a pleasing quality of voice. And now, with all respect, we really must come to a perfect cadence. We have had quite a surfeit. The Report read by Sir S. Bennett, in every respect satisfactory, testifies to the progress of the pupils and the increase of their numbers.—Mus. Standard, July 27.

THE WORCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL is fixed to take place on the 10th, 11th, 12th, and 13th September, under the patronage, as usual, of Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen, in the Cathedral. The principal vocal performers are Mlle. Titiens, Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mme. Patey, Miss Alice Fairman, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Rigby, Mr. Santley, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Lewis Thomas. Dr. Wesley will take the organ, Mr. Townshend Smith the piano, and Mr. Done will officiate as conductor. The hand and chorus will number nearly 350 performers. On Tuesday will be performed Mendelssohn's "Elijah," on Wednesday morning selections from "Samson," Hummel's "Messe Solennelle," and Haydn's "Creation," on Thursday morning Sebastian Bach's "Passion," and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise;" on Friday the "Messiah." On Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday evenings there will be grand miscellaneous concerts in the College Hall; prominence being given on the first evening to Mozart, on the second to Handel, and on Thursday to Beethoven.

THE SEVENTEENTH NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVAL commences on Monday, 16th September, at St. Andrew's Hall. The principal vocalists are Mlle. Titiens and Mlle. Alhani, Madame Cora de Wilhorst, Madame Patey, and Madame Trebelli-Bettini; Messrs. Sims Reeves, W. H. Cummings, Kerr Gedge, J. G. Patey, and Santley. Conductor, Sir Julius Benedict. The sacred performances will include Mendelssohn's "Elijah," A. S. Sullivan's "Festival Te Deum," Haydn's "Creation," Sir Julius Benedict's "St. Peter," and Handel's "Messiah."

VIENNA. The Society of the Friends of Music have appointed Herr Brahms to direct their concerts next season, and have already fixed on their programme. Among the more important works figure Handel's Samson, Mendelssohn's Walpurgisnacht, two Cantatas by J. S. Bach, and Cherubini's Requiem. As our readers may be aware, a committee has been formed for the purpose of erecting a monument to Beethoven. The members are devoting their best energies to their self-imposed task. They have already succeeded in obtaining a site from the Board charged with the extension of the city. This site is the ground laid out as a garden in front of the Academic Gymnasium. It is particularly well adapted for the purpose, because the monument to be erected on it will form as it were, a link between the principal buildings of the capital and the recently inaugurated Schubert Memorial. The project, by the realization of which Vienna will pay off a debt of honor it owes the master, is now fairly launched. At present the committee are limited for funds, but they will no doubt soon be in a position to advertise for designs, and Germany will assuredly come forward liberally with subscriptions, so as to enable the committee to carry out, in a manner becoming the great master, the design eventually selected.

CONSTANTINOPLE. A great many papers have lately published a paragraph to the effect that a Turk, Hassim Pacha, has composed an opera, Mahomet and his Creditors, to a Turkish libretto, for the Turkish Theatre. It now appears that the pacha is an Italian composer of the name of Della Viola, who, some years ago, entered the Turkish army, where he rose to his present dignity without, however, renouncing music as he renounced his name.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUGUST 24, 1872.

The Coming Musical Season.

The prospect is beginning to unfold itself as richly and as temptingly as ever. At all events there will be no lack of quantity. Singers and instrumental virtuosi from abroad look this way for renewal of their golden fortunes, and if we might trust newspaper paragraphs, nearly all the famous artists in Europe would seem to be booked already for America. Doubtless much of this is merely speculation, turning of a thing over in the mind and talking about it, throwing out feelers through the advertising correspondents, and so forth; there is a difference between merely thinking of a thing and doing it. Doubtless every musical soldier of fortune in Europe has thought and perhaps talked, during the summer, of coming over to take a turn here in the land of "Jubilee," meanly as he may think of the gross musical atmosphere in which such monsters fatten. (Thank Heaven! with the last and biggest the brood does seem to have become extinct). Many distinguished artists, however, really are coming. Many new and interesting combinations are forming, while in spite of all the novelties and the distractions, all the excitements artificially worked up by sensation mongers, all the sense of dissipation after "big things," the steadily growing healthy taste for good sound musical enjoyment will still have its regular supplies of Symphony and Oratorio and classical chamber music. Indeed a healthy reaction in favor of quiet, reasonable concerts, in which quality is of more account than quantity, will be sure to show itself after this last, even more than it did after the former Jubilee.—The winter's programme cannot be given yet with much completeness; but of such features as appear to be determined we may name the most important.

In Opera we lose some stars and gain others. Nilsson is now Madame Roussand and not for us at present. Parepa Rosa, too, will not return this year; after a triumphant reappearance in London, she is last reported to have declined handsome offers at St. Petersburg and Moscow, in favor of the Viceroy's new and sumptuous opera house at Cairo. "New fields and pastures green." On the other hand we are to have Pauline Lucca, the bewitching. The indomitable Maretzek has secured her, and for two other prima donna sopranos, Miss Kelloz, who has been turning the heads of the London Opera goes in a marvellous way this summer, and who, according to London musical papers, is coming to "create" Gounod's Mireille at the New York Academy, and Mlle. Rosine Leville (or Laveille) from the Grand Opera, Paris. For contraltos are named Senora Sanz, Mlle. Emma Ferretti and Mina Cooney; for first tenors Sig. Vizzani, and Sig. Abrugnedo, tenor robusto, from Naples and Milan, where he was called "the Wachtel of Italy;" second tenor, Sig. Manresa. Baritone, Moriani, Sparrapani, and the veteran Ronconi for buffo. Basses, Jamet, late of the Nilsson troupe and Coulon. As conductors, Maretzek, Carl Bergmann and Karlberg will, it is said, officiate. The season begins in New York on the 30th of September with L'Africaine, and lasts till the 12th of December. On the 16th, they will open in Philadelphia. Our turn at the Boston Theatre will begin Jan. 6. The repertoire is not divulged, but we fear may be too easily guessed—The excellent Parepa-Rosa English Opera will be missed; nor do we hear of anything important in the way of German Opera. Opera Bouffe, of course, will have its haunts.

The earliest important attraction (yet made public) at the Boston Music Hall, will be a series of concerts by the famous Russian composer and pianist, Anton Rubinstein, who will make his debut in New York on the 23d of September, and after a few concerts there will come to Boston. Manager Grau brings him out, together with the celebrated violinist Wieniawski, and the singers Mlle. Liebhart, soprano, and Mlle. Orgényi, contralto.

Mme. Rudersdorff's concert troupe is nearly organized, and doubtless will be early in the field, attracting much attention both in Boston and the other musical places. Among others she will introduce to us the young lady violinist, Fräulein Therese Liebe, who has made a fine mark in England, whither Rossini sent her with a warm letter of commendation to Sir Julius Benedict (we have seen the letter), and Miss Alice Fairman, a young English singer, one of the genuine contraltos, engaged to sing at the Worcester Festival in September. Mme. R. has also secured the services of Mr. Rudolphsen, our excellent baritone, and as pianist both in solo and accompaniment, Mr. G. W. Sumner, the distinguished pupil of Mr. B. J. Lang. Mme. Rudolphsen will also be prepared to sing herself, and furnish other soloists, in Oratorio performances.

What we shall have in the way of Oratorio is not yet declared. Surely we may look to the Handel and Haydn Society for a complete performance of the "Israel in Egypt" in the right place, the Music Hall, after such earnest study as they made of it for the wrong place, the Coliseum. And we would fain trust that the old Society has still upon its heart and conscience the Bach Passion Music, not feeling much rewarded by its recent Jubilee experiences, for which the Passion Music, in the full tide of eager and most interesting rehearsal, was put aside so summarily last Spring. But there is spirit enough in the Society, we know, to give us some grand Oratorios, grandly rendered, and with far more inspiring effect than any Giltmore chorals of twenty or a hundred thousand voices could by any possibility produce.

The Symphony Concerts of the Harvard Musical Association will be ten in number, as usual, on Thursday afternoons, from three to five o'clock, and on the following dates: November 7 and 21; December 5 and 26; January 9; February 6 and 27; March 13 and 27; April 10. Carl Zerrahn will still conduct and Julius Eichberg will be at the head of the violins. The orchestra and programmes will be composed with great care and kept fully up to the standard of past years; indeed there is every reason to hope that the eighth season of these concerts will more than confirm the favor with which they have always been regarded. The series of programmes is not yet ready for announcement. Besides a few of the solo artists, among whom we may name Mme. Rudersdorff, Fräulein Therese Liebe, the young violinist, Miss Alice Fairman, contralto singer, and the ever welcome pianist, Miss Anna Mehlig, we can only speak of the list of Symphonies as yet determined, namely: of Beethoven, No. 1, in C (first time in these concerts), No. 7 and No. 8; of Haydn, No. 1, in E flat and the "Surprise" (both for the first time); of Mozart, the beautiful one in C (not the "Jupiter") given last year, and the still lovelier one in E flat; the great one in C by Schubert; Schumann in D minor (No. 4); the "Ocean" Symphony by Rubinstein (first time), and one more, which will be either a new one by Gade, or the "Italian" by Mendelssohn, or the "Cologne," in E flat, by Schumann. Of course there will be the usual amount of the best Overtures, Suites, Concertos for the piano and other instruments, &c., &c.

Theodore Thomas, with his admirable orchestra, will soon set out again upon his "missionary" circuit through the States, after a whole summer of delightful garden concerts, in which New York rejoices nightly, and for the like of which Boston, parched up by Jubilee, longeth in vain. To Thomas we look especially for specimens of the new orchestral music, doing the work of general taster for us with a range which we can scarce afford ourselves. For the first time he will introduce the vocal element into his concerts, having secured for the whole season our highly cultivated and most tasteful tenor singer, Mr. George L. Osgood. Certainly it will add a new charm to the choice feasts of instrumental music, to hear also the noble arias of Handel, Mozart, Gluck, &c., with such fine orchestral accompaniment, as well as a large store of the best songs by Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn and Robert Franz, from one who ranks among their best interpreters. The first set of Thomas concerts in the Boston Music Hall will begin Nov. 30, and continue every evening for a week, with one or two matinees besides.

In the form of matinees and soirées of classical chamber music in small, cosy halls, there is promise of abundance. The Mendelssohn Quintette Club are to remain at home, concentrating their efforts, with those of other prominent musicians and teachers, upon their new educational establishment, or "College" of Music, which will be found described below. But not the least part of the education flowing from that spring, we trust, will come in the shape of frequent hearings given by them of the sterling Quartets, Quintets, Trios, &c., of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Schumann, and the rest,—the quintessence of pure instrumental music,—that kind of musical enjoyment of which they were our chief providers for so many years, and which we have greatly missed for several winters past, while they have been travelling in the West. The composition of the Club is changed somewhat; Mr. Wolf Fries has withdrawn, and his genial presence, his refined and soulful art, will be a serious loss. His place, however, will be well supplied by Mr. Hennig, from Philadelphia, who has had the reputation of being the best violoncellist in the country. Meanwhile Mr. Fries is not lost to Boston; he will remain here, only preferring a more quiet, individual sphere, and doubtless he will often cooperate in choice Trios, &c., with artists like Mr. Dresel (who has happily returned to us), Mr. Leonhard, Mr. Eichberg, Mr. Kreissmann, Lang, Parker, Yerabo, and others, whose presence among us is guaranty enough for quantity and quality of all sorts of choice artistic musical reunions.—More, and more particular, hereafter.

Of Organ Music, the great Walcker Organ of the Music Hall will probably furnish regular and more copious supplies than ever. Indeed that well-spring, in a quiet, shady way, is open even now, throughout the summer. Mr. Dudley Buck, who has been appointed to the important office of Organist to the Music Hall Association, plays every Wednesday and Saturday noon, and for an hour on Sunday evening, before small audiences of strangers visiting our city, with a sprinkling of our own music-loving stay-at-home population. He always performs at least one good Prelude and Fugue by Bach, with a large variety of arranged pieces, variations, and improvisations well calculated to unfold the manifold resources of the instrument to curious listeners. Mr. Buck is admirably qualified for the task; and it is quite time that so noble and so delicate an instrument should be under the charge of some one responsible person, so that it may receive fair and consistent treatment. We do not understand that Mr. Buck's appointment means a monopoly on his part of the Great Organ opportunities; it will not exclude other worthy masters of the organ and interpreters of organ music; nor shall we be denied the privilege of hearing Mr. Paine, or Mr. Lang, or Mr. Thayer, or any who are competent. All the more likely shall we be to hear them, now that there is one responsible head, an organized appreciative administration.

For want of such care, on the part of one responsible person, the great instrument had become quite out of order, "demoralized" in fact. Mr. Buck is thoroughly at home in all things relating to the mechanical structure of the organ, and probably no fitter person could be found to undertake the delicate and difficult trust of keeping such a work in proper working order. The Hall itself is just now undergoing internal renovation, repainting of the walls, &c. When this is finished, the organ will be taken in hand and restored to its normal condition. Meanwhile, of course, the organ "noonings" and evenings are given at disadvantage, the organist being greatly limited in his command of means.—We trust, also, that Mr. Thayer intends to resume his autumn and spring courses of organ concerts on that other beautiful Walcker Organ in the First Church. His programmes were always very choice,—indeed almost entirely classical and full of Bach,—and open to all lovers without money and without price.

THE NATIONAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC, soon to begin its labors at the Tremont Temple, is likely to attract earnest students from all parts of the country; for the reputation of its founders, the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, is truly "national," and has always reflected credit on Boston, the home of its birth, and our whole country, as an undoubted artistic organization which has steadily gone on in a true path for twenty-three years. This little band of artists are still active and vigorous; mellowed as they are by an experience which now admirably fits them for just such an institution as the one they are starting. They are safe guides for those desiring a musical education, and students who will follow where they lead, will come out creditably. As an earnest of good intentions, the Club will have as assistant teachers in the various branches, men of high reputation. The piano department will be under Mr. B. J. Lang, who will carry out his admirable system of study, the fruits of which are seen in the persons of such artists as Moser, Sumner, Tucker, Appothorp, Dixie and others; all young men, thoroughly trained in his school, and who with Mr. Lang will work effectively together. The vocal department will be in charge of Mr. Vincenzo Cirillo, an artist-teacher of wide reputation, who comes here from the Royal College of Music in Naples, and is one of the best Italian school. Mr. Howard Ticknor, a gentleman well known in Boston as a connoisseur in the art, says of Mr. Cirillo: "He is, upon the whole, the best vocal teacher I have ever met, and he is the man of men whom I would like to bestow on Boston. I have said to myself a hundred times, that if I had the power I would send him there, to save and to develop the fine young voices which are left to go to waste, or to be ruined by the vocal school of indifferent musicians. If he could work in Boston for one year, I'll stake all my critical reputation that even the unskilful in such matters will recognize his rare merits. You know how assiduously I devoted myself during my eight years of journalism to supporting the development of good taste and good school of music, and you may be sure that I have dwelt upon the proposition con amore, and in the desire to procure for our artistic Boston, what in my day it has never had, a real education at first hand in vocal training. I have no intention of undervaluing what is done by good pupils of good masters, but I have always longed to see the good master himself among us." With such a thoroughly equipped college of music in Boston, which city also offers abundant resources for all general culture, no one need now feel the necessity of going abroad to get a good musical education.—Boston Post.

MUSICAL EDUCATION OF THE BLIND. It may be remembered that about three years ago the Harvard Musical Association gave an extra Symphony Concert "in aid of the Musical Education of the Blind,"—the practical intention being to eke out the means for enabling Mr. CAMPBELL, then the excellent teacher at the Institution in South Boston, himself blind, and standing at the head of such instruction in this country, to visit Europe. That the effort has borne fruit, if not in this locality, in England, will be seen by the following paragraph from the Traveller of Wednesday:

Mr. F. J. Campbell, late instructor of music in the Perkins Institution for the Blind, having witnessed the inferiority of the instruction which the blind children receive in Great Britain, set himself energetically to work to remedy in some measure the condition of the education of the blind in that country. Although many institutions for the education of the blind have been established throughout Great Britain, and although instruction in music has been made a specialty, it is estimated that but one per cent of their graduates have been able to support themselves by the practice of the profession of music in France and America, however, many blind men have been enabled to support themselves well by music, and have often risen to a high standing in their profession. After calling the attention of the British public to the inferiority of the system of instruction of the blind generally, and particularly in music pursued in England to that of France and America, he received the heartiest support and most cordial sympathy from many influential persons who are interested in the education of the blind, and was enabled to establish "The Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind," which has met with the highest commendation and the most gratifying success. He writes to us under the date of the 31 of August, informing us that his corps of assistants were all Americans, and that he had been assured that the introduction of the American system of education must revolutionize the education of the blind throughout the kingdom.

The Death of Dr. Lowell Mason.

Dr. Lowell Mason, Sr., well known to the American musical public as a composer, died at his residence in Orange, New Jersey, on Sunday the 11th inst., at the age of eighty-one years. He was born in the village of Medfield, Massachusetts, January 8, 1792. From his earliest childhood he exhibited the greatest taste for music, as well as extraordinary talent in that direction, becoming a teacher when a mere youth. He removed to Savannah, Georgia, in 1812, where he continued to reside for fifteen years. He first attracted public notice in 1821, by the publication of his celebrated work, "Boston Handel and Haydn Collection of Church Music," which met with great success. His Boston friends, as a consequence, were desires that he should return to his native State. He continued to reside in Savannah, however, until 1827, when he took up his residence in Boston, where he devoted himself to his favorite profession, and was instrumental in introducing vocal music into the schools of Boston and throughout New England. It was mainly through his efforts that the Boston Academy of Music was established. In 1828 his attention was called to the Pestalozzian method of teaching, which, after a thorough test, he adopted. In 1837 he went to Europe and travelled extensively, familiarizing himself with all the improvements in musical teachings and other matters pertaining to its study.

The University of New York conferred the degree of Doctor of Music on Dr. Mason in 1855, being the first musical degree ever conferred by an American college. Dr. Mason was the author and compiler of a greater number of musical works than any other American author, and some of the most popular of our modern hymns are from his pen. He devoted especial attention of late years to the subject of congregational singing in churches. He had been a resident of Orange for a number of years.—N. Y. Sun.

Lowell Mason.

We announced, yesterday, the death of a man who has, during a long life, exercised an extraordinary influence upon the educational interests of New England, and of the country at large. For forty-five years, Mr. Mason has been the head and front of popular music education in this country, and he has lived long enough to see the complete triumph of his life long labors, culminating in the Jubilee chorus, which would have been an impossibility anywhere out of New England, and was only possible there because Lowell Mason has filled that section of the country with church choirs and singing schools, and supplied them with a musical literature adapted to their special capacity and wants. One generation after another of the sons and daughters of New England have learned to read and sing the music that he has composed and printed, and his name has come down from father to son, from mother to daughter, as the chief apostle of a popular system of a branch of education, always neglected at first in new countries, but which is inseparable, in this day, from any general popular culture.

More than thirty years have passed away since the method of Pestalozzi, adopted and taught by Lowell Mason in Boston, and circulated throughout the country by means of his most wide spread collections of sacred music, "The Boston Academy Collection," and the "Carmina Sacra," has been taught in the thousands of country choirs and singing schools of America. And it may safely be asserted that Lowell Mason has been directly instrumental in teaching the rudiments of vocal music to a greater number of the people of America than have been taught in the same period through all other agencies combined.

His personal contributions to sacred music, principally in the form of hymn tunes, were very numerous, and have, in nearly every instance, enjoyed an enduring popularity. There is scarcely a collection of church music now in use either in this country or England, in which the compositions of Lowell Mason are not to be found, remarkable not only for their quiet simplicity and natural melody, but retaining a hold upon the religious world which is rarely achieved by the productions of any other modern composer.

Lowell Mason based his educational work upon the axiom that everybody, young or old, possessed of the ordinary faculty of speech, can be taught to sing. And he frequently pressed this proposition in public lectures with an enthusiastic dogmatism that carried such general conviction with it, that when he would call upon a miscellaneous audience to confirm his theory by uniting in some familiar strain of sacred music, such as the "Old Hundred," every man, woman and child would be seen at least trying to take a part.

As we have already said, all that New England has accomplished in choral music goes back for its origin to the earlier labors of Lowell Mason. He was the founder of a school, held little in esteem among the professors and students of the Italian and German methods. But it is a school that has filled New England with the singers that piled the Coliseum with the most wonderful chorus the world has ever seen; and it has laid, in thousands and tens of thousands, the foundations of a musical knowledge that has grown up to embrace an appreciation of all that is good and noble and elevating in the music of the Old World.

Lowell Mason has lived to see more fruit grown to maturity than falls to the lot of most workers in the fields of human education, and he dies, leaving an enduring monument behind him. He has taught the people their sacred songs, whoever else may have made their laws.—Phila. Bulletin, Aug. 13.

In Memoriam.

THE LATE MR. W. H. W. DARLEY.

(From the Philadelphia Bulletin.)

In the death of W. H. W. Darley, which took place on Wednesday, July 31st., almost the last link is severed between the old and new schools of music in our city. They were a body of earnest, thoughtful men, those few professors, Carr, Cross, Standbridge, Darley, and Meignen (who alone survives) and they, with their influence and the support of friends and enthusiastic pupils, were forward in all the good works in behalf of music and musicians. They founded societies, built up music halls, introduced to our fathers all the best music existing, oratorios, symphonies, concertos, urged on the opera; composed, adapted and arranged indefatigably; gave instructions in the art and science of music, and devoted especial care to the organ and the service of the church. W. H. W. Darley was with them, heart and soul, from the first. Born September 9th, 1801, in New York, he came to Philadelphia when very young, and studied music with old Benjamin Carr, an English composer, who had made his home here. Together they labored to introduce a better taste in music, and by their exertions was first produced in this country, at the old Chestnut Street Theatre, von Weber's opera of Der Freyschütz. It must have been a crude performance, very little like the subsequent representations of the same work. No orchestral score could be obtained, and Carr and Darley arranged the whole work for the instruments from a piano-forte edition. The chorus was composed entirely of ladies and gentlemen who could not be induced to appear before the public, and who, therefore, stood in the wings to sing, while ordinary supernumeraries silently occupied the stage.

In the foundation of the Musical Fund Society Mr. Darley was an honest worker, and for very many years took a prominent part in its direction. His father-in-law, the veteran artist Mr. Thomas Sully, is still one of the Vice Presidents of the institution.

In later years Mr. Darley was an originator of the Harmonic Sacred Music Society, and remained its President during its brilliant career. Subsequently he was an officer of the Mendelssohn Union. But to the general public he was best known as an organist, and as the joint editor, with J. C. B. Standbridge, of several church music books, especially the Cantus Ecclesie, a work that has been considered a standard for nearly a quarter of a century. When quite a youth Mr. Darley evinced noticeable talent for musical extemporization; he was gifted with a graceful flow of melody, and although he composed many instrumental overtures and took many prizes for Glee and Four-Part Songs, his particular inclination was for the music of the Church. The organ especially attracted his attention, as it contained the variety of tone and power suitable for the expression of his melodic inspirations. When St. Stephen's Church, Tenth street, was built, he was chosen organist, and remained there eighteen or nineteen years, holding, during part of the same period, the position of organist at Dr. Furness's Church. At St. Stephen's he developed his peculiar gift of extemporization, and was, at that time, considered the most original and brilliant performer in the city. His local reputation became very flattering, and when St. Luke's Church was built, it was made a point to secure his services, and the Messrs. Hook, of Boston, built expressly for him what was then the largest organ in Philadelphia. For thirty-two years Mr. Darley was organist of St. Luke's Church, commanding to the last the respect and admiration of his many friends among the clergy and congregation. The number of musical works he composed during these years is countless. Anthems, tunes, elaborate Te Deums and service music generally fell in profusion from his pen. He rarely published; occasionally a Christmas or Easter anthem would be coaxed from him by some friendly publisher, but he did not seem to wish that his manuscripts should become common property, preferring to confine their use to his own choir and that of his son. They all bear a strong melodic character, and are marked by a slight quaintness, showing that their composer studied in the older schools.

Since January Mr. Darley has been a great sufferer, only occasionally being able to drive to St. Luke's and occupy his accustomed place. The intense heat of July further prostrated a constitution already shaken by an extremely painful disease, and after four weeks of agonizing suffering, he expired on Wednesday afternoon, in the 71st year of his age. A disposition remarkably amiable, equable and kind, endeared him to a large circle of friends, who will sincerely sympathize with those he has left behind him, and he will be a serious loss to the Church where he has so long and so honorably officiated.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Dream, Baby, dream! 4. Eb to f. Gabriel. 30

The stars are glowing.
Hear'st thou the stream? 'Tis softly flowing.
A cradle song, but not a lullaby. The finely finished music blends well with Barry Cornwall's words.

Farwell! In After Years of Bliss. 4. F to d. Deems. 30

When other tongues shall whisper love,
And other fingers twine thee, boys.
A very good, rich melody, and cannot fail to be effective in public singing.

White Daisy. 3. Eb to e. Molloy. 30

She needs no diadem
Because her golden hair
Is so surpassing fair.
No crown can match its lustre fine.
The words, by Thomas Hood, perfectly overflow with sweetness, and the ballad, altogether, is one of the sweetest of songs.

Pretty Wild-wood Flowers. Song and Chorus. 3. C to f. Shattuck. 30

Full of joy and grace,
Darlings of the grove.
Words by Geo. Cooper.

Come back to Erin. Arranged for Guitar. 3. C to e. Claribel. 30

Come with the shamrocks and spring-time,
Mavourneen.
And its Killarney shall ring with our mirth.
Well known, graceful favorite. Arranged for Guitar.

I'd be a Star. Song and Chorus. 3. Ab to f. Murray. 30

I'd be a star to light thy way
When other lights grow pale.
Very meritorious. Will be sung more than once if "tried over" by a quartette and solo.

Darling little dainty Nell. 3. C to e. Norman. 30

If I could to thy footsteps make
This world a flow'ry dell.
The invention of a good title in composing a song is half the battle. The taking title is not more pretty than the song, which is well written and melodious.

Instrumental.

Mazurka Galante. Fragment de Salon. 4. Ab. King. 50

Changes to the keys of 3 and of 5 flats and returns, and is a very graceful combination of "fragments," each of which has its own melody.

Jolly Brothers Waltz. 3. Cummings. 30

A little set of waltzes in five divisions, each short, crisp and bright, their quick succession keeping up one's interest to the end. The melodies on which these waltzes are founded are already well known and are favorites.

Lovely Vienna Waltzes. 3. Strauss. 75

Musicians are now renewing their acquaintance with Strauss, music being aided in its interpretation by the examples of fine playing given under the direction of the composer.

Bürgersinn Waltzes. 4. Strauss. 75

"Bürgersinn" means "The People's Mind," which will be soon made up as to the superior merits of this collection of waltzes, each one characteristic, and the 10 pages of music furnishing a great variety.

New Annen Polka. As performed at the Boston Coliseum. 2. D. Strauss. 30

Perhaps a little difficult for the 2 mark, but rather easy for 3, and is worthy of notice as one of the composer's earnest pieces, and is also very pretty.

Circassian March. As performed in Boston and New York under the direction of the composer. 3. E minor. Strauss. 40

One of those pieces that represent the advance and retreat of a Military Band, but is not like any other of the kind, having great variety, and a "minor" character. There is, of course, a long crescendo and equally long diminuendo.

Trisch-Tratsch Polka. As performed at Boston and New York under the direction of the composer. 4. A. Strauss. 40

Nobody ever heard such a name before; but Trisch-Tratsch very perfectly describes the movement, which has a queer frisky twitching leap. Very lively, of course.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. a small (roman) letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 820.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 7, 1872.

VOL. XXXII. No. 12.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Two Biographies of Musicians.

From ED. HANSLIK'S review in the "Wiener Neue Freie Presse."

I.

It is not many years since Germany lost two celebrated artists,—the ballad composer, Dr. CARL LOEWE, and the piano virtuoso, IGNAZ MOSCHELES. Both musicians, who died at a very advanced age, left autobiographies, that have lately appeared in print, though in fact not autobiographies in the strict sense of the word, the books being chiefly composed of extracts from journals and private letters. When fifteen years ago I visited Moscheles in Leipzig, I was surprised at the freshness and vivacity with which the old gentleman talked of his French and English concert tours, and his recollections of Vienna. The exclamation: "You ought to write memoirs!" involuntarily escaped me. "I shall not do so myself any more," he replied, "but I guess another after my death will be able to compile something from the journals I have kept with the greatest regularity from the beginning of my artistic career to the present day." It was always Moscheles's desire that his wife, a lady who through kindness of heart, education, and the greatest refinement of manners, is an ornament to her sex, should after his death undertake the publication of the artistic experiences of a career of almost sixty years. It was she, then, who undertook the difficult charge of editing the work, the first volume of which has just appeared. ["From the Life of MOSCHELES." Compiled from letters and journals, edited by his wife. 1st vol. 1872. Leipzig.]

In Loewe's case this charge has been performed by C. H. Bitter, favorably known through his biography of Sebastian Bach and his sons,—though the last part of Loewe's biography is written by his daughter Helen.

Essentially different in their talents, in their education, their manner of life, both composers yet appear to be equally called upon to relate important and attractive experiences from their long earthly pilgrimage, and we trust, that as formerly a delighted audience listened to the artists wherever they went, so now a considerable number of sympathizing readers will follow up the recitals of the two masters.

Loewe passed through a classical education; he was a theologian and teacher at a college before he became a musical conductor; mind and education enabled him to penetrate his art reflectively too, and to communicate the result of this reflection in a choice form. Moscheles, on the other hand, who showed his destination for a virtuoso already at a very tender age, and received a purely musical education, possessed in turn great experience of the world, and the richest knowledge of men and countries. His life as well as his art were outwardly more brilliant and varied; almost always travelling, Moscheles was in fact at home everywhere, while Loewe, hedged in by narrow circumstances, was only able to make use of the vacation time for short artistic excursions.

JOHANN CARL GOTTFRIED LOEWE was born, the youngest of twelve sisters and brothers, on the 30th of November, 1796, in a small town near Halle. From his father, who was "Cantor" and teacher there, he received a strictly religious education, and the first rudiments of his musical culture.

Loewe's deep, beautiful soul betrays itself already in the manner in which he speaks of his toilful, and yet so happy childhood. He was obliged to lend a helping hand everywhere in the house, run errands, carry water, dig potatoes, and even gather up the manure made use of in the orchard. "With what pleasure," he exclaims, "did I rest during the warm summer nights, in the little thatched huts where I was sent to watch the ripening fruit!" But the most beautiful hours to him were those of the winter evenings. "When our mother had been indefatigably working for us all day, and the shadows of evening began to fall, then she sat down at the great stove; my place was at her feet, my head resting in her lap. Thus we sat for a time, half dreaming. 'Now let me alone,' she would say to father, and my sisters and brothers, and then she, whom I loved beyond all others, began to relate,—beautiful recollections from the days of her youth, old, half-forgotten stories, that even now rise up before my soul like strange fairy tales. My eyes then often wandered through the windows of our sitting room, that looked out upon an old decayed graveyard, over its crumbling mounds, and mouldering crosses, and clung to the dark foliage of the old lindens. When my mother had grown silent at length, and I pressed closer to her knees, I used to beg: 'Mama, now play us something yet;' then she would, smiling, take the violin with which my father led the choir in school, and play the most beautiful melodies on it. She had never had any instruction on the violin, yet her tone went deep into my heart." These impressions of his childhood we feel like a distant echo vibrating in many of Loewe's most beautiful ballads.

Very charmingly, too, he describes,—for the first part of this biography was dictated by himself,—his life in Koethen, a small, quiet town, as a member of the choir. "This choir, consisting of sixteen scholars, was obliged to support itself by singing three times in the street, at the doors of the more well-to-do inhabitants. The strange, old-fashioned costume of these little singers consisted of a three-cornered hat, and a long black cloak, while at the back of the head a venerable queue was suspended." From Koethen the thirteen-year-old Loewe went to Halle, where the old, celebrated harmonist, Türk, devoted himself to the musical education of the boy. After Türk's death he turned his attention to scientific studies again, and in 1817 entered the University, to study theology, according to his father's great wish. During this time he composed his first ballads, which already fully reveal his peculiar talent. His acquaintance with C. M. von Weber and Hummel, procured for him, in 1820, an appointment in Stettin as musical conductor, choir-leader at the Jacobs-kirche, and teacher at the College. Here he married, and settled down, remaining in Stettin forty-four years, always restlessly active in the cause of music, and doing untold good in the development of true musical taste and culture in his new home, and yet finding time to compose, displaying in fact a most astonishing musical productiveness.

Besides several operas and oratorios, the greater number of his ballads were composed here, which soon made Loewe's name noted and beloved in all Germany. His residence in Stettin was only interrupted by numerous short journeys, undertaken to perform his ballads in different German cities, or attend the performance of his oratorios. Of these journeys his letters give us a lively picture; but any one who should expect to find in them important ideas upon music, detailed, or even only individual opinions upon artists or works of art, would be disappointed. These communications cannot be compared to Mendelssohn's richly suggestive letters; yet, nevertheless, simple, warmly felt, and graphically told, they make a favorable impression, because they are the direct reflections of a noble, amiable nature. His journeys, taking him to almost all the chief cities of Germany, at length even to England, procured for him the acquaintance of the most noted artists, such as Spontini, Mendelssohn, Marschner, Schumann, &c.

Loewe's letters from Vienna flow over with praise and delight, so happy did he feel there. He experienced there the same peculiar charm which Vienna is wont to exercise over all tone-poets; from Beethoven, who came to Vienna for "a few months," and did not leave it again during life, to the quiet, dreamy Schumann, who confessed, in 1847, he should like best of all to settle down in Vienna, if he found a proper sphere of action there. Loewe liked best to visit at the hospitable, genial house of the Counsellor Vesque v. Pütlingen, where a soirée was given in his honor. "All were burning to hear me," he writes to his wife, "and it must be said, the Vienna people understand me, and know how to listen too; they are so extremely attentive. The domestics are warned not to allow the doors to be touched on the outside, and not an eye stirs in all heads. I sang 'Der Wirtin Töchterlein,' 'Heinrich der Vogler,' and two other compositions. My fame is gradually spreading here. If I could spend a winter here, I would not doubt being very successful. Were I ten years younger I should remain in Vienna, but now this will not do for me any more. I only see confirmed in Vienna, what I always felt,—that from the very beginning I should have been placed in larger circumstances." Material pleasures, too, Loewe knows how to appreciate, and exactly as Schumann writes after a dinner at Vesque's: "I never before had any conception of such culinary art," so Loewe confesses the "respect" he feels for the culinary art of Vienna, after dining with Vesque's father-in-law. He gave a private concert too, in Streicher's Music Rooms, as during the summer season it was impossible to succeed in giving a public one. Fame, honors, and pleasures Loewe enjoyed in plenty in Vienna; he only regrets not having come there fifteen years ago. "You splendid people have only an echo of past days in me yet." With a heavy heart he parted from Vienna to return to Stettin.

A complete catalogue of all of Loewe's compositions is a welcome addition to the biography. It mentions more than 150 works, not to speak of a number of unpublished compositions. A quiet sigh over the transitoriness of musical art, over so much love and labor lost, will probably escape every one who looks through this long catalogue. There we find symphonies, sonatas, string quartets, piano compositions, which, printed twenty or thirty years ago, have yet never gained much of a name. Loewe's operas and oratorios, too, must be looked upon as forgotten. Some of the oratorios had, it is true, during the life of the composer, a respectable success, in repeated performances; for instance, "The Seven Sleepers," "Johannes Huss," "The Destruction of Jerusalem," "The Apostles of Philippi," and "Guttenberg." Of the operas, particularly one, "The Three Wishes," has been oc-asionally performed with applause. Many single beauties as these larger works contain, it yet cannot be denied that neither the opera nor the oratorio was Loewe's real sphere. Their style appears to us to-day curiously antiquated. But we trust that Loewe's Ballads will remain a dear, living possession to the nation. The composition of the Ballad is Loewe's artistic speciality,—in this he stands as unique and unapproached as Schubert in song.

Madrigals.

[From an article on the "Rise and progress of the Madrigal in England," which appeared in the British and Foreign Review some thirty years ago, and was written, we believe, by Dr. E. F. Rieuhauf, F. S. A. The article was suggested by the appearance of the Musical Antiquarian Society's publications.]

Madrigals are peculiarly adapted to meet and satisfy the growing musical wants of the community. They were written for a musically educated people, and for a people so instructed they are still especially fitted: in fact no compositions of any subsequent age can so well supply the necessities of the present time. They repudiate all accompaniment, they need no instrument to help out or hide effects: assemble fifty or a hundred voices around a table, employ them upon a madrigal, and its perfect effect is realized. The refinements which the vocal art has in later years acquired were unknown when these compositions were written, and in their performance are not needed: still the art of rendering harmony a combination of melodies was thoroughly understood and expounded. The appearance of these sets of madrigals is therefore welcome and opportune; since they are not merely the reprints of scarce works, to be placed and to remain untouched in collectors' libraries, but the means of musical instruction and enjoyment, and accordingly we find them circulating in cheap reprints, and sung by thousands.

The history of the Madrigal, though forming but a single and, and as it may appear at first glance, an unimportant portion of the history of music, is in truth one of considerable interest. It first introduced music into society, gave it a new character and a new impulse: it disclosed the power of the art to add to the social and intellectual enjoyments of mankind, and to engage the attention of polished communities. The choicest composers of the age were madrigal writers, and to their sedulous cultivation of vocal harmony under this form we may attribute the progress and perfection of the Italian and English schools of Church music. The fate of these compositions forms an interesting chapter in the musical annals of our country. The art of vocal part-writing was very early cultivated in England, and some uncouth specimens of songs for three or four voices, by Fairfax, Redford and others still exist, prior to the adoption of the term Madrigal. This was doubtless imported from Italy, as well as the prominent features of the composition itself, which were imitated almost simultaneously by the musicians of England and Flanders; and the style of writing was so uniform in these three nations, that it would be impossible from internal evidence to class their madrigals and accurately to assign to each its true origin. In each of these countries the industry of its composers was apparent: of one of the Roman masters alone, not less than five hundred madrigals now exist; and Venice, Lombardy, Naples, Bologna and Florence contributed large additions to the general stock. These were imported into Flanders and England, and reprinted, sometimes with and sometimes without a translation. The reprints of Phalesius at Antwerp are now as frequent as the original editions by Gardano at Venice. In both countries the seed fell upon a genial soil; in England it sprang up luxuriantly. The provident care and discriminating patronage of Queen Elizabeth had ensured for the Church a succession of well trained musicians: her chapel was the nursery and the school of the great composers of the age, and as soon as the performance of madrigals became a prevalent amusement of the time, ample means of its gratification speedily followed.

The first collection of compositions in parts designed for social recreation appears to have been that of William Byrd; but these were sacred as well as secular; and the Italian word Madrigale, not having yet been adopted and anglicized, was not employed. The work was entitled 'Psalmes, Sonnets, and Songs of Sadness and Pietie (thirty-five in number), made into musick of five parts, 1588,' and was dedicated to Sir Christopher Hatton. In the 'Epistle to the Reader,' Byrd thus describes its contents:—

"Benign reader, here is offered unto thy courteous acceptance musicks of sundrie sorts, to content divers humours. If thou be disposed to pray, here are psalmes, if to be merrie here are sonnets, if to lament for thy sinnes, here are songs of sadness and pietie. Whatsoever paine I have taken herein, I shall think to be well employed if the same be well accepted, musicks thereby the better loved and the more exercised."

In this collection Byrd has set to music part of the poem printed in Percy's Reliques, 'My mind to me a kingdom is.'

In the same year appeared a collection of Italian madrigals translated into English, of which the editor was a Mr Nicholas Yonge. That the practice of madrigal-singing was now becoming prevalent, appears from the following passage in the editor's dedication to Lord Talbot, the son of the Earl of Shrewsbury:—

"Since I first began to keep house in the city, it hath been no small comfort to me that a great number of gentlemen and merchants of good account have taken in good part such entertainment of pleasure as my poor ability was able to afford them, both by the exercise of music daily used in my house, and by furnishing them with books of that kind yearly sent me out of Italy and other places. The Italian songs are for sweetness of air very well liked of all, but are most in account with them that understand the language. As for the rest, they either do not sing them at all, or at the least, with little delight. And albeit there be some English songs lately set forth by a great master of music [meaning doubtless, Byrd's collection] which for skill and sweetness may content the most curious, yet because they are not many in number, men delighted with variety have wished more of the same sort: for whose cause chiefly I endeavored to get into my hands all such English songs as were praiseworthy, and amongst others I had the hap to find in the hands of some of my good friends, certain Italian madrigals, translated most of them, five years ago, by a gentleman for his private delight, who willingly gave me such as he had, and also some others lately done at the request of his particular friends."

This collection also contains a madrigal written to the well known and often translated stanzas of Ariosto, 'La verginella è simile alla rosa.'

The popularity of this work soon induced the publication of another on a similar plan, entitled, 'Italian Madrigals Englished, not to the sense of the ditty, but after the affection of the note. Imprinted at London by Thomas Este, 1599.' The editor of this collection was a Mr. Thomas Watson. At a later period Mr. Yonge published a 'Second Book of Madrigalles to five or six voices, translated out of sundry Italian authors.'

Meanwhile Byrd had received sufficient encouragement, by the sale of his first collection, to publish another, under the title of 'Songs of sundrie natures, some of gravitie and others of mirth, fit for all companies and voyces, lately made and composed into musick of three, four, five, and six parts, 1589.' From the author's dedication of this set to Lord Hudson, we learn the growing love of madrigal-singing, and the patronage which the English musicians of that time received from their Queen.

"Having observed, Right Honourable, that since the publishing of my last labours in musick, divers persons of honour and worship have more esteemed and delighted in the exercise of the art than before, it hath greatly encouraged me to take further pains to gratifie their courteous dispositions thereunto. And to no person the dedication thereof so fitly and properly belongeth as unto your Lordship, by whom through the honourable office which you exercise about Her Majestie's person, both myself and all other Her Majestie's musicians are to be commended and protected. And for many favours to me showed, I am most deeply bound unto your Honour."

In his address to the reader Byrd also states, that since his "last impression of musick, the exercise and love of that art hath exceedingly increased,"—a fact which was soon to receive confirmation from the rapid appearance of madrigals and other compositions of a similar kind produced by the English musicians of the time. Among the most eminent and industrious of these was Thomas Morley, the well-known author of the first elementary work on music published in England in the vernacular tongue. His first contribution to the vocal part music of the time was entitled 'Cazonets, or little short songs to three voices, newly published by Thomas Morley, Bachelor of Musicke, etc., 1593.' This collection was dedicated to the Countess of Pembroke, the sister to Sir Phillip Sidney, of whom the composer says, that if her ladyship "shall but vouchsafe them her heavenly voice, it cannot be but that they will return so perfumed that the air will even be made delightful thereby." These canzonets, which are masterly specimens of three-part vocal writing, are among the very few compositions of the age which, until the establishment of the Musical Antiquarian Society, have been reprinted in modern times. We owe their scoring and republication, about thirty years since, to two members of the university of Oxford, Mr. Holland and Mr. Cooke. This set was followed by Morley's book of 'Madrigals to four voices,' published in 1594, of which a second edition was printed in 1600, and a third in score, with his Canzonets. In the succeeding year Morley published his 'Ballets to five voices,' dedicated to Sir Robert Cecil.

It will appear that already these compositions, which are so often ignorantly designated by the general appellation of Madrigals, had several distinctive titles and characters. Their individual and appropriate features are thus described by Morley:—

"The best kind of the light music which of late hath been so deeply dived into is termed Madrigal, a word for the etymology of which I can give no reason, yet use sheweth that it is a kind of music made upon songs and sonnets such as Petrarcha and many poets of our time have excelled in. As for the music, it is, next unto the Motet, the most artificial, and to men of understanding the most delightful. If, therefore, you will compose in this kind, you must possess yourself with an amorous humour (for in no composition shall you prove admirable except you put on and possess yourself wholly with that vein in which you compose), so that you must be wavering like the wind, sometimes wanton, sometimes dropping, sometimes grave and steady, otherwhile effeminate."

In 1598 appeared the first set of 'Madrigals to three, four, five and six voices, newly composed by John Wilbye,' dedicated to Sir Charles Cavendish, and in 1599 the only set of 'Madrigals to four voices' by John Benet. Such a display of musical genius and erudition, directed to the same purpose within the same time, the annals of art in this or any other nation have never recorded. Amongst a musical group so large and so gifted as Italy, Flanders and England then presented, it would perhaps be difficult to assign to any individual absolute and undoubted supremacy, but if that station can be claimed for any one, John Wilbye is the man. Regard being had to the then limited range of the composer's labors, to the means by which every effort of his mind was to be wrought out, to the absence of that coloring which instrumental accompaniment gives, and to the want of those vocal graces which a subsequent age was to develop,—considering also the prescribed range in which the harmonist was accustomed and trained to walk, and that those combinations upon which Purcell adventured in a succeeding age, were then either unknown or denounced as heresies,—the variety of character and coloring which adorns the madrigals of this great writer is surprising. Who or what Wilbye was, is unknown: that he lived in Austin Friars, and that he published two sets of madrigals, is all that the biographer can relate of him. Dowland's madrigals have less art in their texture, and as a contrapuntist he must rank below many of his contemporaries; but his 'Come again, sweet love,' will alone refute Dr. Burney's inconsiderate depreciation of his talents. Of Benet little more is known than of Wilbye: as a composer he appears, if not in the first class, yet among the first in the second: his 'O sleep, fond fancy,' and 'Flow, O my tears,' breathe the very spirit of melancholy.

A few years afterwards appeared the first sets of Michael Este, Thomas Bateson and Richard Allison. Of these very few have struggled into print since the time of their birth. Este is only known to dabbles in music by his 'How merrily we live,' which has served to enrich almost every subsequent collection of vocal harmony, whose various compilers from previous compilations have never thought it worth while even if they had the power, to see whether its author might not have produced another composition of equal merit. Bateson was the organist of Chester cathedral and afterwards of Christ church, Dublin: his reputation rests on his first set of madrigals (for of the second set only a single copy is known to exist), but these suffice to establish it: his charming madrigal 'Sister awake, close not thine eyes,' would alone fix his station as a composer.

These works carry us as far as the year 1606, and three years later the first collection of Catches appeared under the title of 'Pannellia,—Musick's Miscellanie, or mixed varieties of pleasant Round-lays and delightful Catches,' etc.; but this class of vocal compositions forming no part of the publications of the Musical Antiquarian Society, we content ourselves with this brief mention of it.

From the year 1600 to 1607 we find in addition to second sets of madrigals by composers already mentioned, the first and only collections of John Farmer and Thomas Ford. The latter, if any perfect copy exist, is very rare; nevertheless some of its contents, and such as make us wish for more, are well known,—'Since first I saw your face,' and 'There is a lady sweet and kind,'—both of which, among many other musical gems, were supplied to the Ancient Concerts by Mr. Bartleman.

The years 1612 and 1613 were signalized by the appearance of two sets of madrigals, which may rank among the highest of their class. The first by Orlando Gibbons, then organist of the Chapel Royal, and afterwards of Canterbury Cathedral. Gibbons was one of the latest, as he was one of the greatest, of the noble body of musicians to which he belonged. He was born about the time that Byrd began to draw the attention of his countrymen to secular vocal harmony, and he died in 1628 at the age of forty-five. Grandeur is the essential attribute of Gibbons's writings: harmony in its most massy and majestic form is the instrument that he wields; but his compositions are not less distinguished for the skilful texture of their parts than for grandeur of outline; they invite and reward the close examination of the artist, while they impress and delight the unlearned hearer. Few purely vocal writers have combined these qualities in an equal degree. There are thousands of compositions learnedly written, where everything is according to line and rule, where the web of harmony is skilfully woven, and all bears the mark of a practised workman, which yet fail to touch the heart, to awaken the attention and lay hold of the sympathy of the multitude. To Gibbons this power was abundantly imparted,—witness his glorious anthem, 'Hosanna to the Son of David.'

Gibbons's only set of madrigals was published in 1612, dedicated to the author's "right worthy and much honored friend Sir Christopher Hatton." This was the nephew of the celebrated Sir Christopher Hatton, who seems to have been one of the many patrons of the art to whom the English musician could then look for support. "These," says Gibbons in his dedication, "were most of them composed in your own house: the language they speak you provided them; I only furnished them with tongues to utter the same. They were taught to sing in order to delight you, and if you take pleasure in them, they have their end."

Gibbons's secular music partakes, as might be expected, of the character which is stamped upon his compositions for the church. Wilbye, Benet, Morley and Weelkes essayed every style and succeeded in all, passing "from grave to gay, from lively to severe," with equal readiness and success. Gibbons's vein was grave, and his madrigals, in subject as well as structure, are in accordance with it. We may take one of the madrigals in this set to have expressed his feelings as to the proper aim and object of the poet and the musician:

"O that the learned poets of this time,
Who in a love-sick line so well can speak,
Would not consume good wit in harmful rhyme,
But with deep care some better subj. seek:
For if their music please to earthly things,
How would it sound if strung with heavenly strings."

One, and one only of the contents of this set, 'The Silver Swan,' has been copied by successive compilers into numberless collections, but all are worthy of the author of that masterly composition: perhaps the madrigal we have quoted above, and 'Dainty fine bird,' may be ranked among the choicest of the work.

The Madrigal, like the fabled swan, seems to have sung most sweetly when death approached: for Ward's collection appeared in 1613, terminating that rich outpouring of secular vocal harmony which the preceding twenty years had witnessed. In his dedication to Sir Henry Fanshawe, Ward alludes to the decline of musical taste which was now becoming too apparent, and we may presume that he never found sufficient encouragement to prosecute his design of publishing another set:—

"Since no science carries so sufficient authority in itself, but must needs submit to that monster opinion, half truth, half falsehood, yet these compositions of mine, being fronted with your countenance, even should these prove distasteful with the quack palated, yet with the sound, unsubject to such disease of humour or appetite, I presume they will pleasingly relish, and maintain me against the corrupted number of time-sick humourists. These, honoured Sir, are the primities of my muse, planted in your pleasure and cherished by the gentle calm of your favours. What I may produce hereafter is wholly yours."

Ward was more nice in the collection of his words than most of his contemporaries.—Sir Philip Sidney's 'Arcadia' and Drayton's 'Ecollogue' having suggested most of the musical ideas of this set; and these may rank among the first of their kind. The composer of 'Die not, fond man,' 'Upon a bank of roses' and 'Phyllis the bright' may claim a place among the best part writers of the age. With Ward the last of those lights which had irradiated the musical hemisphere of England during a large portion of the Tudor dynasty expired.

One work remains to be noticed, as a part of the musical history of the age. Towards the close of Elizabeth's reign, the Earl of Nottingham, Lord High Admiral, offered a premium for the best madrigal composed in honor of the Queen. No less than twenty-two candidates appeared, and their compositions,—the majority of which were written for six voices,—were published under the title of the 'Triumphs of Oriana.' The title and plan of the work were doubtless suggested by a similar Italian one, 'Il Trionfo di Dori,' it was published in 1602. Morley being the editor, and the only unprofessional contributor being the father of Milton. The theme of every madrigal in the collection is similar, and the burden of each the same,—

"Then sang the shepherds and nymphs of Diana, Long live fair Oriana!"

The contents of this work necessarily vary in excellence.—Wilbye, Weelkes, Morley and Benet preserving their usual station. If the Queen merited such a tribute of loyalty and gratitude from the musicians of her age, she received in turn an enviable requital: her praises are wrought into lasting monuments of art, and in the reign of Victoria it is of Elizabeth that we yet continue to sing. In truth there is no other English sovereign whose name is associated with music of any intrinsic or enduring excellence. Elizabeth died in 1603, and from this period we trace the rapid decline of musical taste and the decay of musical talent in England. But let us linger a little longer on a period so full of welcome reminiscences.

That madrigal-singing was a favorite amusement of the time, is a fact resting on historic testimony and confirmed by the large supply of materials adapted to gratify it. We yet possess at least a thousand English madrigals by composers of name and note. If to these are added the madrigals imported from the various Italian states and from Flanders, it is probable that ten times this number were then amassed and in daily use in England during the twenty-five years of which we have spoken. This consideration sufficiently evinces the state of musical knowledge and its general cultivation, and all the evidence that we possess points to the same conclusion. Without quoting the well-known passage from Morley, we find this fact stated in the words of Galliard, whose testimony was derived in part from history and in part from tradition:—

"Madrigals were much in use in the time of Queen Elizabeth, in which compositions the English of that time have left proof of their ability even to vie with the best Italian composers. Nobody could then pretend to a liberal education who had not made such a progress in music as to be able to sing his part at sight; and it was usual when ladies and gentlemen met, for madrigal books to be laid before them, and every one to sing their part. I believe every one is sensible of the difficulty there would be at present [1720] of finding among the lovers of music a sufficient number qualified for such a performance. But since the glorious reign of Queen Elizabeth, music (for which, as well as her sister arts, England was then renowned all the world over) has been so much neglected, as much by the little encouragement it has received from the great as by reason of the civil wars, that at length this art was entirely lost."

This, be it remembered, is the testimony of a foreigner, resident for many years in England, and therefore not prompted or colored by national prejudice. But of the station which the musicians then occupied, there is in truth no more question than of the fact recorded by Galliard, of which therefore it is needless, though it would be easy, to multiply the proofs.

The decline of madrigal writing and madrigal singing followed soon after the accession of James I. English musicians found no favor or patronage from any of the Stuarts; and the just and liberal support they had received from the last of the Tudors was exchanged for the cold neglect from the first of the succeeding dynasty, followed by an absolute proscription from his successors. Within a few years after the succession of James, all the madrigal writers who in 1602 had sung the praises of Elizabeth were silent. In the reign of Charles I. those collections of songs began to appear which satisfied the musical desire of the time, and to which Henry Lawes was the principal contributor. In the prefatory address to his 'Airs and Dialogues for One, Two and Three Voices,' he thus censures that exclusive admiration of foreign compositions of which the Court has set the example:—

"In our generation whatever is native (be it ever so excellent) must lose its taste, because men have lost theirs. For my own part, I desire to render to every man his due, be he stranger or native. I acknowledge the Italians the greatest masters of music, but yet not all; and, without depressing the honor of other countries, I may say our nation hath had as able musicians as any in Europe. But, as in music the union and diapason are the sweetest of all chords, yet a second and a seventh, which stand next to them, are more discordant from them than any other notes in the scale,—so, as to musicians, a man's next neighbor is the farthest from him, and none give so harsh a report of the English as the English themselves."

The vocal-part writing of this and similar collections consisted of simple melodies, as simply harmonized in three parts. There was no attempt at the artful texture of the madrigal, no points of imitation, none of the evidences of skilful harmonic combination which marked the compositions of a preceding age. Musical education had declined, and Lawes and his contemporaries, if they wrote at all, were compelled to conform to the capabilities and wants of the times. The musical flame was flickering in the socket and it scarcely needed the rough blast of civil war to extinguish it.

The Annual Concourse at the Conservatoire.

BY STANLEY THORNE.

(From the American Register, Paris, Aug. 8.)

Mr. Ambroise Thomas presided for the first time this year at the annual concours of the Conservatoire, and he may be said to have now only entered upon the exercise of his duties as president. Most of my readers are familiar with the queer looking little theatre, which is, notwithstanding its quaintness, the consecrated realm of classical harmony, and the favorite temple of the old composers, whose fame is kept fresh by the masterly interpretations of their works which are to be heard there. I will pass over the appearance of the audience, which is neither very aristocratic nor distingué in appearance, the majority being composed of the parents, friends and acquaintances of the lyric aspirants, who are generally poor and who generally spring from the humblest ranks of society. Before entering upon the discussion of the merits of the candidates, I must ask a question of the direction of the Conservatoire. Why is that ugly square of brown paper pasted over the Imperial arms, leaving the gold bees out in the cold, and why is the Republic represented by a whimsical R with an intoxicated F, which, forgetting all decorum, is on the point of turning a somersault? Is all this intended to impress people with the "provisional" character of the French Republic? If it be so, the travesty is entirely out of place in a place of this kind which has no concern with politics.

The public concours has commenced with the piano examination, which does not attract so large a concourse of people as the singing days, nor does it so deeply interest the public, for the reputation of the pupils of the Parisian Conservatoire, either as regards the violin or piano, is too well established to allow of any anxiety. The fair sex carried off the palm for excellence this year; four young ladies were granted first-class premiums, namely, Mlle. Guirry, Liauzun, Pène, and Maurion, all pupils of that excellent technical professor, M. Le Couppey. M. Herz's pupils received second class premiums and accessits of encouragement. Mlle. Pène is only thirteen years of age, and has, consequently, ample time to continue and perfect her studies. The ladies, twenty in number, all played the concerto in si mineur of Hummel. The gentlemen exhibited their powers in the polonaise in mi bémol of Chopin. They numbered seven aspirants, of whom M. Bourgeois and Wormser took the first premium, being pupils of M. Marmontel, who is generally admitted to be the first instrumental teacher of Paris.

The second day was devoted to the singing class, although why it is so denominated, I cannot understand. No one seemed to be at all preoccupied with the vocal qualities of the candidates, the selection of the various pieces being dramatic and more suitable to the development of the tragic qualities than of the general style and finish of the singer. Another astonishing feature for an examination in a French school was the evident predilection manifested for the music of Verdi, more than two-thirds of the pieces being his most strongly characterized dramatic inspirations. The air from the "Ballo" was sung several times, even by a bass voice—M. Courtois. Why, at an examination of this kind, pupils are allowed or obliged by their professors to transpose, is incomprehensible. The first prize was carried off by M. Boyer, a pupil of Roger, in the air from the "Ballo in Maschera." M. Boyer is a dark-haired young man, delicate and frail in appearance, but possessing a fine baritone voice of sympathetic quality, somewhat lacking in force, which is, perhaps, due to the gentleman's feeble state of health. His interpretation was both artistic and feeling, showing that his talent is perfectly natural and almost self-cultivated. He exhibited all the possession and aplomb of a thorough artist. This is the all saving quality, by the way, of the pupils in general; what they lack in study or natural ability, they make up for in what we Yankees familiarly call brass. The second prizes were given to M. Courtois (a fine bass voice), and to M. Dereims, a tenor. M. Henschling obtained a second accessit. The female candidates were lamentably weak, and the judges demonstrated their good nature by giving them anything. Mlle. Sapon, who sang the cavatina from the "Reine de Saba" with some energy and intelligence, received a second prize which she won easily. Even the jury could not bring in a first premium. Mlle. Marcus and Vidal obtained an accessit, also with the utmost ease. Mlle. Vidal singing the cavatina from "Norma," beginning in one key and finishing in another. I now pass to the violin concours, in which I regretted to note the but too visible absence of intelligent study and proper development of the voices on the part of the professors of the vocal studies, as well as the culpable weakness of the jury. The violin examination was more than brilliant, this class maintaining its reputation as being the very first in Europe. As regards the violoncello, the result was equally satisfactory. The composition imposed was a fragment from the concerto in si mineur of Rombert. M. Loeb, pupil of M. Chevillard, took the first prize; there were two second prizes, two first accessits, one second and one third. For the violin solo the 29th concerto of Viotti in si mineur was imposed. Two brilliant renditions by MM. Turban and Seiglet carried off the first prize, in addition to which there were given three second premiums, which were well deserved, two first accessits, three second accessits, and two third. Among them were several ladies, who were nearly as strong as their comrades. M. Massart's class was the most remarkable, taken as a whole, but one and all merit high praise and encouragement.

The class for the Opéra Comique came next, MM. Leaven and Du Loch sitting among the jury, on the look out for talent and pretty faces. The first prize was again awarded to M. Boyer, who displayed his versatility in the opening scene of the "Barber of Seville"—a trying one, when dressed in a frock coat with a soft hat for a guitar. Several passages of the air and subsequent duet were remarkably given, but M. Boyer's efforts were not more meritorious or artistic than were those of M. Courtois, who appeared in nearly every scene during the day, giving the réplique to his comrades in excellent style. His voice, too, fully equals M. Boyer's; his height and extreme thinness make him, perhaps, a little awkward when gesticulating in a black coat, but unless the jury intend to make him shorter and stouter, I don't see the object in tantalizing him with a second prize, obliging him to study another year, and coupling him in the recompense, too, with M. Dereims, who is much his inferior. A first accessit was given to M. Meyronnet, who appeared in the opening scene of the "Dragons de Villars." No first premium was granted to the ladies, which was just; but, per contra, there was too much leniency exhibited in the distribution of the second prizes. Mlle. Bureau sang the air from the "Nores de Figaro" very well, and deserved encouragement; but Mlle. Chevalier was remarkably weak and inefficient in "Acteon," and in the other scenes in which she seconded her fellow aspirants. Mlle. Thibault appears to be laboring under a severe affliction of the throat, but her appearance, dialogue, and gestures, were piquant and graceful, and she richly merited the unanimous first accessit with which the jury rewarded her efforts as an aspirant for comic opera. Mlle. Lacourrière, who appears to desire to pluck the laurels from Mme. Galli-Marié's brow, must study hard, long, and earnestly to soften the tones of an unsympathetic organ, and also to modify the abruptness of her gesture and carriage.

Next in turn came the Grand Opera. The first prize was again won by M. Boyer in the difficult scene with Gertrude in "Hamlet." The young man's voice appeared to be even fuller and more agreeable in quality than during the other trials, while his action and expression were almost perfect. Rumors of his being engaged by M. Haulanzier were repeated during the audition, and it is more than likely that such is or will be the fact, for the director sent for the promising young artist immediately after his scene. The second prize was awarded unanimously to M. Dereims, who appeared successfully in "Faust," in the "Africaine," and in "Favorita," giving the "Spirito gentil" with charming effect. The first accessit was given to M. Meun, which was very right, but the same favor should have been extended to M. Auger, who rendered the mad scene from "Charles VI." most ably, and who has been overlooked by the jury throughout the session. This incident gave rise to a demonstration of discontent on the part of the public, which was ineffective though well merited. The first premium for the ladies was awarded to Mlle. Vidal, who sang several scenes from the "Africaine" earnestly and acceptably when considered as a pupil, but feebly when gratified with a first class prize. The second prizes were accorded to Mlle. Wagner and Tapon, the former appearing in the third act of "Faust," the latter in the "Favorita." If Mlle. Vidal had been included in the second premium and the first had been put aside as it has been all along, the decisions would have worn a fairer and more impartial aspect. Mlle. Assenat took the only accessit, and her scene from "Robert le Diable" left much to be desired even for that recompense. The general concours on the part of the ladies was very feeble, exhibiting want of study, a large amount of pretension, and insufficient natural ability to support the amazing aplomb exhibited.

M. Jules Simon's Address.

PARIS, Aug. 14th.

The address of M. Jules Simon at the distribution of prizes at the Conservatoire has made so great a sensation in the art world of Paris, owing to the attack on M. Auber's memory, that it may be interesting to your readers to reproduce it.

"Gentlemen," began the Minister of Public Instruction, "whenever we assemble to reward and encourage the living, it is due that we pay the dead a just tribute of gratitude and regret." The Minister went on to enumerate the losses to art since 1870, referring especially to Fétis, Samson of the Comédie, author and actor, Auber, Levasseur, and Carafa. "I admit," he said, "that composers—particularly such composers as Auber and Carafa—may dispense with our funeral eulogium; besides the Institute owes them a panegyric. But the executors, the comedians who have merited, either by their art or science, to be professors at the Conservatoire, and whose praises no perpetual secretary will sing, deserve their titles recalled, their services appreciated, their glory consecrated, here in the midst of passionate lovers of the ideal—deserve also to be held up as a pattern to that youth whose task it is to continue their traditions. Executants leave only their name behind them: it is our duty to defend this, through gratitude as well as in the obvious interest of our own pleasures. I know that Talma and Rachel will be remembered as long as dramatic art endures, and yet those who have heard Talma are already becoming rare. A few years more and no longer will be remembered the enthusiasm we have felt, but only the enthusiasm we have heard described. These are the glories which disappear, like those faithful reproductions of nature which the sun gives us in a few minutes and which he takes away again in a few years. Not the less are they true glories, well merited, dearly earned. We who form the public owe more to artists than to doctors, for they charm away our cares for a space—more than to philosophers, for they inspire in us the splendor of the beautiful, whose mature philosophers do not always succeed in explaining. We owe to them those rare moments when imagination creates an und so new world, peopled with phantoms that attract or repel, and when our spirit is flushed with that exalted pleasure of which Aristotle speaks, and which comes with the exercise of all our faculties; real pleasure, albeit produced by an illusion, as are produced most of our pleasures, and of which the memory lasts unto our latest sigh—softening us, and consoling, and strengthening."

Composers and dramatic authors, in whose presence I speak now, you are still further in the debt of these executive artists. You, like ourselves, owe them the pleasure which their art gives, and, still more than we, a portion of your glory, perchance of your genius. No doubt you stand before your orchestra like the organist before his keyboard. "Tis you who think and dream, you who unchain or call the storms,

Tollers sea ponere vult frons;

you who bid us smile or tremble at your will. But if the artist have not cultivated his voice, if he be not master of his instrument, if he do not thoroughly know the secrets of his art, if he prove only the inanimate interpreter of your passion, if he do not so to speak face himself into you, living your life, vibrating with your enthusiasm, you are like an orator whose tongue has suddenly dried up, and who feels in him great emotions and the clear strength of eloquence without being able to communicate these to the heart and soul of the crowd. When Hahnemann began to play Beethoven's symphonies in this very hall, Beethoven was already admired, but he was not loved, not understood, or at least not understood as he is now a-days. I was present some years ago at the reproduction of "Orpheus" with a friend of mine near whom I sit every day in a very different place, and who had heard Louis Mouret in that part, the father of the tenor whom we have admired in "Guillaume Tell." When he came to the celebrated passage, "I have lost my Eurydice," Orpheus first sang it near the tomb in a moved, pathetic voice, and according to tradition he should have stopped there and re-acted the singing in the same fashion; but all at once, darting down the stage, he gave vent to his grief in cries so terrible that the audience were touched to the very depths. "That is new," exclaimed my friend. There was Gluck, the master of calm and mighty passion, but there was another artistic soul. Thus the same thought clothes itself anew, passing from one virtuoso to another; and this is why the great composers do not pronounce a verdict on their work, nor finally decide until having heard them executed by the masters.

So it is with the theatre. Molière consulted his servant and did not consult Armande Béjart; but rest assured he studied her and she no less taught him more than one secret in dramatic art. Masters have arisen since Molière, who, sometimes like him though in different degrees, combining the author's talent to the comedian's, at other times limiting their ambition to interpreting the works of others, have by dint of work and experience acquired a learning, a correctness of judgment and precision of execution which have made them at once excellent actors and incomparable professors. There are performances at the Théâtre Français which form vivid and profound lessons in literature. You will find better commentators on Molière there than at the Sorbonne: allow an old Professor of the Sorbonne to say so much without failing in respect towards his successors and his own master. It was there that Molière stood while playing his part. He sat in that chair, he wore that costume, he made that motion, and even, oh Boileau! he wrapped himself in that cloak. It was there too, great genius as he was, he fell into exaggeration; for if he more than any other man led his age, he yet committed mistakes. The great man's mistake has reigned undisputed so many years; they will tell you how many, for they keep count with pious care of the least modification of voice or gesture; even a smile has its history. Then there comes to the house of Molière some great master of the art of understanding and expression, and he sets the point right—not without a battle-though. A controversy springs up in theatre and hall, critics intervene, the Académie pronounces its verdict, and at last all is settled: thus is the proper gesture, the deep tone. Are these trifles, gentlemen? No, it is psychology, literature, art, and therefore the most serious matter in the world.

I would impress on executants that the fate of masterpieces in a great measure depends on them, and that therefore they belong to the masterpieces. It is a great name, that of artist, and it should be nobly borne and rendered worthy by the work of a whole lifetime, and especially by obstinate and persevering toil during the first years. To run through the Conservatoire rapidly acquire there some facility, a common cleverness, and then leave it before studies are finished, out of desire for gain and through distaste for work, is to abandon the art for the trade—is to desert. Know that the most illustrious virtuoso who has arrived at the height of popularity and success, should still work, and work every day, under penalty of decay. I am reminded at the moment that Auber was for thirty years your director. I am far from wanting in respect for one so greatly and so legitimately famous, but I do not hesitate to add that he should not have made a master of studious youth. Read him from beginning to end; follow his history from the commencement: his name is facility. Everything succeeded with him in art and life. The smallest musicians understood him and liked him at first sight, and one felt that his aim came of themselves and cost him no effort. There is more work in the shortest scene of Les Huguenots than in all La Muette, which is a masterpiece however. Ay, that man produced more than any one, yet it is certain he never worked. It has been said he was ignorant;—not at all; but he must have known without having learned; for Auber taking pains is as impossible to fancy as Auber writing coarse or tiresome music. He was a magnificent exception, whose place was never here. The director of the Conservatoire is a Cherubini, a Gluck, a Beethoven—genius strengthened by labor and aggrandized by science.

Gentlemen, love the beautiful and study your art: such is the virtue of your state. Everywhere are recited these three words: the True, the Beautiful, the Good; these are the stern trinity that represents Philosophy, Art, and Morals. To discover the true, to express the beautiful, to know and practise duty, are the three vocations for which alone we are in the world. You have chosen the finest part; I consecrate you therein. Enter on your career with the faith and courage of a soldier marching against the foe. You will gather perhaps as much hooting as applause. Glory is to be made by criticism as well as by praise, by detraction and hatred as well as by enthusiasm. And just as in the strife of politics a man finds strength and consolation in the feeling of right, in the firmness of his convictions and the warmth of patriotism, equally so in the battle of art, it is of art he must think, it is for her he must live and through her."

The above speech was frequently interrupted by applause from the entire audience. At the close the distribution of prizes commenced. A pupil of the tragedy-class, M. Dupont-Vernon called the names of the laureates, who came up to receive their rewards from the hands of the Minister. First of all M. Buyer was called up, who had been lucky enough to gain the first prize for singing, the first for opera, and the first for opéra comique, as well as the prix d'honneur. This last was founded some years ago by the widow of Nicodami, an old professor of the pianoforte at the Conservatoire. The prize consists of 500 francs a year.

When the distribution was over, the croix de chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur was conferred upon three professors: M. Mathias (singing), M. Elwart (ex professor harmony), and M. Regnier (dramatic declamation).—Curr. London Orchestra.

A Musical Reminiscence. Meyerbeer as a Leader.

A writer in the Tripod, who resembles "Charles Auchester" in his passionate fondness for music and musical celebrities, gives the following leaf from his book of personal experiences:

The Huguenots was to be performed for the first time in Brunswick, Germany, some time in the neighborhood of 1845, and Meyerbeer was to "conduct" in person. I had been present at all the preliminary rehearsals, and the music had taken such a powerful hold on my youthful imagination (as no music before nor since), that when I heard within a few feet of me, on the eventful day, an introduction: "Herr —, Capellmeister Meyerbeer," I looked around and lo! I beheld the (to me) demigod and ideal of grandeur—the great man whom I had pictured as an Apollo, sixteen feet high, with bâton instead of a club. There he stood a little Jew, muffled up, and a pearly dew-drop hanging on the end of his nose, with a sharp crack in his laugh, so utterly unlike the bâton of the fourth act that I then refused, nor could I since bring myself to accept, the real for the ideal composer. Yet I stood trembling in his presence, examining with wonder the man who wrote that marvellous fourth act: and when he invited me to get out under his feet and not stand in his way so, I felt gratified that he noticed a small boy like me, but did not leave.

He conducted the largest general rehearsal sitting in an arm chair on the stage, leaving the time in a quiet, unostentatious manner, lifting the bâton hardly two inches from his knee; but now and then a quick, nervous motion of the bâton, which communicated itself to the orchestra somewhat like an electric shock, bringing instantly the fs. made one feel the force which he might let loose, but held subdued. The excitement was so intense in the orchestra, that when the apparently unconcerned old man lifted the bâton higher, then the left hand, and finally himself, rising slowly with the crescendo, the musicians in several instances unconsciously half arose out of their seats under the spell of inspiration. Once he rapped on the floor, requesting one of the first violins to hold in a little and not let the music run away with him; then, speaking to some one behind the scenes, directing him to remove that boy (pointed at me). "because he keeps howling in an unearthly manner"—i. e., in laudable endeavor to keep my voice in unison with the first violins carrying the melody. My cup of happiness was full at being noticed again, this time before the combined chorus and orchestra; it was only after contracting most solemnly to keep the peace that I was permitted to remain.

I must here mention that I was a sort of fixture (not even ornamental, but useless) in said orchestra, being tolerated there because I sustained filial relations to the corno Inglese; one of the D flutes was my uncle, and I claimed a general friendship with the trombones, being only at loggerheads with the first violins, on account of the above mentioned failing, which was the result of too much enthusiasm. My invariable place at every rehearsal and performance was in the corner at the left and next to the conductor's desk; so when the evening came I was in my place, and had the best opportunities to observe the great master of modern orchestration.

When he made his appearance in the orchestra, a deafening applause greeted him, which he acknowledged with a slight turn and inclination toward the audience, while divesting himself of his cloak, out of the pocket of which he took his bâton, a little black stick apparently whittled with a knife; he then stepped up to his desk, and after blowing his nose with a dreadful snort, lifted his wand, and a death-like silence prevailed for nearly a quarter of a minute. I watched the stick, and when it descended and was checked with a slight twitch, there proceeded, seemingly out of the end of it, the low rumbling of the long drums—another twitch and silence again—this repeated, and the grand old chorale began to whisper its way through the maze of harmony, until it finally swelled into an anthem inexpressibly glorious when played by such an orchestra.

All through the performance I was too much excited to remember much beyond the figure before me, placid and untouched by the fire of his matchless, passionate, wondrous music—with a stoop in his shoulders, heavy eyebrows, overshadowing a nose which had just enough curve at the end to proclaim the son of Abraham, which latter, by the way, has since risen in my estimation fifty per cent. on account of his children, Meyerbeer and Mendelssohn.

After the performance, on my way home, I must have been still under the intoxicating influence of the trance which held me enchained during the whole evening; for I was arrested by the "Nachtwächter" for making the night hideous with frantic attempts at singing, or rather screaming, the great duet of the fourth act, soprano, tenor, and all the orchestral parts at the same time, and which homage to the great genius who had presided that evening was not fully appreciated by the unpoetical nondescript with the lantern, who had held me by the collar until I had finished the ravishing strain; then, becoming better acquainted with him, and "after a short but eloquent speech, setting forth the importance of the occasion which had brought us together," I insisted on accompanying him to the station house.

At the close of the opera, the Duke "ordered" the orchestra and singers to the palace, for the purpose of having several scenes repeated to him, which was intended as a great honor. Mr. Meyerbeer did not go, but sent a note to his Highness the next morning, saying that he forgot all about it.

Of his works I will say nothing—the world has given its verdict: "Before him the composers of Fidelio and Don Juan—after him—nobody—or as Heine has it: Meyerbeer has rendered all previous dramatic music doubtful, all future impossible."

"Nothing New Under the Sun."

The Boston Festival was, no doubt, rather original; but in many of the peculiar effects which were introduced into its musical elements, it cannot claim to be unique. For instance, already in the 17th century artillery accompaniments have been successfully tried, at least if we may call a great deal of noise a success. In the way of gigantic instruments, Boston has not out rivalled the specimens which an entertainment of a somewhat analogous nature gave birth to, i. e., if we may believe what the erudite writer of a paper appearing in one of the most valuable and interesting of German periodicals communicates to its readers. We allude to an article contained in No. 29 of the Gartenlaube, an illustrated paper, very widely circulated in Germany. It is entitled: "A Proof that there is nothing new under the Sun," and the writer gives us the following narrative in support of this apparent truism, a narrative of sufficient interest, we consider, to warrant its translation into the vulgar tongue. "Unique in the annals of music is undoubtedly that concert which was given in Dresden on the 13th of July, in the year 1615, at the request of the reigning Grand Duke Johann Georg, of Saxony. It was intended that this grand concert should consist of a performance of some work in the form of an oratorio, treating upon the history of Holofernes. The libretto was written by a certain Mathias Pflaumenker, and the music was composed by the royal choirmaster, Grundmaus. The latter submitted a sketch of a programme to the Duke, which obtained not only the sanction of that exalted potentate, but also procured for its originator a present of five barrels of beer from the royal brewery, with the orders that he was to excel himself in producing something extraordinary, something quite original and exceptionally peculiar. Acting upon these orders, Grundmaus issued an invitation to all the musicians of Germany, Switzerland, Poland, and Italy, to take part with their pupils, in a grand musical festival in Dresden. On the 9th of July, 1615, the day of St. Cyrillus, there were no less than 576 instrumentalists and 990 singers assembled in Dresden, native artists not included. The instrumentalists who came from all points of the compass brought with them, in many cases, instruments of quite a novel construction. Of these, the most striking was a gigantic double bass, the property of a Pole named Rapotzky. It was placed upon a waggon drawn by eight mules, and measured no less than eighteen feet in length. A small ladder was ingeniously placed against the instrument, and upon this the musician ran up and down with wonderful agility, playing his part with the utmost precision. A student from Wittenberg, undertook the part of Holofernes, and in order to keep his worn-out bass voice in something approaching a decent condition, he had the ducal authority to prime himself with beer all day long previous to the performance, at the expense of the princely host. The 13th day of July, 1615, witnessed the grand performance, the scene of which was a small hill in the vicinity of the city. Here were stands for the court and audience in general, besides stages and stands for the performers, both instrumental and vocal. Fearing that the gigantic double bass of the Polish gentleman, notwithstanding its enormous size, would not be powerful enough for the rest of the instruments, the choir-master and conductor Grundmaus caused a rather thick rope to be stretched upon the four sails of a windmill which stood upon the top of the hill where the concert was held, and with the assistance of an instrument very much like a wooden saw, sounds resembling those emanating from a legion of violins were sawed out of this novel addition to the orchestra. An enormous organ was built expressly for the concert, and it occupied a prominent position upon the incline of the hill. The organist was a priest named Serapion, who made use of his fists in playing this instrument. Instead of drums, large brewing cauldrons were made use of, but as the conductor was afraid that even these would be drowned by the sounds of all the other instruments, he obtained the permission of the Grand Duke to introduce artillery, and several cannons were loaded and discharged by the head artillery-man at certain passages in the music. This performance was most successful, and the thousands who witnessed it were greatly pleased at the various novel effects which the composer made use of. Donna Bigozzi, from Milan, distinguished herself greatly among the vocalists, but she unfortunately exerted herself so much in rendering the runs and shakes which fell to her share, that she expired three days after. The student who took the part of Holoferne, sang one aria with such a powerful bass voice, that he made everybody and everything tremble and vibrate. The entertainment was brought to a close with a double fugue, which led to a pitched battle between the Dresden choir and the foreigners. The latter, who in this passage represented the flying Assyrians, were pelted with rotten apples and lumps of clay by their Dresden brethren, who were supposed to be triumphant Israelites, and this unexpected finale was greatly enjoyed by the Grand Duke, who laughed till the tears ran down his cheeks. It was only with extreme difficulty that the foreign choristers could be hindered from returning the salutes, otherwise the festival might have terminated in a sanguinary engagement between the rival vocalists. The choir-master Grundmaus, the originator and conductor of the fete, received in remuneration of his services a cask of wine and 50 ducats from his princely protector. Does not this beat the Boston affair hollow?—London Mus. Standard.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, SEPT. 7, 1872.

[For the following description of a peculiarly American institution, our readers are indebted to one of the most intelligent and earnest teachers of the West, Mr. W. S. B. MATHEWS, of Chicago, who has from time to time contributed so much valuable correspondence to our columns.]

The "Normal" Music School.

Whoever reads the musical papers will notice some time in May the advertisement that a Normal Musical Institute is to be held at so and so, beginning early in July and continuing six weeks. Then follow the names of two or three distinguished teachers and the address of the Principal. This year there were about a dozen schools of this class held in different parts of the country. They are all on the same general plan, and each one is in charge of some more or less distinguished writer of psalmody. All these schools sprang from one root—the music teachers' "Convention" formerly held in Boston under Dr. Lowell Mason's direction. At first they were intended exclusively for singing teachers, and their leading class was that in "method of teaching." It was in this class that Dr. Mason had the most wonderful success; for he possessed the very perfection of a teacher's manner, having a clear and simple style of speech, a kindly way and rare skill and tact in leading a class by questions to reason out the whole subject for themselves. His more celebrated pupils were also good teachers; Bradbury, Woodbury, Root, Seward, and the rest. Still in all that constitutes a teacher I must be permitted to cherish my boyhood's illusion that Dr. Mason was facile princeps.

The original school of this kind had a class in voice culture, and I think the first one was conducted by Mr. Geo. F. Root. And much need was there for it; for the singing master with his infinite notions of intonation, and his utter ignorance of any right method of producing and delivering the tone, was in danger of losing his voice at just the age when it would begin to be profitable to him. Very soon, however, Mr. Geo. James Webb began to conduct voice classes, and his simple method has had great influence on those who have come within reach of his teaching.

The other principal element of the work of the "Normal" was the practice of heavy choruses, for which the quality of the singers gathered and their enthusiasm gave rare opportunity. The remainder of the working day was filled up with harmony classes, psalmody, practice, &c.

The practice of heavy choruses necessitated the employment of a good pianist to play the accompaniment, and this afforded opportunity for a few enterprising singing masters to pick up a few notions in the matter of accompanying and elementary playing. And so began the introduction of piano lessons.

The first conductors of these schools were distinctively teachers; but when it was discovered that all the pupils became disciples of the Principal, and used his books in teaching, every other author of a singing book found it necessary to hold a "Normal" in the summer in order to secure an adequate following. And this is the situation at the present time.

But the strong competition between these schools has led to a great strife in the matter of the employment of distinguished teachers; and the employment of a number of good musicians, again, has led to a great improvement in the artistic tone of the schools, and a gradual minifying of what was originally the whole school, namely, the Singing-Teacher's Class. For as soon as you introduce heavy choruses, and begin to speak of really artistic instrumental music, you throw into decided shade the merely A-B-C work of the ordinary singing school. And so it happens that for ten years past a constantly increasing attention has been given to private lessons in singing and on the pianoforte.

The growth of pianoforte instruction in the "Normal" has been chiefly remarkable within four years, and dates more particularly from Mr. William Mason's engagement in Mr. Root's "Normal" at South Bend, Ind., in 1870. At the Normal of the preceding year held at Janesville, Wis., we had, I think, some twenty piano and organ pupils, nearly all of whom were very indifferent players. At South Bend, where, also, I had the pleasure of assisting Mr. Mason, we had about forty piano pupils. The following year Mr. Mason was employed by Messrs. Seward and Allen in the "Normal" held at Binghamton, N. Y. Here we had about fifty piano and organ pupils. This year at the same place we had sixty pupils in the same department, who took about four hundred and thirty lessons, and would have taken about fifty more if the teachers had been able to work more hours. This same year, also, I hear that Mr. Root's school in Chicago had a large instrumental class taught by Mr. Robert Goldbeck and Mr. E. E. Whittemore. And at the same time Mr. H. S. Perkins held a "Normal" at Racine College, Wis., where Prof. J. C. Fillmore, a Leipzig graduate, had a large class. It is easy to see, therefore, that fully twice as many piano pupils have resorted to "Normals" for instruction this year as ever before. I am not sure but the proportion is even greater, for I have no statistics of the four or five schools of this kind held in Ohio and elsewhere. But not only has the number of pupils been greater, the quality has also been better. We have had a more intelligent class, and those who had more artistic cultivation than was formerly the case. Whether the schools did them any good, the reader must judge from the following account of the exercises in one of them.

The Binghamton school is organized in two separate departments, the Vocal and the Instrumental. The former is managed by Messrs Theo. Seward and Chester G. Allen, the latter, by Mr. Mason and the writer. This dual organization allows more latitude in adjusting rates of tuition and providing classes; for instrumental teachers understand best the real wants of their department. In the Vocal Department the teachers were: Mr. George James Webb, voice culture; Mr. Chester G. Allen, voice and harmony; Mr. Theo. Seward, method of teaching and chorus-conducting; Mr. Henry Harding, voice and elementary work; Mr. B. C. Unseld, children's class. The public exercises were daily as follows: at 8.30 A. M. came devotional exercises and calling the roll; at 8.45, general exercise in psalmody and choir singing; at 9.30, singing teacher's class (by Mr. Seward); 10.30, popular vocal training (by Mr. Allen); 11.15, technical vocal training (by Mr. Webb); 2 P. M., experimental teaching class (by Mr. Seward); 3, harmony (by Mr. Allen). In the evening four times a week was held the chorus practice. This scheme provides, it will be seen, admirably for singing teachers; for in the teachers' class Mr. Seward pursues the method laid down in "The Music Teacher," the book which he assisted Dr. Mason to make; a method which I suppose has never been surpassed. I ought also to speak more particularly of Mr. Allen's class in vocal training, of which I heard very complimentary accounts from the teachers benefitted by it. Besides the class exercises in voice culture, a large number of the pupils take private lessons in singing. Probably something more than three hundred private lessons in singing were given.

In the Instrumental Department there were this year but two teachers, Mr. William Mason and the writer, Mr. Buck being unable to come. There were two classes. The Musical Grammar class was held at 8 A. M. It discussed the subject in the method of off-hand lectures, going over the topics of keys, scales, chords, cadence, modulation, pedal point, suspensions and other dissonances, voice movement, counterpoint, imitation, canon, fugue, phrase, period, song-form, rondo, sonata, and variable forms. As all the points were illustrated by citations from the better class of writings (principally from classic works) opportunity was given for a considerable amount of aesthetic talk about music in general. The Piano Teachers' class came at 4.15 P. M. and, though less systematic than the one just described, it was so not from want of care on the part of the teachers, but from the exceedingly imperfect state of present knowledge on the subject. I believe a great deal has been done by Mr. Mason towards bringing piano-teaching into some really scientific form; and of the great value of this class at Binghamton there were not two opinions among the pupils. Twice a week there were piano recitals by Mr. Mason. These were familiar talks about the music (always very short, however), and such admirable playing as it is a real pleasure to hear. I can give a better idea of these by citing the first four programmes than in any other way.

Sonata Pathétique, Op. 23.....	Beethoven.
Nocturne, No. 1, Op. 21.....	Schumann.
Arabesque, Op. 18.....	Schumann.
Polonaise in C sharp minor, Op. 26.....	Chopin.
Spring Dawn Mazurka Caprice.....	Mason.
Reverie, "Au Matin".....	Mason.
Dance Rustique.....	Mason.
Sonata, Op. 25.....	Beethoven.
Nocturne, Op. 21, No. 6 and 7.....	Schumann.
Impromptu Fantasia.....	Chopin.
Waltz in C sharp minor.....	Chopin.
Gavotte.....	Dupont.
Berceuse.....	Mason.
So-So Polka.....	Mason.
Sonata, in F minor, Op. 2, No. 1.....	Beethoven.
Phantasiestücke, Heft I, Op. 12.....	Schumann.
Ballade, in A flat.....	Chopin.
Spinnelied.....	Litoff.
On-ét-pl-pl-nel (Urban Dance).....	Richard Hoffman.
Romance Etude.....	Mason.
Sonata, in C sharp minor (Moonlight).....	Beethoven.
Romance, in F sharp.....	Schumann.
"Warum" (by request).....	Schumann.
En e vom Lied, Op. 12.....	Schumann.
Etude, in C sharp minor.....	Chopin.
"If I were a Bird".....	Henselt.
Improvisation on "The Last Rose of Summer".....	Mason.

There were weekly concerts, and that was the reason of the absence of especially concert music from the recitals. The improvisations were altogether unique, such as no one but Mason would give—so elegant, yet often so grotesque, and remarkably impressive and fascinating to the audience. The remainder of the time of the instrumental pupils was filled up with private lessons and practice. Owing to the large number of pupils desiring lessons from Mr. Mason, it was found necessary for each pupil to take one lesson a week of him and one of the writer, an arrangement which turned out to the satisfaction, I believe, of all parties. The technical lessons were given according to the Mason system, of which it is one great beauty that it takes comparatively little time but leaves the teacher free to devote the greater part of his attention to phrasing and artistic playing. In the course of this teaching I was repeatedly struck with the care with which Mr. Mason prepared new pieces for pupils. All the difficult passages had the fingering marked, every unusual position of the hands was explained, and he invariably heard the pupil read the piece through the first time. I have never seen so much done for a pupil in one lesson as was done here. And at the end of the term I was impressed with the remarkable improvement pupils had made—even those who at first I thought in too immature a state to receive any permanent impression in five weeks. One of these, who spent the first three weeks on one piece, Jungmann's "Spinning Wheel," told me, "These lessons are worth all I ever took before, for I have now learned how to study, and can go on with some intelligence."

A similar state of things I found to prevail among Mr. Webb's pupils in singing. Though of course five weeks is as inadequate a time to form a voice as a pianist, there are some things that can be taught even in this time. Namely, the proper formation and delivery of the tone, and the true method of phrasing and studying a new piece. A pupil once on the right track in respect to these points will not afterwards go far astray.

Of the public concerts I need not speak except to say that it would be difficult to hear better chorus singing.

Here in Chicago, at Mr. Root's school, I hear fine accounts of Mr. Fred. Root's Harmony classes, and of the graded system of singing teaching, as illustrated by Messrs. O. Blackman and E. E. Whittemore. Both these gentlemen are remarkably clear and successful teachers, and in these classes had the advantage of going over the ground of their daily experience for some years. The other exercises of the school were on the same general plan as those at Binghamton, except that they had here no piano-teachers' class nor Musical Grammar.

